69830

69890

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE,
FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE,
DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

VOLUME CXLVI

JANUARY 1, 1938, to JUNE 25, 1938

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK
495

69890

INDEX TO VOLUME CXLVI

JANUARY 1, 1938, to JUNE 25, 1938

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 28	January 1	369-396	April 2
29- 56	January 8	397-424	April 9
57- 84	January 15	425-452	April 16
85-112	January 22	453-488	April 23
113-140	January 29	489-516	April 30
141-168	February 5	517-544	May 7
169-196	February 12	545-572	May 14
197-228	February 19	573-600	May 21
229-256	February 26	601-628	May 28
257-284	March 5	629-656	June 4
285-312	March 12	657-682	June 11
313-340	March 19	683-710	June 18
341-368	March 26	711-737	June 25

A

- Academic freedom
  - Schaper case, justice done; EP......... 199
  - Washington, university of; revolt. C. Stevens; C......... 543
- Ackerberg, Robert E., junior
  - Chicago conditions; C...227; see also... 149
- Adams, Franklin P.
  - "Here comes the milkman"; P......... 387
- Addresses, commencement; E......... 687
- Adventures of Chico, the. M. Van Doren; MP......... 310
- Adventures of Marco Polo, the. M Van Doren; MP......... 484
- Adventures of Robin Hood, the. M. Van Doren; MP......... 653
- Advertising and politics. H. Kravif; C..... 27
- Aggression; penalty of failure to face. Low; Ct......... 232
- Agriculture; bill, new, provisions; EP...... 198
  - Farm aid—fourth stage. M. Ezekiel; S.. 236
- Aitken, Walter
  - Montana opinion; C......... 682
- Aitken, Webster, pianist. B. H. Haggin; M. 163
- Alexander, Robert
  - On The Nation; C......... 709
- All the living. J. W. Krutch; D......... 422
- Allen, Devere, and others
  - The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C......... 569
- Allen, Robert G., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Alsberg, Henry G., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......7; see also C...... 195
- Aluminum company of America; monopoly suit against; EP......... 684
- America and Europe; E...259; see also C... 367
- American federation of labor
  - Conflict with C. I. O. By P. Y. Anderson; S......... 147
  - Los Angeles. O. Carlson; S......... 43
  - Opposition to Labor's non-partisan league; EP......... 399
  - Peace with Committee for industrial organization, attempts; EP......... 575
- American guide series; honor for workers. H. G. Alsberg; C...195; see also.... 7
- American labor party of New York, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- American legion, and pensions. M. S. Hayer; S......... 586
- American medical association; revolt grows; EP......... 454
  - See also Medicine
- American newspaper publishers association, convention; EP......... 518
- American telegraph and telephone company; report shows monopoly; EP......... 398
- Amlie, Thomas R., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Anderson, Paul Y
  - Black, Justice, dissents; S......... 634
  - Business, big and little, and the administration; S......... 175
  - Chamber of commerce of the United States, meeting; S......... 551
  - Childs, Marquis W., and Justice Black; S.........579; see also E......... 577
  - Congressional fade-out; S......... 689
  - Democratic party, fight for control; S... 715
  - Embargo on shipments to Spain; S..... 494
  - Fascism—American style; S......... 347
  - Fight on spending; S......... 459
  - Finance, public; government spending to be resumed; S......... 431
  - Florida primary election, Democratic; S 551
  - Ford and Republic steel, government cases against; S......... 524
  - Gannett, Frank E., and the government reorganization bill; S......... 375
  - Girdler must pay; S......... 431
  - Government reorganization bill, revival possible; S......... 551
  - Hoffman attack on the C. I. O.; S...... 689
  - Iowa and Kentucky primaries; S....... 689
  - Labor union war; S......... 147
  - La Follette committee needs funds; S.. 460
  - La Follette movement; S..524; see also C 598
  - Madden, Chairman, and Senator Burke; S......... 175
  - May bill for dictatorship in case of war; S......... 291
  - Monopolies, congressional investigation; S 715
  - National association of manufacturers, propaganda; S......... 291
  - New deal recruits; S......... 579
  - Profiteering at government expense; S.. 263
  - Reorganization and bunk; S......... 406
  - Republican party activity; S......... 494
  - Roosevelt bandwagon, new; S......... 551
  - Roosevelt must fight; S......... 431
  - Roosevelt reforms hamstrung by congress; S......... 175
  - Roosevelt spending-lending program; S.. 494
  - Roosevelt under two flags; S......... 147
  - Supreme court upholds Wagner act; S., 634
  - Vigilante movements; S......... 263
  - Wage-hour bill, Republicans on; S...... 494
  - Walsh-Healey act amendment, vote on, denied; S......... 715
  - War, threatened; S......... 202
  - Washington, letters from, 263, 291, 319, 347, 375, 406, 431, 459, 494, 524 (see also C, 598); 551, 579, 634, 689, 715
- Anderson, Paul Y., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
  - Return to The Nation; EP......... 316
- Anglo-German fellowship, dinner; EP....... 31
- Anschluss. See Austria
- Anti-lynching bill. See Lynchings
- Anti-semitism. See Jews
- Anti-spending campaign. See Finance, public
- Anti-trust decision. See Oil
- Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
- Anti-war congress in Washington; EP...... 659
- Arcand, Adrian. D. Martin; S......... 241
- Architecture
  - Roof, battle of the. D. Haskell; Arc..... 79
- Armaments
  - Big navy, American, plans for; E....... 200
  - Defense estimates, and the "dead" league of nations. Low; Ct......... 587
  - Naval, aggravate possibility of war. O. G. Villard; S......... 184
  - Naval, growth. J. Groth; Ct......... 174
  - Naval, race. O. G. Villard; S......... 100
  - Naval, increase by Japan; EP......... 169
  - Profiteering. P. Y. Anderson; S......... 263
  - Roosevelt asks billion; EP......... 57
  - Scandinavia enters race; EP......... 491
- Armstrong, Clarence
  - Progress through reaction; C....599; see also E......... 492
- Arnold, Thurman, appointment as assistant attorney general; EP......... 315
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1937... 7
- Art
  - Cloisters, the. P. Rosenfeld; A......... 596
  - Demuth memorial show. P. Rosenfeld; S 50
  - Marin and his oils. J. Mellquist; A.... 308
  - Museum of modern art; exhibition. J. Mellquist; A......... 541
  - Quintanilla, Luis, drawings. R. Pielkova; S......... 395
  - Statues in the sun. P. Rosenfeld; S.... 485
  - "Technicians," two schools for. D. Haskell; A......... 708
- Atlantic Monthly, The, conquered by Franco; E......... 233
- Austria
  - Anschluss; E......... 260
    - And the future. I. G. Rogin; S...... 438
    - Conquest by Hitler; E......... 316
    - Conquest by Hitler. R. Dell; S...... 321
    - Effect in Italy. F. C. Hanighen; S... 669
    - Hitler, Mussolini and Austria. J. Groth; Ct......... 385
    - Last chapter. L. Lore; S......... 235
    - Mousetrap, escape from. A Kuh; S.........647, 674, 701
    - Murder; gangster triumphant. F. Kirchwey; S......... 321
    - Outcasts—a Who's who. E. Lengyel; S 695
    - Plebiscite; EP......... 426
    - Plebiscite, Hitler; Catholic church division of opinion; EP......... 398
    - Preparations for overthrow. R. Dell; S 292
    - Schuschnigg resistance to Hitler...... 384
    - Surrender; E......... 232
  - Gedye dispatches from Vienna; EP..... 342
  - Jews. See Jews
  - Refugees; aid asked; C......... 544
  - Schmitz, R., death in concentration camp reported; EP......... 685
  - Seyss-Inquart. L. Lore; S......... 502
  - Socrates discusses the Spartans. A. Hollriegel; S......... 357
- Automobiles. See United automobile workers of America
- Aylesworth, Merlin H., appointment as publisher of the New York World-Telegram; E......... 430

B

- B., F.
  - America's blood guilt in China; C...... 283
- Baby derby, Toronto; EP......... 259
- Bach, Julian S., Jr.
  - The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C......... 570
- Baker, Jacob
  - Hoarding and recovery; C.....656; see also, 294; C......... 488
- Baker, Newton Diehl; death; EP......... 3
- Baldwin, Roger, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Ballou, Jenny
  - Seeks material on Ella Wheeler Wilcox; C......... 28
- Barcelona. See Spain
- Bard college needs help. E. Gray; C........ 256
- Barth, Alan
  - Milk production; S......... 16
- Baruch, Bernard M., testimony before senate unemployment committee; EP....... 286
- Baseball; the Yankees and Di Maggio; EP.. 455
- Baxter, James P., 3d, on foreign policy of the United States......... 461
- Beal, Fred, back in prison; EP......... 315
- Beck, Dave, decline of. S. C. Menefee; S.... 354
- Becker, Carl, on keeping out of war........ 378
- Benson, Elmer A., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Benton, Thomas H., and others
  - War and The Nation; C...111; see also C.........139, 195
- Bernard, John T. By G. Schreiber; Ct..... 148
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1937.. 7
- Bernards, Sol
  - Picture magazines, decline; C......... 340
- Bernstein, Philip S.
  - Hitler dooms the church; S......... 329
- Bethlehem steel; plebiscite on company's management-ownership plan; EP..... 603
- Between the devil. J. W. Krutch; D........ 26
- Birth of a baby, the, film, censored; EP.... 315
  - Pictures in Life censored; EP......... 427
- Bisson, T. A.
  - Spiking Japan's guns; S......... 120
- Black, Justice Hugo L.
  - "Against the supreme court"; EP....... 169
  - Attacks by M. W. Childs and implied criticism by Chief Justice Hughes; P. Y. Anderson; S...579; see also E... 577
  - Dissenting. M. Lerner; S......... 264
  - Opinion in Indianapolis water company case; EP......... 58
- Blitzstein, Marc, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Block, Paul; suit against The Nation; EP.. 547
- "Blockade," film, attempted censorship; E... 688
- Blum, Léon. See France
- Blume, Peter, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Bogan, Louise
  - James, Henry, on a revolutionary theme; S......... 471
- Boileau, Gerald J., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Book clubs, battle of. K. Hutchison; S...... 506
- Books; prices and the law. C. Lazare; S..95; see also C......... 196
  - See also Reading
- Borgese, G. A., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Bourke-White, Margaret, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937......... 7
- Bowers, Ambassador Claude G.; defended. F. C. Kelly; C......... 55
- Boycott all aggressors. M. V. Leof; C...... 283

- Boycott of Japanese goods. See Chinese-Japanese war
- Bradley, Barclay W.
  - Substitute for the Ludlow bill; C...... 255
- Brady, Robert A., on foreign policy of the United States ... 435
- Brameld, Theodore
  - Browder and Marx; C...311; see also.. 247
- Brazil; fascism, Vargas style; EP... 342
  - Integralist uprising; EP... 575
- Brindze, Ruth
  - Meat, price of; C... 83
  - Radio newspaper; S... 154
- British West Indies; tragedies. W. A. Domingo; C ... 626
- Brody, Alter
  - "Liberals," visas for; C.......195; see also ...111; C, 228, C, 255
- Broun, Heywood. M. Marshall; S... 580
- Browder and Marx. T. Brameld; C.....311; see also ... 247
- Brownson, Robert
  - Canadian opinion; C..........367; see also ...E, 259; C, 487
- Bryan, Allen
  - Why Hague will quit; S... 664
- Buchman, Doctor Frank D. See Oxford group
- Budapest conference; EP... 86
- Budget. See Finance, public
- Burgum, Edwin B.
  - Education by night; C... 112
- Burke, Senator E. R., and Chairman Madden. P. Y. Anderson; S... 175
- Burke, Kenneth
  - On E. Vivas' review of his "Attitudes toward history"; C... 139
- Business
  - And the government; EP... 29
  - Big and little, and the administration. P. Y. Anderson; S... 175
  - Business men, little; conference with Roosevelt; EP ... 142
  - Crisis deepens; E... 631
  - Deficit financing. G. R. Walker; C.... 27
  - Hoarding and recovery. G. R. Walker; C, 488; see also...294; C, 656
  - Little, revolt; E... 173
  - Profiteering at government expense. P. Y. Anderson; S ... 263
  - Profits, hiding by industry. E. Janeway; S......432; see also C... 543
  - Profits must be restricted. B. W. Bradley; C ... 167
  - Prospects; E ... 5
  - Recession and relief; E... 233
  - Risks—the key to recovery. S. H. Slichter; S...294; see also E, 289; C, 488
  - Roosevelt policy. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 147
  - Wage-cut fallacy; E... 144
  - World; Van Zeeland plan for improving; EP ... 143
- Butler, George
  - Yale university needs the C. I. O.; S... 67

C

- C. I. O. See Committee for industrial organization
- Cabot, Hugh, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 ... 7
- Caldwell, Erskine, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 ... 7
- California; fruit and vegetable growers set up trust; EP ... 143
  - Advertising and politics. H. Kravif; C. 27
- California medical association; political surgeons. P. A. Dodd; C... 27
- Canada
  - Fascism; A. Arcand. D. Martin; S.... 241
  - Fascism, shadow over dominion. E. S. McLeod; S.....176; see also C...... 311
  - Opinion on British foreign policy. R. Brownson; C..367; see also E, 259; C, 487
- Cardenas, President. See Mexico
- Carlson, Oliver
  - Los Angeles grows up; S..45; see also C, 139
- Carlton, Leonard
  - Mussolini schemes for Egypt; S... 68
- Carnegie, Dale. M. Marshall; S... 325
- Carnegie foundation, report; EP... 199
- Carol, King. See Rumania
- Casey Jones. J. W. Krutch; D... 280
- Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
- Cecil, Russell L., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 ... 7
- Cedillo, General. See Mexico
- Censorship, moving pictures
  - Birth of a baby, the; EP... 315
  - Blockade, attempted ban on; E... 688
  - Spain in flames censored in Pennsylvania. A. W. A. Cowan; C... 27
- Chamber of commerce of the United States, meeting in Washington. P. Y. Anderson; S ... 551
- Chamberlain, John, on foreign policy of the United States ... 404
- Chamberlain, Neville. See Great Britain
- Chance and clairvoyance. G. R. Weaver; C. 140
- Chapman, Grenville T.
  - The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C ... 570
- Charities, hoarding of capital; EP... 685
- Charwoman: 20 Vesey street. 6:00 p. m. B. Belitt; P ... 212
- Chautemps, Camille. See France
- Chesterton, Gilbert Keith, biographical material sought. M. Ward; C... 312
- Chiang Kai-shek. See Chinese-Japanese war
- Chicago
  - Labor's non-partisan league a factor in politics; EP ... 399
  - Memorial day massacre. See Steel—Strikes—Republic steel corporation
  - Politics; city doesn't care. M. S. Mayer; S.........149; see also C... 227
- Child labor. See Labor, child
- Childs, Marquis W.
  - Jackson versus Richberg; S... 119
  - Public housing today; S... 10
- Childs, Marquis W., and Justice Black. P. Y. Anderson; S...579; see also E, 577
- Childs, Richard S., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 ... 7
- Chinese-Japanese war
  - Aid for Chinese fighters, appeal. A. Smedley; C... 682
  - American aid to Japanese; E... 661
  - American refusal to give economic aid to China; EP ... 142
  - America's blood guilt. F. B.; C... 283
  - Betrayal at Geneva; E... 577
  - Boycott of Japanese goods:
    - An incentive to war. H. Neumann; C 195
    - Effect; EP ... 142
    - Effect on American labor; E......145; see also C... 228
    - Hosiery, union-made, lisle. A. Newborg; C...312; L. Rogin, C, 367; C..... 424
    - Pittsburgh newspapers and the boycott. G. A. Coleman; C... 167
    - Widening; E ... 175
    - Winning; E... 33
  - Cabinet crisis in Tokyo follows setback in arms; EP ... 453
  - Chengchow threatened; EP... 198
  - Chinese and Japanese purchases from the United States. E. T. Douglas; C..... 139
  - Chinese cooperate against Japan; EP... 397
  - Chinese eighth route army; spiking Japan's guns; S... 120
  - Chinese gains and losses; EP... 313
  - Chinese resistance stiffens; E...371; EP, 425
  - Chinese successes; EP... 518
  - Fight to finish seen in move by Chiang Kai-shek; EP ... 30
  - Hankow, haven at. C. Corcoran; S..... 39
  - Hsuchow, capture by Japanese; EP..... 602
  - Japanese aim at Canton-Hankow railway; EP ... 574
  - Japanese aims and prospects; EP... 113
  - Japanese cut Lunghai railway; EP..... 574
  - Japanese offensive slackens; EP... 230
  - Japanese policy, arrogance. R. Dell; S.. 35
  - Panay sinking film; EP... 30
  - Panay sinking, Japanese apology accepted; EP ... 1
  - Setbacks for Japanese; EP... 86
  - Slaughter by Japanese, profits on; E... 686
  - Yellow river dikes, cutting by Chinese; EP ... 711
  - See also Neutrality
- Chrismer, Leslie
  - United States and foreign nations; C... 112
- Christian Front, The. M. G. Lewis; C...312; see also C... 487
- Christianity doomed by Hitler. P. S. Bernstein; S ... 329
- Christmas, 1937; EP... 1
- Church in Germany. See Germany
- Circle, the. J. W. Krutch; D... 512
- Cities that consume men. H. Ward; S..... 91
- Civil rights
  - La Follette subcommittee:
    - Continues defense; EP... 573
    - Needs funds. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 460
  - Opposition to; EP... 480
  - Report; E ... 5
  - Report on "Red" Kuhl... 37
  - McNaboe anti-communist bill vetoed; EP 398
  - Vigilante movements. P. Y. Anderson; S 263
- Civilian conservation corps; blows at, and threatened militarization. B. Harkness; C ... 168
- Clairvoyance and chance. G. R. Weaver; C.. 140
- Clark, Charles E., on keeping out of war... 378
- Clark, Eunice
  - Fallow land; P... 129
- Clark, Margaret C.
  - On The Nation; C... 709
- Clemens, Cyril
  - Seeks material on L. Strachey; C...... 516
- Clipper ship, reproduction. O. G. Villard; S 700
- Cloisters, the. P. Rosenfeld; A... 596
- Coal; price schedule announced by National bituminous coal commission; EP..... 59
- Coffee, John M. By G. Schrieber; Ct... 148
- Coffee, John M., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 ... 7
- Coleman, George A.
  - Press and boycott on Japanese goods; C 167
- Coleman, McAlister
  - In the shadow of the capitol; S... 641
  - Rise of David Dubinsky, the; S...525, 558
- College graduates, advice to; E... 687
- Colleges and universities
  - Curtailment of enrolment proposed by President Conant; EP... 143
  - New York city. See New York city
  - Recruiting in various fields; report of Carnegie foundation; EP... 199
  - See also names of institutions
- Columnists on parade. M. Marshall; S...244 (correction, 276); 273, 297, 325, 386, 464, 580, 721
- Commencement addresses; E... 687
- Commerce. See Trade, foreign
- Committee for industrial organization
  - Attack by Representative Hoffman. P. Y. Anderson; S... 689
  - Conflict with A. F. L. By P. Y. Anderson; S ... 149
  - Convention to decide on permanent organization to be held; EP... 454
  - Factionalism; Stolberg articles; EP..... 114
  - Los Angeles. O. Carlson; S... 43
  - Opposed by J. P. Kennedy; E... 234
  - Peace with American federation of labor, attempts; EP ... 575
  - Squabble between Lewis and Dubinsky; E ... 88
  - Yale university needs the C. I. O. By G. Butler; S... 67
- Committee of 430, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 ... 7
- Committee on civil liberties. See Civil liberties
- Commonwealth and Southern; fair price for. S. M. Hyneman; C, with editorial comment; see also EP...113; 127
- Communism
  - Browder and Marx. T. Brameld; C..311; see also ... 247
  - Constitution. M. Eastman; C... 655
  - Gerson appointment in New York attacked; EP ... 287
  - Gerson appointment upheld by Governor Lehman; EP ... 316
  - In American labor unions; front-page news again; EP... 170
  - New York state legislation against progressives; EP ... 343
  - "Red menace." E. Winter; C.....139; see also ... 43
  - Yankee; E ... 632
- Composers. See Music
- Conant, President James B.; proposal to curtail university enrolment; EP... 143
- Conference on world economic cooperation; EP ... 371
- Congress
  - Adjournment; E ... 713
  - Adjournment date vague; EP... 601
  - Fade-out. P. Y. Anderson; S... 689
  - Filibuster by Republicans in the senate. F. S. Cutler; C... 283
  - Hamstrings Roosevelt reforms. P. Y. Anderson; S ... 175
  - Legislation, little prospect for; EP..... 257
  - Message to; EP... 29
  - Program promises conflict; EP... 141
  - "Young Turks," on The Nation's honor roll for 1937... 7
  - "Young Turks," gallery of. G. Schrieber; Ct ... 148
- Contracts, government; vote on Walsh-Healey act amendment denied. P. Y. Anderson; S ... 715
- Cooperative book club. A. Horlings; C..196; see also ... 95
- Copeland, Senator Royal S.; death; EP.... 712
- Corcoran, Crispian
  - Haven at Hankow; S... 39
- Corporations
  - O'Mahoney bill for regulation; EP...... 230
  - Personality; opinion of Justice Black and other supreme court justices; EP. 169
  - Regulation; Kansas City stockyards case. I. F. Stone; S... 690
- Countryman, The; EP... 343
- Cowan, Arthur W. A.
  - Spain in flames, censored; C... 27
- Cradle will rock, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 107
- Cromwell, James H. R., sales tax plan; EP. 115
- Cummings, Attorney General, conduct of his department. M. W. Childs; S... 119
- Cutler, F. S.
  - Filibuster by Republicans in the senate; C ... 283
- Czecho-Slovakia
  - Calls men to the colors; E... 603
  - Czechs stand guard. M. W. Fodor; S... 639
  - France, reliance on. A. Werth; S...... 718
  - Henlein, K., rise of. L. Lore; S... 410
  - Henlein visit to London; EP... 574
  - Henlein's demands; EP... 489
  - Hitler's attitude; E... 520
  - Situation. H. B. Kranz; S... 350
  - Slovak demand for autonomy; EP...... 658
  - Trade agreement with; EP... 315
  - War averted; EP... 629

D

Dancing
  Criticism. L. Kirstein; S.... 164
  Martin, John, criticisms. L. Kirstein; S. 164
  Popular style in America. L. Kirstein; S 450
Darby, Hugh H.
  Defends his review of Man, bread and destiny, book by the Furnases; C.... 56
Darrow, Clarence, death; EP.... 316
Davies, Ernest
  Labor governments and sabotage; S.... 179
Davies, Richard; intolerance at university of Wisconsin; EP 603
Defense, national. See Armaments
Dell, Robert
  Austria, conquest by Hitler; S.... 320
  Behind Vansittart's promotion; S.... 97
  Can Hitler be bought?; S.... 35
  Chamberlain's treason; S.292; see also C 424
  Diplomacy at Geneva; S.... 635
  Ethiopia and Spain before the League council; E 550
  France, foreign policy; C.... 196
  Hitler and Mussolini after Austrian seizure; S 637
Democracies, speech against, by Mussolini; EP 574
Democracy; and fascism, struggle between. R. Niebuhr; S 12
  Begins at home. L. Chrismer; C.... 112
Democratic party
  Fight for control. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 715
  Peril in cleavage; E.... 456
  Primaries; attitude of Republicans; EP. 659
Demuth memorial show. P. Rosenfeld; A... 46
Denmark; German threat. R. Morey; C.... 626
  Hitler's next victim. J. Joesten; C.... 515
Depression, business. See Business
Design laboratory. D. Haskell; S.... 708
Dionne quintuplets, struggle over; EP.... 491
Diplomatic service. See United States
Dodd, Paul A.
  Political surgeons; C.... 27
Dodd, William E.; address against German Nazis; EP 87
  On foreign policy of the United States.. 404
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1937.... 7
Doll's house, a. J. W. Krutch; D.... 53
Domestic service. E. Seeley; S.... 613
Dominican republic. See Haiti
Domingo, W. A.
  British West Indies; tragedies on our doorstep; C.... 626
Doughty, LeGarde S.
  Verse for a sower; P.... 276
Douglas, Emily Taft
  Chinese and Japanese purchases from the United States; C.... 139
Douglas, Paul H., on keeping out of war... 378
Douglas, William O., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.... 7
Drama. See G., M., Krutch, J. W. (for reviews); Theater, the Dreher, Carl, on foreign policy of the United States 405
Drug and food law. See Food and drug law
Duggan, Stephen, on foreign policy of the United States 404
Dubinsky, David, rise of. M. Colemen; S.525, 558
  See also Committee for industrial organization
Dulles, John Foster, on foreign policy of the United States 460
Duker, Samuel
  Palestine, partition; C.... 27

E

Eastman, Lucius R., on foreign policy of the United States 405
Eastman, Max
  Communist constitution, the; C.... 655
Economic conditions. See Business
Economic cooperation, world, conference on; EP 371
Economic planning; E....60; see also C.... 227
Economics; profits must be restricted. B. W. Bradley; C 167
Edelman, Isidore
  Decimal relief system of the WPA; C... 626
Eden, Anthony. See Great Britain
Education. See Schools
Egypt; Mussolini scheming for. L. Carlton; S 68
Eire. See Ireland
Elections; labor issue in; EP.... 258
Electric bond and share company; supreme court decision; EP.... 370
Embargo, Spanish. See Spain
Emery, Martha
  Mormon "security"; S.... 182
Employees, government. See United States
Engelbrecht, H. C.
  America's gift to aggressors; S.... 407
England, See Great Britain
Epstein, Abraham
  Social security act, criticism of; C.... 28
Equal rights amendment. See Women
Ernst, Morris L., on foreign policy of the United States 461
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1937.... 7
Espionage, labor. See Labor
Essary, J. Fred
  Hull not "despairing"; C..655; see also 588
Ethiopia
  Before the League council. R. Dell; E... 550
  Diplomacy at Geneva. R. Dell; S.... 635
  Recognition question at Geneva; E.... 577
Europe
  And America; E....259; see also C.... 367
  Budapest conference; EP.... 86
  Fascism, accelerated surrender to; E.... 713
  Foreign policies. R. Dell; S.... 35
  Jig-saw; E 199
  Learns from Vienna. R. Dell; S.... 320
  Lull, ominous; E.... 401
  Paris bows to London; E.... 457
  Situation in face of Mussolini-Hitler conversations; EP 545
  War over Czecho-Slovakia averted; EP. 629
  Watching eye; the U. S. S. R. By Low; Ct 697
Extra-sensory perception. G. L. R. Weaver; C 140
Ezekiel, Mordecai
  Farm aid—fourth stage; S.... 236

F

Farley, James A., loser in Democratic primaries; EP 546
Farm bill. See Agriculture
Fascism
  American style. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 347
  American, tinder for; E.... 633
  And democracy, struggle between. R. Niebuhr; S 12
  Brazilian, Vargas style; EP.... 342
  British, fighting by law; L. B. Milner; S....65; see also C.... 515
  Budapest conference may mark turn of tide; EP 86
  Canadian. D. Martin; S.... 241
  Canadian; shadow over dominion. E. S. McLeod; S....176; see also C.... 311
  European, accelerated surrender to; E.. 713
  Happy new year! Groth; Ct.... 6
Federal technical school. D. Haskell; S.... 708
Field, Morris
  Union teachers only, for United automobile workers of America; C...284; see also E 201
Fight for peace, the. M. Van Doren; MP.. 595
Films. See Moving pictures; Van Doren, M., (for reviews)
Finance, public
  Budget, balancing, arguments against. P. M. Sweezy; C, with editorial comment 84
  Budget to be balanced by curtailment of spending; EP 57
  Cromwell sales tax plan; EP.... 115
  Deadlock over new tax bill; E.... 457
  Deficit financing. G. R. Walker; C.... 27
  Income tax exemption for government securities and government officials; president asks end; EP.... 490
  Inflation, coming? K. Hutchison; S.... 527
  Mitchell, C. E., must pay income-tax penalty; EP 314
  Revenue bill, passage by the house; "spare the rich" provisions; EP.... 314
  Roosevelt's Arthurdale speech on taxation; EP 630
  Salaries of officers of New York port authority held taxable, by United States supreme court; EP.... 630
  Spending, government:
    And unemployment relief; E.... 604
    Fight on spending. P. Y. Anderson; S....459; E.... 578
    Lending-spending bill passed by senate; EP 657
    Spend or starve; E.... 428
    Spending and recovery; E.... 455
    To be resumed. P. Y. Anderson; S... 431
    Women's rebellion against; EP.... 519
  Taxation policy, new; EP.... 314
  "Third basket" tax; EP.... 197
  Wyoming oil-tax case; EP.... 314
Fischer, Louis
  Spain, Barcelona holds out; S.... 374
  Loyalist successes; S.... 8
  Peril of; S 348
  Road to peace; S.... 238
  Situation on the loyalist front; S.... 458
  Spain won't surrender; S.... 495
Flanagan, Hallie, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
Florida primary election, Democratic; Roosevelt victory. Anderson; S.... 551
Fodor, M. W.
  Czechs stand guard; S.... 639
Food, price of. W. Hardenbergh and R. Brindze; C 83
Food and drug law; passed by house of representatives; objectionable features; EP 659
Ford motor company, government case against. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 524
  Memphis safe for Ford. G. Lambert; S 93
  National labor relations board acts; EP. 2
Foreign policy, United States. See United States
Foreign service. See United States
Foreign trade. See Trade, foreign Forgery. B. Schapper; S...155; see also C.. 284
France
  And Czechoslovakia. A. Werth; S.... 718
  Foreign policy. R. Dell; C.... 196
  Foreign policy; Paris bows to London; E 457
  Negotiations with Italy over Spain break down; E 603
  Politics:
    American reporting of; EP.... 114
    Behind Blum's failure. A. Werth; S.. 462
    Chautemps government, only temporary; EP 114
    Crisis. M. E. Ravage; S.90; see also E 88
    Daladier's new cabinet; EP.... 425
    No dictatorship. M. E. Ravage; S.... 152
    Popular front falls; E.... 88
Frank, Gerold
  Elders of Komionka, the; S.... 98
Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
Freedom, civil. See Civil rights
Freedom and the executive; E.... 372
Freedom of speech; suppression in New Bedford. D. Sprecher; C.... 283
Freedom of the press. See Newspapers
Frendberg, I. C.
  Nye, senator, opposition to; C....543; see also 245
Friendly, Edwin
  O'Connell peace act; C.... 283
Fuller, H. J.
  Anti-Japanese boycott; C....228; see also E 145
Fuller, Margaret, biographical material sought. M. Wade; C.... 28
Furnases' book, "Man, bread and destiny"; Darby review attacked and defended; C 56

G

G., M.
  What a life; D.... 512
Gannett, Frank E., and the government reorganization bill. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 375
Gedye, G. E. R.; dispatches from Vienna; EP 342
General motors corporation; profits. A. M. Levin and E. Janeway; C...543; see also 432
Generals, retired, reactionary. O. G. Villard; S 644
Generals without buttons. M. Van Doren; MP 365
Geneva. See League of nations
Georgia; law against leaflet distribution held unconstitutional; EP 398
Germany
  Anglo-German fellowship, dinner; EP... 31
  Army purge; EP 197
  Austrian annexation, effect; EP.... 545
    See also Austria
  Church doomed by Hitler. P. S. Bernstein; S 329
  Denmark, German threat against; C... 626
  Economy, sound or unsound. A. Vidakovic and I. G. Rogin; S....437, 438
  Finances; cost of five years of Hitler; EP 143
  Foreign policy; can Hitler be bought? R. Dell; S.... 35
  Hitler and Mussolini after Austrian seizure. R. Dell; S.... 637
  Hitler's conversations with Mussolini; EP 545
  Hitler goes to Rome; E.... 520
  Hitler's cold war; E.... 345
  Hitler's speech; EP.... 229
  Illnesses, diplomatic; EP.... 171
  Jews. See Jews
  Opposition to Hitlerism, in Germany. H. S.; C 55
  Phonograph records from Germany. P. Glaberman and B. H. Haggin; C.... 598
  Protests against Dodd address; EP.... 87
  Purge in the reich; E.... 172
  To-day. O. G. Villard; S.... 616
Gerson, Simon W., appointment to New York office, by S. M. Isaacs, attacked; EP. 287
  Appointment upheld by Governor Lehman; EP 316
Girdler, Tom. See Republic steel corporation
Girl was young, the. M. Van Doren; MP.. 193
Glaberman, Philip
  Records, phonograph, from Germany; C. 598
God gets an idea. G. S. Kaufman; S.... 208
Goga, Octavian. See Rumania
Gold, Herman
  Isolationism and war; C.... 312
Gold; sterilization plan; EP.... 230
Gorki, Maxim; biographical material sought. C. Oumansky; C.... 544
Government. See United States
Government employees. See United States Government spending. See Finance, public
Government ownership; utilities, coal companies and railroads, proposed purchase. O. G. Villard; S.... 127

Government reorganization bill. See United States
Graduates, advice to; E.................... 687
Graham, Marcus, persecution as editor of Man. C. J. Taft; C.................. 112
Graves, John Temple, II, on foreign policy of the United States 404
Gray, Esther
  Bard college needs help; C............ 256
Great Britain
  And Italy. Low; Ct.................. 70
  Anglo-German fellowship, dinner; EP.. 31
  Anglo-Italian agreement. O. G. Villard; S 505
  Egypt, Mussolini scheming for. L. Carlton; S 68
  Fascism, fighting by law. L. B. Milner; S.........65; see also C............ 515
  Foreign policy:
    Behind Vansittart's promotion. R. Dell; S 97
    Canadian opinion on. R. Brownson; C......367; see also E, 259; C, 487
    Chamberlain and isolationism; E..... 605
    Chamberlain declaration; EP......... 369
    Chamberlain's policy; EP............ 546
    Chamberlain's treason, in face of Hitler and Mussolini. R. Dell; S...... 292
    Eden's resignation; EP 229
    Eden's resignation. R. Dell; S...... 292
    Isolation. Mackey; Ct.............. 344
    Paris bows to London; E............ 457
  Investments, foreign, restrictions relaxed; EP 171
  Jew-baiting. L. B. Milner; see also C.... 515
  Labor demands. H. J. Laski; S......... 412
  Labor unions, "regulated." L. Huberman; S 206
  Sabotage threatened. E. Davies; S..... 179
  Taxation; EP 518
Greatest show on earth, the. J. W. Krutch; D 107
Greed. M. Van Doren; MP............... 26
Greene, Irving L.
  Forgery, check; C...284; see also...... 155
Gross, I. Q.
  "Yussel" Jacobs okays the Nazis; S... 698
Grosz, George
  Saints; Ct 331
  Voice of reason; Ct.................. 14
Groth, John
  Happy new year! by fascists; Ct........ 6
  Hitler, Mussolini and Austria; Ct...... 385
  Naval armaments, growth; Ct.......... 174
Guérard, Albert
  Pacifism and egoism; C............... 598
Guérard, Albert, on foreign policy of the United States 436
Guide, series, American; honor for workers. H. G. Alsberg; C...195; see also... 7
Gunther, John
  India, new ferment in; S.............. 203
Guthrie, Elton F.
  Women's rights attacked; C........... 340

H

Hacker, Louis M.
  Replies to A. Brody; C...255; see also.. 195
Haggin, B. H.
  Aitken, Webster, pianist; M........... 163
  Music, recorded; S......54, 109, 192, 225, 282, 366, 396, 451, 513, 567, 624, 680, 735
  Phonograph records from Germany; C.. 598
  Toscanini broadcasts; M............... 338
Hague, Mayor Frank. See Jersey City
Haiti; arrests by President Vincent. S. Juste Zamor; C 168
  Massacre by Dominicans; EP.....2; E, 146
Haiti. J. W. Krutch; D.................. 309
Hamilton, Leverne
  War mongers; C...................... 516
Hanighen, Frank C.
  Italy from the inside; S............... 669
Hankow. See Chinese-Japanese war
Happy new year! Groth; Ct................ 6
Hardenbergh, Wesley
  Meat, price of; C..................... 83
Harkness, Bernard
  Civilian conservation corps; C......... 168
Harlan county trial; EP.................. 658
Harris, Sydney J.
  Moscow trials; C...367; see also E..... 287
Harvard university; Walsh-Sweezy case; democracy at Harvard; E............. 662
Haskell, Douglas
  Battle of the roof, the; Arc............ 79
  Two schools for "technicians"; A..... 708
Hays, Arthur Garfield, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937....................... 7
Health, public. See Medicine
Hearst, William Randolph; financial jigsaw puzzle; EP 343
Heartbreak house. J. W. Krutch; D........ 566
Helium, delivery to Germany held up by Ickes; EP 426
Henlein, Konrad. See Czecho-Slovakia
Herkimer, Jessie K.
  On The Nation; C.................... 709
Herring, Hubert
  Mexico claims its own; S......440; see also C 543
Hill-Sheppard bill. See War
Hillman, Sidney, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
Hinkle, Walter M.
  The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C 569
Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
Hoarding and recovery. G. R. Walker; C.....488; see also 294; C.......... 656
Hoffman, Clare; attack on C. I. O.; S...... 689
Holding companies; Electric bond and share company supreme court decision; EP. 370
  Roosevelt address on; E............... 60
Hollriegel, Arnold
  Socrates discusses the Spartans; S...... 357
Hollywood. See Moving pictures
Honor roll for 1937, The Nation's........ 7
Hopkins, Harry L., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.......................... 7
Horlings, Albert
  Co-operative book club; C...196; see also 95
Hosiery, See Chinese-Japanese war—Boycott
House, Edward M. O. G. Villard; S........ 414
Housewives, feudal. E. Seeley; S.......... 613
Housing; New York city; clash with LaGuardia. L. Post; S.................. 125
  Public, today. M. W. Childs; S......... 10
Howard, Kinsey
  The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C 570
Howe, Quincy
  Nation, The, and its attitude toward Great Britain; C...626; see also E... 576
Huberman, Leo
  British unions, "regulated"; S......... 206
Hughes, chief justice, on Justice Black; E.. 577
Hughes, J. J.
  Catholics not all reactionaries; C....... 55
Hughes, Langston
  Laughter in Madrid; S................ 123
Hull, Secretary, and the Spanish embargo. M. Lerner; S...................... 607
  Hull of Downing street; E.....576; see also C 626
  Not "despairing." J. F. Essary; C...655; see also 588
Hulswit, Mrs. Charles S., anti-spending campaign; E 578
Hungary, the Spain of the east. H. B. Kranz; S 610
Hunger and Mrs. Hulswit; E.............. 578
Hutchison, Keith
  Battle of the book clubs; S............ 506
  Inflation; S 527
  Wall street; S 268
Hyde, Douglas. See Ireland
Hyneman, Samuel M.
  Tennessee valley authority, and fair price for Commonwealth and Southern; C, with editorial comment, 311; see also EP 113; 127

I

I married an angel. J. W. Krutch; D...... 680
Ickes, Secretary, holds up helium for Germany; EP 426
  Public housing program. M. W. Childs; S 10
If I were you. J. W. Krutch; D........... 162
Illness. See Medicine
Illnesses, diplomatic; EP.................. 171
Immell, Ralph. See National progressive party
In the wind.........588 (see also C, 655); 612, 643, 672, 699, 724
Income tax. See Finance, public
India; new ferment in J. Gunther; S.... 203
  Politics; congress, divisions in; EP.... 259
Indianapolis water company case, opinion in; EP 58
Industry. See Business
Inflation. See Finance, public
Ingold, Jack
  Middle west talking; C......598; see also 524
Inland steel company, labor board's decision; EP 426
Iowa primaries. P. Y. Anderson; S......... 689
Ireland; Eire, new state, established; EP... 31
  Treaty with Great Britain; Hyde for president; EP 490
Irons, Martin; biographical material sought. B. L. Owens; C 228
Isaacs, Stanley M. See Gerson, S. W.
Isolation. See Neutrality
Issues and men. See Villard, Oswald Garrison Italy
  And Germany; E..................... 520
  And Great Britain. Low; Ct........... 70
  Anglo-Italian agreement. O. G. Villard; S 505
  Egypt, Mussolini scheming for. L. Carlton; S 68
  From the inside. F. C. Hanighen; S... 669
  Intervention in Spain shown clearly; EP 87
  Mussolini and Hitler after Austrian seizure. R. Dell; S................. 637
  Mussolini's conversations with Hitler; EP 545
  Mussolini's speech at Genoa against democracies; EP 574
  Negotiations with France over Spain break down; E...................... 604
  Vatican, friendliness for Mussolini; EP 115
Ivens, Joris, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7

J

Jackson, Robert H., boomed for governor; EP 31
  Versus Richberg; M. W. Childs; S.... 119
Jacobs, "Yussel," okays the Nazis. I. Q. Gross; S 698
James, Henry, on a revolutionary theme. L. Bogan; S 471
Janeway, Eliot
  Handouts for railroads; S........500; See also EP......................... 490
  How industry hides profits; S......432; see also C......................... 543
Japan
  Loan sought in New York; EP........ 86
  Naval increase; EP.................. 169
  Policies on; E...................... 117
  Politics:
    Cabinet, new; EP................. 631
    Military versus democracy; EP...... 259
    Militarism triumphs; EP............ 58
    See also Chinese-Japanese war; Japanese-American relations
Japanese-American relations
  American aid to Japanese in China; E.. 661
  American attitude toward Japan. O. G. Villard; S 470
  American blood guilt in China. F. B.; C 283
  American trade with Japan; profits from slaughter; E 686
  Roosevelt's naval program aimed at Japan; EP 141
  United States and Japan. O. G. Villard; S 18
  United States, policies; E............. 117
  War with Japan, campaign for. O. G. Villard; S 209
Jersey City
  Battle to restore democracy; EP....... 602
  Expulsion of Norman Thomas by Hague; EP 517
  Fascist demonstration by Hague; EP... 546
  Hague defends regime; Jersey City workers' loss; EP 87
  Hague defied by O'Connell; EP......... 630
  Hague injunction trial; E............. 714
  Hague, moves against; EP............ 684
  Hague rule threatened. A. Bryan; S.... 664
  Hague, spearhead of reaction. J. R. Longo; C 488
  Longo, J. R., victim of Hague, asks help; C 655
  Mob violence by Hagueists; E......... 663
  Open letter to President Roosevelt. O. G. Villard; S 589
  Rally of Hague "supporters"; EP..... 59
Jewelry, strain of wearing. F. Sullivan; S.. 615 Jews
  Anti-semitism:
    Austrian; EP 685
    British. L. B. Milner; S......65; see also C 515
    Canadian. D. Martin; S............ 241
    Davis case at university of Wisconsin; EP 603
  German; EP 712
  Polish, and the fate of Poland. W. Zukerman; S 379
  Polish; elders of Komionka. G. Frank; S 98
  Rumanian; measures; EP.............. 115
Jezebel. M. Van Doren; MP.............. 365
Joesten, J.
  Hitler's next victim; C................ 515
Johnson, Hugh-and-cry. M. Marshall; S.... 297
Johnstown, Pennsylvania; fascism—American style. P. Y. Anderson; S............ 347 Journalism. See Newspapers
Journeyman. J. W. Krutch; D............. 190
Justice, department of, conduct by Cummings. M. W. Childs; S.................... 119

K

Kansas City, Missouri; Pendergast machine wins; EP 399
  Stockyards case. I. F. Stone; S........ 690
Kaufman, George S.
  God gets an idea; S.................. 208
Kelly, Fred C.
  Defends Ambassador Bowers; C........ 55
Ken—the inside story. G. Seldes; S.....497; see also EP......................... 631
Kendrick, B. B., on foreign policy of the United States; S.................. 435
Kennedy, Joseph P., versus the C. I. O.; E 234
Kentucky primaries. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 689
Keys, F. V.
  Responsibility for Hitlerism; C.....424; see also 292

Kilpatrick, William H., on foreign policy of the United States 460
Kingsbury, Doctor J. A.; resignation from board of New York association for improving the condition of the poor; EP. 685
Kirchwey, Freda
    Gangster triumphant; murder of Austria; S 321
Kirstein, Lincoln
    Criticism of dancing; John Martin; S.. 164
Knapp, George L.
    Neutrality; C 168
Komionka, elders of. G. Frank; S.... 98
Kranz, Henry B.
    Czecho-Slovakia; S 350
    Hungary—the Spain of the east; S..... 610
Kravif, Hy
    Advertising and politics; C.... 27
Krock, Arthur. See New York Times
Krutch, Joseph Wood
    All the living; D.... 423
    Between the devil; D.... 26
    Broadway season; D.... 680
    Casey Jones; D.... 280
    Circle, the; D.... 512
    Cradle will rock, the; D.... 107
    Doll's house, a; D.... 53
    Greatest show on earth, the; D.... 108
    Haiti; D 309
    Heartbreak house; D.... 566
    I married an angel; D.... 680
    If I were you; D.... 162
    Journeyman; D 190
    Living newspaper; D.... 137
    On borrowed time; D.... 224
    Once is enough; D.... 253
    One third of a nation; D.... 137
    Our town; D.... 224
    Prologue to glory; D.... 394
    Save me the waltz; D.... 309
    Sea gull, the; D.... 422
    Shadow and substance; D.... 162
    Shoemaker's holiday, the; D.... 80
    Time and the Conways; D.... 80
    Tortilla flat; D.... 107
    Two bouquets, the; D.... 680
    Washington jitters; D.... 567
    Whiteoaks; D 394
    Wine of choice; D.... 280
Kub, Anton
    Escape from the mousetrap; S..645, 674, 701
Kuhl, "Red"; life and times.... 37

L

Labor
    Cities that consume men. H. Ward; S.. 91
    Code, by the United States supreme court; E 290
    Domestic service. E. Seeley; S.... 613
    Espionage; report of La Follette committee; E 5
    In elections; issue; EP.... 258
    Marine. See Shipping
    Spies; life and times of "Red" Kuhl.... 37
    Wage-cut fallacy; E.... 144
    Wages-and-hours bill:
        Compromise changes made in conference; EP 683
        Filibuster, southern, threatened; EP.. 601
        Prospects; EP 546
        Reported; EP 454
        Republican action on. P. Y. Anderson; S 494
        See also National labor relations board
Labor, child
    O'Mahoney bill; EP.... 230
Labor board, national. See National labor relations board
Labor governments and sabotage. E. Davies; S 179
Labor party, British. See Great Britain
Labor relations board, national. See National labor relations board
Labor unions
    British, "regulated." L. Huberman; S.. 206
    Communism in, front-page news again; EP 170
    Educational work; E....201; see also C 284
    Los Angeles. O. Carlson; S.........43; see also C.... 139
    Marine, biased report against; EP...... 87
    See also American federation of labor; Committee for industrial organization
Labor's non-partisan league; factor in Chicago politics; EP 399
    Opposed by American federation of labor; EP 399
La Follette, Philip M., interview with. M. Lerner; S 552
La Follette, Robert M., junior, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.... 7
La Follette, Suzanne
    Corrects error in Brody letter; C, with editorial comment....228; see also.... 195
La Follette committee. See Civil rights
La Follette party. See National progressive party
La Follettes, attack on president; E....492; see also, C.... 599
LaGuardia, Mayor Fiorello H. See New York city
Lambert, George
    Memphis safe for Ford; S.... 93
Lasker, Albert; no financial interest in Ken; EP 631
Laski, Harold J.
    Demands of British labor; S.... 412
Lazare, Christopher
    Book prices and the law; S........95; see also C 196
Leach, Agnes, on foreign policy of the United States 405
Leaflets. See Freedom of the press
League of nations
    Betrayal at Geneva; E.... 577
    "Dead," and defense estimates. Low; Ct 587
    Diplomacy at Geneva. R. Dell; S...... 635
    Scraps of paper at Geneva. Low; Ct... 637
Lederman, Minna
    Composers in revolt; S.... 181
Legionnaire here again. M. S. Mayer; S.... 586
Lehman, Herbert H., upholds appointment of Gerson; EP.... 316
Lending-spending bill. See Finance, public
Lengyel, Emil
    Austria's outcasts; S.... 695
Lentz, Nicholas
    Social credit not fascist; C.........311; see also 176
Leof, M. V.
    Boycott all aggressors; C.... 283
Lerner, Max
    Behind Hull's embargo; S.... 607
    Justice Black, dissenting; S.... 264
    La Follette, P. F., interview with; S... 552
    Mr. Roosevelt, ringmaster; S.... 63
Lesley, Parker
    Wishful thinking (on war) in 1840; C.. 167
Lester, Mildred E.
    Collective action versus "isolationism"; C 167
Levin, Alfred M.
    General motors' profits; C.........543; see also.... 432
Lewis, John L. See Committee for industrial organization
Lewis, Marion G.
    Christian Front, The; C...........312; see also C.... 487
Lewis, Sinclair, capitulates; EP.... 231
"Liberals," visas for. A. Brody; C...195; see also 228, C.... 255
Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
Liburt, Joseph, M. D.
    Poverty and illness; C............340; see also EP.... 86
Life censored for birth pictures; EP.... 427
Life dances on. M. Van Doren; MP.... 421
Lincoln battalion, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
Lippmann, Walter M. Marshall; S.... 464
Literature, pleasures of. E. Wilson; S...... 128
Little business revolts; E.... 173
Living newspaper. J. W. Krutch; D.... 137
Llewellyn, Karl N., on foreign policy of the United States 405
Longo, John R.
    Hague, spearhead of reaction; C.... 488
    See also Jersey City
Lord and Thomas; advertising and politics. H. Kravif; C.... 27
Lore, Ludwig
    Austria......last chapter; S.... 235
    Rise of Konrad Henlein; S.... 410
    Seyss-Inquart, Arthur; S.... 502
    Tyrol Germans; S.... 583
Lorentz, Pare, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
Los Angeles grows up. O. Carlson; S....43; see also C.... 139
Louis-Schmeling fight; "Yussel" Jacobs okays the Nazis. I. Q. Gross; S.... 698
Low
    Aggression; Ct 232
    Great Britain and Italy; Ct.... 70
    League of nations, "dead," and defense estimates; Ct 587
    Plebiscite, European; Ct.... 504
    Roosevelt troubles; Ct.... 665
    Scraps of paper at Geneva; Ct.... 637
    Watching eye, the; Soviet Russia; Ct... 697
Ludlow resolution for referendum on war; E 61
    Arguments against, and answers to. O. G. Villard; S 71
    Arguments in favor. N. Thomas; C.... 83
    Substitutes for; C.... 255
Lynchings; bill buried; EP.... 257
Lynd, Robert S., and Helen M., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.... 7

M

Mack, Julian W., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
Mackey, John
    British isolation; Ct.... 344
    Spring travel, 1938; Ct.... 402
Madden, Chairman of the Labor board, and Senator Burke; P. Y. Anderson; S... 175
Madrid. See Spain
Magazines, picture, decline of. S. Bernards; C 340
Man; case of M. Graham, editor. C. J. Taft; C 112
Manlet, Joseph
    The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C.... 571
Man's moral progress. D. T. Ray; C...682; see also.... 563
Manufacturers' association. See National association of manufacturers
March of time. M. Van Doren; MP.... 136
Marin and his oils. J. Mellquist; A.... 308
Marine, merchant. See Shipping
Marine labor. See Shipping
Marriage; teacher dismissed for marrying. E. F. Guthrie; C.... 340
Marshall, Margaret
    Columnists on parade; S..........244; (see also 276); 273, 297, 325, 386, 464, 580, 721
Marshall, S. L. A.
    Oil, silver, and the peso; C.......543; see also 440
Martin, Governor Charles H. See Oregon
Martin, David
    Arcand, Adrian, fascist; S.... 241
Martin, John; criticisms of dancing. L. Kirstein; S 164
Marx, Karl, and Browder. T. Brameld; C ....311; see also.... 247
    And Russia. R. Niebuhr; S.... 530
Matthews, Herbert L., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.... 7
Maverick, Maury. G. Schrieber; Ct.... 148
    On The Nation's honor roll for 1937... 7
May bill. See War
May day celebrations; EP.... 517
Mayer, Milton S.
    Chicago doesn't care; S...........149; see also C.... 227
    Legionnaires and pensions; S.... 586
McConnell, Francis J., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.... 7
McLeod, E. S.
    Shadow over Canada; S..........176; see also C.... 311
McNaboe bill vetoed; EP.... 398
McKenna, Norman
    Christian Front radicalism; C......487; see also C.... 312
Mead, J. T.
    On department of labor's employees' conciliation committee; C...196; see also 41
Meat, price of. W. Hardenbergh and R. Brindze; C.... 83 Medicine
    Misalliance; struggle over medico-economic questions; S.... 666
    Political surgeons. P. A. Dodd; C...... 27
    Poverty and illness. J. Liburt, M. D., C.........340; see also EP.... 86
    Private, failure of; report of National institute of health; EP.........86; see also C.... 340
Mellquist, Jerome
    Marin and his oils; A.... 308
    Museum of modern art; exhibition; A... 542
Memorial day massacre. See Steel—Strikes—Republic steel corporation
Memphis safe for Ford. G. Lambert; S.... 93
Menefee, Selden C.
    Decline of Dave Beck; S.... 354
Merchant marine. See Shipping
Merlusse. M. Van Doren; MP.... 365
Mexico
    Cardenas, president, firm stand in Cedillo revolt; E 606
    Financial and tariff policies; E.... 118
    Internal and international situation tense; EP 575
    Oil:
        And Mexico's future. I. O. Prendergast; S 716
        British and American attitudes toward expropriation; EP 427
        Companies, revolt against; E.... 346
        Crisis over properties averted; EP... 397
        Mexico claims its own. H. Herring; S......... 440; see also C.... 543
    Silver purchase suspension by United States, effect of; EP.... 371
Middle west talking. J. Ingold; C...... 598; see also 524
Militarism, Roosevelt's, pointless. O. G. Villard; S.... 157
Milk, production. A. Barth; S.... 16
Miller, Guy V
    Pennsylvania's scrambled politics; S.... 555
Miller, Mrs. Lea P.; dismissal for marriage. E. F. Guthrie; C.... 340
Milner, Lucille B.
    Fascism in Great Britain; fighting by law; S....... 65; see also C.... 515
Milton, George Fort, on foreign policy of the United States 461

- Minifie, James M., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
- Minnesota, university of; justice to professor Schaper; EP 199
- Mitchell, Charles E. must pay income-tax penalty; EP 314
- Modern age books, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
- Money, meaning of. H. Scherman; C...487; see also 363
- Monopolies
  - Anti-trust law enforcement, new lease of life; EP 518
  - Anti-trust laws; test seen in appointment of T. Arnold; EP 315
  - Attack on; E 31
  - Congressional investigation, coming; P. Y. Anderson; S 715
  - Investigation fund voted; EP 684
  - Suit against Aluminum company of America; EP 684
  - See also Oil
- Montana opinion on Roosevelt. W. Aitken; C 682
- Moral progress, man's. D. T. Ray; C....682; see also 563
- Morey, Robert
  - Denmark, German threat against; C.... 626
- Morgan, Arthur E. See Tennessee Valley authority
- Mormon "security." M. Emery; S 182
- Moscow trials. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Mousetrap, escape from. See Austria
- Moving pictures; Hollywood a union town. M. Thompson; S 381
  - See also Censorship, moving pictures; Van Doren, B., for reviews
- Muggeridge, Eric G.
  - Asks help for Spanish children; C 367
- Mundelein, George, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
- Murphy, Frank, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
- Museum of modern art; exhibition. J. Mellquist; A 541
- Music
  - Composers in revolt. M. Lederman; S 181
  - Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
  - Toscanini broadcasts. B. H. Haggin; M... 338
- Mussolini, Benito. See Italy

N

- NLRB. See National labor relations board
- Nation, The
  - Attitude toward Great Britain. Q. Howe; C......... 626; see also E 576
  - Honor roll for 1937 7
  - Lapsed subscriptions, "reasons" for 699
  - On Chamberlain and isolationism; E.... 605
  - Opinions of readers on The Nation; C... 709
  - Poll on America's foreign policy....314; 376; 403; 435; 460; 522; 523; letters 569
  - Read in Scottish village. C. H. Sturgeon; C 83
  - Suit against, by R. Sprigle and P. Block; EP 547
  - War, and The Nation. T. H. Benton and others; C....111; see also C....139, 195
- National Association of manufacturers; propaganda disclosed; P. Y. Anderson; S... 291
- National bituminous coal commission. See Coal
- National committee to uphold constitutional government. P. Y. Anderson; S 375
- National defense. See Armaments
- National institute of health, report; EP. 86; see also C 340
- National labor relations board
  - Acts to bring Ford to book; EP 2
  - Change of name to "Labor's heartbreak house" suggested; E 547
  - Decision in steel cases; EP 426
  - Decision on power of district court to enjoin board. P. Y. Anderson; S 175
  - Decisions; EP 426
  - Order for reinstatement of locked-out workers upheld by supreme court; EP 573
  - Victory in Remington-Rand case, under Wagner act. P. Y. Anderson; S 634
  - Wagner act, contentions of companies in Harlan county case; EP 658
  - Wagner act upheld by federal courts in Remington-Rand case; EP 658
- National peace conference. J. Wechsler; S...... 323, 352; see also C...... 488
- National progressive party
  - Immell named executive director; EP.... 603
  - LaFollette movement. P. Y. Anderson; S..........524; see also C 598
  - LaFollette movement. O. G. Villard; S.. 561
  - LaFollette movement; new progressives; E 519
- Navies. See Armaments; Japanese-American relations
- Nazis
  - American; activities; EP 59
  - American; sadism, imported; E 493
  - British; E 499
  - Canadian. D. Martin; S 241
  - Canadian. E. S. McLeod; S........176; see also C 311
  - See also Germany
- Nebraska; unicameral legislature, record. C. Reckmeyer; C 139
- Negus, Doctor Victor E., on use of vocal organs; EP 547
- Neuberger, Richard L.
  - The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C 571
- Neumann, Henry
  - Boycott of Japanese; C 195
- Neutrality
  - Act; and Chinese and Japanese purchases from the United States. E. T. Douglas; C 139
  - Act causes American refusal to give economic aid to China; EP 142
  - Act, denounced. C. S. Zimmerman and B. D. Wolfe; C....139; see also C.... 111
  - Act favors Japan. G. L. Knapp; C 168
  - Collective action against "isolationism." M. E. Lester; C 167
  - Isolationism; EP 659
  - Isolationism and war. H. Gold; C 312
  - O'Connell bill. E. Friendly; C 283
- New Bedford, "free speech" in. D. Sprecher; C 283
- New deal. See Roosevelt, Franklin Delano—Administration
- New Jersey; Hagueism, moves against; EP 684
  - Mob violence by Hagueists; E 663
  - See also Jersey City
- New party. See National progressive party
- New York association for improving the condition of the poor, hoarding of capital; EP 685
- New York city
  - Colleges, move for liberalization; EP... 455
  - Colleges, reorganization plan. H. Selsam; C 656
  - Housing; clash of L. W. Post with Mayor LaGuardia; S 125
  - Schools; education by night. E. B. Burgum; C 112
- New York state
  - Governorship prospects; EP 31
  - Legislation against progressives; EP.... 343
  - Senatorship, fight for, following death of Copeland; EP 712
- New York stock exchange, reform in sight; EP 455
- New York Times
  - Gedye dispatches from Vienna; EP 342
  - Krock, Washington correspondent, on the oil-trust cases, and on the supreme court; EP 171
  - Reporting of French crisis by P. J. Philip; EP 114
- New York World-Telegram, appointment of M. H. Aylesworth as publisher; E.... 430
  - Suppression of liberal views; E 548
- New Zealanders in Spain. A. O'Halloran; C 627
- Newark, New Jersey. See Thomas, N.
- Newborg, Agnes
  - Hosiery, union-made lisle; C 312
- Newspapers
  - American, reporting of French crisis; EP 114
  - And sex appeal. O. G. Villard; S 443
  - Freedom of the press. W. A. White; S.. 693
    - Georgia anti-leaflet law held unconstitutional; EP 398
    - Man, and M. Graham, editor; persecution. C. J. Taft; C 112
    - Pittsburgh papers and the boycott on Japanese goods. G. A. Coleman; C.. 167
    - Suppression of liberal views by the New York World-Telegram; E 548
  - Publishers' convention; EP 518
  - Pulitzer prize awards; E 549
  - Radio; newspapers by. R. Brindze; S... 154
- Night schools, New York city. E. B. Burgum; C 112
- Norris, George W., on keeping out of war.... 376
- Noth, H. W.
  - On The Nation; C 709
- Nye, Senator Gerald P. By O. G. Villard; S......... 245; see also C 543

O

- O'Connell bill. See Peace
- O'Connell, Jerry J. By G. Schreiber; Ct 148
  - On The Nation's roll of honor for 1937 7
  - Seeks re-election; defies Hague; EP.... 630
- O'Connell, Cardinal William H.; views on Barcelona bombing; EP 342
- Of human hearts. M. Van Doren; MP 254
- O'Halloran, Arthur
  - New Zealanders in Spain; C 627
- Oil
  - Conviction of companies, at Madison. P. Y. Anderson; S .... 147; see also EP 114
  - Trust cases, views of A. Krock; EP... 171
  - Wyoming tax case; EP 314
  - See also Mexico
- Oliphant, J. B.
  - Fascism in England; C, 515; see also... 65
- O'Mahoney bill. See Corporations
- On borrowed time. J. W. Krutch; D 224
- Once is enough. J. W. Krutch; D 253
- One third of a nation. J. W. Krutch; D.... 137
- Opinion, public. See Poll, cross-section
- Oregon
  - Martin, Governor Charles H., defeat. O. G. Villard; S 644
  - Victory for H. L. Hess in primaries; EP 602
- Ossietzky, Carl von, murder by Nazis; E.... 549
- Oumansky, C.
  - Gorki, M.; biographical material sought; C 544
- Our town. J. W. Krutch; D 224
- Owens, Ben
  - Seeks material on Texas labor history; C 228
- Ownership, public. See Government ownership
- Oxford group; Rising Tide on social and economic conditions; EP 3

P

- Pacific Islands, claims to; EP 286
- Pacifism; and egoism. A. Guérard; C 598
  - Pacifists, and Woodrow Wilson. O. G. Villard; S 388
- Palestine; partition. S. Duker; C 27
- Panay sinking. See Chinese-Japanese war
- Parran, Thomas, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
- Parshley, H. M.
  - Darby review of book, Man, bread and destiny, by the Furnases; C 56
- Party, new. See National progressive party
- Passementerie pact, doomed? F. Sullivan; S.. 615
- Peace
  - "Economic cooperation" not feasible; EP 371
  - Isolationism and Chamberlain; E 605
  - O'Connell bill. E. Friendly; C 283
  - Returns in The Nation's poll 376
  - Road to. L. Fischer; S 238
  - War in the peace movement; National peace conference. J. Wechsler; S....... 323; 352; see also C 488
  - See also Pacifism; War
- Pearls of the crown, the. M. Van Doren; MP 484
- Pegler, Westbrook. M. Marshall; S 273
- Pennsylvania
  - Democratic split; EP 343
  - Election; EP 258
  - Primary election results; EP 602
  - Politics, scrambled. G. V. Miller; S.... 555
- Pensions. M. S. Mayer; S 586
- People of the Cumberland, the M. Van Doren; MP 595
- Peters, John P., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 7
- Petroleum. See Oil
- Philip, P. J. See New York Times
- Phonograph records from Germany. P. Glaberman and B. H. Haggin; C 598
  - See also Haggin, B. H. (for recordings)
- Picture magazines, decline. S. Bernards; C.. 340
- Pielkova, Ruth
  - Quintanilla drawings; A 395
- Pittsburgh papers and the boycott on Japanese goods. G. A. Coleman; C 167
- Planning, economic; E....60; see also C.... 227
- Plays. See G. M.; Krutch, J. W. (for reviews); Theatre, the
- Pleasures of literature, the. E. Wilson; S... 128
- Plebiscite, European. Low; Ct 504
- Poems
  - Charwoman: 20 Vesey street. 6.00 p. m.; B. Belitt 212
  - Fallow land. E. Clark 129
  - "Here comes the milkman." F. P. Adams 387
  - Landscape. D. S. Savage 474
  - Loew's Sheridan. C. Wilder 703
  - Old stone cross, the. W. B. Yeats 304
  - Poem. H. B. Mallalieu 212
  - Prelude. D. S. Savage 647
  - Spring song. F. P. Adams 328
  - To a friend. W. B. Yeats 305
  - Verse for a sower. L. S. Doughty 276
- Poland; Jews. See Jews
- Politics and advertising. H. Kravif; C 27
- Poll, cross-section, on Roosevelt; EP 711
- Porto Rico. See Puerto Rico
- Post, Langdon
  - Clash with LaGuardia over housing; S.. 125
- Poverty and illness. See Medicine
- Prendergast, L. O.
  - Oil and Mexico's future; S 716
- Presidential campaign of 1940; Democrats' hopes; EP 546

- Press. See Newspapers
- Press, freedom of. See Freedom of the press
- Price fixing; book prices and the law. C. Lazare; S...... 95; see also C...... 196
- Prices, high and low; EP.................. 230
- Prison literature sought. R. Reynolds; C.... 488
- Profits. See Business
- Progress through reaction. C. Armstrong; C......... 599; see also E......... 492
- Progressive party, national. See National progressive party
- Prologue to glory. J. W. Krutch; D......... 394
- Psychology; clairvoyance and chance. G. R. Weaver; C......................... 140
- Public finance. See Finance, public
- Public housing. See Housing
- Public ownership. See Government ownership
- Public utilities
  - As a risk. F. A. Sieverman, junior; C......515; see also......294; C.... 488
  - Electric bond and share company, supreme court decision; EP............ 370
  - Purchase by government, proposed. O. G. Villard; S...127; see also EP...113; C, with editorial comment............ 311
  - TVA operations held constitutional by district court; EP..113; see also..127; C, with editorial comment............ 313
  - Relations with the government; EP..113; see also......127; C, with editorial comment 311
  - Roosevelt policy. P. Y. Anderson; S... 147
  - Valuation; decision in Indianapolis water company case; EP.................. 58
- Publishing, book. See Books
- Puerto Rico; Governor Winship, reactionary. O. G. Villard; S.................... 644
- Pulitzer prize awards; E.................. 549
  - Award to R. Sprigle; EP.............. 547
- Puner, Samuel Paul, and S. D. Spero
  - Uncle Sam, privileged boss; S......41; see also C......................... 196

Q

- Quayle, Jack J., junior
  - Sailors; testimony from the fo'c'sle; C.. 227
- Quintanilla, Luis, drawings. R. Pielkova; A.. 395

R

- RFC. See Reconstruction finance corporation
- Radio
  - God gets an idea. G. S. Kaufman; S.... 208
  - Newspaper by radio. R. Brindze; S...... 154
  - War in the ether. K. Van Gelderland; S 300
- Railroads
  - Finances, problem; EP.............171; EP.............342; E............. 521
  - Handouts for. E. Janeway; S.......500; see also EP....................... 490
  - Interstate commerce commission report on conditions; EP....................... 426
  - Plight. O. G. Villard; S.............. 673
- Raoul, William
  - Stepping up production; C, with editorial comment.......227; see also E....... 60
- Ravage, M. E.
  - France, in crisis; S.................90; see also E......................... 88
  - France, no dictatorship; S............ 152
- Ray, David T.
  - Man's moral progress; C...........682; see also 563
- Reading, pleasures of. E. Wilson; S........ 128
- Reason, voice of. G. Grosz; Ct............ 14
- Recession. See Business
- Reckmeyer, Clarence
  - Nebraska's unicameral legislature; C.... 139
- Reconstruction finance corporation; handouts for railroads. E. Janeway; S.....500; see also EP....................... 490
- Records, phonograph, from Germany. P. Glaberman and B. H. Haggin; C........ 598
  - See also Haggin, B. H. (for recordings)
- Recovery, business. See Business
- "Reds." See Communism
- Reed, Stanley, nomination for supreme court; EP 85
- Refugees, United States appeal for international action; EP................. 370
- Reissig, Herman F.
  - Spain needs ambulances; C............. 424
- Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment relief
- Remington-Rand company, strike-breaking formula; EP 658
  - Victory for the labor relations board. P. Y. Anderson; S.................. 634
- Reorganization, government. See United States
- Republic steel corporation
  - Government case against. P. Y. Anderson; S 524
  - Girdler must pay. P. Y. Anderson; S... 431
  - Labor board's decision; EP............ 426
  - See also Steel and iron—Strikes
- Republican party; activity. P. Y. Anderson; S............................. 494
  - And the democratic primaries; E...... 659
- Reynolds, Reginald
  - Seeks prison literature; C............. 488
- Rhode Island, reaction in. I. M. Tobin; C... 55
- Richberg, Donald R., versus Jackson. M. W. Childs; S......................... 119
- Rights, civil. See Civil rights
- Rising Tide, EP.......................... 3
- Risks—the key to recovery. S. H. Slichter; S.........294; see also C 488, C... 515
- River, the. M. Van Doren; MP............ 193
- Robinson passport case. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Rogan, Don
  - The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C 571
- Rogin, I. G.
  - Germany's economy; S................ 438
- Rogin, Lawrence
  - Lisle stockings, union made; C.....367, 424
- Roman catholic church
  - Catholics not all reactionaries. J. J. Hughes; C 55
  - Christian Front, The, a "radical" Catholic magazine. M. G. Lewis; C 312; see also C 487
  - Division of opinion on Hitler plebiscite; EP 398
  - Pressure in America, on Spain; EP..... 170
  - Vatican friendliness for Mussolini; EP.. 115
- Roof, battle of the. D. Haskell; Arc........ 79
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  - Address on holding companies; E...... 60
  - Administration:
    - And business, little and big. P. Y. Anderson; S 175
    - Arthurdale speech on taxation; EP.. 630
    - Attacks on president the "number one" obsession; E............... 491
    - Attack on monopoly; E............ 31
    - Business and the government; message to congress; EP........... 29
    - Business men, big; conference with president; EP 87
    - Business men, little; conference with president; EP 142
    - Business, policy on. P. Y. Anderson; S 147
    - Democratic primaries; fight over New deal policies; E................ 659
    - Fourth phase in business control; E. 116
    - Freedom and the executive; E...... 372
    - La Follette attacks; E..492; see also C 599
    - Message to congress; EP.......... 29
    - Militarism. O. G. Villard; S.....45, 157
    - Montana opinion. W. Aitken; C.... 682
    - Naval program; EP.........141; E 200
    - New deal, looking up; EP......... 546
    - New deal, program not abandoned; EP 2
    - New deal, recruits. P. Y. Anderson; S 579
    - Peril in cleavage in Democratic party; E 456
    - Poll, cross-section, on the president; EP 711
    - President must fight for measures. P. Y. Anderson; S............. 431
    - Public utilities, policy on. P. Y. Anderson; S 147
    - Reforms, attempted, hamstrung by congress. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 175
    - Roosevelt bandwagon, new. R. Dell; S 551
    - Roosevelt, ringmaster. M. Lerner; S 63
    - Spending-lending program. P. Y. Anderson; S 494
    - Troubles. Low; Ct................ 665
    - Under two flags. P. Y. Anderson; S. 147
    - Writing for profit; comment on; EP. 258
- Roosevelt, Mrs. Franklin D., columnist. M Marshall; S 386
- Rorty, James
  - Medicine's misalliance; S 666
- Rosenfeld, Paul
  - Cloisters, the; A...................... 596
  - Demuth memorial show; A............. 46
  - Schreiber, G., exhibition; A........... 190
  - Statues in the sun; A.................. 485
- Roumania. See Rumania
- Rubens passport case. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Ruedy, August
  - Moscow trials; C........367; see also E 287
- Rumania
  - Carol drops mask; E.................. 34
  - Fascism threatened; EP.............. 3
  - Goga's anti-semitic and illegal measures; EP 115
  - Jews. See Jews
  - Part in European jig-saw; E........... 199
- Rumely, Dr. Edward A., and the government reorganization bill. P. Y. Anderson; S 375
- Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Rylands, T. F.
  - On The Nation; C.................... 710

S

- S., H.
  - Opposition to Hitler in Germany; C..... 55
- Sabotage, labor governments and. E. Davies; S 179
- Sailors. See Shipping
- Saint Louis Star-Times, liberalism; EP..... 316
- Saints. G. Grosz; Ct...................... 331
- Santo Domingo. See Haiti
- Savage, D. S.
  - Landscape; P 474
  - Prelude; P 647
- Save me the waltz. J. W. Krutch; D....... 309
- Scandinavia enters armament race; EP...... 491
- Schaper, Professor William A., justice done; EP 199
- Schapper, Beatrice
  - Forgery; S.......155; see also C...... 284
- Scherman, Harry
  - Meaning of money, the; C.....487; see also 363
- Schleswig, north; Hitler's next objective. J. Joesten; C 515
- Schmeling-Louis fight; "Yussel" Jacobs okays the Nazis. I. Q. Gross; S............ 698
- Schmitz, Richard, death in concentration camp reported; EP................. 685
- Schools
  - Education at night. E. B. Burgum; C... 112
  - Educational work, labor unions'; E.201; see also C........................ 284
  - New York city, education by night. E. B. Burgum; C 112
  - Public, report by President's advisory committee on education; EP.......... 287
- Schreiber, Georges
  - Congressman; Ct 148
- Schreiber, Georges, exhibition. P. Rosenfeld; A 190
- Schuschnigg, Chancellor. See Austria
- Scott, Byron N. By G. Schreiber; Ct....... 148
- Scottish help for Spanish children. C. H. Sturgeon; C 83
- Sculpture. See Art
- Sea gull, the. J. W. Krutch; D........... 422
- Seattle; decline of D. Beck. S. C. Menefee; S 354
  - Election; EP 258
- Sedgwick, Ellery, "sees" Spain; E.......... 233
- Seeley, Evelyn
  - Housewives, feudal; S 613
- Selden, Frank Henry
  - On The Nation; C.................... 709
- Seldes, George
  - Ken—the inside story; S...497; see also EP 631
- Selsam, Howard
  - Colleges, New York city, reorganization plan; C 656
- Shadow and substance. J. W. Krutch; D.... 162
- Ship, clipper, reproduction. O. G. Villard; S. 700
- Shipping
  - Maritime labor opposed by Kennedy; E.. 234
  - Report against unions, biased; EP..... 87
  - Sailors; testimony from the fo'c'sle. J. Y. Quayle, junior; C.............. 227
  - Subsidies. O. G. Villard; S............ 725
- Shoemaker, Joseph; assailants acquitted; EP 712
- Shoemaker's holiday, the. J. W. Krutch; D.. 80
- Shryock, Henry S., Jr.
  - On The Nation; C................... 709
- Sieverman, F. A., junior
  - Utilities as a risk; C..515; see also 294; C 488
- Silver. See Mexico
- Sinclair, Upton, on keeping out of war...... 377
- Slichter, Sumner H.
  - Risks—the key to recovery; S...294; see also C..........488; C............. 515
- Slight case of murder, a. M. Van Doren; MP 310
- Smedley, Agnes
  - Aid for Chinese fighters, appeal; C...... 682
- Smith, Norman; beaten by Memphis police. G. Lambert; S 93
- Snow white and the seven dwarfs. M. Van Doren; MP 108
- Social credit not fascist. N. Lentz; C...311; see also 176
- Social security act, criticized. A. Epstein; C. 28
- Socrates discusses the Spartans. A. Hollriegel; S 357
- South Chicago Memorial day massacre. See Steel—Strikes—Republic steel corporation
- Southbury, Connecticut, council, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937........... 7
- Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Spain
  - Ambulance, appeal for; EP............ 685
  - Ambulances needed. H. F. Reissig; C... 424
  - American legislators' letter to the cortes; EP 142
  - Atrocities, rebel; EP................. 683
  - Barcelona, bombing; EP.............. 142
  - Barcelona bombing; views of Cardinal O'Connell; EP 342
  - Barcelona faces front. L. White; S..... 266
  - Barcelona holds out. L. Fischer; S..... 374
  - Betrayal, projected, at Geneva; E...... 577
  - "Blockade," film, attempted censorship; E 688
  - Bower, C. G., ambassador, defended. F. C. Kelly; C.................. 55
  - Catholic pressure in America; EP....... 170

Children, foster parents wanted. E. G. Muggeridge; C........ 367
Diplomacy at Geneva. R. Dell; S....... 635
Embargo against loyalists; E.......344; P. Y. Anderson; S........ 494
American; Hull's refusal to lift it; E........576; see also C........ 626
American state department policy. M. Lerner; S........ 607
Aids fascists; E........ 399
Stands; EP..............370, 453, 489
Fascist drive, advance; EP............ 369
Franco prepares for tourists. T. Wolfe; C........ 598
Franco-Italian negotiation break-down; E 604
Franco's conquest of the Atlantic Monthly; E........ 233
Government successes. L. Fischer; S.... 8
Government successes; EP....2; EP.... 489
Insurgent drive; sinking of the Baleares; EP........ 313
Italian intervention shown clearly; EP.. 87
League of nations council; Spain on agenda. R. Dell; E........ 550
Loyalist cause not lost; E.............. 429
Loyalists will not surrender. L. Fischer; S........ 495
Madrid, laughter in. L. Hughes; S..... 123
Mussolini rescinds compromise offer; fascist aid to rebels continues; EP...... 285
Negotiations, international; EP......... 657
New Zealanders in. A. O'Halloran; C... 627
Peril. L. Fischer; S........ 348
Scottish help for Spanish children. C. H. Sturgeon; C........ 83
Shirt-sleeve heroes. L. Stowe; S........ 467
Situation on the loyalist front. L. Fischer; S........ 458
Terrorism campaign by insurgents; EP.. 170
Teruel, rebel setback at; EP........... 115
Teruel, victory; E........ 60
"Spain in flames," censored in Pennsylvania. A. W. A. Cowan; C........ 27
Speech, freedom of. See Freedom of speech
Spending. See Finance, public
Spero, Sterling D., and S. P. Puner
Uncle Sam, privileged boss; S.....41; see also C........ 196
Spies, labor. See Labor
Sprecher, Drex
"Free speech" in New Bedford; C...... 283
Sprigle, Ray, award of Pulitzer prize to; his suit against The Nation; EP......... 547
Spring song. F. P. Adams; P............. 328
Spring travel, 1938. J. Mackey; Ct......... 402
Stanley, Wendell M., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937........ 7
Statues. See Art
Steel and iron
Decisions of national board in Inland Steel and Republic cases; EP........ 426
Strikes:
Republic steel corporation; Chicago has forgotten. M. S. Mayer; S........149, see also C........ 227
Republic steel corporation; marchers at Chicago massacre fined; E..... 62
Stevens, Cole
University of Washington revolt; C.... 543
Stockings, silk and lisle. See Chinese-Japanese war
Stocks; Wall street investment and speculation. K. Hutchison; S............. 268
Stolberg, Benjamin, articles on C. I. O.; EP. 114
Stone, I. F.
Kansas City stockyards case; S........ 690
Praise for "The politicos"; C...682; see also........ 562
Stone, William T.
On "isolationists"; C...488; see also... 323
Storm in a teacup. M. Van Doren; MP..... 421
Stowe, Leland
Spain's shirt-sleeve heroes; S........... 467
Strachey, Lytton; biographical material sought. C. Clemens; C.............. 516
Sturgeon, Christine H.
Scottish help for Spanish children; C... 83
Subsidies, shipping. O. G. Villard; S....... 725
Sullivan, Frank
Passementerie pact, doomed?; S........ 615
Supreme court, United States
Black, dissenting. M. Lerner; S........ 264
Black, dissents prove value. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 634
"Black against the supreme court"; EP. 169
Decisions, liberalized; EP............. 370
Electric bond and share company decision; EP........ 370
Georgia anti-leaflet law held unconstitutional; EP........ 398
Holds salaries of officers of New York port authority are taxable; EP....... 630
Honor among judges; E..........577; see also........ 579
Indianapolis water company case; decision; EP........ 58
Krock, A., views in the New York Times; EP........ 171
Labor code; E........ 290
Liberal trend, recent; E.............. 660
Reed nomination; EP................. 87
Sutherland retirement; EP............. 58
Upholds labor relation board's order for reinstatement of locked-out workers; EP........ 573
Upholds Wagner act, in Remington-Rand case. P. Y. Anderson; S............ 634
Sutherland, Justice, retirement; EP......... 58
Sweezy, Paul M.
Balancing the budget; C, with editorial comment........ 84
Sweezy-Walsh case. See Harvard university

T

TVA. See Tennessee valley authority
Taft, Clinton J.
Persecution and the press; case of M. Graham and Man; C................ 112
The Nation's poll on American foreign policy; C........ 571
Talbot, Marion
On review of biography of L. M. Alcott; C......284; see also................ 216
Tampa, Florida, flogging cases; assailants acquitted; EP........ 712
Tariff; agreement with Czecho-Slovakia; EP. 315
Taxation. See Finance, public
Teigan, Henry G., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937........ 7
Teigan, Henry G. By G. Schreiber; Ct..... 148
Telephone monopoly shown; EP............ 398
Tennessee valley authority
Inquiry demanded; EP................ 285
Inquiry in full swing; EP............. 630
Jitters. P. Y. Anderson; S............ 319
Morgan, A. E., refusal to back up charges; EP........ 314
Morgan charges and congressional inquiry; EP........ 341
Operations held constitutional by district court; EP...113; see also 127; C, with editorial comment........ 311
Teruel. See Spain
Test pilot. M. Van Doren; MP............ 540
Texas labor history, material sought. B. L. Owens; C........ 228
Textile workers' organizing committee, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937..... 7
Theater, the; Broadway season. J. W. Krutch; D........ 680
Federal theater and Mercury theater, New York; successes; EP...201; see also C........ 284
"Third basket" tax. See Finance, public
Thomas, Elbert D., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937........ 7
Thomas, Norman
Ludlow resolution for war referendum; C 83
Mobbed in Newark; E................ 663
See also Jersey City
Thompson, Dorothy. M. Marshall; S........ 721
Thompson, Morton
Hollywood a union town; S............ 381
Three-year plan wanted; E...60; see also C.. 227
Time and the Conways. J. W. Krutch; D... 80
Times, New York. See New York Times
To the victor. M. Van Doren; MP.......... 484
Tobin, Irwin M.
Reaction in Rhode Island; C........... 55
Tom Sawyer. M. Van Doren; MP.......... 254
Tompkins, M. B.
On The Nation; C................... 710
Toronto baby derby; EP.................. 259
Tortilla flat. J. W. Krutch; D............. 107
Toscanini, Arturo, broadcasts. B. H. Haggin; M........ 338
Trade, foreign; agreement with Czecho-Slovakia; EP........ 315
Trade unions. See Labor unions
Transport workers' union, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.................. 7
Trusts. See Monopolies
Two bouquets, the. J. W. Krutch; D....... 680
Tyrol Germans. L. Lore; S................ 583

U

USSR. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Uncle Sam, privileged boss. S. D. Spero and S. P. Puner; S...41, see also C...... 196
Unemployment; census figures; EP......... 30
Washington, District of Columbia. McA. Coleman; S........ 641
Unemployment relief
Baruch testimony before senate committee; EP........ 286
Hoarding of capital by private charity; EP........ 685
Hunger and Mrs. Hulswit; E.......... 578
Recession and relief; E................ 233
Spending, government, and relief; E... 604
See also Works progress administration
Union of soviet socialist republics
And Karl Marx. R. Niebuhr; S....... 530
Dispatches from Moscow, 1940-1941. O. G. Villard; S........ 332
Moscow trials. O. G. Villard; S........ 302
Moscow trials, and repercussions; EP 287; see also C........ 367
Robinson-Rubens passport case; EP.... 58
Watching eye over Europe. Low; Ct... 697
Unions. See Labor unions
United automobile workers of America; N. Smith, organizer, beaten by Memphis police. G. Lambert; S............... 93
On The Nation's honor roll for 1937.... 7
United States
And Europe; E.....259; see also C.... 367
Cities that consume men. H. Ward; S.. 91
Democracy begins at home. L. Chrismer; C........ 112
Diplomatic service, praise for. O. G. Villard; S........ 532
Finances. See Finance, public
Foreign policy: Facing two ways; E.... 687
The Nation's poll..403, 460, 522, 523; letters........ 569
Refusal to repeal Spanish embargo; E 576; see also C................. 626
Freedom and the executive; E.......... 372
Government and business; EP......... 29
Government employees; Uncle Sam, privileged boss. S. D. Spero and S. P. Puner; S.......41; see also C....... 196
Government reorganization, proposed EP 231; E........ 317
And bunk. P. Y. Anderson; S...... 406
Battle over; E........ 400
Bill passed by senate; EP........... 370
Bill defeated; E........ 427
Gannett lobby against; P. Y. Anderson; S........ 375
Lobbying against; EP............... 341
Revival possible. P. Anderson; S..... 551
Isolationism and war. H. Gold; C...... 312
Naval program, Roosevelt's; EP....... 141
Public utilities. See Public utilities
Trade agreement with Czecho-Slovakia; EP........ 315
War policy, weakness. O. G. Villard; S. 271
See also Japanese-American relations
Universities. See Colleges and universities; names of institutions
Untermyer, Samuel, on foreign policy of the United States........ 435
Utilities, public. See Public utilities

V

Valuation. See Utilities, public
Van Doren, Mark
Adventures of Chico, the; MP......... 310
Adventures of Marco Polo, the; MP... 484
Adventures of Robin Hood, the; MP.... 653
Fight for peace, the; MP............. 595
Generals without buttons; MP......... 365
Girl was young, the; MP.............. 193
Greed; MP........ 26
Jezebel; MP........ 365
Life dances on; MP.................. 421
March of time; MP.................. 136
Merlusse; MP........ 365
Of human hearts; MP................ 254
Pearls of the crown, the; MP.......... 484
People of the Cumberland, the; MP..... 595
River, the; MP...................... 193
Slight case of murder, a; MP.......... 310
Snow white and the seven dwarfs; MP.. 108
Storm in a teacup; MP............... 421
Test pilot; MP...................... 540
To the victor; MP.................. 484
Tom Sawyer; MP.................... 254
Wells Fargo; MP.................... 82
Young Pushkin; MP................. 26
Van Gelderland, Karl
War in the ether; S................... 300
Van Sittart, Sir Robert; behind his promotion. R. Dell; S........ 97
Vargas, Dictator. See Brazil
Vatican. See Roman catholic church
Vidakovic, A., on Germany's economy; S... 437
Vigilante movements. See Civil rights
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Issues and men:
American attitude toward Japan; S... 470
Anglo-Italian agreement; S.......... 505
Armament race; S................. 100
Clipper ship, reproduction; S......... 700
Diplomatic service, praise for; S..... 532
Dispatches from Moscow, 1940-1941; S 332
Generals, retired, reactionary; S...... 644
Germany of to-day; S.............. 616
House, Edward M.; S.............. 414
Japan and the United States; S...... 18
Japanese-American relations, and naval expansion; S........ 184
LaFollette movement; S............. 561
Ludlow war referendum; S.......... 71
Martin, Governor C. H., defeat; S... 644
Militarism, pointless; S............. 157
Moscow trials; S.................. 302
Newspapers and sex appeal; S........ 443
Nye, Senator; S...245; see also C... 543
Public utilities, coal companies and railroads; proposed purchase by government; S......127; see also EP, 113; C, with editorial comment......... 311
Railroads' plight; S................ 673
Roosevelt, open letter to, on Hague; S 589

  Roosevelt militarism; S.............. 45
  Shipping subsidies; S.............. 725
  War and non-resistance; S........... 356
  War policy, American, weakness; S... 271
  War possibility aggravated by armament; S.............. 184
  War with Japan, campaign for; S..... 209
  Wilson, W., and the pacifists; S...... 388
  Winship, Governor B., reactionary; S 644
Vivas, Eliseo, review of K. Burke's "Attitudes toward history"; C.............. 139
Vocal organs, use and misuse; EP.......... 547
Voice of reason, the. G. Grosz; Ct.......... 14
Voorhis, H. Jerry, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.............. 7
Voorhis, H. Jerry. G. Schreiber; Ct......... 148

W

WPA. See Works progress administration
Wade, Mason
  Seeks material on Margaret Fuller; C.. 28
Wages. See Labor
Wages-and-hours bill. See Labor
Wagner act. See National labor relations board
Walker, George Richmond
  Deficit financing; C.................... 27
  Hoarding and recovery; C......488; see also 294; C.......................... 656
Wall street. See Stocks
Walsh-Healey act, vote on, denied. P. Y. Anderson; S...................... 715
Walsh-Sweezy case. See Harvard university War
  And peace; collective security; E....... 4
  Anti-war congress in Washington, and isolationism; EP.................. 659
  Bills, Hill-Sheppard and May, against "war profits"; EP...231; see also... 291
  Greek tragedy and modern politics. R. Niebuhr; S....................... 12
  In the ether. K. Van Gelderland; S..... 300
  Isolationism and war. H. Gold; C...... 312
  Ludlow resolution. See Ludlow resolution, etc.
  Materials, America's gift to aggressors. H. C. Engelbrecht; S.............. 407
  May bill, for dictatorship in case of war. P. Y. Anderson; S...291; see also EP, 231
  Mongers. L. Hamilton; C.............. 516
  Nation, The, and war. See Nation, The Nonresistance. O. G. Villard; S........ 356
  Reason, voice of. G. Grosz; Ct.......... 14
  Referendum on. See Ludlow resolution, etc.
  Threatened. P. Y. Anderson; S......... 202
  Wishful thinking in 1840. P. Lesley; C 167
  See also Armaments; Pacificism; Peace
Ward, Harold
  Cities that consume men; S............ 91
Ward, Maise
  Asks for Chesterton material; C........ 312
Washington, District of Columbia; unemployment in the shadow of the capitol. McA. Coleman; S.................. 641
Washington, letters from......63, 119, 147, 175, 202, 263, 291, 319, 347, 375, 406, 431, 459, 494, 524 (see also C, 598); 551, 579, 607, 634, 689, 715
Washington battalion, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937........................ 7
Washington jitters. J. W. Krutch; D....... 566
Washington, university of; revolt; C. Stevens; C.............................. 543
  Teacher dismissed for marrying. E. F. Guthrie; C.......................... 340
Weaver, George R.
  Clairvoyance and chance; C........... 140
Wechsler, James
  War in the peace movement; S......323, 352; see also C..................... 488
Welles, Orson, on The Nation's honor roll for 1937........................... 7
Wells Fargo. M. Van Doren; MP.......... 82
Werth, Alexander
  Behind Blum's failure; S.............. 462
  Czecho-Slovakia and France; S......... 718
West, George P., on foreign policy of the United States...................... 404
West Indies, British, tragedies. W. A. Domingo; C......................... 626
What a life. M. G.; D.................... 512
White, Leigh
  Barcelona faces front; S............... 266
White, William Allen
  Freedom of the press; S............... 693
  On keeping out of war................ 377
Whiteoaks. J. W. Krutch; D............. 394
Whitney, Richard, larceny; E............ 318
  Sentencing; EP....................... 427
Wilcox, Ella Wheeler; biographical material sought. J. Ballou; C................ 28
Wilder, Charlotte
  Loew's Sheridan; P.................... 703
Wildermann, Rudolf; no reflection intended in Lore article...................... 737
Williams, David Rhys
  Substitute for the Ludlow bill; C....... 255
Wilson, Edmund
  Pleasures of literature, the; S.......... 128
Wilson, Woodrow, and the pacifists. O. G. Villard; S........................... 388
Wine of choice. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 280
Winship, General Blanton. See Puerto Rico
Winter, Ella
  "Red" menace, the; C...........139; see also.............................. 43
Winternitz, Milton G., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937.......................... 7
Wisconsin university; symptoms of intolerance; case of R. Davis; EP.......... 603
Wishful thinking in 1840. P. Lesley; C..... 167
Wolfe, Bertram D., and C. S. Zimmerman
  Neutrality act; C...139; see also C..... 111
Wolfe, Thomas
  Franco prepares for tourists; C........ 598
  On keeping out of war................ 377
Women
  Equal rights amendment; EP.......... 198
  Rebellion against government spending; EP.............................. 519
  Rights attacked. E. F. Guthrie; C...... 340
Works progress administration; decimal relief system. I. Edelman; C.............. 626
World-Telegram, New York. See New York World-Telegram
Wyoming oil-tax case; EP................ 314

Y

Yale university; needs the C. I. O. By G. Butler; S.............................. 67
Yankee communism; E.................. 632
Yeats, W. B.
  Old stone cross, the; P................ 304
  To a friend; P....................... 305
Young Pushkin. M. Van Doren; MP........ 26

Z

Zamor, S. Juste
  Haiti; arrests by President Vincent; C.. 168
Zeeland, Paul van; economic program; EP.. 143
Zimmerman, Charles S., and B. D. Wolfe
  Neutrality act; C...139; see also C... 111
Zukerman, William
  Jews and the fate of Poland; S......... 379

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Action at Aquila. H. Allen; B............. 279
Adamic, Louis
  My America; B....................... 648
Adler, Mortimer J.
  What man has made of man. A study of the consequences of platonism and positivism in psychology; B.......... 415
Aesthetic quality. A contextualist theory of beauty. S. C. Pepper; B............. 481
African genesis. L. Frobenius and D. C. Fox; B.............................. 278
After midnight. I. Keun; AN............ 595
Alcott, Louisa May, biography. K. Anthony; B........216; see also C.......... 284
Allen, Hervey
  Action at Aquila; B................. 279
Allen, James S.
  Reconstruction: The battle for democracy; B......................... 19
Allison, John M. S.
  Malesherbes, defender and reformer of the French monarchy, 1721-94; B....... 706
Altgeld, John Peter, biography. H. Barnard; B.............................. 648
America goes to war. C. C. Tansill; B...... 479
America on relief. M. D. Lane and F. Steegmuller; B.......................... 251
America south. C. Beals; B................ 21
American years. H. Sinclair; B.......... 677
America's 60 families. F. Lundberg; B..... 102
Anabasis. St.-J. Perse. With a translation into English by T. S. Eliot; B....... 536
And so to war. H. Herring; B............ 594
Anders, G. S.; R........................ 76
Anders, G. S.; letter on his review of "New frontiers of the mind," by J. B. Rhine; G. R. Weaver; C..................... 140
Anthony, Katharine
  Louisa May Alcott; B..216; see also C.. 284
Arnold, Thurman W.
  Folklore of capitalism, the; B.......... 46
Art, eleven books on; B................ 220
Art of ancient Egypt, the; B............ 220
Art without epoch; B.................. 220
Arthur Rimbaud in Abyssinia. E. Starkie; B 677
At the Paris peace conference. J. T. Shotwell; B........................... 131
Attitudes toward history. K. Burke. Letter by Burke on Vivas review; C........ 139
Authors; five books on; B................ 185

B

Bach, Julian, junior; R.................. 508
Bakunin, Michael, biography. E. H. Carr; B 358
Barnard, Harry
  "Eagle forgotten": The life of John Peter Altgeld; B.................. 648
Barnes, Harry Elmer
  Economic history of the western world, an; B.............................. 77
Be loved no more. A. B. Tourtellot; B...... 678
Beals, Carleton
  America south; B..................... 21
  Glass houses; B...................... 594
Beard, Miriam
  History of the business man, a; B.... 250
Beaumont, Cyril W.
  Complete book of ballets; B........... 622
Belitt, Ben; R.......................... 133
Bell, Margaret
  Women of the wilderness; B........... 650
Bellamy, Edward, articles, letters and addresses; AN.......................... 280
Bellamy speaks again; AN................ 280
Beres, David; R........................ 417
Bernard DeVoto: A preliminary appraisal. G. Mattingly; B................... 333
Bertram, James M.
  First act in China; B................. 130
Bisno, Beatrice
  Tommorrow's bread; AN............... 364
Bisson, T. A.
  Japan in China; B.................... 704
Bisson, T. A.; R.....................389, 650
Bogan, Louise; R......................129, 417
Book, the. The story of printing and bookmaking. D. C. McMurtrie; AN....... 25
Born, Esther
  New architecture in Mexico, the; B... 49
Botticelli; B........................... 220
Bowleg Bill, the sea-going cowboy. J. Digges; B.............................. 534
Bowley, A. L.
  Wages and income in the United kingdom since 1860; B................. 390
Brenner, Anita; R....................49, 306
Breuer, Bessie
  Daughter, the; B..................... 510
Briefs, Goetz A.
  Proletariat, the: A challenge to civilization; AN............................ 707
Brisbane: A candid biography. O. Carlson; B 22
Britain faces Germany. A. L. Kennedy; B.. 638
Brothers, the. H. G. Wells; B............ 420
Browder, Earl
  People's front, the; B............247; see also C........................... 311
Brown, Sterling A.; R................... 448
Brynes, Oscar
  Day's work, the; AN................. 484
Buck, Pearl S.
  This proud heart; B.................. 187
Burckhardt, Jacob
  Civilization of the renaissance in Italy, the; B............................ 220
Burke, Kenneth
  Attitudes toward history. Letter on review by E. Vivas; C................ 139
Burney, Fanny, biography. A. B. Tourtellot; B.............................. 678

C

Caldwell, Erskine
  Southways; B........................ 730
Carlson, Oliver
  Brisbane: A candid biography; B....... 22
Carr, E. H.
  Michael Bakunin; B.................. 358
Cassal, Gould; R.......................420, 653
Cezanne; B............................ 220
Chamberlain, John; R...............22, 73, 648
Chambrun, Clara Longworth de
  Shakespeare rediscovered; B........... 728
Charles Darwin. G. West; B.............. 593
Chase, Stuart
  Tyranny of words, the; B............. 101
Chavez, Agustin Velazquez
  Contemporary Mexican artists; B...... 49
Children of the rising sun. W. Price; B..... 389
Childs, Marcus W.; R.................... 251
Christopher Marlowe: The man in his time. J. Bakeless; AN..................... 135
Citizen of Geneva: Selections from the letters of Jean Jacques Rousseau. C. W. Hendell; B............................ 160
Civilization of the renaissance in Italy, the. J. Burckhardt; B.................... 220
Collected poems. E. E. Cummings; B........ 360
Collected poems of Sara Teasdale, the; AN.. 25
Colum, Mary M.
  From these roots: The ideas that have made modern literature; B........... 22
Coming from the fair. N. Hoult; AN...... 734
Coming victory of democracy, the. T. Mann; B.............................. 726

- Complaint and reform in England. W. H. Dunham and S. Pargellis; AN....... 161
- Complete book of ballets. C. W. Beaumont; ■ 622
- Compton-Burnett, I.
  - Daughters and sons; B................ 593
- Concept of morals, the. W. T. Stace; B..... 76
- Concert pitch. E. Paul; AN............... 511
- Conqueror of the seas. The story of Magellan. S. Zweig; B....................... 158
- Conquest of the past. Prince Hubertus zu Löwenstein; B....................... 476
- Contemporary Mexican artists. A. V. Chavez; B 49
- Crowning of a king, the. A. Zweig; B...... 651
- Culture of cities, the. L. Mumford; B...... 477
- Cummings, E. E.
  - Collected poems; B.................. 360
  - Seven poems; B...................... 360
  - Tulips and chimneys; B.............. 360
- Curry, Walter Clyde
  - Shakespeare's philosophical patterns; B.. 728
- Curtiss, Mina; R.................510, 650, 678

D

- Dahlberg, Arthur
  - When capital goes on strike; B......... 652
- Darby, Hugh H.; R..................449, 507
- Darby, Hugh H.; defends his review of "Man, bread and destiny," by C. C. and S. M. Furnases; C.............. 56
- Darwin, Charles, biography. G. West; B.... 593
- Daughter, the. B. Breuer; B............... 510
- Daughters and sons. I. Compton-Burnett; B 593
- Day's work, the. O. Brynes; AN........... 484
- Debt to Shakespeare in the Beaumont-and-Fletcher plays, the. D. M. McKeithan; B 728
- Defoe. J. Sutherland; B................... 250
- De Kruif, Paul
  - Fight for life, the; B................. 507
- Delafield, E. M.
  - Ladies and gentlemen in Victorian fiction; AN 161
- Deutsch, Babette; R....................... 536
- de Valois, Ninette
  - Invitation to the ballet; AN........... 280
- DeVoto, Bernard: A preliminary appraisal. G. Mattingly; B 333
- Dictators and democracies. C. B. Hoover; B.. 188
- Digges, Jeremiah
  - Bowleg Bill, the sea-going cowboy; B... 534
- Dinesen, Isak
  - Out of Africa; B...................... 306
- Dos Passos, John
  - Journeys between wars; B............ 418
  - U. S. A.; The 42d parallel; Nineteen-nineteen; The big money; B......... 210
- Douglas, Paul H.; R...................... 648
- Drury, Clifford Merrill
  - Marcus Whitman, M. D., pioneer and martyr; B 223
- Dufferin and Ava, Marquess of, biography. H. Nicolson; B..................... 277
- Duhamel, Georges
  - Pasquier chronicles, the. B. de Holthoir, translator; B...................... 444
- Dunham, W. W., and S. Pargellis
  - Complaint and reform in England; AN.. 161
- Dunn, Frederick Sherwood
  - Peaceful change; B.................... 50

E

- "Eagle forgotten"; The life of John Peter Altgeld. H. Barnard; B.............. 648
- Earth memories: L. Powys. Introduction by Van W. Brooks; B................. 705
- Economic history of the western world, an. H. E. Barnes; B.................. 77
- Edman, Irwin
  - Four ways of philosophy; B........... 48
- Education of a diplomat, the. H. Wilson. Introduction by C. Bowers; B....... 391
- Einstein, Albert, and L. Infeld
  - Evolution of physics, the; B........... 536
- Ejido, the. Mexico's way out. E. N. Simpson; B 306
- Ekman, Karl
  - Jean Sibelius: His life and personality. Foreword by E. Newman. Translated by E. Birse; B.................... 159
- Eliot, T. S.
  - Translation of Anabasis. (In book by St.-J. Perse); B.................... 536
- Elliott, W. Y., and four others
  - International control of non-ferrous metals; B 24
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo
  - Young Emerson speaks: Unpublished discourses on many subjects. Edited by A. C. McGiffert, junior; B......... 592
- Enters, Angna
  - First person plural; AN............... 162
- Escape from the mousetrap. A. Kuh; S.........................645, 674, 701
- Evolution of physics, the. A. Einstein and L. Infeld; B 536

F

- Fagen, Melvin M., and O. I. Janowsky
  - International aspects of German racial policies. Preface by James Brown Scott and postscript by Josiah C. Wedgwood; B 23
- Fashion is spinach. E. Hawes; B........... 419
- Faulkner, William
  - Unvanquished, the; B................. 212
- Field, G. Lowell
  - Syndical and corporative institutions of Italian fascism, the; B.............. 676
- Fight for life, the. P. de Kruif; B......... 507
- Final choice, the: America between Europe and Asia. S. and J. Raushenbush; B.. 73
- First act in China. J. M. Bertram; B..... 130
- First person plural. A. Enters; AN........ 162
- Five hundred self-portraits; B.............. 220
- Fletcher, John Gould
  - Life is my song; letter on review by Eda Lou Walton; C..................... 255
- Flivver king, the. U. Sinclair; B...222; see also C 424
- Flying Yorkshireman, the. Five novellas; B.. 653
- Folklore of capitalism, the. T. W. Arnold; B. 46
- Footnotes to the film. Edited by C. Davy; B. 160
- Forever Ulysses. C. P. Rodocanachi; B..... 130
- Four ways of philosophy. I. Edman; B...... 48
- Fox, Douglas C., and L. Frobenius
  - African genesis; B.................... 278
- Frischauer, Paul
  - Great lord, a; AN.................... 280
- Frobenius, Leo, and D. C. Fox
  - African genesis; B.................... 278
- From these roots: The ideas that have made modern literature. M. M. Colum; B... 22
- Furnas, C. C. and S. M.
  - Man, bread and destiny; Hugh H. Darby defends his review; C.............. 56

G

- Galantière, Lewis; R...................... 444
- Geismar, Maxwell; R...130, 216 (see also C...284); 276, 420, 593............. 651
- General Washington's dilemma. K. Mayo; B. 447
- Genzmer, George; R....................... 101
- Georgian adventure. The autobiography of Douglas Jerrold; B.................. 509
- German octopus, the. Hitler bids for world power. H. C. Wolfe; B.............. 508
- German universities, the, and national socialism. E. Y. Hartshorne, junior; B.... 76
- "Germanicus"
  - Germany, the last four years. Introduction by Sir W. Layton; B........... 638
- Germany, two books on; B................. 538
- Germany, the last four years. "Germanicus." Introduction by Sir W. Layton; B... 538
- Ghent, W. J.; R.......................... 223
- Gilson, Etienne
  - Unity of philosophical experience, the; B. 219
- Glass houses. C. Beals; B................. 594
- Gorki, Maxim
  - Specter, the; ■....................... 679
- Gottschalk, Louis
  - Lafayette joins the American army; B.. 307
- Goya's "The disasters of the war." Introduction by E. Faure; B.........104; 220
- Great leveler, the: The life of Thaddeus Stevens. T. F. Woodley; B.......... 19
- Great lord, a. P. Frischauer; AN......... 280
- Griffith, Wyn
  - Wooden spoon, the; AN............... 161
- Gruen, William; R...................278, 536
- Guérard, Albert; R........................ 160
- Gustav Stresemann. His diaries, letters and papers. Edited and translated by E. Sutton; B 446
- Gypsy Waters cruises south. D. Water; AN. 707

H

- Hacker, Louis M.; R..............102, 562 (see also C, 682)
- Haggin, B. H.; R......................... 20
- Haldane, J. B. S.
  - Heredity and politics; B...........563; see also C.......................... 682
- Hanighen, Frank C.; R.................. 24
- Hanson, Simon G.
  - Utopia in Uruguay; B................ 188
- Harris, Abram S.; R..................19, 188
- Hartshorne, Edward Yarnell, junior
  - German universities, the, and national socialism; B 76
- Haskell, Douglas; R...................... 477
- Hauser, Ernest O.
  - Rest of the world, the; B............. 535
- Hawes, Elizabeth
  - Fashion is spinach; B................. 419
- Hawthorne, Julian
  - Memoirs. Edited by E. G. Hawthorne; B 478
- Hearken unto the voice. F. Werfel; B...... 276
- Helen's tower. H. Nicolson; B.............. 277
- Hello America! C. Saerchinger; B......... 619
- Hendel, Charles William
  - Citizen of Geneva: Selections from the letters of Jean Jacques Rousseau; B.. 160
- Heredity and politics. J. B. S. Haldane; B 563; see also C...................... 682
- Herman, Yuri
  - Tonia; B 620
- Herring, Hubert
  - And so to war; B..................... 594
- Herskovits, Melville J.; R...563; see also C 582
- Hertz, Emanuel
  - Hidden Lincoln, the. From the letters and papers of William H. Herndon; B.... 335
- Hidden Lincoln, the. From the letters and papers of William H. Herndon. E. Hertz; B 337
- History of militarism, the. Romance and reality of a profession. A. Vagts; B.. 134
- History of the business man, a. M. Beard; B. 250
- History of women in medicine, a. K. C. Hurd-Mead, M.D.; AN.............. 624
- Hoellering, Franz; R.....214, 358, 476, 535, 730
- Hook, Sidney; R.......................48, 415
- Hoover, Calvin B.
  - Dictators and democracies; B.......... 188
- Horatio Seymour of New York. S. Mitchell; AN 734
- Hotson, Leslie
  - I, William Shakespeare, do appoint Thomas Russell esquire; B........... 728
- Hoult, Norah
  - Coming from the fair; AN............ 734
- House of all nations. C. Stead; B.......... 703
- House that Hitler built, the. S. H. Roberts; B 214
- Hurd-Mead, Kate Campbell, M.D.
  - History of women in medicine, a; AN.. 624
- Hutchison, Keith; R....................390, 652
- Hutt, Allen
  - Post-war history of the British working classes, the; B..................... 390

I

- I live under a black sun. E. Sitwell; B..... 448
- I was a share-cropper. H. H. Kroll; AN.... 136
- I, William Shakespeare, do appoint Thomas Russell esquire. L. Hotson; B........ 728
- Impressionists, the; B..................... 220
- Infeld, Leopold, and A. Einstein
  - Evolution of physics, the; B.......... 536
- Insanity fair. D. Reed; B................. 705
- International aspects of German racial policies. O. I. Janowsky and M. M. Fagen. Preface by J. B. Scott and postscript by J. C. Wedgwood; B.............. 23
- International control of non-ferrous metals. W. Y. Elliott and four others; B..... 752
- Introduction to the theory of employment. J. Robinson; B...................... 652
- Invitation to the ballet. N. de Valois; AN.. 280
- Italy against the world. G. Martelli; B..... 564

J

- Janeway, Eliot; R........................ 46
- Janowsky, Oscar I., and M. M. Fagen
  - International aspects of German racial policies. Preface by J. B. Scott and J. C. Wedgwood; B................ 23
- Japan in China. T. A. Bisson; B........... 704
- Japan in transition. E. Lederer and E. Lederer-Seidler; B 650
- Jean Sibelius: His life and personality. K. Ekman. Foreword by E. Newman. Translated by E. Birse; B........... 159
- Jerrold, Douglas
  - Georgian adventure. The autobiography of Douglas Jerrold; B............... 509
- Johnson, Josephine W.
  - Year's end; AN...................... 78
- Joseph in Egypt. T. Mann; B.............. 303
- Josephson, Matthew
  - Politicos, the. 1865-1896; B...562; see also C 682
- Journeys between wars. J. Dos Passos; B... 418
- Judge Lynch. His first hundred years. F. Shay; AN 511
- Jung, Carl Gustav
  - Psychology and religion; B............ 510

K

- Kennedy, A. L.
  - Britain faces Germany; B............. 538
- Keun, Irmgard
  - After midnight; AN.................. 595
- Kirstein, Lincoln; R...............74, 277, 622
- Kohn, Hans; R........................134, 623
- Kroll, Harry Harrison
  - I was a share-cropper; AN........... 136
- Kronenberger, Louis; R......101, 212, 509, 621
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R.................. 333
- Kuh, Anton
  - Escape from the mousetrap....645, 674, 701
- Kusnets, Simon
  - National income and capital formation 1919-1935; AN 364

L

- Ladies and gentlemen in Victorian fiction. E. M. Delafield; AN............... 161
- Lafayette joins the American army. L. Gottschalk; B 307

Lamb, R. K.; R........................77, 250
Land of the free. A. MacLeish; B.......... 390
Lane, Marie Dresden, and F. Steegmuller
  America on relief; B.................... 251
Lange, Oskar, and F. M. Taylor
  On the economic theory of socialism. Edited and with introduction by B. E. Lippincott; B 732
Larger view, the. B. Kaverin; B.......... 620
Last five hours of Austria, the. E. Lennhoff. Introduction by P. Frischauer; B.... 730
Lazare, Christopher; R.................... 593
Lechlitner, Ruth
  Tomorrow's phoenix; AN.............. 78
Lederer, Emil, and E. Lederer-Seidler
  Japan in transition; B.................. 650
Lederer-Seidler, Emy, and E. Lederer
  Japan in transition; B.................. 650
Lehmann, John
  Prometheus and the bolsheviks; B...... 132
Lennhoff, Eugene
  Last five hours of Austria, the. Introduction by P. Frischauer; B.......... 730
Lerner, Max; R....................46, 533, 726
Letters of Madame de Sévigné to her daughter and her friends. Selected, with introductory essay, by R. Aldington; AN 725
Levin, Harry; R...................185, 216, 333
Levy, H.
  Philosophy for a modern man, a; B.... 392
Lewis, C. Day
  Starting point; B...................... 252
Lewis, Sinclair
  Prodigal parents, the; B................ 101
Life along the Passaic river. W. C. Williams; B 334
Life is my song. J. G. Fletcher; letter on review by E. L. Walton; C.......... 255
Lincoln, Herndon's. E. Hertz; B........... 335
Linklater, Eric
  Sailor's holiday, the; AN............... 135
Lippincott, Benjamin Evans
  Victorian critics of democracy; B...... 623
Lips, Eva
  Savage symphony; B.................... 476
Literary opinion in America. Edited by M. D. Zabel; B 216
London music in 1888-1889. As heard by Corno di Bassetto. Later known as Bernard Shaw; B.................. 20
Lore, Ludwig; R.......................... 538
Lorentz, Pare
  River, the; B........................... 390
Louisa May Alcott. K. Anthony; B....216; see also C.......................... 284
Love, here is my hat. W. Saroyan; B...363; see also C.......................... 487
Löwenstein, Prince Hubertus zu
  Conquest of the past; B................ 476
Lowenthal, Marvin; R...................... 23
Lundberg, Ferdinand
  America's 60 families; B.............. 102

M

Macgregor, R. M.; R....................... 132
Magellan, biography. S. Zweig; B.......... 158
Malesherbes, defender and reformer of the French monarchy, 1721-94. J. M. S. Allison; B 706
Man against himself. K. A. Menninger; B... 333
Man, bread and destiny, by C. C. and S. M. Furnas; Darby review attacked and defended; C 56
Mann, Thomas
  Coming victory of democracy, the; B.... 726
  Joseph in Egypt; B.................... 303
Mann, Thomas; Thomas Mann's Joseph Story. H. Slochower; B 303
Man's courage. J. Vogel; AN.............. 595
Marcus Whitman, M.D., pioneer and martyr. C. M. Drury; B...................... 223
Marlowe, Christopher, biography. J. Bakeless; AN 135
Marshall, Margaret; R...222 (see also C...424)
Martelli, George
  Italy against the world; B............. 564
Materials, raw, two books on; B............ 24
Mattingly, Garrett
  Bernard DeVoto: A preliminary appraisal; B 333
Maugham, W. Somerset
  Summing up, the; B.................... 420
May, E. S., and four others
  International control of non-ferrous metals; B 24
Mayo, Katherine
  General Washington's dilemma; B...... 447
McGill, V. J.; B.......................392, 733
McKeithan, Daniel Morley
  Debt to Shakespeare in the Beaumont-and-Fletcher plays, the; B............ 728
MacLeish, Archibald
  Land of the free; B.................... 390
McMurtrie, Douglas C.
  Book, the. The story of printing and bookmaking; AN 25
Memoirs of Julian Hawthorne, the. Edited by E. G. Hawthorne; B............. 478
Menninger, Karl A.
  Man against himself; B................ 333
Mexican art, two books on; B.............. 49
Michael Bakunin. E. H. Carr; B............ 358
Millett, John D.
  Works progress administration in New York City, the; B.................. 251
Mitchell, Stewart
  Horatio Seymour of New York; AN.... 734
Monroe, Harriet
  Poet's life, a: Seventy years in a changing world; B...................... 305
Montherlant, Henri de
  Pity for women; B..................... 480
Mozley, J. F.
  William Tyndale; B..................... 77
Mumford, Lewis
  Culture of cities, the; B.............. 477
My America. L. Adamic; B.................. 648
My Austria. K. Schuschnigg; B............ 617
My son, my son! H. Spring; B............. 619

N

National income and capital formation, 1919-1935. S. Kusnets; AN.............. 364
Neff, Emery; R............................ 23
Neighborhood. My story of Greenwich house. M. Simkhovitch; B.................. 446
New architecture in Mexico, the. E. Born; B 49
New directions in prose and poetry, 1937. Edited by James Laughlin IV; B.... 185
New frontiers of the mind. J. B. Rhine. Letter by G. R. Weaver; C......... 140
New letters in America. Edited by Horace Gregory; B 185
New writing, spring, 1937. Edited by J. Lehmann; B 185
Nexö, Martin Anderson
  Under the open sky; B................. 480
Nicolson, Harold
  Helen's tower; B 277
Niebuhr, Reinhold; R..247 (see also C..311); 479. 594
Norden, Charles
  Panic spring; AN...................... 25
Nutrition. Final report of the mixed committee of the League of nations; B... 449

O

O'Brien, Justin; R....................480, 564
O'Faolain, Sean
  Purse of coppers, a; B................ 417
On the economic theory of socialism. O. Lange and F. M. Taylor. Edited and with introduction by B. E. Lippincott; B 732
Out of Africa. I. Dinesen; B.............. 306

P

Paintings of Rembrandt, the; B............ 220
Panic spring. C. Norden; AN............... 25
Pargellis, Stanley, and W. H. Dunham
  Complaint and reform in England; AN.. 161
Pasquier chronicles, the. G. Duhamel. Translated by B. de Holthoir; B.......... 444
Paul, Elliott
  Concert pitch; AN 511
Peaceful change. F. S. Dunn; B............ 50
Peattie, Donald Culross
  Prairie grove, a; B.................... 359
People's front, the. E. Browder; B...247; see also C.......................... 311
Pepper, Stephen C.
  Aesthetic quality. A contextualist theory of beauty; B 481
Perse, St.-J.
  Anabasis. With a translation by T. S. Eliot; B 536
Philosophy for a modern man, a. H. Levy; B 392
Pielkova, Ruth; R.......................... 677
Pigou, A. C.
  Socialism versus capitalism; B......... 158
Pity for women. H. de Montherlant; B...... 480
Plough and the sword, the: Labor, land, and property in fascist Italy. C. T. Schmidt; B 105
Poems. R. Warner; B...................... 129
Poet's life, a: Seventy years in a changing world. H. Monroe; B................ 305
Politicos, the. 1865-1896. M. Josephson; B...562; see also C.................. 682
Post-war history of the British working classes, the. A. Hutt; B............ 390
Powys, Llewellyn
  Earth memories. Introduction by Van W. Brooks; B 705
Prairie grove, a. D. C. Peattie; B.......... 359
Price, Willard
  Children of the rising sun; B......... 389
Principles of mathematics. B. Russell; B... 733
Prodigal parents, the. S. Lewis; B........ 101
Proletariat, the: A challenge to western civilization. G. A. Briefs; AN............. 707
Prometheus and the bolsheviks. J. Lehmann; B 132
Promises men live by, the: A new approach to economics. H. Scherman; B...360; see also C.......................... 487
Protection and marketing of literary property, the. P. Wittenberg; AN............. 624
Psychology and religion. C. G. Jung; B..... 510
Public papers and addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the; B.................... 533
Purse of coppers, a. S. O'Faolain; B....... 517

R

R. F. D. By C. A. Smart; B.............. 482
Rahv, Philip; R..22, 363 (see also C..487)
Raushenbush, Stephen and Joan
  Final choice, the: America between Europe and Asia; B................ 73
Raw materials, two books on; B............ 24
Raw materials in peace and war. E. Staley; B 24
Rawlings, Marjorie Kinnan
  Yearling, the; AN...................... 483
Realm of truth, the. G. Santayana; B....... 278
Reconstruction: The battle for democracy. J. S. Allen; B....................... 19
Red star over China. E. Snow; B.......... 47
Reed, Douglas
  Insanity fair; B 705
Rembrandt, paintings of; B................ 220
Rest of the world, the. E. O. Hauser; B..... 535
Rhine, J. B.
  New frontiers of the mind. G. R. Weaver; C 140
Rice, Philip Blair; R.............303, 335, 705
Rimbaud, Arthur, in Abyssinia. E. Starkie; B 677
River, the. P. Lorentz; B.................. 390
Roberts, Donald A.; R.................77, 220
Roberts, Stephen H.
  House that Hitler built, the; B......... 214
Robinson, Joan
  Introduction to the theory of employment; B 652
Robinson, L. E.; R......................... 335
Rodocanachi, C. P.
  Forever Ulysses; B 130
Roosevelt, Franklin D.
  Public papers and addresses; B......... 533
Rosenberg, Arthur; R..................446, 705
Rosenfeld, Paul; B.......19, 104, 220, 360, 510
Rousseau, Jean Jacques, selections from letters. C. W. Hendel; B............... 160
Routh, H. V.
  Towards the twentieth century: Essays in the spiritual history of the nineteenth; B 23
Rowe, J. W. F., and four others
  International control of non-ferrous metals; B 24
Rugoff, Milton; R....................106, 679
Rukeyser, Muriel
  U. S. 1; B.............................. 335
Rukeyser, Muriel; R........................ 160
Russell, Bertrand
  Principles of mathematics; B........... 733

S

Sachs, Curt
  World history of the dance. B. Schoenberg, translator; B 74
Saerchinger, César; R.................159, 619
Sailor's holiday, the. E. Linklater; AN...... 135
Salvemini, Gaetano; R.............105, 564, 676
Santayana, George
  Realm of truth, the; B................ 278
Saroyan, William
  Love, here is my hat; B...363; see also C 487
Savage symphony. E. Lips; B.............. 476
Schapiro, J. Salwyn; R..................... 706
Scherman, Harry
  Promises men live by, the: A new approach to economics; B...360; see also C 487
Schmidt, Carl T.
  Plough and the sword, the: Labor, land, and property in fascist Italy; B...... 105
Schuschnigg, Kurt
  My Austria; B 617
Selected poems. A. Tate; B................ 133
Seven poems. E. E. Cummings; B........... 360
Sévigné, Madame de; letters to her daughter and her friends. Selected, with introductory essay, by R. Aldington; AN... 735
Seymour, Horatio, biography. S. Mitchell; AN 734
Shakespeare, four books on; B............. 728
Shakespeare rediscovered. C. L. de Chambrun; B 728
Shakespeare's philosophical patterns. W. C. Curry; B 728
Shapiro, Harold Roland
  What every young man should know about war; B.................... 25
Shaw, Bernard
  London music in 1888-1889. As heard by Corno di Bassetto. Later known as Bernard Shaw; B.................. 20
Shay, Frank
  Judge Lynch. His first hundred years; AN 511
Shelley and his contemporary critics; the unextinguished hearth. N. I. White; B... 731

- Shepard, Odell; R.......................478, 592
- Shephard, Esther
  - Walt Whitman's prose; B.............. 621
- Shotwell, James T.
  - At the Paris peace conference; B...... 131
- Sibelius, Jean, two books on; B............ 159
- Sibelius, a close-up. B. de Törne; B......... 159
- Sigerist, Henry E.
  - Socialized medicine in the Soviet union; B 417
- Simkhovitch, Mary
  - Neighborhood. My story of Greenwich house; B 446
- Simpson, Eyler N.
  - Ejido, the. Mexico's way out; B....... 306
- Sinclair, Harold
  - American years; B..................... 677
- Sinclair, Upton
  - Flivver king, the; B...222; see also C.. 424
- Sitwell, Edith
  - I live under a black sun; B........... 448
- Six centuries of fine prints. C. Zigrosser; B.. 19
- Skelton, Alex, and four others
  - International control of non-ferrous metals; B 24
- Slesinger, Donald; R....................... 619
- Slochower, Harry
  - Thomas Mann's Joseph Story; B....... 303
- Smart, Charles Allen
  - R. F. D.; B.......................... 482
- Snow, Edgar
  - Red star over China; B............... 47
- Socialism versus capitalism. A. C. Pigou; B. 158
- Socialized medicine in the Soviet union. H. E. Sigerist; B.................... 417
- Southways. E. Caldwell; B................ 730
- Specter, the. M. Gorki; B................. 679
- Spring, Howard
  - My son, my son! B................... 619
- Stace, W. T.
  - Concept of morals, the; B............ 76
- Staley, Eugene
  - Raw materials in peace and war; B... 24
- Starting point. C. D. Lewis; B............ 252
- Stead, Christina
  - House of all nations; B............... 703
- Steegmuller, Francis, and M. D. Lane
  - America on relief; B.................. 251
- Stevens, Thaddeus, biography. T. F. Woodley; B 19
- Stewart, Maxwell S.; R............50, 130, 704
- Stillman, Clara Gruening; R................ 446
- Stresemann, Gustav. His diaries, letters, and papers. Edited and translated by E. Sutton; B 446
- Summing up, the. W. S. Maugham; B...... 420
- Sutherland, James
  - Defoe; B 250
- Sweezy, Paul M.; R...158, 360 (see also C...487), 732
- Syndical and corporative institutions of Italian fascism, the. G. L. Field; B......... 676

T

- Tansill, Charles C.
  - America goes to war; B............... 479
- Tate, Allen
  - Selected poems; B..................... 133
- Taylor, Fred M., and O. Lange
  - On the economic theory of socialism. Edited and with introduction by B. E. Lippincott; B 732
- Teasdale, Sara
  - Collected poems; AN................... 25
- This proud heart. P. S. Buck; B........... 187
- Thomas Mann's Joseph Story. H. Slochower; B 403
- Tietjens, Eunice
  - World at my shoulder, the; B......... 620
- Titian; B 220
- Tonia. Y. Herman; B...................... 620
- Tomorrow's bread. B. Bisno; AN........... 364
- Tomorrow's phoenix. R. Lechlitner; AN..... 78
- Törne, Bengt de
  - Sibelius, a close-up; B................ 159
- Tourtellot, Arthur Bernon
  - Be loved no more; B.................. 678
- Towards the twentieth century: Essays in the spiritual history of the nineteenth. H. V. Routh; B.................. 23
- Triple thinkers, the. E. Wilson; B.......... 590
- Tulips and chimneys. E. E. Cummings; B... 360
- Tyndale, William, biography. J. F. Mozley; B 77
- Tyranny of words, the. S. Chase; B....... 101

U

- U. S. 1. M. Rukeyser; B................. 335
- U. S. A. The 42d parallel; Nineteen-nineteen; The big money. J. Dos Passos; B 210
- Uncle Tom's children. R. Wright; B........ 448
- Under the open sky. M. A. Nexö; B....... 480
- Unextinguished hearth, the. Shelley and his contemporary critics. N. I. White; B.. 731
- Unity of philosophical experience, the. E. Gilson; B 219
- Unvanquished, the. W. Faulkner; B........ 212
- Utopia in Uruguay. S. G. Hanson; B....... 188

V

- Vagts, Alfred
  - History of militarism, the. Romance and reality of a profession; B............ 134
- Van Doren, Dorothy; R......279, 619, 677, 730
- Van Doren, Mark; R.........187, 306, 359, 728
- Van Gogh; B.............................. 220
- Varandyan, Emmanuel
  - Well of Ararat, the; B.................106
- Victorian critics of democracy. B. E. Lippincott; B 623
- Villard, Oswald Garrison; R...........131, 391
- Villiers, Alan; R.......................... 158
- Vivas, Eliseo; R...................76, 219, 481
- Vivas, Eliseo, review of K. Burke's "Attitudes toward history." K. Burke; C... 139
- Vogel, Joseph
  - Man's courage; AN.................. 595

W

- Wages and income in the United kingdom since 1860. A. L. Bowley; B......... 390
- Walcott, John; R......................... 620
- Wallace, Donald, and four others
  - International control of non-ferrous metals; B 24
- Walt Whitman's prose. E. Shephard; B..... 621
- Walton, Eda Lou; R.....252, 305, 334, 390, 448, 480, 620, 731
- Walton, Eda Lou; letters on her review of "Life is my song," by J. G. Fletcher; C 255
- Warner, Rex
  - Poems; B 129
  - Wild goose chase, the; B.............. 129
- Waters, Don
  - Gypsy Waters cruises south; AN....... 707
- Well of Ararat, the. E. Varandyan; B...... 106
- Weller, George; R........................ 418
- Wells, H. G.
  - Brothers, the; B...................... 420
- Werfel, Franz
  - Hearken unto the voice; B............. 276
- West, Geoffrey
  - Charles Darwin; B.................... 593
- Weyl, Nathaniel; R................21, 188, 594
- What every young man should know about war. H. R. Shapiro; B.............. 25
- What man has made of man. A study of the consequences of platonism and positivism in psychology. M. J. Adler; B.. 415
- Wheeler, Dinsmore; R..................... 482
- When capital goes on strike. A. Dahlberg; B. 652
- Whipple, T. K.; R......................... 210
- White, Newman I.
  - Unextinguished hearth, the. Shelley and his contemporary critics; B.......... 731
- Whitman, Marcus, biography. C. M. Drury; B 223
- Whitman, Walt, prose. E. Shephard; B..... 621
- Wild goose chase, the. R. Warner; B....... 129
- William Tyndale. J. F. Mozley; B......... 77
- Williams, William Carlos
  - Life along the Passaic river; B........ 334
- Willison, George; R....................25, 534
- Wilson, Edmund
  - Triple thinkers, the; B............... 590
- Wilson, Hugh
  - Education of a diplomat, the. Introduction by C. G. Bowers; B............. 391
- Wittenberg, Philip
  - Protection and marketing of literary property, the; AN...................... 624
- Wolfe, Henry C.
  - German octopus, the. Hitler bids for world power; B...................... 508
- Women of the wilderness. M. Bell; B....... 650
- Wooden spoon, the. W. Griffith; AN....... 161
- Woodley, T. F.
  - Great leveler, the: The life of Thaddeus Stevens; B 19
- Woodward, Helen; R...................... 419
- Woodward, W. E.; R..................307, 447
- Works progress administration in New York city. J. D. Millett; B.............. 251
- World at my shoulder, the. E. Tietjens; B... 620
- World history of the dance. C. Sachs. Translated by B. Schoenberg; B........... 74
- Wright, Richard
  - Uncle Tom's children; B............. 448
- Writer in a changing world, the. Edited by Henry Hart; B..................... 185
- Writing, five books on; B.................. 185

Y

- Yearling, the. M. J. Rawlings; AN......... 483
- Year's end. J. W. Johnson; AN........... 78
- Young Emerson speaks; Unpublished discourses on many subjects. R. W. Emerson. Edited by A. C. McGiffert, junior; B 592

Z

- Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.................. 590
- Zigrosser, Carl
  - Six centuries of fine prints; B......... 19
- Zweig, Arnold
  - Crowning of a king, the; B........... 651
- Zweig, Stefan
  - Conqueror of the seas. The story of Magellan; B 158

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ JANUARY 1, 1938 NUMBER 1

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 729

EDITORIALS:

WAR AND PEACE 732
BUSINESS PROSPECTS 733
BEHIND THE SCENES 733
THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1937 735
THE LOYALISTS PUSH AHEAD By Louis Fischer 736
PUBLIC HOUSING TODAY by Marquis Childs 738
GREEK TRAGEDY AND MODERN POLITICS By Reinhold Niebuhr 740
THE VOICE OF REASON Drawing by George Grosz 742
ONLY THE COWS ARE CONTENTED By Alan Barth 744
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 746

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE SCOPE OF GRAPHIC ART by Paul Rosenfeld 747
OUR SECOND BOURGEOIS REVOLUTION By Abram L. Harris 747
SHAW AS CRITIC by B. H. Haggin 748
LATIN AMERICAN PANORAMA by Nathaniel Weyl 749
BRISBANE FOR POSTERITY by John Chamberlain 750
THE ROOTS OF THE ROOTLESS by Philip Rahv 750
BEFORE THE WORLD COURT by Marvin Lowenthal 751
THE "BLIGHT OF AIMLESSNESS" by Emery Neff 751
THE RAW-MATERIALS PROBLEM By Frank C. Hanighen 752
THIS IS WAR by George Willison 753
SHORTER NOTICES 753
FILMS: THE POET AS HERO by Mark Van Doren 754
DRAMA: GOOD DANCING AND BAD JOKES By Joseph Wood Krutch 754

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
✶
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

THE WORLD FOUND IT A LITTLE HARD TO look Christmas in the face this year. The press was full of rueful editorials apologizing for the shortage of honest merriment on hand, while "peace on earth" and "goodwill to men" were spoken as fervent prayers rather than expressions of greeting. Everybody hoped that the little town of Bethlehem would in fact lie still beneath the silent stars of Palestine—that no Jews would be found murdered in the birthplace of the Jew whose 1937th birthday was being celebrated—and four thousand British troops stood guard over the handful of Christians worshiping at the shrine of the Nativity. The Nazi neo-pagans shifted Christmas to the winter solstice and dedicated it to the gods of the Teutons—an expression of mystic isolationism which nobody outside Germany objected to. We note, however, with some resentment, that Hitler ate his Lebkuchen just the same. We begrudge Lebkuchen to Hitler and Wotan; let 'em eat mistletoe berries. All in all the world enjoyed a morose Christmas—one troubled by sensations of guilt and dread. And Santa Claus is reported to have called out to the Soviet Arctic expedition as he passed their ice cake on his way to the Pole: "Boys, I advise you to give up this idea of floating back to civilization. Drop an anchor and stay where you are, and a Happy New Year to you."

✶

ACCEPTANCE OF THE JAPANESE APOLOGY for the Panay incident brings to a close the diplomatic crisis which has existed since the sinking of the American gunboat a fortnight ago. Japan technically complied with the American demands with regard to apologies, punishment of the responsible officers, and promise of indemnification. Whether its assurances against a repetition of such incidents are of value can only be shown by future events. It is significant, however, that the army leader believed to be chiefly responsible for firing on the Panay after the bombing—Colonel Hashimoto—not only has not been punished but was one of the commanders of the troops which attacked and captured the important city of Hangchow last week. Because of his position of leadership in the Japanese fascist movement Hashimoto is believed to be immune from governmental discipline. Further evidence that Japan was unimpressed by the American protests may be found in the sweeping and wholly illegal decree making foreigners, including Americans, subject to the death penalty for actions embarrassing to the Japanese armed forces in China. For years foreigners have enjoyed extraterritorial rights in China. In abrogating them, the Japanese have virtually closed the Open Door in China, since few foreigners will care to do business—or indeed be able to—under the arbitrary supervision of the Japanese militarists. For these reasons, if for no others, we cannot believe that the State Department will bow to the latest Japanese decree.

* * *

THAT THE TERUEL VICTORY WAS NOT A flash in the pan is indicated by the launching of a new government offensive in the province of Jaen in the extreme south of Spain. All the evidence indicates that the government armies have been enormously strengthened in recent months, and that the internal political situation has steadily improved. Moreover, it is apparent that the government forces are gradually mastering the technique of offensive warfare, in which they were completely unskilled a year ago. The Fascists are still superior in artillery, military leadership, and discipline, but they are obviously racked by increasing dissension. This heightens the striking parallel between the Spanish conflict and our own Civil War. In both cases the rebels, representing the old feudal elements, included a majority of the officers of the regular army and enjoyed unquestioned military superiority during the first year of the war. In both instances the formation of a large national army proved to be a protracted and difficult task, constantly hampered by poor leadership. Yet in the end the government with the great industrial cities under its control turned out the superior army. While we earnestly hope that the Spanish struggle will not drag out for four bitter years, it is significant that the Loyalist government has already begun preliminary training for draft classes which are not expected to be called for nearly a year.

* * *

WHILE CONGRESSMEN HIT THE TRAIL FOR home last week, the President was not idle in mending his political fences. The general political mood since the stock-market break has been one of uneasy conciliation toward business, with no real conviction on the part either of the progressives or of the conservatives that the President can be counted on for a sustained policy in one direction or the other. Recent developments, however, bear out the analysis in our Washington dispatch of two weeks ago—that the President would show definitely during the month after the close of the special session that he has no intention of swerving from New Deal policies or of abandoning the progressives. The chief items in support of this view have been Mr. Roosevelt's meeting with eight Senate militants—Norris, Wagner, La Follette, Minton, Schwellenbach, Green, Pepper, and Brown; his "fighting orders" given to the majority leaders in Congress for the regular session; Senator Norris's statement that if the New Deal program is not legislated by the coming session of Congress, Mr. Roosevelt will probably be a candidate for a third term; and Assistant Attorney General Robert H. Jackson's recent speeches hitting not only the monopolists but the whole business leadership, important because Mr. Jackson is close to the President. The President has a chance in his coming message to Congress to make it clear to the country that he has not been deflected from his policies by business sabotage.

* * *

WHEN REPORTS OF THE SLAUGHTER OF THE Haitians first trickled out of the Dominican Republic, it required an effort to believe that they were not grossly exaggerated. The picture of 800 men and women hacked to death with machetes and thrown to the sharks seemed too grisly for credibility. But with the passing of time the reports of the massacre were not only verified from more and more reliable sources, but the extent of the blood-letting was revealed to be vastly greater than originally rumored. From 800 the toll reported in a United Press dispatch rose to 5,000, then to 8,000, and now, according to official figures released by the Haitian legation in Washington, the total of mass killings is placed at 12,168, shown to have "taken place in more than sixty-five Dominican localities, almost simultaneously, at a given signal." Not until the middle of December, however, was there any confirmation by Dominican officials. It remained for Dictator Trujillo's consul at New Orleans to admit that the massacre occurred. In a letter to the National Negro Congress, Consul Rafael A. Espaillat not only gave official confirmation to the reports but entered one of the strangest pleas in defense of mass murder that we have ever encountered. Referring to this macabre St. Bartholomew's affair as "an incident," Mr. Espaillat explains that it "is not an occurrence to cause surprise, and it is my belief that such incidents will continue to happen in the future unless the Haitian government should establish a policy of economic protection toward its citizens." If Haiti doesn't feed its people, Mr. Espaillat apparently feels, it is only reasonable to expect these "pariahs" and "miserable proletariat" to be fed to Dominican sharks. President Roosevelt's pressure on Trujillo to accept mediation by the United States, Mexico, and Cuba should put the Dominican dictator in a tight spot and force an airing of the goriest episode in recent peace-time history.

* * *

THE BRAVEST THING THE NLRB HAS DONE is to confront the feudal power of Henry Ford and assert quietly that it must be brought within the rule of law. The board's decision of last week is chiefly remarkable for the fact that a civilized state has waited so long to subject the lawlessness of the Ford empire to criticism and curb. The evidence taken by the board would be almost incredible if it were not so clearly buttressed and so well authenticated. The savagery of the attack of the Ford "service men" on Richard Frankensteen, Walter Reuther, and the other union organizers at the River Rouge plant in Detroit was such that one can scarcely believe it could have happened anywhere outside a fascist state. One could not believe it if one did not also recall the Memorial Day massacre at Chicago and the record of lynchings in the South. The Ford Company's conception of labor relations is part of the same primitivism that marks our police brutality and our lynchings. Ford's Mr. Bennett has declared that he will ignore the Labor Board's ruling that the company has violated the Wagner Act and that it must reinstate twenty-nine of its employees and cease interfering with union organization. Mr. Bennett speaks vaguely of an appeal to the courts, but what he will do when they uphold the board is shrouded in darkness. One thing is clear. If the Ford empire can successfully defy the law of labor relations as well as every canon of human decency, the way will be open for converting the primitivism of Mr. Ford's power into the permanent primitivism of the fascist state.

*

IN THE WELTER OF PICTURE MAGAZINES that decorate the newsstands these days is a newcomer called Rising Tide. Organ of Dr. Frank Buchman's Oxford Movement, Rising Tide calls pictorially for a God-controlled world—"the revolution which will end revolution by changing human nature and remaking men and nations." A whole section of the magazine is devoted to testimonials in which housewives, statesmen, farmers, industrialists, doctors, and even editors tell how they let God control their lives by the practice of the four absolutes—honesty, purity, unselfishness, and love. We don't recall ever coming out specifically for honesty, purity, unselfishness, or love, but we support all four, and up to this point we have no quarrel with Rising Tide. Where we begin to find our own stock of love running low is at the section captioned "The Forgotten Factor in Industry Is That God Has a Plan." Here we read the testimonial of a union organizer who since he found God sees that "power without responsibility is dangerous to the individual and to the nation." Then there is the steel worker who confesses that "hatred led me to faith in a material revolution. I was changed, and see that only a spiritual revolution from within goes far enough to meet the needs of men and industry." And the Negro member of an engineer's crew who discovers that "this God-control business has made a big difference in the boiler room." At this point we recall the plutocratic nature of Dr. Buchman's backing, and his logical thesis that it is easier for God to control a nation through one man than it is through a whole legislature and bureaucracy. Of course, Dr. Buchman insists, your dictator must be the right kind, but last year Dr. Buchman interviewed Adolf Hitler and found him good.

*

THE RESIGNATION OF PREMIER TATARESCU following the failure of his Liberal Party to obtain the required 40 per cent of the vote in last week's national election has made Rumania more of a question mark than ever in international politics. Although Tatarescu was drifting toward the Rome-Berlin axis, his defeat was not accomplished primarily by the anti-fascist groups. On the contrary, the two openly fascist parties—the Iron Guard and the Christian Front—polled an unexpectedly heavy vote, while the National Peasant Party under Dr. Julius Maniu obtained less than 20 per cent of the total. Bratianu, who has been mentioned as a possible successor to Tatarescu, is a member of the family which dominated Rumania for generations. As an open enemy of King Carol, and even more of Mme Lupescu, his Cabinet would likely give aid and comfort to the fascist parties. Nevertheless, the Bratianus have been traditionally pro-French, and it is doubtful whether its latest representative would yield to the Iron Guard to the extent of deserting the Little Entente. As we go to press there is still a possibility that another election will be called, in which case the democratic forces will have another chance to rally. But a more ominous alternative is implied in the flight of the anti-fascist Titulescu and in the conversations which King Carol has been having with the fascist leader Goga and with General Antonescu, former Chief of Staff. There is an acute danger that Carol will play the Hindenburg and turn the government over to dictatorship—either fascist or military.

*

NEWTON D. BAKER WAS A TIRED LIBERAL, and his whole career showed what happens when a man's liberalism is not anchored in a continuing social movement. Baker started as an alert young reform lawyer in Cleveland, a follower of Tom Johnson. As city solicitor and later as Mayor of Cleveland he fought for municipal reform and opposed the control of the local utilities. He was, moreover, a pacifist and a humanitarian. By a strange quirk of political destiny, Wilson offered him the war portfolio in 1916, and Baker accepted. The humanitarian had to bend every energy to equip America for war; the pacifist found it necessary to carry through a vast conscription drive and to jail hundreds of conscientious objectors. In Baker's defense it may be said that having accepted Wilson's approach toward an undemocratic war for democracy, he was caught in its logic. He was an efficient War Secretary—amazingly so for a layman who had never had the slightest experience with war. After the war Baker lived in the shadow of the Wilsonian tradition, but he clung to that tradition only where it was weakest, that is, in the field of international liberalism. In domestic policy he turned his back on the concepts behind the "new freedom." He became the open champion of the utility interests, whose fees he took for legal work before the federal courts. For a time in 1932 the reactionary Democrats hoped they could use him to head off Roosevelt's nomination. From then until his death a few days ago he grew ever more bitterly anti-New Deal and anti-labor, becoming at last indistinguishable from the Liberty Leaguers.

War and Peace

THE debate on American foreign policy has raged so intensely that it has wiped out the landmarks of realistic discussion. We find ourselves tangled up with words and concepts—"war," "peace," "isolation," "neutrality," "pacifism," "communism," "fascism," "collective security," "democracies," "aggression," "scuttle and run," "Chinese wall," "gangster diplomacy." We mill about in a nightmare of slogans, each of them an absolute that we hurl at our opponent or that he hurls at us. It is time to return to the real world of chances and probabilities.

It is on this level of chances and probabilities, and not on any level of certainties, that the discussion must go on. For the claims of either side—those advocating collective security as well as those advocating isolationism—that their nostrum will certainly eliminate all danger of war are unreal and inflated. The basic difficulty about the neutrality bill that Congress passed last year and about the Ludlow resolution for a war referendum is that they aim at insulating America against war—and that is impossible. And in their anxiety to achieve this impossible, they adopt methods—this is especially true of the Ludlow resolution—which may achieve the exact opposite of their intentions. The basic error, likewise, of many of the proponents of collective security is that they stretch too far a logic that is inherently sound. It is true that the best way to minimize the chances of war is to meet the aggressive action of the fascist powers with the cooperative action of the other powers. But it is not true that this action constitutes an absolute assurance against war. Nor is it true that it must be military action, or that it must even look to military action. The statements of Mr. Stimson and Mr. Landon, although we agree with their general tenor, smell far too much of powder for our comfort; and Mr. Landon's implication that the British Socialists and pacifists in 1914 should not have opposed Great Britain's entrance into the war can only be understood as part of the resurgence of the martial spirit in its more naked capitalist form.

It is typical of the unreal character of the discussion that both sides in the dispute about collective security seem to have abandoned its original premises of economic action. This is especially true in Great Britain, whose closeness to the centers of conflagration has heightened the temperature of controversy. The parliamentary debates disclose on the one hand an interpretation of collective security which involves only the formula of the League of Nations minus Article X—a formula that is by no means enough. They disclose on the other hand an interpretation that involves joint military action with America and France against any fascist aggressor—a formula that goes a good deal too far.

It is time to get back to collective security as basically economic. We live in a world in which nations flourish or fall by their economic strength or weakness, in which war is a large-scale industry drawing its materials from the four corners of the world, in which the specter that haunts the aggressor nations is not so much military defeat as financial collapse. Reinhold Niebuhr, in an article elsewhere in this issue, points out that the capitalist democracies are involved in contradictions as deep and inescapable as those expressed in the Greek tragic themes. But the fascist powers are caught in the same contradictions. Their aim is to solder capitalist power with the flame of terrorism. Yet they must push their aggressions in a world in which every major gain must be made at the cost of other capitalist powers; and in a world, moreover, where their own war machines can operate only with the sufferance and help of the industrial machines of the major democracies.

That is what creates the strength of economic action by the capitalist democracies. It is we who furnish the scrap iron, the steel, the oil, the rubber which Japan is using to wipe out Chinese civilization. English credit and trade would be necessary to keep Germany from collapse if it should embark on its Czechoslovakian and Russian adventures. American, English, and French money and raw materials are the cement that alone can hold Mussolini's Mediterranean power together for any length of time. The democracies need not and must not talk of war; they need talk only of their legal power to withhold or provide credits and munitions according to their choice. This is all the "quarantining" that need ever be done; and if it were done with firmness and decisiveness, it would undoubtedly provide an adequate check to long-range plans of conquest.

Would it also prevent resort to war as a desperate final step on the part of the fascist powers? That, unfortunately, is the gravest incalculable in a situation full of incalculables. It would be foolish to say that the fascist nations would never dare precipitate war in order to drag the whole world down with them in their own ruin. One can only say that if they are allowed to ravage the smaller powers at will now, their strength and prestige and arrogance will be all the greater when the decisive moment comes. The real claim to make for collective security is not that it will eliminate all danger of war, but that an announced determination to take economic action against an aggressor will minimize the probability of those continuing depredations from which general war will inevitably develop.

One of the chief arguments against this course is that it freezes the world into two hostile armed camps, confronting each other with bristling military preparations. But that is not a coming danger; it is a present fact. The problem is how to dispel the atmosphere of armed camps that now exists. The great danger today is that the world will be pushed into another system of alliances such as preceded the outbreak of the World War. American isolationism will not avert that danger. The only alternative to the alliance system is a pooled and common effort to keep the peace. The idea of collective security has survived the collapse of the organizations in which it has been embodied—the League, the Kellogg Pact, Locarno. Its essence is readiness for cooperative action, limited to the economic plane and kept within the scope of international law. It is not, as we pointed out last week, action against any nation. It is rather action for certain standards of peaceful and non-aggressive international behavior. No nation is excluded from joining this common effort. Nor need it involve treaty obligations or iron-clad commitments. We have learned that international peace does not depend on words in a treaty but on common interests, common understanding, and the habit of common action. Viewed in this light, collective security offers a genuine program—not for fighting fascism or redressing the balance of the world but for maximizing the probabilities of peace.

Business Prospects

THE closing days of 1937 find American business somewhat anxiously studying the trade statistics of the last few months for a clue to the months ahead. It is now apparent that the decline in business activity which occurred between the end of August and the end of November was one of the sharpest on record. During this period the Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial activity tobogganed from 117 to 90—a drop of 27 points in three months. This is considerably steeper than the decline between October and December, 1929—the record until this year.

Unemployment has also grown with almost unprecedented speed. The WPA estimates that at least two million persons have lost their jobs since Labor Day, and that another one to two million will be thrown out of work by the end of January. Official estimates of the Department of Labor indicate that more than 570,000 were added to the rolls of the jobless between mid-October and mid-November. Of the total, only 100,000 have been cared for by the WPA, and unless Congress provides additional funds, less than two of the twelve million unemployed will be on the WPA lists at their peak on February 1.

In contrast with the situation in 1929, favorable elements exist which to a degree offset the decline in industrial activity. Foreign trade has been better than at any time for many years. There is little indication that the American recession has seriously affected general business conditions abroad, or, indeed, that it has reached into all sectors of the domestic economy. Following exceptionally good crops, farm income for 1937 is estimated at $8,500,000,000, as compared with $7,900,000,000 in 1936. Moreover, Christmas trade in the New York area was less than 1 per cent lower than it was last year in dollar volume and fully up to it in number of transactions. Since even in 1929 retail trade held up long after the decline in the capital-goods industries had set in, the general prevalence of wage scales somewhat above those of a year ago may support business despite the existing psychology of fear. It is perhaps also worth noting that in the week ending December 11 the New York Times weekly index of business activity advanced for the first time since August 14.

If it were possible to pick out with certainty the primary cause of the recession among the many factors contributing to it, predictions for 1938 would be relatively easy. But certainty in this field is almost invariably a sign of economic illiteracy. There is, however, much substance in the Administration's contention that speculative buying created by inflation psychology caused business firms to pile up inventories in excess of immediate needs, thus preparing the way for the slump. If this were the only factor, we might assume that the recession had already reached its low point and that 1938 would see a return to a more orderly recovery movement. But against this hope we must set the threat of the government's budget-balancing policy. A year ago, with only about three-fourths as much unemployment as at present, the WPA was caring for nearly twice as many persons. A corresponding decrease has occurred in other forms of emergency expenditures, leaving the country without an adequate cushion against a decline in consumer purchasing power. The business offensive against the corporation and capital-gains taxes also provides cause for pessimism. For unless some way can be devised to tap the existing surpluses of capital through taxation, the government will have to fall back on borrowing to close the gap between production and consumer purchasing power.

Politics rather than economics must furnish the key to the probable extent and duration of the recession. If Congress would hold to the policies that proved relatively so successful in 1933, we should feel reasonably sure that the slump would be short-lived. If there is any lesson to be learned from 1929, it is that business cannot prescribe for its own ailments.

Behind the Scenes

THE La Follette Committee on Civil Liberties sent stunning Christmas greetings to some 2,500 American corporations on December 22 when it made public a list of concerns using the services of detectives from 1933 to 1936, compiled from the records of detective agencies providing the service, mainly, of labor espionage. Several minor business concerns have protested against their inclusion in the list, and it is possible that a few of those listed had used detectives only as guards; but these highly publicized and exceedingly minor exceptions must not be allowed to obscure the overwhelming evidence that American business as a whole has as a matter of policy used the services of the most despicable human species, the labor spy, to prevent "free" American workers from exercising their rights.

The list which has agitated the headlines is only an appendage of the final report of the committee, which spent eighteen months exploring the underworld of industrial espionage and has returned to warn the country, on the basis of volumes of evidence, that labor espionage, which has long since become an intrenched interest in its own right, threatens to undermine the very fabric of business itself. Three other reports will follow, covering industrial munitioning, strike-breaking and coercion, and the bloody story of Harlan County, Kentucky.

The present document tells a story, far too dramatic for fiction, in which the high tragedy of workers' lives and unions broken for pay comes out in the low-comedy language of illiterate spies, the half-men who are the tools of respectable business. And through it all runs the irony that this dim world of persecution and fear lies just behind the bright façade of American democracy and freedom and is for thousands the real world in which they must live and work. Listen to the lines of one "Red" Kuhl, as he becomes explicit about the technique of drawing workers into espionage:

> Well, first you look your prospect over, and if he is married that is preferable. If he is financially hard up, that is number two. If his wife wants more money, or he hasn't got a car, that all counts. And you go offer him this extra money; naturally you don't tell him what you want him for.

And here is the technique in operation on a human victim:

> Mr. Kuhl: No, sir. I don't know McNamara, but I helped lay the plans with W. H. Gray to hook him.
>
> Senator La Follette: What plans did you lay?
>
> Mr. Kuhl: Well, I found out where he lived. I found out the places that he visited, found out a little about his home life, and I gave this information to Gray.
>
> Senator La Follette: Was he a union man?
>
> Mr. Kuhl: He was a union man.
>
> Senator La Follette: What did you do?
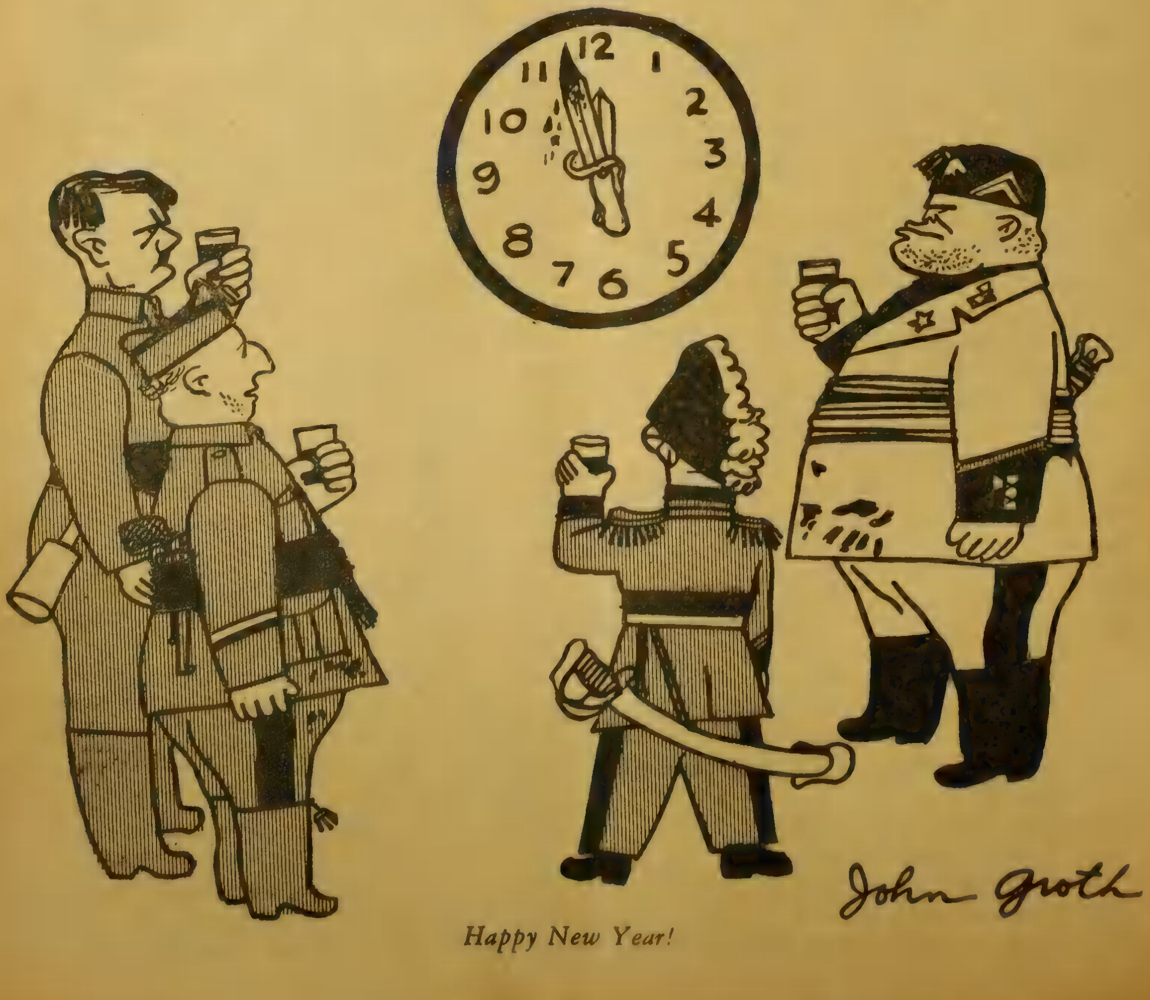
>
> Mr. Kuhl: Gray and I drove down to his house, and I waited in the car until Gray went in and hooked him, and Gray told me, "A hundred per cent I've got him."

We have said that this world of persecution is for thousands their real world; but fortunately it can also be said that since the La Follette committee began its monumental investigation many of these thousands have been freed through organization in unions too strong to be corrupted by the termites of Pinkerton or Corporations Auxiliary. In automobiles the victory of the U. A. W. apparently put an end to espionage in General Motors, at least on its former scale, which had enriched the agencies to the tune of $829,765 in three years. It is known, however, that General Motors keeps well informed about the inner workings of the U. A. W. And for all the protestations of industry that it does not or will no longer employ spies, it should be clear that this practice is organic to American industry and that the only effective weapon against it is more and more unionization. Meanwhile not only labor but the public in general owes honor and praise to the La Follette committee for its courageous and uncompromising picture of an underworld that industry deliberately made.



Happy New Year!

"The Nation's" Honor Roll for 1937

FOR the tenth successive year The Nation offers a roster of Americans who either as individuals or as groups deserve the applause of their countrymen. In a world in which courage is at a premium they have been courageous; they have been intelligent when intelligence was sorely needed; in public affairs, journalism, or the arts they have made a contribution, by a particular act or by their general behavior, which is worthy of honorable notice.

THE YOUNG TURKS in Congress, some forty strong, led by MAURY MAVERICK of Texas, and including JERRY O'CONNELL of Montana, JOHN T. BERNARD and HENRY G. TEIGAN of Minnesota, THOMAS R. AMLIE and GERALD J. BOILEAU of Wisconsin, JOHN M. COFFEE of Washington, H. JERRY VOORHIS of California, and ROBERT G. ALLEN of Pennsylvania, for their courageous fight in the House against the principalities and powers of reaction.

SENATOR ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., and SENATOR ELBERT D. THOMAS of the Senate Civil Liberties Committee, and their staff, for having written a new economic charter for American civil liberties.

HARRY L. HOPKINS, head of the WPA, for his fight against heavy odds to keep the destitute and unemployed from bearing the chief burden of government economy, and for his liberal influence in government counsels.

WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, for persisting—in the face of the drive against him and the commission—in his effort to use it as an instrument of control in reorganizing the stock market and safeguarding the interests of the investor.

WILLIAM E. DODD, for his protest against the sending of an American representative to the Nazi Party gathering at Nürnberg, and for a devotion to the democratic idea which has stood out among the bleak hypocrisies of our diplomacy.

GOVERNOR ELMER A. BENSON of Minnesota, for withdrawing the license of the Pinkerton Agency for industrial espionage, and for showing what a Farmer-Labor governor can do in furthering a program of social legislation; and GOVERNOR FRANK MURPHY of Michigan, for keeping his head during the automobile strike despite the enormous pressure exerted on him by business interests.

THE TEXTILE WORKERS' ORGANIZING COMMITTEE, headed by SIDNEY HILLMAN, for the intelligence and courage it has used in its campaign of organization, and especially for showing, for the first time in labor history, that a map of trade unionism does not have to omit the South.

THE UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS' UNION and the TRANSPORT WORKERS' UNION, their officers and organizers, for winning brilliant labor victories and demonstrating that they are forces to be reckoned with.

THE AMERICAN LABOR PARTY of New York and its officers, for their skilful and perspicacious campaign in the New York City elections, which gave labor politics a new dignity and standing.

MORRIS L. ERNST and ROGER BALDWIN, for leading the fight against the Hague dictatorship in Jersey City; and NORMAN THOMAS, for being found in every danger spot where civil liberties are threatened in America.

JUDGE JULIAN W. MACK, of the Federal Circuit Court, for his decision in the Electric Bond and Share case, the climax of a distinguished career of judicial service, which has been marked by an equal grasp of the realities of economics and the meaning of law.

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, of the American Civil Liberties Union, for his courageous investigation and report on the Ponce massacre in Porto Rico.

MEMBERS OF THE LINCOLN and WASHINGTON BATTALIONS, living and dead, who have fought in the International Brigade in Loyalist Spain for the defense of the cultural heritage common to all democratic peoples.

THE TOWN COUNCIL OF SOUTHBURY, CONNECTICUT, for setting an example of stubborn local opposition to the advance of the Nazi training camps in America.

SURGEON GENERAL THOMAS PARRAN, for heading the national fight against venereal diseases and breaking down the taboos which have until now surrounded them.

THE COMMITTEE OF 430, and its leaders, RUSSELL L. CECIL, JOHN P. PETERS, MILTON G. WINTERNITZ, and HUGH CABOT, who issued a medical Declaration of Independence from the bureaucracy and vested interests of the American Medical Association.

BISHOP FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, for completing twenty-five years of work which have deeply affected the social teachings of the church.

CARDINAL MUNDELEIN for expressing the best elements of his church in his condemnation of the persecutions in Nazi Germany.

HERBERT L. MATTHEWS of the New York Times and JAMES M. MINIFIE of the New York Herald Tribune, for the sustained quality of their correspondence on the Spanish Civil War.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, for breaking the story of the Paramount newsreel on the Chicago Memorial Day massacre.

WENDELL M. STANLEY, for isolating and identifying certain viruses and establishing their nature as protein molecules, thus promising to do for viruses what Pasteur did for bacteria.

ROBERT S. and HELEN M. LYND, for their two books about Middletown—the second, published in the past year—which hold the mirror up to American life and show us what is changing in it and what is tenacious.

THURMAN ARNOLD, for the joyous and ironic detachment with which, in "The Folklore of Capitalism," he slaughters some of the most sacred of the sacred cows of a business man's society.

G. A. BORGESE, Italian exile in America, for the passion and insight of his depiction of fascism in "Goliath: The March of Fascism."

ERSKINE CALDWELL and MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE, for the text and photographs of "You Have Seen Their Faces," which brings an old and a new art together to illuminate the plight of the share-cropper.

MODERN AGE BOOKS and its president, RICHARD S. CHILDS, for their venture into the field of low-cost books, which has given progressive writers a new mass audience.

HENRY G. ALSBERG, for translating the talents of the WPA writers into the splendid "American Guide Series"; and HALLIE FLANAGAN, for helping to make a dramatic renaissance out of the theater projects of the WPA.

ORSON WELLES, for bringing a new talent and a remarkably fresh eye to the American theater, and especially for his production of "Julius Caesar."

MARC BLITZSTEIN, for "The Cradle Will Rock," which opens new reaches for the musical play as social satire.

PETER BLUME, for his canvas The Eternal City, which brings the best of the painting tradition to the anti-fascist cause.

JORIS IVENS and his associates, for filming and producing "Spanish Earth"; and PARE LORENTZ and the Farm Security Administration, for their documentary film, "The River."

The Loyalists Push Ahead

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Barcelona, December 13

THREE days ago sixty-one rebel airplanes went out to bomb and machine-gun the government's lines on the Aragon front. They were flying in broken formation. Seizing instantaneous advantage of this tactical blunder, forty republican fighters took to the air, and in a few minutes nine Nazi and Italian planes came hurtling to the ground, among them several new German Messerschmitts, which can do 375 miles an hour on the dive. The Loyalists lost one machine. Its pilot jumped out when its wings were punctured, and as he descended in his parachute the Fascist heroes machine-gunned him.

Aviation plays a decisive role in the Spanish war. On the northern front, and particularly in the Bilbao attack, the militiamen stuck to their trenches bravely while enemy bombers rained torpedoes and shrapnel on them ten, sometimes twenty, times a day. If on a morning following a raid they awoke to find the sky clear, their nerves cracked and they surrendered. They couldn't stand it another day. Franco has been on the offensive ever since the war started because he has had the planes and artillery with which to smash the republic's defense before sending his infantry to assault and capture. He has benefited, too, from the republic's green soldiery and bad officer cadres. These handicaps are being wiped out.

The north succumbed because it was politically unorganized and poorly supplied with airplanes. But since November, 1936, Franco has not recorded a single victory in the central core of Spain—except Malaga, which was practically handed to him last February by disloyal or incompetent generals. The government, on the other hand, launched the Brunete offensive in July, the Belchite attack in September, and now has captured Teruel.

The republican army is already 650,000 strong. More important, perhaps, than its mere size is the fact that 140,000 Loyalist soldiers are in the reserve. Until a short time ago all the government's trained men were in the line. This meant that if the rebels pushed hard against any given point it could only be reinforced at the expense of some other sector. Franco always had a reserve, or "army of maneuver" as Foch called it; it gave him the mobility which has characterized his campaigns. He could rush units from one front to another without endangering any of his positions. The government can match that now. During November and December only second-class brigades held the lines, while the best divisions were in the rear, resting or receiving more training.

Today a further factor intervenes to diminish Franco's initial superiority. The government is intensifying armament production, and in the last several months domestic output has begun to tell. The republic's factories are turning out 3,000 kilograms of powder a day. On April 1, according to plan, the government will make all the explosives it needs. The bulk of the Loyalist army's rifle and machine-gun ammunition and many of its shells are manufactured at home. The most encouraging development is in the field of airplane production. In December, 1937, the government's plants are yielding twenty-five fighting planes. These copies of the famous Soviet "Chatos" are as good as the Russian model, fly side by side with them, and are indistinguishable from them. The majority are piloted by young Spaniards, daring sometimes to the point of recklessness. By February, 1938, the Loyalist factories will be making two Chatos a day, and in March the daily output will be increased by one-half a Fokker pursuit machine and one-half a Fokker fighter, which carries a supply of light bombs. The factories have all the raw materials they require until June. Italy and Germany must seriously reduce their own aviation fleets to enable Franco to cope with this new Spanish armada of the air. "If we had 300 more planes we could win the war," a government leader said to me the other afternoon. In six or seven months, losses subtracted, he will probably have them.

All the time, however, the Fascist invaders continue to pour in more men and war material of ever better quality. Germany, especially, is using Spain as a testing ground for new arms equipment. The Reichswehr, moreover, has had a huge personnel turnover in Spain. A maximum number of its officers serve their apprenticeship in the "little war." The Germans are relatively few in number but their penetration is the more insidious. It extends, too, to Portugal and Morocco. Mussolini wanted to finish the war by a crushing blow immediately after the northern front collapsed, and his assistance was correspondingly augmented. Yet the end is nowhere in sight. The war will probably go on until 1939.

The Spanish conflict has thus become a strange and revealing historic phenomenon. Actually the Spanish Republic is fighting half of Spain, Germany, and Italy single-handed. The U. S. S. R. saved it between October, 1936, and May, 1937, when, deserted by its armed forces and caught unprepared, it would but for foreign aid have fallen an easy prey to world fascism. At present the Spanish people have mobilized their resources and men and pursue the battle with mounting vigor and enthusiasm.

This proves two things: first, a united people, defending its independence and inspired, above all, by a faith in social change no longer deferrable, is difficult to conquer. Second, fascism is weak. Something must be pretty rotten in Francoland if he has not been able to win with all the help the Fascists have lent him. Terror will establish "order," but it cannot compel loyalty. The wholly Moorish or Italian garrisons of rebel towns are arousing resentment. Lately more and more authentic reports tell of hostility between Falange Fascists and Monarchists. This friction reflects the dilemma of Franco's foreign relations. German and Italian aid has failed to bring him final triumph. There is an alternative combination—England and monarchy. That would spell his doom, yet circumstances may force him to try it. The little Caudillo, or Führer, has announced that he proposes to return a Bourbon prince to the Spanish throne, and the Duke of Alba and other land-owning royalists are back in favor.

Winston Churchill several weeks ago wrote in the London Evening Standard that since the legal government was strong in its territory and Franco in his, both factions ought to unite under a king. Churchill's genius ruins his common sense. A child in politics could remind him that Alfonso XIII departed, unmourned, after a peaceful municipal election. The monarchy has few friends. The Falange is as anti-monarchist as the Loyalists, and if Franco betrayed it and Italy and Germany as well, his life would not be worth much. Meanwhile, in any case, Franco's monarchist pronouncements and the rise of the discarded feudal gentry to greater power must provoke the suspicion and ire of the Fascists and of the innumerable republicans in rebel Spain. This situation probably accounts, in part, for the postponement of the rebel offensive which Franco began to advertise as imminent immediately after the fall of the Asturias in October, and which, he said, would finish the war in short notice. Queipo de Llano, the broadcasting Seville general, has been saying that he understands "the impatience which the brevity of the official military communiqués provokes in the souls of my listeners. Let them be patient. The hour of the deliverance of all Spain is perhaps nearer than one would suppose." Maybe. This pronouncement, with others like it, indicates that the rebels are worried by the war fatigue of their subjects. Several times Franco has promised an early peace. The French government obtained access a few weeks ago to German secret-service reports from Salamanca. Since then it takes a more optimistic view of Loyalist prospects.

There was every reason for Franco to try to strike a decisive blow. The moment Gijon fell he concentrated all his man-power, artillery, and air force in eastern, central, and southern Spain. That did not take more than two weeks. Germany and Italy are eager to see the end. If they swallow Spain, Germany will be free to launch the next adventure, Czechoslovakia, Austria—but who can guess? The expense of prolonged intervention in Spain, moreover, weighs heavily upon Italy. Fighting goes on in Abyssinia. Protest strikes and a revolt in Sicily are the new Roman Empire's first harvest.

France has now adopted a definitely pro-Loyalist policy. It is worried about its imperial lines of communication with North Africa and fears being surrounded by fascist aggressor states. The Cagoulard affair showed even the extreme pro-rebel right that foreign fascist influence is not limited to Iberia. The new French stand strengthens the Spanish Republic and raises the price of intervention for Germany and Italy. Poor Spain is sapping the vitality of world fascism. Should China resist as long as Spain has, the international outlook would grow much brighter. Russia, France, and England are helping China with arms. If the non-fascist, status quo, pacifist nations got together, the unholy triple alliance of territory-grabbing pirates could be stopped. Spain's heroic fight has made this a concrete possibility.

The Spanish people are paying heavily for the privilege of fighting the world's battle against fascism, paying not merely in dead, wounded, and captured, in the daily nervous strain, and in destroyed wealth, but in unrelieved undernourishment. This is serious, and here at least outside friends can do something. The government has large funds, but if the war is to last another year, food imports must be curtailed so that arms and materials for making arms can be bought abroad. Franco has been receiving credits from big American and British companies. The democratically elected government, however, meets its bills in cash. It is forced to economize, and the population suffers.

Public Housing Today

BY MARQUIS CHILDS

EVEN to approach the problem of low-cost housing, however objectively, is to become confused by the tangled thicket of controversy that has grown up around this vital question. Any appraisal of what has been done in the past is almost certain to be clouded by a fog of factional argument. And certainly the future of housing is jeopardized by the bitterness that has been engendered over what is a fundamental reform. But because the situation is changing so rapidly it is important to try to analyze the failure of the New Deal, up to the present, to provide mass low-cost housing.

What has been done, it is obvious, merely demonstrates that government can build adequate houses and apartments with generous subsidies. The achievement thus far is no more than a salesman's sample, as those concerned with past housing programs readily acknowledge. Only about 30,000 dwelling units have been built during the past four and a half years. PWA's housing division built 21,800 units in large apartment houses in major cities of the country. The Resettlement Administration has completed or will soon complete 5,995 units of the "farmstead" type and 2,133 units in three suburban projects. Measured against the need this is nothing. In New York City alone it is conservatively estimated that 500,000 families live in substandard dwellings. And New York is no exception among the cities of America.

Why is it that with millions of words about housing from every conceivable source, the New Deal has failed so conspicuously in this department? The first and most obvious reason, of course, is that until the Wagner-Steagall Act there was no direct attempt to build low-cost dwellings. Before the Wagner Act housing was confused with relief, with the problem of stranded farmers, with public works. It attempted to sneak in by the back door, and if anything is clear as a result of past experience it is that this is impossible. Yet private capital cannot build for the underprivileged third of the population. Government must do the job.

When the public-works program was first assigned to him, under an act that referred in a few words to the construction of low-cost houses, Secretary of the Interior Ickes attempted to encourage limited-dividend housing projects, to be built with government loans up to 80 per cent of the value of the project. It was soon apparent that this method was impractical, and Mr. Ickes switched to a system of direct subsidies, ultimately fixed at 45 per cent of the total cost, paid out of relief funds at his disposal. But it was still a question whether these subsidized apartments were to be built by PWA's own housing division or under the supervision of local housing authorities. And it is this issue of centralization versus decentralization which divides housing advocates today into two hostile camps.

By Georges Schreiber

Secretary Ickes

So far as Mr. Ickes's public record goes, he has been in favor of a decentralized program for a long time. But he insisted in his early dealings with the two or three housing authorities then in existence that the PWA act left him no alternative but to construct those projects, houses as well as bridges and dams, sought by communities that lacked sufficient funds to provide collateral for government loans. He had a long and acrimonious dispute with the Housing Authority in New York City. Officials there resented Mr. Ickes's suspicion of the honesty of the community. In his turn the federal Administrator charged the New York Authority with inefficiency and delay, the very accusations that had been brought against the PWA Housing Division during preliminary preparations for the Williamsburg project. On both sides there was complete distrust.

Mr. Ickes tried the method of centralization for four years, and as is now generally recognized, it proved inadequate. The very fact that the federal government was in charge raised not only land costs but construction costs. Long delays contributed to the mounting costs as prices of building materials advanced from depression lows. Scrupulously insistent on approving each project, each contract, Mr. Ickes found that his desk became inevitably a bottleneck impeding the flow of the vast amount of documentation necessary in such a large-scale job, and this despite the fact that he worked to the point of exhaustion month in and month out.

There were long and harassing delays over the acquisition of sites for the approved projects. The right of the federal government to condemn land for housing was finally challenged, and a Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the Housing Division did not have such power. It was a serious blow and for a time threatened to paralyze not only the public-works program but other New Deal activities. Confronted with this obstacle, PWA had to call upon local authorities to acquire sites. (The courts of New York and Kentucky had previously upheld the right of those states to condemn land for housing, and since then there have been similar decisions in other states.) Legal action was not the only cause of delay. When purchasing agents for PWA's Housing Division came into a locality, land prices were immediately pushed up if word of the presence of these benefactors from Washington got out. Various stratagems had to be employed if the government was not to pay four or five times the value of the land. In Washington the confusion of motives that made housing merely incidental to the vaster problem of relief constantly hampered the work of the Housing Division. Twice after allocations had been decided upon and projects had been approved, relief emergencies arose and funds were suddenly withdrawn from PWA.

Given comparatively high land costs, high building costs, and a subsidy of only 45 per cent of the total, it was inevitable that rentals would have to be placed at a figure beyond the budget of slum dwellers. The rent at the Techwood project in Atlanta is $7.39 a room a month, at Parklawn in Milwaukee, $7.46; and even though it is argued that these rents, with services included, are equivalent to the average charge of $5 a room in a large city tenement, they are too high. That is why Nathan Straus, the new head of the Housing Authority created by the Wagner Act, acted to write off $134,000,000 of the government's investment in PWA housing; an investment that was represented by the loans, up to 55 per cent of the total, advanced to finance housing projects. Only with this written off, according to Mr. Straus, could the PWA projects, under the terms of the Wagner Act, become real low-rent housing, with average rentals of $5, $5.50, and $6 a room.

In accordance with the terms of the Wagner Act Mr. Straus has based his program on the principle of decentralization. He has called in representatives of housing authorities in about thirty states and has encouraged them to submit detailed applications at the earliest possible moment by earmarking funds for them for a limited time. He has conferred at length with these local officials and sought the aid of several of the most capable members of PWA's housing staff, as well as of others outside the old set-up. The local authorities have gone home to prepare their plans, and Mr. Straus is optimistic that final allocations can be approved by the President within a relatively short time. Mr. Straus's associates profess to be unafraid of the possibilities of graft inherent in granting localities so large a degree of autonomy. There will be graft, they say, but it will be small and, in comparison with the gain in speed and cheapness of construction, unimportant.

It would be foolish, of course, to assume that this shift of policy will remove all obstacles. Mr. Straus faces an extremely difficult task. For one thing, the local housing authorities have to a certain extent become indifferent as a result of their long enforced inactivity. Having no function, they lapsed into lifelessness. To revive these bodies will not be easy. Mr. Straus did not make his task any less difficult by appointing a labor adviser from the ranks of the American Federation of Labor, thereby immediately precipitating a C. I. O.–A. F. of L. quarrel. It will take all his tact and all his energy to push through his program within anything like the period that is now being suggested.

Certainly Mr. Straus should be allowed to make a test of his method unhampered by sniping from the centralization school. His friends in New York and Washington believe that from the first moment of his appointment he has been the victim of a campaign of persecution, and behind this campaign they see the figure of Mr. Ickes himself. This, it is scarcely necessary to add, Mr. Ickes denies, though it is no secret that he opposed the appointment of Mr. Straus. The quarrel between them goes back to the ancient dispute between PWA's Housing Division and the New York Authority, of which Mr. Straus was formerly a member. And it involves practically everyone who has even the vaguest ideas about housing. That there has been a campaign to discredit Mr. Straus no one can doubt. Certain newspapers have printed a series of articles dwelling on his unfitness, suggesting that he will speedily hang himself, and in general preparing the way for his early exit. Senator Vandenberg was provided with ammunition for use against Mr. Straus's Hillside housing project, ammunition which apparently was all wet, for the Senator backed down as soon as Mr. Straus appeared before the committee considering his fitness. Shortly afterward the Senate confirmed Mr. Straus.

Mr. Ickes now takes a position of calm detachment. He will not, he has made it clear, participate in any way in the Straus program, even though the Wagner Act gives him, as Public Works Administrator, "general supervision" over the new Housing Authority. It is apparently his private conviction that Mr. Straus is bound to fail, and he will not shed any tears about it. That his attitude may delay a real start on a program of low-cost housing is also apparently no concern of his. If his employees have been campaigning against Mr. Straus, he will discipline them. Further than that he will not go.

Mr. Straus's supporters are extremely bitter. Too often they talk about the future in terms of past failures and past feuds. If there is something wrong with Hillside, something far worse, they suggest, is wrong with PWA's purchase of the Anacostia site in the District of Columbia. It is possible that an investigation might show irregularities; it might show that prices paid for land were too high. That has been a persistent rumor in Washington for many months. But it is certain that an investigation at this time would discredit the cause of low-cost housing by government, whatever else it might accomplish. Anyone who continues to foment this quarrel, on either side, is deliberately impeding action that has been disastrously delayed. To continue to berate Mr. Ickes for his failure to decentralize the housing program is worse than futile. To try to discredit Mr. Straus, from whatever motive, is stupid. He has been appointed, he has been confirmed, he has powerful friends in Washington and New York. Obviously he cannot be blasted out of office without serious damage to the program he has undertaken. What is more, the campaign against him will serve as an excellent alibi if he fails. He can say, and with a sufficient show of facts to make his case plausible, that he was seriously hampered in starting his program by the jealous factionalism and obstructionist tactics of rival bureaucrats.

Mr. Straus has frankly recognized the serious handicaps that must be overcome if low-cost dwellings are to be built under the new law. The major one is the provision in the act that local housing authorities must put up 10 per cent of the capital cost of a project. Most of the cities are so broke that they would be hard put to find 1 per cent. But they can find, or at least Mr. Straus is of the opinion that they can find, their share of the annual subsidy which under the law is to represent the difference between the economic rent and the social rent. It is here that Mayor LaGuardia enters the controversy raging around Mr. Straus. He has proposed that the 10 per cent be raised from private sources by bonds that would be issued against a first mortgage on the completed project. Mr. Straus has replied, rightly it would seem, that it is unreasonable to jeopardize the government's 90 per cent stake and the implied guaranty of low rentals in order to induce private business to put up 10 per cent. It is possible, Mr. Straus has intimated, that a legislative remedy must be sought.

Mayor LaGuardia's refusal to allow representatives of the New York Housing Authority to attend the Straus conferences, intended as a spectacular gesture, appeared merely petulant. If the Mayor expected to make political capital from this gesture, he must have been bitterly disappointed. In the old days Mayor LaGuardia berated Mr. Ickes and his semicolon boys; now he turns his fire on Mr. Straus. On the horizon is 1940, and Mr. Ickes and the Mayor find themselves in the same camp.

The funds made available under the Wagner Act will allow hardly more than a good start. With the total amount named in the bill, $526,000,000, optimistic persons estimate that not more than 150,000 dwelling units can be constructed, and only $300,000,000 of this sum is available in the first two years that the act is operative. This is not a time for factional dissension. All persons interested in the problem must unite if housing is to be anything more than a word badly abused by different sets of politicians.

Greek Tragedy and Modern Politics

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

ONE of the recurring motifs of Greek tragedy is the hero's deeper involvement in his fate through his very efforts to extricate himself from it. Thus in the Oedipus cycle the father of Oedipus is warned that his son will kill him. To avert this fate he exposes the new-born infant to the weather, but the boy is rescued by a kindly shepherd, and is brought to maturity by a foster-father, whom he regards as his real father. Fearful of becoming guilty of his supposed father's death, the youth flees from home, only to come into deadly encounter with his real father on the way. In the same manner the sons of Oedipus seek to avoid the curse which their father has pronounced upon them by ruling their kingdom alternately, a policy which leads to civil war and the very consequence of mutual destruction which they sought to avoid.

The modern international situation offers abundant proof of the profound insight into human tragedy of the Greek dramatists. They were not writing melodrama but were interpreting history, including that of modern times. The history of our era seems to move in tragic circles, strangely analogous to those presented symbolically in Greek tragedy. The democratic nations of the world are involving themselves more inexorably in world catastrophe by their very efforts to avert or to avoid it.

The political tension of the modern world is created by the aggressive attitude of the so-called have-not nations, the hungry powers, which happen also to be the fascist powers. The defenders of the status quo are the more or less satisfied nations, which happen also to be the protagonists of democracy.

History does not justify simple moral judgments. To regard the democratic nations as "good" because they are seeking to preserve peace does not mean that we can hold them guiltless in their relation to the whole chain of vicious circles which constitutes recent history. The fury of the hungry nations is partly the evil fruit of the vindictiveness of the victorious nations. The fact that the defenders of the status quo are also the defenders of democracy reveals the ambiguous character of the struggle. Nevertheless, we may forget the past for the moment and record only the obvious fact that the fascist powers, chiefly Japan, Germany, and Italy, have forms of government which can exist only by threat and aggression. Their whole economy is subordinated to their military objectives and can justify itself only if it can achieve imperial aims commensurate with their desperate martial preparations.

Yet none of these nations want a major war. All are too poor to bear the burden of a long conflict. What they want is to be left alone by the powerful nations while they devour lesser nations in their vicinity. Thus Japan is at war with China. But it is a war into which it would not have dared to venture if it had not known that the democratic powers would not interfere. Italy hopes to gain virtual control of Spain and has further African ambitions. Germany's immediate objective is Czechoslovakia, then probably Austria, and a semi-political, semi-economic Danubian empire, to which Czechoslovakia and Austria are the gateways.

The economic weakness of the fascist powers determines their diplomacy. They bluff the dominant powers into acquiescence to their still minor military exploits by threatening to involve the world in war if their objectives are not granted. They can afford to engage in these bluffs because they do not have to consider the public fear of war which places a check upon the maneuvers of statesmen in democratic nations. It is, for instance, a fairly well-established fact that when Germany militarized the Rhineland it averted French and English intervention by threatening to retaliate with a terrible aerial bombardment. Germany knew very well at that time that it was not prepared for a war against France and England. But an after-us-the-deluge recklessness proved to be a successful type of diplomacy. It is, in fact, this "gangster" diplomacy which has obtained one diplomatic triumph after another for the fascist nations. It would of course be naive to distinguish this type of diplomacy too sharply from that traditionally engaged in by all the nations, for diplomacy has never lacked this element of bluff. Nevertheless, governments less obviously constructed for a desperate hour and with some sense of responsibility for the future, whether they be democratic or monarchial, are embarrassed by inhibitions which the new dictatorships lack completely.

Two recent events prove how successfully fascist diplomacy still functions. The Brussels conference was called to see what could be done about Japanese aggression in China. It adopted a vigorous resolution of condemnation but could do no more than that. It was, in fact, such a dismal failure that the question arises why the powers allowed it to be called at all; for the impotence of the democratic nations is obvious enough without advertising it through the breakdown of a world conference. Probably it was called because Britain and the United States hoped to maneuver each other into taking the lead in some kind of action. Each was willing to follow the lead of the other, but neither was willing to accept the risks of leadership.

In the conversations between Lord Halifax and Hitler, prompted by the world situation but obviously centering in the problem of Czechoslovakia, it is not known exactly what was said, but it is fairly certain that the conversations did not change the relations between Germany and Britain. Britain would like to dissuade Germany from the ventures it seems bound to make in Central Europe by offering various minor compensations. But the one thing it will not do is to declare that it will support France in opposition to Germany if Germany invades Czechoslovakia or destroys it by fomenting a rebellion of the German minority. Just as in 1914, Britain wishes to reserve its decision. The tragedy is that because of this very uncertainty the Germans will probably be tempted to make their venture, hoping for British neutrality. But it is also highly probable that Britain will have to come into the struggle just as it did in 1914. Germany's dream of a Mitteleuropa has disquieting similarities to the old Berlin-to-Bagdad imperial thrust. Britain's only alternative to war would be to come to terms with Germany and Italy in a kind of imperial partnership in which the junior partners would accept their subordinate position only so long as they felt themselves not yet ready to kick the senior partner out. Nothing is clearer, in short, than that the desperate effort of Britain to stay out of a Continental war will help to precipitate a conflict in which it must inevitably become involved once the war is begun.

Just as Britain tries to make itself believe that it does not belong to the Continent, we in the United States try to make ourselves believe that we do not belong to the world. We could stay out of a world conflict a little longer than Britain, just as we did in 1914, but not much longer. Fearing to be drawn in ourselves, we shall contribute by our irresponsibility toward world affairs to an overt expression of the world's anarchy in which we must become involved. The tragic circle will be completed for both Great Britain and America. France, more desperate and contemplating the prospect of being reduced to an insignificant role in European affairs, is undoubtedly more ready to act than the other nations. But it will be throwing discretion to the winds if it acts without previous pledges of support from its former allies. It may do this; a desperate action on the part of France may actually precipitate the world war. But for the moment French diplomacy is securely tied to the apron strings of the British Foreign Office.

Why are the democratic nations so tragically committed to this dance of death? One answer is that the democratic nations are also the great capitalistic nations. Their economic power, which alone would be sufficient, if artfully applied, to stop the fascist ventures, is not wholly on the side of democracy, or even wholly on the side of the imperial interests of these nations. A social war happens to cross the international conflict just as it did in the days when Athens and Sparta fought for the hegemony of Greece. The dominant financial groups in the democratic nations are afraid that a too vigorous stand against the fascist powers will lead to the spread of communism. At the same time the mystery surrounding Russia and the fear that its perpetual purges indicate some serious loss of inner cohesion and morale have contributed to France's undue dependence upon Britain.

Class interests tend to create centers of sympathy for fascism in every democratic nation. Since democracy is a potential peril to every privileged class, this is not altogether surprising. But it is strange that the dominant economic groups should be such poor defenders of their imperial interests. In Britain Winston Churchill upbraided the government in the closing days of the last Parliament for allowing Franco to mount guns leveled at Gibraltar; and Lloyd George inquired, in the opening days of the new Parliament, whether Spanish guns on the coast were not a menace to British ships in the Mediterranean. When the ministry answered that the ships could be protected by smoke screens, Lloyd George taunted the government for leaning upon so slender a reed. "We have become," said a leader of the Labor Party facetiously, "the champions of empire against the Tories." These incidents reveal to what degree the interests of a ruling class have become incompatible with the total interests of the empire which it built and upon which it must rely for its continuance.

Courtesy of the Black Sun Press

The Voice of Reason

Drawing by George Grosz

Perhaps this incompatibility spells the doom of the British Empire. For, while the interests of a ruling oligarchy are never wholly compatible with the total interests of the nation or empire, complete incompatibility is an omen of decay and death. It is this contradiction between imperial interests and Tory class interests which alone makes explicable the duplicity and deviousness of British policy in regard to Spain. Britain does not want the Loyalists to win because its capitalistic interests would suffer if Spain had a radical government; it does not want Franco to win because Italian imperialism would thereby be fastened on the Iberian Peninsula. Hence the British Foreign Office equivocates with endless non-intervention proposals, each more transparently dishonest than the last.

It would be erroneous, however, to attribute the ineptitude of the democratic powers wholly to the influence of the capitalistic groups within these nations. Democracy itself it at a disadvantage in dealing with dictators. It is not easy to convince the general public that the risk involved in calling the bluff of the dictators is a justified risk. The general electorate can hardly be expected to have a clear understanding of the nation's fateful involvement in the total world problem. In America, for instance, any scheme of collective security would probably be opposed more vigorously by a Middle Western farmer than by an Eastern banker.

The general public not only does not see the total picture which alone can justify the risks democratic nations must take, but gives itself to moralistic illusions about the nature of politics. It fondly hopes that generosity toward dictators will assuage their appetites, instead of merely giving them occasion for regarding "liberal" democracy as a craven and corrupt form of government which they have a mission to destroy. The saintly George Lansbury, erstwhile leader of the British Labor Party, is the perfect symbol of this moral hope. He thinks that he can dissolve the dynamics of fascism by personal conferences with Hitler and Mussolini. Norman Davis expressed a somewhat similar moralism when he voiced the hope at the Brussels conference that a way would be found to settle international disputes without force.

Since politics in general and international politics in particular spell a contest of power in which moral arguments alone have never dissuaded a nation from a desired course of action, this simple moralism of the democratic peoples represents a rather naive application of principles drawn from the observation of individual behavior to the problem of collective behavior. This is a natural error of individuals who have made no careful study of and have no direct contact with the problems of statecraft. In the present moment it serves some of the ruling oligarchies very well. During the Italian-Ethiopian crisis the do-nothing policy of the Tories was admirable supported by the pacifist hopes of labor and the church people. Thus an illusion of the democratic classes serves to accentuate the equivocation of the plutocratic classes in our modern democracies.

In one sense the simple moralism of the democratic nations is not so much the illusion of untutored individuals as the error of a whole culture. All the democratic nations are informed by cultural presuppositions which had their rise in eighteenth-century rationalism. This rationalism attributes human wrongdoing to ignorance and holds to the implicit or explicit hope that a general advance of human knowledge will eliminate human conflict by "inculcating in all men the same principles of virtue and goodness," to quote Auguste Comte, the philosopher of positivism. This whole culture analyzes the facts of human nature falsely and fails to understand the organic relation between reason and passion or reason and interest. Its mistakes are particularly apparent in its analysis of collective behavior, but it is equally mistaken in its estimate of individuals. The fact is that even individuals are more persistently egotistic and use their cultural and spiritual achievements as instruments of egotism more generally than the culture of modernity realizes.

It is significant that the fascist nations have broken with this "liberal" culture as completely as they have rejected democratic politics. Broadly speaking, they follow Nietzsche's romantic glorification of power as self-justifying. Having disavowed the nation's responsibility for any so-called "universal" values, they feel able to destroy the last vestiges of a universal European culture without a qualm of conscience. Their unqualified rejection of universal values in history leads to a cruel nihilism, just as the too simple moralism, rationalism, and universalism of the "liberal" nations lead them into hypocrisy in assessing their own actions and ambitions, and to false hopes when they estimate the probable actions of their opponents.

History would add a cruel irony to the tragedy of the self-destruction of modern democracies if it developed that what is still left of a universal culture and an ordered civilization could not protect itself against moral nihilism and political anarchy because a liberal civilization had assessed the weight of morality in politics too highly. All political justice is achieved by coercing the anarchy of collective self-interest into some kind of decent order by the most attainable balance of power. Such a balance, once achieved, can be stabilized, embellished, and even, on occasion, perfected by more purely moral considerations. But there has never been a scheme of justice in history which did not have a balance of power at its foundation. If the democratic nations fail, their failure must be partly attributed to the faulty strategy of idealists who have too many illusions when they face realists who have too little conscience. The false strategy will not be derived purely from the illusions of the idealists about their foes but from their illusions about themselves.

It may still be possible for the democracies to escape the vicious circle in which they are caught. But their economic structure as capitalistic nations, their political structure as democratic nations, and their liberal cultural inheritance, all seem to combine to fasten diplomatic ineptitude upon them as an ineluctable fate. They may still have enough power to win a war in which they are involving themselves by trying to avoid it. But they certainly cannot avert the catastrophe which they seek to avoid. They may save themselves in the end, but they seem unable to save civilization.

Only the Cows Are Contented

BY ALAN BARTH

TO PRODUCE milk from contented cows it is necessary to milk the cows twice daily, feed them generously in the months when they are not turned out to pasture, shelter them in spacious barns, and clean the barns carefully every morning. Dairy farmers do this by starting work at 3:30 or 4 a. m. and finishing with the night milking at 6:30 or 7. For these hours of labor they pay their hired hands about $20 a month, plus board and lodging. If they are lucky, they also pay board and lodging to themselves.

However contented the cows may be with this regime, the dairy farmers are exceedingly discontented. They observe that the milk they produce is sold in New York City at about three times the price they get for it. For fifty years they have been fighting the milk dealers for a larger share of the proceeds. They have formed innumerable cooperatives, associations, leagues, and unions, and they have staged an almost continuous series of milk strikes. The strike which is now being carried on by the farmers of the New York City milkshed is under the banner of a new organization, the Dairy Farmers' Union.

When industrial workers strike, they refuse to work. When farmers strike, they go right on working and merely refuse to be paid. The distinction makes a strike peculiarly difficult for farmers to sustain. In the special case of dairy farmers the difficulty is aggravated by the perishable nature of their product. The cows cannot be left unmilked; the milk cannot be kept for more than forty-eight hours. Dairy farmers must either sell their milk or sell their cows.

The choice is a hard one. It has made the milk strike more bitter and destructive than any other kind of strike. When dairy farmers who are withholding their product from the dealers see neighbors continuing to deliver milk at prices boosted by their own sacrifice, they are sometimes moved to violence. They raid delivery trucks and dump their neighbors' milk or pour kerosene into it. The loss is taken, not by the dealers, but by the individual farmers. The result is a ruthless sort of civil war, neighbor fighting neighbor.

It is pathetically futile, this strife among the embattled farmers. They cannot hope by such methods to beat the dealers, whose financial powers of endurance are far greater than their own. Recognizing this fact, the Dairy Farmers' Union has organized a strike which deviates from the customary pattern. It calls its method milk diversion. Although it pickets the plants of dealers who refuse to sign with it, it discourages violence, and it insists that its members withhold their milk from the picketed plants only when it is possible for them to deliver their milk to union plants instead. At the same time it is trying to induce independent dealers who will sign union contracts to open new plants, and to divert the flow of milk to these. This is slower and less dramatic than the usual strike technique, but it saves the farmers from bankruptcy and permits the union to gain strength gradually.

In many localities there are no plants save those of Sheffield and the Dairymen's League, both of which are fighting the union. This is because the League and to a lesser extent Sheffield have followed a policy of buying up independents and closing their creameries. In the whole of Otsego County, for example, where there are fifteen League and Sheffield plants, there is not a single independent fluid-milk creamery. In Oneida County farmers have pooled their resources to build a creamery of their own and have contracted with an independent dealer to buy its output. In Schoharie County business men have joined farmers in trying to bring new creameries into several of the dairy centers. The business men realize that their own prosperity depends on a decent income for the farmers.

Twenty-eight plants have now signed contracts with the union. This is a tiny percentage of the total number required to handle the tremendous supply of milk in New York State, but it does indicate that some of the big company plants have been shut down and that a great deal of milk which formerly went to others has been successfully diverted. The real problem of the Dairy Farmers' Union is to break up the middleman monopoly and reintroduce free competition into the dealer field.

The big three among the milk dealers in New York are Sheffield, Borden, and the Dairymen's League. They constitute what is commonly called the "milk trust," and they used to be referred to as a combination in restraint of trade. Now and then there was even disagreeable talk about invoking the anti-trust laws against them. But all that belongs to the past. They may still constitute a milk trust; but now it is strictly, slickly legitimate.

This bit of legal legerdemain was made possible by New York State's latest milk law, the Rogers-Allen Act, passed last summer. This law provides for a joint bargaining agency which will fix the prices for milk paid to the producers by the dealers within the New York City milkshed. It sets aside the federal and state laws against monopoly to permit both dealers and producers to bargain collectively. Seemingly, this is fair enough. But there's a catch. Producers' representatives, under the act, are chosen through the producers' cooperatives. Now the largest cooperative is the Dairymen's League. Twenty years ago when it was fighting Borden and Sheffield the League was a very useful instrument to the farmer. But it is fighting them no longer. Today it sells about 80 per cent of its milk to Borden, contracting, in fact, to supply all the milk which the Borden Company requires. In addition, it engages prominently in the distributing business on its own account and owns a great number of milk depots, creameries, and conversion plants. It has become big business, identified with the dealers rather than with the producers in interest. Its members receive even less for their milk than the farmers who sell to Sheffield. Another "producers'" cooperative is the Sheffield Producers' Cooperative Association, a quite unglorified company union which all farmers who sell their milk to Sheffield must join. These two associations pick representatives for the bargaining agency. With the exception of a number of small, bona fide cooperatives, they make up the whole producer representation on the agency. Borden and Sheffield obviously dominate the dealer side of the representation, and through their control of the two principal cooperatives manage to sit on both sides of the board.

The Rogers-Allen Act has another aspect which will bear even closer watching. It provides for the establishment of milk prices on a classification basis. Classification is determined according to the use the dealers decide to make of the milk. Each classification has a different price, the highest price being paid for Class I, which is milk to be sold in fluid form. The farmers have no voice whatever in determining the classification. Until they receive their checks from the dealers at the end of the month they have no way of reckoning how much they will receive, because they have no way of knowing into what classes the dealers will divide their raw product. Their cost of production, of course, remains the same. The farmer's income from milk must be viewed in this light since only about 40 per cent of all milk produced is sold to consumers in fluid form. The rest is converted into ice cream, cheese, butter, condensed milk, evaporated milk, and a variety of other products. Borden and Sheffield are fond of issuing elaborate statements to show what percentage of the consumer's milk dollar goes to the farmer. They neglect to state that their breakdown applies only to milk sold in Class I and therefore gives no indication of what the farmer receives for all the milk he sells.

Consumer organizations, headed by the Milk Consumers' Protective Committee, are warring now against high milk prices. Borden and Sheffield raised the retail price one cent a quart in November. Since last June the retail price has gone up three cents. The successive boosts have been explained as attributable to a milk shortage—which means the dairy farmers' strike. But not all of the three-cent rise has gone to the farmer. Milk is sold by the hundredweight, which is equivalent to about forty-seven quarts. Three cents more a quart, then, means $1.41 more per hundred pounds. The price to the farmers, as determined by the joint bargaining agency, has gone up only ninety-eight cents since last June. The forty-three-cent balance has not yet been explained. Organized consumers understand, however, that the farmer is not to blame for high prices and that he is entitled to a return which will pay his cost of production, plus a reasonable profit. They have determined, therefore, to work toward the establishment of a consumers' cooperative which will eliminate the huge middleman's mark-up.

Another possible solution is to treat milk as a public utility and to set retail prices for its sale. New York's Mayor LaGuardia recently proposed setting up a municipal milk plant as a yardstick, an idea which was incorporated in the American Labor Party's platform. Reliable experts have estimated that milk could be sold in New York for eight cents a quart, five cents of which would go to the farmer and the rest to cover the cost of pasteurizing, bottling, and distributing. The Mayor has in fact just announced a plan to permit independent dealers to sell bottled Grade B milk at nine cents a quart from trucks at ten locations in the city; this is in contrast to the present Sheffield and Borden price of fourteen cents a quart for bottled Grade B milk delivered.

If the Dairy Farmers' Union is successful in raising prices to the producers, it will, of course, extend its influence outside New York. Milk is by far the most important agricultural product in the United States; three million farmers sell it, and one-fourth of the nation's total farm income is derived from it. Since milk, unlike wheat and cotton, is not exported, the present desperate plight of dairy farmers in all portions of the country cannot be ascribed to any loss of foreign markets.

What is most significant about the Dairy Farmers' Union is its application of an industrial-labor technique to the farm. It differs from the cooperatives in that it does not want to put the farmers into the distributing business. Having observed the fate of the Dairymen's League, it does not intend to go in for owning plants or for selling on a cooperative basis. It wants to bargain collectively, not market collectively. It is true that farmers are capitalists in the sense that they have an investment at stake, derive their income from profits rather than from wages, and own land and livestock on which they must reckon taxes, mortgage interest, and depreciation. Nevertheless, like industrial workers, they are real producers of wealth, and their union, like any other labor union, is working toward the transfer of economic power in America from the hands of the few—the middlemen, the dealers—to the hands of the many, the producers.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Can We War on Japan?

TO THIS question the answer is emphatically "No." The army and navy know this and most of the State Department officials, too. The President knows it, for as far back as July 1, 1923, he wrote an article for Asia in which he said that, of his own knowledge as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, many officers of both services admitted that in the event of war the Philippines could not be held, although at that time the Japanese fleet was less than half of our paper strength—"the line of communication was too dangerously long." The opinion at that time was that the war would have to be decided not by military measures but by "economic issues." This was the belief, he said, at a time when "offensive operations over long sea distances were less difficult than now." If, he wrote, Japan thought in 1914 that it could attack us through Mexico or direct invasion of the Pacific coast, "it is safe to say that her strategists have now tacitly abandoned such ideas." Speaking of the situation in 1923, he repeated that after the first year or two of hostilities economic causes would become the determining factor. He added:

> Tableau: Japan and the United States, four or five thousand miles apart, making faces at one another across a no-man's-water as broad as the Pacific. Some genius then might arise to ask what it was all about and what the use was of the atrophy of national life and development. . . . If, then, it were realized by the people of this country and of Japan that a war would be a futile gesture attended by no sufficiently compensating results, each nation might be in a fair way to change its apprehensive habit of mind.

This article Asia deemed so important that it printed it for a second time in March, 1934.

I have yet to meet army or navy officers who believe that the situation has materially changed since Franklin Roosevelt wrote thus about it. I heard the late Admiral Sims declare that we could not wage war on Japan nor Japan upon us; that if our fleet reached Japan it could only fire a few rounds at the coast and then return to its home base. He was positive in his statement that our fleet could not maintain itself off Japan if it got there, and that the enemy, if he knew his business, would not give battle but stay safely in port until our ships had sailed away. The crux of the whole thing is the absence of a great naval base capable of provisioning, refueling, and repairing the fleet—Manila is too far away, and so is Hongkong if that should be loaned to us. Several high officers of the army express the same view, saying privately that a conquest of Japan is impossible, that we cannot hold the Philippines and could not reconquer them if the Japanese took them. They agree with Franklin Roosevelt that it would take two years to get the war under way, and they scoff at the suggestion that Japan could land and maintain troops upon our soil.

General Johnson Hagood avers that we never on a single day landed enough supplies in France to maintain our army while it was in that country; if this is perhaps an exaggeration, it cannot be very far from the truth. Yet in 1917-18 we had a fleet of more than 3,000 ships carrying our men and supplies across the sea, and they were not seriously molested by the enemy's submarines. No sane man who visualizes the fact that our Pacific coast is more than twice as far from Japan as our Atlantic coast is from France, and realizes how limited are the Japanese supplies of oil and gasoline and how small is the Japanese merchant fleet, can contend that we are in danger of invasion by the Japanese. Moreover, to move an army across seas today would require one-third more ships than in 1917 because of the increased size and number of the cannon, tanks, motor vehicles of every description, shells, and airplanes necessary for a modern expeditionary force. The Japanese have shown extraordinary organizing ability and amazed military men by the way they have provisioned and supplied with ammunition their many columns in China. But the job of landing in America would be beyond their genius or that of any other country.

But we are told that we must not say this; that it is wrong for the peace societies to talk about a war referendum, about our being unwilling ever to go to war, not because the President and the Cabinet want to go to war but because they want to keep up the bluff that they may have to do so—the kind of stuff that Alf Landon telegraphed to the President. The peace lovers are accused of dividing the nation when it ought to be presenting a united front. We are supposed to keep quiet and not say what we think and what the American people want, namely, no war in the Pacific under any consideration. How absurd to demand this policy of us! It immediately makes the Administration as much a dictator of our minds as Hitler is of the German mind or Mussolini of the Italian. Moreover, the representatives of those countries know perfectly well how our people feel. You can't choke off debate in Congress. The Japs can find out how the American people are thinking without any difficulty. They know what Franklin Roosevelt wrote in Asia in 1923, and they know that there have been no changes in relative armaments or in new types of war vessels to make any important change in the situation in 1937.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Scope of Graphic Art

SIX CENTURIES OF FINE PRINTS. By Carl Zigrosser. Covici-Friede. $5.

DESPITE its flaws, Mr. Zigrosser's book is a unique and important one. No other volume grasps the subject of graphic art as broadly and inclusively as it does. Its closest parallels, Ivins's "Fine Prints and Books" and the encyclopedic studies of the French and Germans—Rosenthal's, Bock's, Glaser's, and Kristeller's—in one or another way are less completely comprehensive of the origins, the techniques, and the qualities of "the scraps of paper, some old, some new, with curious marks in ink on them, but rare and precious in men's eyes," that are called fine prints. It represents the evolution and the scope of all varieties of the graphic art: the woodcut, the wood-engraving, the color-stencil; metal-engravings, mezzotints, dry-points, stipple-engravings, aquatints, and soft-ground etchings; and stone-rubbings, lithographs, and photographs. Indeed, its title actually belies it. The book covers not six but ten centuries of fine prints, since together with chapters on European and American work it includes one upon the woodcuts of the Orientals; and the Chinese commenced printing from blocks at least as early as the year 868.

The defects to which we have reference are not negligible. One of them resides in the quality of the reproductions, which compose almost a half of the volume. Too many of these are either faint or tantalizingly obscure. Another inheres in the composition of the book as regards the relation of the reproductions to the text. The plates not only are segregated at the volume's end. They are arranged in an order half in accordance with their categories and half with their chronologies, but not in conformation with the progress of the text. Thus the reader continually is obliged to fumble among them for the illustrations to which he has been referred by the author. Again, the very high level of the majority of the exhibits is not thoroughly sustained. Mr. Zigrosser's reasons for including reproductions of certain lithographs among his modern examples might well seem to require further explanation.

His text, on the contrary, is eminently satisfactory. Exhaustive of his subject it possibly is not. But then, no individual's inquiry into the matter of graphic art could reasonably be expected to be. The material's prodigious bulk sets a perfect search beyond his powers. The Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris alone contains upward of four million prints. And the numbers of them in existence must be countless. Yet if Mr. Zigrosser's treatment is not exhaustive, neither is it exhausting. His rare grasp of the history of his art, of the circumstances contributing to the development of all its branches and their techniques as well as of the material and aesthetic purposes to which it has lent itself—from the manufacture of playing-cards and religious ikons onward—has been expressed in a lively 90,000-word essay. Above all, his study is finely proportionate. In describing the different feelings which in various centuries have projected themselves through prints, he has not failed to dwell at due length on the individual achievements which are the glories of the graphic cabinets. His main chapters include like so many small brilliants miniature essays on the qualities of the engravings, etchings, and lithographs of Mantegna, Dürer, Rembrandt, Goya, Daumier, and many other master-craftsmen.

Hence, "Five Centuries of Fine Prints" ultimately does give us not only a unique picture of the evolution of one of man's chief means of recording his experiences, but an unusual sense of the roots of its peculiar importance. This importance, we see, to an extent derives from the print's extraordinary documentation of the life contemporaneous with it. To an even greater extent, we find it flowing from the capacity of the multitudinous best of its species to evoke, to a degree by no means inferior to that at the command of other types of art, "the entire gamut of the emotions." "They possess uniqueness, magic, a spiritual impress, the stamp of vivid personality, a singing quality of line or mass, some telling economy of expression that satisfies in a flash of immediate comprehension." We recollect that with the print's small key, Rembrandt profoundly unlocked his heart, poignantly gave the world his almost matchless feeling of the divine in life. And we distinguish at last the array of the scarcely lesser men, including at least one living individual, who in the forms of graphic art have imparted a priceless grandeur of experience.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Our Second Bourgeois Revolution

RECONSTRUCTION: THE BATTLE FOR DEMOCRACY. By James S. Allen. International Publishers. $2.

THE GREAT LEVELER: THE LIFE OF THADDEUS STEVENS. By Thomas Frederick Woodley. Stackpole Sons. $3.50.

REAL understanding of the economic and social forces which lay behind the Civil War and which came to a head in the years immediately following was long frustrated by passionate sectional animosity and racial prejudice. In attempting to allay sectional animosity such historians as Burgess, Dunning, Rhodes, and others of lesser caliber gave an interpretation of events which beclouded the fundamental issues of the period and contributed to a perpetuation of the myths on which American race prejudice feeds. These historians envisioned the Reconstruction era as a saturnalia of black debauchery aided and abetted by white carpet-baggers from the North and scalawags of the South. They gave a picture of black barbarism bent upon the destruction of Southern white culture. It mattered little to these scientific historians that this culture, even though its harsher features were sometimes softened by the benevolence of the master class, rested in final analysis upon the degradation of human beings.

This interpretation of the Burgess-Dunning-Rhodes school of historiography has been challenged by numerous writers. Of all the recent attacks upon it the most devastating was that of W. E. B. Du Bois. But in his monumental work, "Black Reconstruction," Du Bois was not content to show the falsity of the position of the Burgesses and their followers. He insisted that the Reconstruction governments symbolized the Negro's struggle not merely to achieve the democratic rights of man but to establish a dictatorship of black labor. Mr. Allen cannot subscribe to this point of view, although he does think that Du Bois's book when taken as a whole is a profound refutation of the distorted accounts of the period. He is right in saying that a dictatorship, whether of black or white labor, was impossible in the post-bellum agrarian South, and that the only dictatorship that existed at this time was that of the triumphant bourgeoisie represented in Congress by the Committee of Fifteen. The purpose of this dictatorship was to consolidate the power of Northern finance and industry and completely liquidate the old slaveholding oligarchy.

Mr. Allen maintains that the black masses aimed to establish nothing more or less than democracy in the former slave states. Although emancipated only yesterday, they knew that democracy signified something more than office holding, the right to vote, equality before the law, and even civil liberty. It meant the right to property. Despite their ignorance the Negroes knew that without an economic basis their rights as free men were virtually meaningless. The economic foundation of their democracy was land. And their support of the Republican Party was to a very large extent based upon their determination to prevent a reassertion of the economic power of the plantation masters and their belief that the federal government would confiscate the large estates of the former slave-holders and divide them among the landless. To many professional historians the "forty acres and a mule" slogan of the black peasantry has been only a source of amusement. But Mr. Allen thinks that it gives us the main clue to the Negro's ambition and at the same time guides us in understanding the dominating forces of our second bourgeois revolution.

Because of their hunger for the land many of the former slaves, according to Mr. Allen, not only seized the land but defended their occupancy against the bayonets of federal troops. This was especially true of the Sea Islanders on the coast of South Carolina. One will search in vain, however, for any articulation of this demand for land in the speeches and writings of the Negro leaders of the time. The reason is not hard to discover. The demand of the masses for land could not be satisfied on any appreciable scale except by the confiscation of the former slave-holders' property. Nothing was more abhorrent to respectable Negro reformers like Douglass, Cardoza, Delaney, Pinchback, Bruce, and Langston. These lawyers, journalists, and politicians aspired to emulate the principles and ideals of the conservative rather than of the revolutionary bourgeois. All they wished to achieve for the Negro was equal citizenship by constitutional methods, and in this respect they were the forerunners of the present-day leaders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. It was this outlook which caused Langston and Douglass unwittingly to sabotage the attempt of the National Labor Congress to bridge the gap between white and black labor directly after the Civil War.

The one man who insisted upon confiscation to the bitter end was Thaddeus Stevens, leader of the Radical Republicans. From Mr. Woodley's appraisal one is likely to make the mistake of attributing Stevens's leveling disposition and his unexplained relation with his mulatto housekeeper simply to an ingrained sympathy with the weak and defenseless, bred by his physical deformity. Stevens's radicalism, like that of all revolutionary figures, was no doubt deeply psychoanalytical in origin. But a diagnosis of his subconscious springs of action hardly reveals his stature or his wisdom.

In assuming the leadership of the Radical Republicans, Stevens knew that without confiscation Negro suffrage, even when backed by the federal army, could not establish democracy in the South. His advocacy of this Jacobin measure was supported by neither the radicals nor the conservatives in the Republican Party. Both radical and conservative Republicans represented the interests of the industrial bourgeoisie of the North. The confiscation and division of property ran counter to their conception of democracy. Besides, it would establish a dangerous precedent. At first the conservatives were reluctant even to enfranchise the Negro. But they soon realized that the slave power was to be annihilated and legislation in the interest of Northern business effected only with the aid of the Negro vote. Thus they united with the radicals under Stevens's leadership to bestow political and civil equality upon the emancipated slaves. As soon as the dominance of Northern industry and finance was assured, neither wing of the party had further use for the Negro, who was gradually shorn of power and disfranchised.

Mr. Allen views the economic and political aftermath of the Civil War in the perspective of Marx's class theory of society; but it is gratifying that this incisive and simply written analysis is not marred as was his earlier work, "The Negro Question in the United States," by the attempt to apply the doctrinaire formulas of the Comintern to the problems of this country. Mr. Woodley's book, a revision of an earlier work on Stevens, supplements Mr. Allen's. While mainly factual and at times a little dull, it is a sympathetic treatment of the life of that much-maligned man who realized, perhaps better than any of his contemporaries, that the paramount issue in Reconstruction politics was the institution of democracy in the Southern states.

ABRAM L. HARRIS

Shaw as Critic

LONDON MUSIC IN 1888-1889. As Heard by Corno di Bassetto, Later Known as Bernard Shaw. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

THE public will not read collections of newspaper or magazine articles on music, and least of all is it interested in reports of concerts and operas of fifty years ago—that was what American publishers said when I tried to get them to bring out Shaw's "Music in London, 1890-1894." If they were right, then the public will not read his reviews of musical events in 1888 and 1889; it will prefer to read Mr. Downes, Mr. Gilman, Mr. Chotzinoff on events of today. And if that is so, then the public is—to put it very mildly—making a great mistake. The performance of Boito's "Mefistofele" which Shaw wrote about on May 29, 1889, can be of no interest to anyone today; but it provided the occasion for Shaw to observe that Gounod's "Faust" was "a true musical creation, whereas Boito has only adapted the existing resources of orchestration and harmony very ably to his libretto. In short, Gounod has set music to Faust, and Boito has set Faust to music"; and that "the house likes Boito's prologue, in spite of the empty stage and the two ragged holes in a cloth which realize Mr. Harris's modest conception of hell and heaven." This is not the best example but merely the shortest; the fact is that the daily events of the musical season elicited from Shaw a flow of comment on music, on musical performance, on the entire musical scene, that is still among the most discerning, the most revealing, the most enjoyable one can read in any language.

Read this comment, read the astounding article on a performance of "Il Trovatore" at the end of the book, the equally astounding article on Verdi; they will—or at least they should—kill your taste for the incompetent, the pretentious, the despicable critical performances of today. These are strong terms, but the terms I would like to use are unprintable; and if you suspect me of extravagance read Shaw, whose remarks about his colleagues are as timely as his remarks about "Il Trovatore." Of one, disliked by the others, Shaw wrote:

> He has the force to write individually, originally, making his mark with every opinion he delivers. Of how many critics in London is it possible to say as much? When one thinks of the average critic, with his feeble infusion of musical dictionary and analytical program, the man who has no opinion, and dare not express it if he had, who is afraid of his friends, of his enemies, of his editor, of his own ignorance, of committing an injustice (as if there were any question of abstract justice involved in the expression of a critic's tastes and distastes), it is impossible not to admire L. E., who, at an age at which all ordinary journalists are hopelessly muzzled by the mere mass of their personal acquaintance, can still excite these wild animosities in the breasts of his colleagues.

And I would say of Shaw that what made him so great a critic was his integrity in relation to his material—by which I mean among other things that he used all his resources of knowledge, taste, and wit in the process of dealing rigorously with the material as it required to be dealt with; whereas the others use the material to show their knowledge, taste, and wit. Mr. Chotzinoff does anything to his subject to appear hard-boiled, blasé, wise to the things which the more naive and impressionable fall for; Mr. Gilman's act is different—he is the littérateur, the gentleman—but his subject suffers no less. Our musical life is the worse for a Barbirolli at the head of a New York Philharmonic, a Stokowski all over the place; it is the worse, then, for a criticism which helped to make these things possible; and to believe that one critic believed what he wrote of Barbirolli's first appearance here, or of Stokowski's appearances during the past ten years, I would have to believe him to be without the understanding I know he possesses. Shaw created no such dilemma for his readers.

B. H. HAGGIN

Latin American Panorama

AMERICA SOUTH. By Carleton Beals. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

THE continent and a half which lies southeast of the Rio Grande is virtually terra incognita to the North American mind. To be sure, nostalgic writers have made frequent literary flights from an industrialized society in crisis into the bosom of idealized Indian communities. But these vicarious pilgrimages to the primitive generally contributed no more to an understanding of America South than did Rousseau to anthropology. The historians of Latin America have rarely troubled to analyze the economic and social factors which are the engines of history, while the newspapers have added to popular ignorance by foreshortening Latin America's contemporary history into a meaningless chronicle of caudillo struggles.

Carleton Beals's new work is a social history of the stresses and strains molding the destinies of Hispanic America. Despite an occasionally elephantine syntax, the book makes splendid reading; its observations are generally penetrating, and its scholarship is unobtrusive and thorough. "America South" is a first-rate contribution in a field which has been chiefly worked by intellectual mediocrity.

Beals's work opens with absorbingly interesting chapters on the physical characteristics of the continent and the welding of the Indian civilizations to their topographical, climatic, and soil environments. The second act in the drama deals with the deformation of Indian and mestizo by the rigid racial hierarchy of Spanish colonial rule, the monopolization of the land in feudal repartimientos, the growth of the slave trade with the depopulation of the West Indies and the rise of tropical agriculture in the Caribbean.

Beals is one of the few writers who discuss the vast slave revolts which shook Spanish rule. He makes a fruitful distinction between the rebellions of the Negroes, who had no organic relation to the American soil, and the agrarian revolution of the Indian peasants. Much remains to be done in this rich and neglected field, and such events as the Brazilian slave revolts, resulting in the formation of the Negro republic of Palmares in the seventeenth century, lie fallow for the progressive historian. Beals, by the way, pays discerning tribute to the Negro's contributions to Latin American civilization, contributions which conventional historians deprecate or ignore.

The chapters on the struggle for independence are particularly fine, for they differentiate skilfully between the two insurgent strands which contributed to the breaking up of Spain's empire—the creole counter-revolution against the Napoleonic reforms and the popular agrarian and Indian movements of Morelos and Hidalgo.

In his penetrating discussion of the reasons for Latin American backwardness, Beals takes sharp issue with the academic group which maintains that America South is condemned to remain a non-industrialized, raw-material hinterland for a long time to come. Crucial to the technical side of this question are the coal deficiency of the continent and the transport problem created by the Andes. Beals takes a dynamic view of such technological limitations and points to the existence of immense latent sources of substitute energy, such as water power. The social-economic problem is primarily that of an imperialist penetration which tends to thwart industrialization for the home market. In a very important section Beals points to the retreat of American and British investment during the crisis, which forced a reorientation of the Latin American economy away from reliance on a single precarious export product and toward a diversified production. These new policies have been driven forward by nationalistic movements which often become the tool of fascist forces.

The Paradise Regained of Beals's study is the recent emergence of new Latin American forces—the student movement, the Peruvian APRA, the reconstruction of Mexico—which in his opinion will become potent enough to forge a free Ibero-America. This section contains strange lacunae. Thus student radicalism is enthusiastically applauded, but the reader will search in vain for a treatment of the labor movement. There is no mention of Brazil's Luiz Carlos Prestes or of the powerful Chilean popular front.

Beals excoriates official pan-Americanism as an attempt to put cash-register politics into dress clothes. While praising the United States for repudiating armed intervention at the Buenos Aires congress, he views the so-called collective interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine with a cold eye. He points out that the Buenos Aires delegates held secret sessions on means of combating communism—"really a smoke screen for fighting democratic and liberal forces." Despite

President Roosevelt's rounded rhetoric in praise of democracy, the congress achieved "a working alliance of military despotisms to prevent freedom from raising its head on the southern continent."

The chief weakness of Beals's concluding chapter is that he underrates the disguised intervention of the fascist international in Latin American affairs—an intervention whose purpose is the conquest of vast raw-material areas and markets and whose chief instrument is the subsidized fascist party. Beals notes the parallel between the international fascist axis of today and the Holy Alliance whose machinations in behalf of autocracy evoked the Monroe Doctrine a century ago. But instead of proposing an active United States policy of cooperation with the other American democracies to prevent fascism from conquering a continent, he whips the ghost of military intervention. The chief threat today to the freedom of America South is not imperialism but fascism.

No work of this scope, written in a period of rapid social flux, could be faultless. In the reviewer's opinion, Beals's study stands as the finest and most comprehensive treatment of its subject written by an American. It will do much to bring the progressive movement of the United States closer to that of Latin America. NATHANIEL WEYL

Brisbane for Posterity

BRISBANE: A CANDID BIOGRAPHY. By Oliver Carlson. Stackpole Sons. $3.

MR. CARLSON goes about the job of putting his subject on the record for posterity with a portentous lack of humor. He proves, among other unexceptionable things, that Arthur Brisbane loved money and was a dull platitudinarian, all of which might reasonably be printed in the Coals to Newcastle Department. Does one need 373 pages to show that Calvin Coolidge had a third-rate mind, or that George Horace Lorimer liked his short stories to have happy endings? Perhaps our grandchildren will delight in such incontestable demonstrations, but they need not be pulled out like taffy in 1937; there is a better use for white paper. Of more interest than his major theses is Mr. Carlson's habit of putting down an occasional good side light: for example, it is mildly edifying to learn that Brisbane got his lech for good real estate through listening to Henry George expound the single tax. But the side lights are fitful sparks in the general gloom of Mr. Carlson's réchauffé of the dreary stuff that went to make up Mr. Brisbane's newspaper column "Today."

Why write about Brisbane, anyway? There may be good reasons, but Mr. Carlson hasn't proved the job was necessary. He treats Brisbane as a mouthpiece for Hearst, which he undoubtedly was. But like other serious books on Hearst—and this is a book on the Lord of San Simeon at one remove—Mr. Carlson's "Brisbane: A Candid Biography" proceeds on the somewhat specious assumption that Hearst is a major menace. Behind Mr. Carlson's Brisbane lurks the shadow of a peculiarly malignant devil whose power to subvert the American public is incalculable. Pish and likewise nonsense! The fact of the matter, plain to those who can get along without wasting their fists on dummies, is that Hearst is a feeble old man whose life has been one of almost unmitigated failure. He has contributed nothing to journalism since his crude typographical innovations of the nineties; Captain Joe Patterson has put it all over him in New York, and his papers elsewhere are fading visibly. Aside from his part in engineering the Spanish-American War, he has bungled every important journalistic campaign of his career. He failed, unfortunately, in his efforts to bust the trusts and to keep us out of the World War. He failed, more fortunately, to become mayor or governor or President, or to dominate the New Deal, or to popularize Mussolini in this country, or to put Landon in the White House, or to drive the reds out of the University of Chicago. If he is a devil, he is one on the assumption that devils put the hex on all insidious things and so condemn themselves to demonological impotence. Mr. Brisbane, as mouthpiece of a failure, might be invested with some ironical significance. His friends say he had charm. But Mr. Carlson leaves him as he evidently found him: empty, boring, inane. Even as his lord, the Master of San Simeon. JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

The Roots of the Rootless

FROM THESE ROOTS: THE IDEAS THAT HAVE MADE MODERN LITERATURE. By Mary M. Colum. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

MRS. COLUM belongs to that small group of critics who have been mortally offended by the political tendencies of modern literature, and her book seems to be written under the impulse of this resentment rather than out of the need to offer any new analysis of her own. The materialist investigation of the sources of the creative and of its meanings, however, cannot be discredited by the mere repetition of outworn critical notions or by the tedious insistence on the artist's cast-iron purity. And this new plea for a return to the past will convince no one save those who, either by temperament or tradition, are committed to the view of literature as a snug, familiar little world stacked with works of art that are the private property of their creators and "proper" appreciators.

In her discussion of the history of the modern literary mind Mrs. Colum's emphasis throughout is so formalist as to exclude most of the forces that have contributed to its development. To her, art is a self-contained whole where critic and creator instruct each other in the pursuit of the imaginative life. The method of tracing derivations explains virtually everything. If you want to know why modern criticism evolved the ideas that it did, then look to Lessing. All modern poetry has been jointly fathered by Wordsworth and Baudelaire, and all the realists in prose are the offspring of Flaubert. The internal stresses of literature comprise its total definition, and anyone who disagrees is simply a vulgarian trying to rob the select minority of its spiritual luxuries. The impacts of the politico-social order, of changing moralities, of science and philosophy, are barely referred to and then mostly in order to assert their irrelevance. But in reality no ponderous dictum of sociological criticism is half so spurious as Mrs. Column's contention that the "theory" that literature is an expression of society would, in practice, "banish a great portion of the imaginative literature of the world, would banish nearly all lyric poetry and also such literatures as reflect a purely fantastic, imaginative, or psychic life." This is multiple confusion. In the first place, the term "society"—unless specifically delimited—is so all-inclusive that unless we believe that literature is an expression of it, our only alternative is to believe that it is the image and material appearance of supernatural powers. Secondly, even assuming that we are dealing here with one "theory" of literature among many, the question is whether this theory is true or false, however much its spread would tend to establish a prejudice against the lyric, fantastic, and so on. Furthermore, on what basis does Mrs. Colum set up this absolute dichotomy between the social and personal, the practical and the imaginative, the lyric and epic? The retreat of some poets into individual imaginings is just as much an expression of society as the preoccupation of others with political ideals. And if Mrs. Colum is using the word "social" as a synonym for the word "socialist," she should say so.

Formalist literary thought can survive in criticism only in so far as it is more exacting and acute than other modes in its analysis of the techniques of writing. As a mere exercise in aesthetic uplift, however, there seems little room for it, especially when it also adorns itself with general ideas about the nature of man and the character of nations. Thus, in writing of the Russian critic Belinsky, Mrs. Colum informs us that the tendency to make literature serve society and solve social and political problems "is really indigenous to the Russian mind." Such statements argue a chronic incapacity to see any phenomenon in its historic perspective. Russian literature has known several periods when aesthetic and symbolist movements predominated; and if often in the past, and particularly since the revolution, the serviceable aspects of literature have been emphasized, it is due to the specific conditions of Russian society in given time-spans and not to any singular predetermination of the Russian mind.

PHILIP RAHV

Before the World Court

INTERNATIONAL ASPECTS OF GERMAN RACIAL POLICIES. By Oscar I. Janowsky and Melvin M. Fagen. With a Preface by James Brown Scott, and Postscript by Josiah C. Wedgwood. Oxford University Press. $2.

IF YOU want a neat example of what international law is held to be and a pathetic disclosure of what it really is, I can recommend a prayerful reading of "International Aspects of German Racial Policies." Professor Janowsky and Mr. Fagen prepared the substance of this book in support of a petition presented last year to the League of Nations by a number of humanitarian, labor, and Jewish organizations and indorsed by some eighty well-known Americans. It proves by chapter and verse drawn from three centuries of international practice that Germany's mistreatment of its Jewish population—a mistreatment catalogued in an appendix containing the famous McDonald report to the League—has violated any number of human rights laid down by international law. It further proves that this mistreatment has violated the rights of other nations, as well as Germany's own obligations formally and legally assumed in 1919. Finally it proves by precedents and cases that international law empowers other nations, and indeed obligates the League, to intercede in behalf of the mistreated Jews and "non-Aryan" Christians.

With what results? The petition has been shelved, the world has left the victims of Germany to their fate, and thus we may learn that international law is not quite like other law. It is not a body of legislation backed by force; but it is, as Frederick L. Schuman once phrased it, "certain generally recognized rules" used by otherwise anarchic sovereign nations in playing a game for power. In other words, international laws are laws in much the same sense as are laws of etiquette. As a matter of fact, perhaps one of the greatest triumphs of international law since the war lay in its forcing Soviet diplomats to wear full-dress suits. For the readers who can follow what lies between the lines, the authors of this book have indicted not only Germany but international law itself.

The indictment will eventually be lodged before a court which, hard as it may be to believe, is even more dilatory than the League Assembly; but a court from whose verdict there is no escape or appeal. It will be Weltgeschichte, history incarnate, which shall one day render the Weltgericht, the judgment of humanity. And there are people who claim to hear something like the distant rumble of guns summoning that court to session.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL

The "Blight of Aimlessness"

TOWARDS THE TWENTIETH CENTURY: ESSAYS IN THE SPIRITUAL HISTORY OF THE NINETEENTH. By H. V. Routh. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

EUROPEAN intellectuals are generally agreed upon the premise of this book, that "the twentieth century lacks spiritual certainty." "Spiritual," Professor Routh makes clear, is to be understood in its wider sense, without theological associations, as "aspiration towards Beauty, Truth, Righteousness." Lack of confidence in these ultimate human values can scarcely be the result of the political and economic chaos into which Europe has been drifting, for Mr. Routh reminds us that the ages of the "Iliad," the Greek drama, the "Divine Comedy," and "Hamlet" were quite as full of "cruelty, baseness, and unendurable egoisms." Yet without averting their eyes from their contemporaries, Homer, Sophocles, Dante, and Shakespeare somehow convince us of man's essential grandeur. So also do the great romantics. Even the Victorians tower above us, though the light they throw on man's pathway is dim and flickering, and the loudness with which they proclaim their certainties arouses suspicion that they are already feeling some of our present misgivings. Hence it is with the Victorians that Mr. Routh begins his investigation into the failure of the humanistic tradition to permeate the new civilization of science, industrialism, and democratic aspiration.

The theme is not unfamiliar to readers of Spengler, Aldous Huxley, and the American "new humanists"; but seldom, if ever, has it been treated with such a union of impartiality and breadth. The investigation is not narrowed to England and to belles-lettres. While Mr. Routh's main concern is with the outstanding personalities in British literature, science, and philosophy, he maintains perspective by frequent glances at their French and German contemporaries. Goethe is the most impressive modern example of spiritual certainty; Heine probably the first instance of awareness of a "rift" in European culture. In England Mr. Routh finds the "turning-point" in Mill's "On Liberty" (1859), which "looks forward to a time when educated people will have no allegiances, and no convictions which are too precious to be disproved or too profoundly intimate to be capable of disproof." He considers Mill "at heart a simple soul" who had no premonition of the psychological disintegration which he was unloosing, and which was to be precipitated by the Darwinism which fell upon an astonished world in the same year. Over the vast, ill-explored territory from Mill and Darwin to the present time Mr. Routh moves briskly and penetratingly, more concerned with stimulating inquiry than with pressing his own conclusions as to the causes of the modern "blight of aimlessness." He is especially felicitous in portraits of those who, like Matthew Arnold, hesitated between the old culture and the new civilization. His information leaves little for the specialist to cavil at; his clarity and vigor will attract the serious general reader. Mr. Routh, an attractive example of the younger generation of Englishmen who are good Europeans, should provoke Americans to awareness of the difference of their cultural and intellectual assumptions from those of Europe. It seems to the reviewer that Americans have succeeded more frequently in adjusting their culture to science, and are less inclined to regard economic and political obstacles to the life of the spirit as insurmountable.

EMERY NEFF

The Raw-Materials Problem

RAW MATERIALS IN PEACE AND WAR. By Eugene Staley. Council on Foreign Relations. $3.

INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF NON-FERROUS METALS. By W. Y. Elliott, E. S. May, J. W. F. Rowe, Alex Skelton, and Donald Wallace. The Macmillan Company. $6.50.

EVER since Sir Samuel Hoare at the League of Nations session in 1935 suavely proposed that the League study the means for bringing about "free distribution of raw materials" among all countries, the words "distribution" and "access" have hypnotized the world. And when the Nazis proclaimed that "it is impossible to solve the raw-material problem without giving Germany back her colonies," another vista of peace appeared in proposals for the return of the colonies. On top of this came the recent report of the League committee on raw materials, which in effect said that there is no raw-material problem after all. (Sir Samuel probably knew this right along.) What is the truth behind this confusion?

In the first place, the League committee spoke correctly when it pointed out that giving back its colonies would not remedy Germany's raw-material shortage. The German colonies contain no iron ore, copper, bauxite, manganese, or petroleum—the materials most needed—but only some copra and palm oil. In fact, commercially important raw materials now being produced in the various colonial territories of all nations represent only about 3 per cent of the world's raw-material production. The truth is that Hitler wants the colonies principally as a publicity Ersatz for the real conquests which he has failed to make.

The whole mystification about raw materials springs from the fact that raw materials mean one thing in peace, another in war. If the whole world were directing its forces along normal peace-time channels, there would be little talk of raw-material problems. In peace time no nation or its producers refuse to sell raw materials to anyone who wishes to buy them. There has existed no shortage of any of the principal raw materials since the last war. On the contrary there has been overproduction. Germany, Italy, and Japan—the great "unsatisfied"—can buy as much cotton from Texas, iron from Lorraine, copper from Chile, manganese from Russia as they wish—provided they can pay for them. "Paying"—therein lies the catch.

The arguments, at this point, run as follows: (1) Germany cries for raw materials to feed its industry; (2) the "satisfied" powers reply that they have on hand an embarrassing surplus of raw materials for Germany to buy; (3) Germany retorts that it cannot pay for these because other countries will not buy its goods or advance it credit; (4) the "satisfied" powers answer that if Germany cuts out anti-Semitism, which has caused widespread boycotts, reduces tariffs, and stops the extravagant rearmament program, it can obtain plenty of trade and credit to buy these materials. In short, the argument winds up in a general impasse about the causes of the world economic crisis—economic nationalism, tariffs, stringency of credit, currency wars, and the uneconomic armament race. This is only another way of saying, as the League committee said, that the raw-material problem is but part of the general world economic problem.

Germany, however, might point to the national monopolies of certain raw materials. Britain in Malaya, in collaboration with the Dutch in their Indies, has long had a monopoly of rubber—this aroused even the phlegmatic Hoover—and in collaboration with the Dutch and the Bolivians a monopoly of tin. The United States possesses a monopoly of helium gas for dirigibles and has announced a fancy scheme for preventing its free export. But these international tin and rubber cartels do not prove very successful in maintaining monopolies (producers will cheat and consumers will strike), and they raise the threat of substitutes, synthetic rubber, for instance. No country has a monopoly of one or all of the basic raw materials—cotton, oil, iron, copper, etc. Raw materials are too widely diffused among nations. Even "unsatisfied" Germany stands first in world production of one important material, potash—for fertilizer.

The core of the matter lies in the fact that it is a war-time problem. The second World War has apparently already started, and this war, with the preparations for widening it, has produced the present furious race for raw materials. Thus Sir Samuel Hoare, a spokesman for a "satisfied" empire, utters a seductive phrase in the hope that it will delay the assault of the "unsatisfied" imperialisms. Dr. Schacht juggles currencies and trade agreements in a bewildering effort to obtain raw materials for the forges of Krupp. Germany backs Franco, and Göring's planes assist in the capture of Basque iron ore. We had Hitler's word for it at Würzburg on June 28, "That is why we want a Nationalist government in Spain, in order to be able to buy ores." Meanwhile Leunawerke uses Rio Tinto pyrites for explosives, while France, deprived by Franco of its usual supply of Spanish pyrites, turns to Italy for this essential. And so on.

Here, again, no solution exists apart from the general solution of the world economic crisis. In this war-time race Germany and Italy can get "access" to raw materials only by obtaining credits from Britain and France. It is not unnatural that such powers, engaged in rearmament themselves, should hesitate about the loans. War provides the only road to "access." Colonies, as we have seen, are no good; Italy has found poor raw-material pickings in Abyssinia. Raw materials lie, for the most part, in sovereign states. And that is another reason why Germany and Italy invade Spain and Japan sets out to conquer China.

Professor Staley, on the whole, gives a good survey of the raw-materials problem. In this book he has written a less detailed and comprehensive study than his excellent "War and the Private Investor," leaving case studies and background to the tome "International Control of Non-Ferrous Metals," where the student may follow the extraordinary role which copper, lead, nickel, aluminum, and zinc, and the companies controlling them play in the international economic tangle. For a solution to the problem Professor Staley, recognizing the war aspects of the matter, falls rather lamely back on "collective security" and an appeal to Britain and the United States to stand together.

FRANK C. HANIGHEN

This Is War

WHAT EVERY YOUNG MAN SHOULD KNOW ABOUT WAR. By Harold Roland Shapiro. Knight Publications. $1.50.

THERE are far more important things for a young man to know about war than are here presented—its institutional history, for example, its economic causes, and its far-reaching socio-political results. Nevertheless, in offering a rather gratuitous demonstration of the accepted truth that "war is hell" for the individual caught in its toils, this small book makes a number of arresting points, gleaned from the official records kept by army doctors and surgeons during the late (but apparently not the last) World War. These professional records present a cool but appalling picture of the stark horrors of modern warfare, a frightful threat not only to life and limb but to health and sanity. The filth in the trenches will be indescribable, young man, and while nothing can be done about that, military medicos are human after all, and can and do offer advice on how to regulate your sex life while standing up to your middle in slime compounded of mud and human excrement. What are your chances of being wounded? One in five. Your wound may be slight, but in that case "you may be buried alive in shelled trenches; you may be frozen to death or die of hunger and thirst; you may be burned, or your frozen feet may drop off with your shoes. . . . You may become ill, delirious, insane before you have reached the hospital train." If you are lucky and get patched up, you will be rushed back to the front as soon as possible, for the function of an army medical corps, according to one high authority, is not limited "to a colorless part in victory . . . to that function of saving life and preventing suffering in the individual . . . leaving untouched that great task—the prompt return to our fighting line of men who can be saved for future usefulness to our arms." This time you may be seriously wounded, in which case you should be upon an operating table within twelve hours. But "how are you going to do it, gentlemen?" asks Colonel Shockley, United States Army Medical Corps. "You are not going to do it, that's all. I haven't seen it done, and I don't believe it will be done." When you die, however, you will receive the best of care, be assured, providing your body is found. You will get a good scrubbing with soap and water, and be clean again at last. You will even achieve a clean sheet and you will be laid out decorously—"your jaw will be bandaged to keep it from falling . . ." GEORGE WILLISON

Shorter Notices

THE COLLECTED POEMS OF SARA TEASDALE. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Sara Teasdale's poems should have been carefully selected rather than collected. But several points concerning her work become clear if one reads through this volume. She was one of the first American poets to use city imagery with fair success. Her work did grow in depth and wisdom, and despite some sentimentality she kept, by excellent pruning, a complete lyric purity and simplicity unmarred by rhetoric and untouched by forced or literary design. If she cannot achieve Edna Millay's fine lines, she does avoid Millay's artificiality. Nor am I contradicting this statement when I say that most of her imagery is completely traditional; its very familiarity is proper to her themes—the love of life and the necessary suffering that love must cost. Miss Teasdale's gift was for the writing of pure song. Her lyrics demand music and call it to mind. The complete simplicity and usualness of her imagery and syntax, her control of vowel and consonant, make all of her best poetry, like that of the Elizabethans, demand musical setting. Sara Teasdale's last book is her best, though all the long poems and the sentimental lyrics should have been excluded. Hers is a slight and very feminine talent, but within its limitations authentic.

THE BOOK. THE STORY OF PRINTING AND BOOKMAKING. By Douglas C. McMurtrie. Covici-Friede. $5.

Every few years some studious printer retells the tale of bookmaking, from the pictographs of the anonymous ancients to the "press editions" of the many contemporaries "who must be mentioned"—more perhaps to save feelings than records. It is a capital story, though, the very best-natured of all the stories man can tell on himself with his head up. Often this intrinsic geniality softens it for the kind of people who think they have ceased being sentimentalists because they have become intellectual. In 1927 Mr. McMurtrie's "The Golden Book" romanticized "the romantic story" with best-seller success. This hardly comported with his two dozen other books on printing, which include his "History of Printing in the United States." His latest offering is again a popular treatment, but this time an excellent one. It has but a trace left of the appeal to those who think bibliophily a "quest" for the quaint and the "priceless." Its factual considerations go slightly deeper than is usual in such general coverage. It contains unpretentious facsimiles of the famous pages every bookman ought to know, and also many reproductions less familiarly important. Its reference lists will lead the earnest reader to main deposits of bibliographical knowledge. The introduction and the last chapter urge some dependable aesthetic criteria which the reader can apply to his own collection of books, and thus double their interest by the addition of this single volume. It is in itself a candid, decent piece of bookmaking for the purpose, and the most ample popular account of the subject this reviewer has seen in English.

PANIC SPRING. By Charles Norden. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

Except for a few flashbacks the scene of this novel is an island off the coast of Greece, where five men and one woman seek release from disillusionment in a kind of timeless sun paralysis. A boatman has capriciously selected them to be the guests of Rumanades, a retired munitions manufacturer who realized that his occupation was governed by the law of diminishing spiritual returns, and who rules over this island with a meaningless display of ceremonial. The author employs the "South Wind" formula of indolent living set against a lush background, but his novel makes a feeble showing in a literary market which has already been cornered by a more inventive work. Similarities between the two islands end with the volcanic cliffs, the magnificently pagan and childlike peasants, and the lack of moral verdicts. The vagabonds in this book, unlike the inhabitants of Nepenthe, are neither brilliant nor beguiling. Their dialogues are stilted, and for all their naked sunbathing and nocturnal drinking bouts they never achieve much more than an artificial abandon. What little action there is comes from the past experiences of a few of them poignantly related, and since these have not been fused into the present pattern of their lives, there is no unifying plot. Perhaps one would not complain about its absence if the writing had charm and distinction. If a book has little substance, it cannot afford to be heavy-footed.

FILMS

The Poet as Hero

I HAVE at last found an exception to the rule—for rule it still is—that artists are impossible heroes for fiction. The reason I advanced in the cases of "Rembrandt" and "Zola," and might have advanced in the case of Harry Baur's "Beethoven," is that the characteristic activity of an artist is invisible; or at any rate that it is not the hand alone which paints a picture, and that there is no known way of acting like a poet. The exception is "Young Pushkin" (Amkino); by which might be meant either that this film succeeds where all others have failed or that it has not tried the impossible. I prefer the latter meaning, if only because it leaves the rule unviolated after all; the rule is an excellent thing to hold on to.

V. Litovsky, who plays the boy Pushkin in this completely delightful narrative, does not act like a poet. He acts like a boy. It is his good fortune to be himself a very bewitching youth; but what is more to the point, he knows how to become Pushkin in his teens—for that it is the boy Pushkin before us we never are tempted to doubt. The scene is the Imperial Lyceum at Tsarkoye Selo where Pushkin was a student from his twelfth to his eighteenth year, and where the evident fact that he was a poet did not prevent him from being liked by the other boys or from deserving the nickname "Monkey." Here his high spirits express themselves in many ways, only one of these ways being poetry. It is the whole person that we see—tempestuous in his frolics, his despairs, his loves, his hates, and his silences, and bent no less fiercely upon chasing a tattle-tale than upon reading a book or writing a poem. We see him writing one poem, and the spectacle has not a false note in it; the memory carried away is of a kinky-haired young fellow in uniform biting his quill and staring angrily ahead of him (not up, not vaguely off) at the word which refuses to come. Not the idea, or the mood, but the word. We see him reading a book, too. As he lies on his stomach in bed when the lights should be out, his face is a marvelous study: the eyes rigid with attention, the whole head fixed in a kind of critical wonder, and yet a few muscles twitching in intelligent and purposeful spasm about the mouth. He is the kind of boy who can say of a classmate: "He is a real poet, but his poems are bad." Pushkin's desire is not to be a real poet; it is to be a good one, and we are convinced that he is just that. We are prepared, then, for the great scene of his reading in competition before the toothless Derzhavin, surviving laureate of the eighteenth century, who has been waiting to die until a new poet should arise in Russia. Derzhavin's excitement as he totters to his feet and cries "Music, music! Gentlemen, a poet!" has none of that nonsense about it which makes most such scenes ridiculous. But this in turn is a reminder to say that the film abounds in superbly played old men as well as in perfectly directed adolescents. It is a triumph of taste and wisdom.

A revival for one night of Von Stroheim's somewhat legendary "Greed," a box-office failure fourteen years ago, was recently presented to the Ladies' Garment Workers' Union by its educational committee. The legend is that no copy of the fiasco survives; but here one was, borrowed from the Museum of Modern Art Film Library, and one could see why "Greed" had failed. It was too faithful to the naturalism of its source, Frank Norris's "McTeague," which also is a kind of failure, since in spite of its huge power it is out of print. "Greed" kept all the power and all the unpleasantness; but those were not and are not popular virtues.

MARK VAN DOREN

DRAMA

Good Dancing and Bad Jokes

IF "Between the Devil" (Imperial Theater) were everywhere as clever as some four or five of the choruses, then it would deserve a good deal more than merely passing praise. Unfortunately, however, the Messrs. Howard Dietz and Arthur Schwartz seem, on each such occasion, to have put their whole wit into one jest and to have been resolved to live as fools, if not for the rest of their dull lives, at least during the next half hour or so. The result is that the show is very uneven indeed, and that one might with some show of reason damn it completely or praise it with honest warmth.

Besides the meandering, impudent choruses above mentioned there is the presence of Evelyn Laye and of a newcomer to New York named Adele Dixon—to say nothing of Jack Buchanan, the praise of whose sleek manliness (virility in tails, I should call it) probably ought to be left to the ladies. Then there is the dancing of Vilma Ebsen, who has a jazz style subtly her own, and one mad song by the "Tune Twisters," which is dragged in by the heels but is probably the best single feature of the evening. Add an unusually good-looking bevy of young ladies and several moments of reasonably funny farce, and you have what sounds like a very good show until the description reaches the point where I am compelled to add not only that even these reasonably funny moments are too far apart but also that a good many moments in between are unreasonably unfunny.

Despite certain touches "in the modern manner," "Between the Devil" is not so much the "musical comedy" of the program description as it is what used to be called "a farce with music," and the back bone of its humor is composed of gags which were not very fresh in the days when that genre was common. The author of the book is like the Divine Astrea "who fairly puts all characters to bed," but except for this explicitness he writes naughty farce as it was written twenty-five years ago, and fails to titillate me at least when he requires Mr. Buchanan to take off his clothes behind a screen. As samples of the humor permit me merely to say that marriage to three persons is referred to as "trigonometry," that there are such puns-that-are-not-puns as "adding insult to bigamy," and that at an ardent moment the hero has to blow the feathers of a lady's hat out of his face.

This brings me to the moral of my piece. Why is it that those who borrow old jokes for the stage almost invariably borrow such bad ones? When a man is original but feeble, one assumes that he is doing the best he can, but if a humorist is going to plagiarize, there is no excuse for not plagiarizing from the masters. It is bad enough to be compelled to say of a gag, "That always was funny," but worse to be compelled to remark, "I never did laugh at that one." Several times during what was, after all, a frequently amusing evening, I found myself whispering, "The first time I heard that one I yawned in the cradle."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Letters to the Editors

For Sense in Censorship

Dear Sirs: "Spain in Flames" has not yet been seen by the free people of the sovereign state of Pennsylvania. But The Nation has left the record of the censorship incomplete.

On November 24 Judge Levinthal of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, in a scholarly and courageous opinion, reversed the order of the Board of Censors and directed the board to "approve 'Spain in Flames' in the form in which it was originally submitted." To the hopeful sentence in its "Spain in Flames" editorial stating that "legal action is, however, under way in Pennsylvania to force the Board of Censors and Governor Earle to rescind orders which have no basis in law," The Nation may now, for the information of its readers, add that at least one court in Pennsylvania has confirmed its editorial view that the order had no such basis.

But the final word in the history of this struggle for sense in censorship has not yet been written. On December 16 the Pennsylvania Board of Censors filed an appeal from Judge Levinthal's order to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. That appeal was taken while Governor Earle was on the high seas. It is to be hoped that he will move to have it dismissed so that the free citizens of Pennsylvania may have the opportunity to form an opinion about these flames in Spain for themselves.

ARTHUR W. A. COWAN

Philadelphia, December 22

Who Wants Partition?

Dear Sirs: If the choice in Palestine is truly "pogroms or partition," as Philip Bernstein suggested in your issue of December 4, then the case for partition need not even be stated. But the lack of enthusiasm for the suggestions of the Peel report indicate that such are not the alternatives in Palestine.

Could the extremists in Arab life be eliminated, there would be no reason for doubting the possibility of amity between the two peoples. It is generally taken for granted that the Mufti and his followers represent the Arabs of Palestine. It would be equally correct to say that the clergy and nobility in pre-revolutionary France represented the interests of the French peasants and bourgeoisie. The Mufti is a member of the effendi (landlord) class, and so are his followers. They and the money lenders are the exploiters of the Arab masses. In the present crisis the voice of the middle-class city Arab has been stilled by blackmail and murder. The peasant and the city worker never had a spokesman.

What are now the feelings of those who, poor as they are, have been envied by neighboring Arabs because of their opportunities to enjoy the prosperity which the Jews have brought to the country? Have the advocates of partition consulted them on their willingness to be turned over to Emir Abdullah's poorhouse, which in the euphemistic language of diplomacy is referred to as Trans-Jordan? SAMUEL DUKER

Washington, D. C., December 20

Political Surgeons

Dear Sirs: It was with much interest that I read the editorial in the December 11 issue of The Nation entitled Political Surgery. There is one point that you will be interested in knowing about. The committee composed of Drs. Malony, Wilson, Yoell, Peers, and Kilgore referred to in The Nation as the Publication Committee was the original Committee of Five which officially represented the California Medical Association in initiating the survey of which I was director. My report was handed in to this Committee of Five for publication on October 23, 1936. When they failed to release it after a reasonable amount of time, I insisted that they delay no longer. Finally, after any number of complaints on my part and on the part of the governmental officials who had been responsible for federal grants, I made plans for private publication.

In the meantime the California Medical Association had laid the "necessary groundwork" for disposing of the report as it saw fit. When complaints of those who were interested in not allowing the report to be killed through inaction became so loud that they no longer could be disregarded, the State Department of Public Health took the stage as the official public sponsor of the survey. One of its first acts was to appoint from among the members of the State Board of Health a new Publication Committee, whose duty it was to edit the report and to see that a document was published. Three members of this newly appointed Publication Committee were Howard Morrow, president of the State Board of Health and also president of the California Medical Association; Edward Pallette, a senior member of the State Board of Health and last year's president of the California Medical Association; and George Kress, another senior member of the State Board of Health and editor of California and Western Medicine, official publication of the Medical Association. Observing the make-up of this committee, one needs little imagination to figure out why the California Medical Association and the State Board of Health stood in perfect agreement as to what was to be done with the final report.

This is the "trust" that some of us know is operating in defense of the old system of private practice and at great sacrifice of public welfare.

PAUL A. DODD

Los Angeles, Cal., December 18

Advertising and Politics

Dear Sirs: It is not clear from Miss Woodward's article, How to Swing an Election, in your issue of December 11 whether she refers to an election held this fall or in 1936. However, in any case it was not the first instance of Lord and Thomas's participation in California politics. I remember that Upton Sinclair, in "I, Candidate for Governor and How I Got Licked," wrote of the role of this advertising agency in the smear-Sinclair campaign. The billboards and newspaper ads attacking Sinclair, together with the rest of the Republican publicity in the 1934 California gubernatorial election, were handled by this agency, Sinclair reports.

HY KRAVIF

New York, December 15

Money Must Be Spent

Dear Sirs: Keith Hutchinson's article in your issue of December 11 contained an excellent analysis of the present economic recession, but his conclusion, although in line with current liberal thought, struck me as inadequate.

Deficit financing was justified so long as it represented a replacement of the deposit money which vanished with the contraction of private credit during the years 1930-33. But now that deposits are as large as they were in 1929 there is money enough to finance production at capacity—if all the money were in active circulation. But the fact is that a vast sum is held idle in the banks by investors, trust accounts, and corporations. And so long as it is held idle we shall have unemployment and depression. Further pump-priming will stimulate business for a time, but the new money poured into the pump will again be drained off into private dry wells, as it has been in the past. And when the pump-priming ceases, as it must some time, business will decline again.

What we need is not a further increase in the volume of money but an increase in the velocity of its circulation. This might be brought about either by "restoring the confidence" of business men, which implies a complete surrender of the New Deal, or by devising taxes which would severely penalize the accumulation of idle funds.

The fact we must recognize is that our economy will not function—without the stimulus of credit inflation—unless all income received is either spent or invested. Money that cannot be invested must be spent. We cannot hope for a steady prosperity until measures are devised to give effect to this principle.

GEORGE R. WALKER

Boston, December 20

Mr. Epstein Unchanged

Dear Sirs: Mr. L. A. Beck's letter in The Nation of December 18 regarding your recent editorial and my presumed changes of mind is interesting to me only as an example of the bankrupt tactics of my critics.

As to Mr. Beck's charge that in my speech before the Colorado Conference of Social Work I attacked "the Social Security Act as well as the Social Security Board and others who are not in full agreement" with me, Mr. Beck knows that I did not make reference to either the Social Security Board or other people's point of view.

It is significant that Mr. Beck uses the same quotation from my testimony before the Congressional committees studying the social-security bills as was recently cited to me by a member of the Social Security Board. The frightful inconsistency charged to me is that early in 1935 I indorsed the major portion of the President's general program and even favored the old-age insurance plan then proposed. What Mr. Beck does not tell is that my testimony referred to a bill which was entirely different from the one finally enacted. That bill not only provided for lower contributions, to be attained at a slower rate of increase, and for less than one-third the present contemplated reserve, but also—which is most important to me—for a direct governmental contribution.

My chief criticisms of the insurance provisions of the Social Security Act are based on the fact that the present taxes are placed almost entirely on the workers as wage-earners and consumers, and that since this must inevitably reduce their purchasing power, production will be curtailed, unemployment increased, and insecurity enhanced. There is thus no inconsistency in my indorsement of a plan which offered a base for a socially desirable system and my criticism of an act which is directly the opposite. Indeed, until there is a governmental contribution to the present old-age and unemployment-insurance provisions, obtained through progressive taxation, I must continue to denounce the act for what it is—a measure tending toward social insecurity rather than security—if I am to be consistent with the principles I have held steadfastly for over twenty years.

ABRAHAM EPSTEIN, Executive Secretary
American Association for Social Security
New York, December 17

Margaret Fuller

Dear Sirs: I am preparing a biography of Margaret Fuller and would be glad to hear from anyone possessing letters or information about her not hitherto made public. Any letters or other material sent to me in care of Reynal and Hitchcock, 386 Fourth Avenue, New York City, will be carefully handled and promptly returned. MASON WADE

New York, December 27

Ella Wheeler Wilcox

Dear Sirs: I have undertaken a study of Ella Wheeler Wilcox and her times, and I shall be obliged if owners of letters from Miss Wilcox will send copies of them to me for examination, or, if more convenient, the originals, which will be promptly copied and returned. I shall also be grateful for any memories of the poet which her friends or acquaintances may send.

JENNY BALLOU

Short Beach, Conn., December 23

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's correspondent in Spain, has just arrived in the United States for a short visit.

MARQUIS CHILDS, Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, is the author of "Sweden: The Middle Way."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, is the author of "Beyond Tragedy."

GEORGE GROSZ has recently published a portfolio of drawings, "Interregnum," from which The Nation has selected several for publication.

ALAN BARTH is a New York newspaperman.

PAUL ROSENFELD is the author of "By Way of Art."

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, is the author of "The Negro as Capitalist."

NATHANIEL WEYL, formerly an economist for the AAA, is working on a book about South America.

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN, author of "Farewell to Reform," is on the staff of Fortune.

PHILIP RAHV is an editor of the Partisan Review.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL is the author of "The Jews of Germany."

EMERY NEFF is assistant professor of English at Columbia University.

FRANK C. HANIGHEN is a close student of the economic forces which motivate wars. He is the coauthor of "Merchants of Death."

GEORGE WILLISON is the author of "Why Wars Are Declared."

Correction—In the issue of November 27, L. O. Prendergast stated that telephone service in Mexico "is in the hands of two foreign companies, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Swedish Ericcson trust, in which the A. T. and T. has a 35 per cent interest." Mr. Prendergast intended to say the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation, not the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 8, 1938 NUMBER 2

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 29

EDITORIALS:

THE ATTACK ON MONOPOLY 31
THE BOYCOTT IS WINNING 33
CAROL DROPS THE MASK 34
CAN HITLER BE BOUGHT? by Robert Dell 35
THE LIFE AND TIMES OF "RED" KUHL 37
HAVEN AT HANKOW by Crispian Corcoran 39
UNCLE SAM, PRIVILEGED BOSS By Sterling D. Spero and Samuel Paul Puner 41
LOS ANGELES GROWS UP by Oliver Carlson 43
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 45

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

CAPITALISM AS MAGIC by Max Lerner 46
RED IN THE EAST by Eliot Janeway 47
THE WAYS OF PHILOSOPHY by Sidney Hook 48
"MEXICAN MODERN" by Anita Brenner 49
MISDIRECTED ENERGIES by Maxwell S. Stewart 50
ART: THE DEMUTH MEMORIAL SHOW By Paul Rosenfeld 50
DRAMA: A DOLL'S HOUSE by Joseph Wood Krutch 53
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 54

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

✶

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

✶

MR. ROOSEVELT'S MESSAGE ON THE STATE OF the nation was among the sharpest commentaries on the functioning of the capitalist economy that any President has sent to Congress. In form and temper it marks an abrupt departure from the demoralized Administration mood of the past several months. In terms of actual program, however, there was little to put one's teeth into that had not already been discussed in previous messages. Despite the "candor" of his phrases, the President is clearly marking time in foreign affairs. In the domestic sphere he pleaded again and persuasively for the farm and wage-hour bills; retreated from the "balanced budget" philosophy, but not far enough to adopt the opposite philosophy of government spending to combat the recession; promised again that no one would starve if the WPA could help it; and took a firm stand on tax revision, implying that he would favor no changes in the capital-gains tax, and only such changes in the undistributed-profits tax as would ease the burden on small business. There is not much here that is new; yet, in contrast with what looked like an earlier tendency to bargain away the principles of the New Deal in return for business "cooperation," even to hold fast to what has already been enunciated seems like a step forward. The weakness of the message is its lack of a constructive and articulate program for dealing with the recession. The President's reference to an annual wage in the building industry is scarcely a major contribution toward recovery. His unwillingness to commit himself to government spending is ominous. In this respect Senator La Follette's insistence on more spending bolstered by heavier taxation would seem to smell more of the spirit of "action and action now" than the President's message.

✶

IT IS WHEN HE TALKS OF BIG BUSINESS and the government, however, that the President reaches the crux of the message. Mr. Jackson and Mr. Ickes, by their speeches, stirred up a storm; Mr. Roosevelt now seeks to ride and command it. It is noteworthy that the emphasis of the message is not on monopoly or on any projected trust-busting. One must assume that the President can read history as well as the next man, and that he knows the record of the failure of anti-trust legislation, as pointed out in our editorial elsewhere in this issue. His emphasis is rather where it should be—on business power and irresponsibility rather than on size, and on the price and production policies not only of the monopolies but of the rest of big business. His indictment of particular business practices is important not because they violate some fancied competitive ideal, but because they carry with them "control of other people's money, other people's labor, other people's lives." What the President fails to see, or is unwilling to say, is that while his indictment applies only to a minority of business men, that minority controls our economic life. But a more important omission is the absence of a definite program for dealing with this concentration of power in the hands of an irresponsible few. The President hints at banking legislation, which may mean that he appreciates the fact of the government's dependence on the big capitalists for continuing investment and realizes that it was just such a dependence that caused the death of reform governments in Great Britain and France. Upon the nature of the President's supplementary messages, with their specific proposals, will depend one's judgment as to whether this message was chiefly rhetoric or the beginning of a new turn in policy.

*

THE CENSUS OF UNEMPLOYMENT SHOWS that there is a larger number of jobless in the United States than anyone believed possible. While there will be endless controversy regarding the exact interpretation of the statistics, a strict mathematical count indicated that the number of unemployed in mid-November was 10,871,000. Since that date at least another million have been thrown out of work, bringing the total to very nearly twelve million. Assuming that a fourth of the two and a half million women listed as jobless would not be in the labor market if their husbands had work, the total is still well over eleven million. A few, but very few, of these will be eligible for unemployment insurance in another few weeks. In New York, which is one of the twenty-one states in which unemployment insurance becomes payable this month, only 185,000 of the 1,350,000 who are out of work have applied for benefit payments, and it is impossible to know how many of these will be disqualified. Throughout the country approximately two million persons are on government work projects. But there remain at least eight million who are receiving neither jobless benefits nor work relief. As things stand at present, these millions are in precisely the same plight as were the unemployed in the early days of the Hoover Administration. They must look to the state, to the municipality, or to private charity for such aid as is available. But if the past few years have taught us anything, it is that the local communities are incapable of meeting the demand for relief. Pending the development of a coordinated national-security program, which would eliminate discrimination, Congress might well consider the proposal put forward by the Community Mobilization for Human Needs for an immediate resumption of federal grants-in-aid to enable the states to cope with the growing crisis.

CHIANG KAI-SHEK'S DECISION TO RESIGN the Premiership and concentrate on military affairs may be taken as an indication that the Chinese leaders have determined to fight the war to the finish. H. H. Kung, the new Premier, is one of Chiang's most trusted aides and may be expected to carry out his policies. Despite the rapid Japanese advance in Shantung, the military situation is not wholly unfavorable to China. Observers of the utmost reliability who have recently returned to this country from the Peiping area report that the large Japanese army in Shansi, Suiyuan, and parts of Hopei has practically been immobilized by the guerrilla tactics of the Eighth Route Army. At most, Japanese control extends only about five miles from the railroads, and even these are frequently cut. Popular feeling in both the occupied and unoccupied sections of the country is growing more bitter against Japan as a result of the systematic, wholesale pillaging of the towns and countryside which have been occupied by the Japanese troops. Evidence which has come to light recently makes it clear that the undeclared war, including the Shanghai adventure, was not the outgrowth of unfortunate incidents, as appeared at the time, but was deliberately planned months in advance by the extremists in the Japanese army. It is apparent, however, that the strength of Chinese resistance was seriously underestimated, and that even the extremists would now welcome peace if it would guarantee Japanese domination over North China.

*

NOT THE LEAST REGRETTABLE ASPECT OF the Panay incident was the inflammatory purpose it was made to serve. For days before the newsreels reached the United States their coming was heralded by news items describing the dangers attendant on their recording, outlining their itinerary, and explaining the delays. When the pictures finally arrived, full double-column advertisements appeared in the New York dailies listing all the moving-picture houses in the metropolitan area at which they would be shown, and many of the larger houses advertised separately, giving lurid descriptions of the horrors to be revealed. On the first day the films were shown, the papers reported the exact degree of fever raised in each theater, and one journal even sent a reporter around to ask members of the audience whether the pictures made them feel like going to war. Several responded with a gratifying ferocity that was played up in the headlines. Actually the newsreels themselves were not nearly as inflammatory as the build-up, but the running comment was assuredly not intended to cool fevered brows. The bombing itself was shown only indirectly, and there was no sign of the machine-gunning of the Panay. But the fulsome discussion of the commentator made up for that. As the film showed the flag-draped coffin of an American seaman who was killed on board the gunboat, the voice of Lowell Thomas reminded us, in grim staccato and with what sounded like disapproval, that the government says the incident is closed. Without all the ballyhoo the films would have been calmly accepted as a reasonably good newsreel; as presented they became a challenge to "red-blooded Americans" to stand up and put those Japs in their place.

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame

*

WHEN THE NEW YORK DEMOCRATS ASSEMBLE at the annual Jackson Day dinner, where the governorship prospects are usually lined up, the figure on whom all eyes will be turned will be another fellow by the name of Jackson. Besides having the running start of a good name, Robert H. Jackson has recently been catapulted into national prominence by his speeches attacking big business. These have given him the build-up he has needed in order to become available for the governorship of New York State this year. Jackson first gained attention as general counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, where he made a brilliant argument in the tax suits against Andrew Mellon and did much to strengthen the tax administration. He is something of an anomaly—a former corporation lawyer who has turned out to be one of the strongest Administration progressives. He would undoubtedly receive the support of the Labor Party in New York as against District Attorney Dewey, who is almost certain to get the Republican nomination for governor. The only candidate who could replace Jackson is Senator Wagner, and a boom has already been started by Tammany to head Jackson off by drafting Wagner for the governorship and running Lehman for the Senate in Wagner's place. The maneuver has a double purpose: not only would it spike the Jackson boom, but it would replace a strong liberal in the Senate with a man more to the liking of the financial interests. Wagner would make a strong candidate for governor, but he should not be taken out of the Senate, where his talent for holding the liberal bloc together makes him indispensable. New York labor will do well to insist that he stay where he is and to throw its strength to Jackson for governor.

*

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE NEW STATE OF EIRE leaves de Valera and the Irish people with their basic problems as far from solution as ever. Although the last ties with the British Empire have nominally been cut, Ireland is still not independent. True, it has obtained complete control over its domestic policies, but its autonomy in this respect is really no greater than was granted in the Free State charter of 1921. In theory it is no longer dependent on the British Commonwealth of Nations for its foreign policy, but in practice it is as much a vassal as ever. Mr. de Valera is actually working in closer harmony with Great Britain than at any time in the past five years. Nor has any progress been made on the problem of "partition." The new constitution invests Dublin with sovereignty over the whole of Ireland, but the British have decreed otherwise. While the constitution was created to unify the country, it has only served to accentuate political differences and weaken de Valera's power. Most of the changes are minor, but they lie in the general direction of an authoritarian state. Civil rights are guaranteed, subject to rather sweeping exceptions. The President is granted power which in the hands of a strong man might facilitate the establishment of a dictatorship. For the moment, however, the strength of the opposition precludes any move in that direction.

*

LORD HALIFAX'S VISIT TO HERR HITLER may appear to have been a failure to those who hoped it would fail, but it was not so regarded by the group in England which is responsible for having brought it about. The London Times of December 3 contained a long and highly interesting description of the second annual dinner of the Anglo-German Fellowship. Five hundred persons attended, Lord Mount Temple presided, and the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, president of the Deutsche-Englische Gesellschaft, sister organization in the Third Reich, was the chief guest. Lord Mount Temple noted that the Fellowship has grown to 700 members—"citizens of weight and influence, occupying responsible positions, and drawn from all parts of the British Isles." The Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha made it clear that Lord Halifax's visit must be regarded as the first success in a continuing campaign rather than the final fiasco in a failing cause. Herr von Ribbentrop uttered similar felicities, and Lord Halifax, with an almost jocular verbal wink at his distinguished audience, which responded with laughter, said that he intended to speak mainly of the hunting expedition which, he wished to remind them, was the "original purpose" of his visit and that it would therefore be the subject of his address. The Times list of "among those present" was formidable with lords and ladies, admirals, and field marshals. They included Sir Robert and Lady Vansittart. Sir Robert has just been made chief diplomatic adviser to the British Foreign Office.

The Attack on Monopoly

THE new moves to grapple with the monopoly problem which are implicit in the President's message to Congress and were spelled out in the speeches of Mr. Jackson and Mr. Ickes may be seen from two angles. Most of the discussion has been centered on the immediate politics of these moves, with the President again getting the worst of it so far as the newspapers are concerned. If the turn in policy were limited to trust-busting slogans and the attempt to fix the blame for the recession, we should agree with much of the criticism of it. But if it marks a recognition by the President that his whole recent policy of compromise and concession has been as unfruitful politically as it has been futile economically, the change is a good one.

Then, too, there is the larger perspective. These considerations of politics and morale, however important on the eve of the opening of Congress, are not of prime significance. Five or ten years from now the question of who was to blame for the depression, or whether the President was politically clever in his moves, will be unimportant. But the question of what measures were taken to cope with the recession, and what long-run policy was adopted for the regulation of business, will be crucial. It was inevitable, of course, that after Wall Street had persisted in blaming the recession on the Administration, the Administration should retaliate by blaming it all on business; and the speeches of Mr. Ickes and Mr. Jackson, with their unfortunate emphasis on personal devils, must be read in this light. But it is time the question of who is responsible for the depression were shifted to the question of what is responsible.

There are men around the President who are beginning to make an analysis not only of the recession but of the whole impasse of American capitalism that runs beyond campaign thunderings and political snap judgments. This analysis is implicit in the recent Administration utterances, although overlaid by political incrustations. Its central approach to the ups and downs of the permanent depression has three phases. First, the major part of American industry is controlled by corporations so powerful that most of our prices are what Gardiner C. Means has called "administered" prices, with a resulting lack of price flexibility and an incapacity for change as required by changing needs. Second, these corporations have been in a position (in Mr. Jackson's phrase) to "skim the cream off recovery" by their huge profits; they have profited from advances in technology and lowered costs, but instead of following the Brookings formula of lowering price and increasing volume and thus pumping the technological savings back into purchasing power for labor and the consumer, they have chosen to maximize their profits, even at the expense of higher prices and smaller volume. Third, industrial and financial concentration has gone so far that a relatively small number of men now control the sources and pace of investment and have the power to withhold it; and that control is exercised in the thoroughly undemocratic way that characterizes the management-control and banker-control of industry. This latter, incidentally, is the core of relevance in Secretary Ickes's reference to America's "sixty families."

If this analysis is sound, the power, inflexibility, price and labor policies, and investment policies of the giant corporations are crucial to the whole situation. We have never believed in what Justice Brandeis has called "the curse of bigness" as such; the problem is not one of bigness but of irresponsible power and inflexibility of adjustment to economic needs.

But the remedy for our economic ills is not trust-busting. The Administration has much to learn if it thinks it can bring prosperity by enforcing the anti-trust laws. They are part of the exploded and outmoded folklore of capitalism—a folklore, as Thurman Arnold has pointed out, that allowed us to cling to our ideal of a competitive society and at the same time allowed the trusts to flourish. The anti-trust policy has been a failure ever since its adoption in 1890. Fifty years of agitation have resulted only in the Sherman, Clayton, and Federal Trade Commission acts. The anti-trust suits and the consent decrees have amounted to practically nothing. The whole policy is vitiated by the attempt to control a living economic institution in terms of the dead ritual and incongruous procedures of criminal litigation. Theodore Roosevelt tried trust-busting and ended by turning his face Janus-like in both directions at once, with a distinction between "good" and "bad" trusts. In the immortal words that Mr. Dooley placed in his mouth, "On wan hand I wud stamp them undher fut; on th' other hand, not so fast." Woodrow Wilson tried trust-busting, and his failure was shrouded in war.

It has been one of Mr. Roosevelt's merits that he has up to now recognized the futility of the anti-trust laws, and has addressed himself instead to the regulation of business. It is true that he has gone about regulation often in the wrong way, and that the NRA did much to increase the power of the monopolies. But in fairness to the Administration, one should point also to the Public Utilities Holding Company Act, the SEC, the NLRB, and the TVA as moves in the right direction, and to the light that the Pecora and Wheeler hearings have shed on corporate finance. In long-run terms the recent moves represent a recognition by the Administration that its policy of regulation has not accomplished its objectives; that despite the partial successes of the government, the recession has caught it with Big Money still in the saddle and still powerful enough to sabotage the purposes of the New Deal. We welcome the change of Administration policy as a sign that Mr. Roosevelt means to push on with his reforms. But the direction is all important. If Mr. Roosevelt means to move back to the Sherman Act and the cloud-cuckooland of a competitive system, the results can only be tragic. If he means to move forward to more stringent and more intelligent regulation of business, he is on the right track.

Here, or anywhere in government regulation, the beginning of wisdom lies in the recognition that absolutes must be avoided. The industrial system presents a whole hierarchy of methods by which prices are determined. In certain sweated industries cutthroat competition reigns and "chiseling" is a real menace; in the distributive and retail trades, one must face the problem of resale price maintenance and of the independent merchant as against the chain-store; in the case of the railroads, consolidations must be part of a realistic program; the public-utility field is the happy hunting ground of holding companies and financial marauders, and only drastic control accompanied by the TVA principle and a change in judicial rate-making can help the consumer; an industry like aluminum represents a case of a 100 per cent perfect monopoly, protected by patents and ripe for socialization. Some of the most important industries—steel, autos, oil, movies—fall between these categories in the area of what the economists are now calling by the barbarous name "oligopoly," where a few large companies divide the field, often through linked financial directorates, and where there is a community of interest in price and production policy.

Obviously no ready-made pattern will fit these varied needs. What the Administration needs is not a slogan but a program. Fortunately it has the materials for one in the studies of the National Resources Committee, in the WPA studies of recent changes in industrial techniques, in the files of the NRA, and in the series of excellent studies of price policy made in the Labor Department under Walton Hamilton and soon to be published. It should use them.

The Boycott Is Winning

FOUR and a half months have passed since The Nation first urged a consumers' boycott as the most practicable means of opposing Japanese aggression in China. During that period the boycott has been steadily gaining strength. And within the past week it has suddenly emerged as a nation-wide movement of unprecedented proportions. Doubtless the sinking of the Panay and the subsequent showing of the films depicting that attack have played an important role in bringing home the realities of Japanese aggression to the American people. But there is also abundant evidence that Americans are beginning to grasp the fact, for the first time, that they, in cooperation with other peace-loving peoples, have the power not only to stop Japan but to diminish the threat of war throughout the world.

The success of the four-months-old movement to stop the purchase of Japanese goods is almost incredible. Within the past week officers of six of the country's largest chain stores—F. W. Woolworth, S. S. Kresge, McCrory, S. H. Kress, the F. and W. Grand Stores, and the National Dollar Stores—have announced that they are not placing additional orders for Japanese manufactured goods. The only other important chain in the same field, the W. T. Grant Stores, was earlier reported to be considering a similar ban, but it has not made any definite announcement.

So far the department stores have not come out as openly as the chain stores, but the Herald Tribune of December 17 reported that two of New York's largest stores had discontinued purchases from Japan and that others were holding up orders pending an appraisal of popular sentiment. Similar reports have been received from San Francisco, Washington, Portland, and other cities.

The effect of the boycott on the sale of silk has not been as dramatic, but there is plenty of evidence that inroads are being made on this most important of all Japanese products. On December 18 it was announced that the silk-hosiery manufacturers would be forced to "plan a midwinter curtailment of production." On the following day it was reported that the number of producers of lisle stockings had increased from five to fifty-five within six weeks. Since that time one of the largest manufacturers, the Gotham Silk Hosiery Company, has announced a new stocking made of cotton lisle "to meet such demand as may develop." A large number of firms have also branched out into the production of full-fashioned rayon stockings.

To the annual convention of the American Student Union must be given credit for one of the most colorful incidents in connection with the boycott. The bonfire which consumed silk stockings, neckties, and other garments has been a front-page story throughout the country. A less publicized but even more dramatic incident occurred in a New York settlement house when a group of children were presented with Japanese-made toys at their annual Christmas party. Spontaneously indignant, these slum children, to whom even the cheapest toy is a prize of great value, returned the gifts to the settlement house, where they lie today, a testimonial to the children's hatred of war and a rebuke to the donors.

It is impossible within our limits of space to attempt to list the organizations which have indorsed the boycott. They represent all sections of the nation and all shades of political and religious opinion. In addition to the American Federation of Labor, the Committee for Industrial Organization, the American Student Union, and the American Negro Congress, we find such various groups as the United Christian Council for Democracy, Division 36 of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, the City Council of Hamtramck, Michigan (a Polish-American community), the Kiwanis Club of Boston, the Lions Club of Charleston, West Virginia, the Massachusetts State Grange, the Lieutenant John A. Patten Post, American Legion, Troy, New York, and the American Artists' Congress actively supporting the boycott. We could cite many more, equally diverse but similarly united in opposition to the Japanese invasion. The Independent Merchants' Association of Montana, which earlier voted to suspend buying Japanese products, has written to the National Retail Dry Goods Association asking similar action. In Richmond, Virginia, a state Committee for Boycott against Japanese Aggression has been set up as a branch of the national committee in New York.

Details on the spread of the boycott movement in other countries are lacking, but it is significant that the Council of the powerful League of Nations Union of Great Britain unanimously adopted a resolution on December 17 which (1) "welcomes the action taken by individuals and societies, both at home and abroad, to refuse to purchase goods of Japanese origin; and (2) trusts that there will be such an extension of this refusal to purchase Japanese goods as will convince the British government of the strength of public opinion on this subject." On December 15 the international executive committee of the International Peace Campaign, under the leadership of Viscount Cecil, voted unanimously to organize, on a worldwide scale, a private boycott of Japanese goods. A World Boycott Conference will be held in London beginning February 14, with the slogan "Save China—Save Peace." Thirty-nine international organizations with an aggregate membership of some 300,000,000 are to take part in this drive.

While figures showing the effect of the American boycott campaign during the last two months will not be available for at least sixty days, some effect is discernible in the September and October trade figures. Despite a general increase in American foreign trade during those months, trade with Japan, both imports and exports, fell off sharply as compared with the same months in 1936. Particularly striking is the fact that our imports of raw silk, in volume, dropped almost exactly 25 per cent in each month as compared with the previous year. As the price was also down about 5 per cent, the net loss in purchasing power to Japan was approximately 30 per cent. While all this loss cannot be attributed to the boycott, a number of reports from trade circles indicate that even three months ago "resistance to Japanese products" on the part of consumers was noticeable.

Even from this brief survey it is apparent that a development of utmost importance is under way. For the first time in history the common people of the world are discovering an effective method of registering their protest against war and aggression. True, they have not yet stopped Japan. But as it becomes apparent that China is settling down to a long-drawn-out campaign of resistance, the possibilities for effectively using this weapon are greatly increased. Japan has reserves to carry on its invasion of China for several months longer, but its capacity for continuing its drive beyond that period depends entirely on the economic support it receives from the principal commercial countries—the United States and the British Empire. Denied that support, Japan will find itself unable to obtain the war materials necessary to carry its campaign through to the end.

Carol Drops the Mask

THE news of the past week from Bucharest was not as unexpected as some of the correspondents make it appear to be. For the better part of a year King Carol has been telling the foreign journalists who came to see him that events of the gravest sort were brewing. What he left to the imagination was that he intended to play the part of destiny himself. But a glance at the political checkerboard of Rumania made that manifest. The young monarch had for seven years been enjoying himself hugely at the game of reigning. A constitutional ruler on paper, he was in fact ignoring parties and parliamentary majorities; and he labored with no little skill and with all his energies to get rid of them altogether. To this end he sowed discord in the more powerful groups—like the Liberals and the National Peasants—and raised up dictator-apprentices to undermine their influence. But his efforts were not entirely successful. The party of Maniu gained suport in the country, though not proportionately at elections, while the Iron Guard of Corneliu Codreanu, grown strong and arrogant, snapped at the hand that had been feeding it. Thenceforth there was but one course open to the King. With a quasi-republican foe on the left and a totalitarian one on the right, he must drop the mask and frankly break up the party system. The recent elections, in which, despite official pressure, his minions failed to obtain the required plurality, were the last straw.

In calling to office Octavian Goga—poet, anti-Semite, and hooligan chief—Carol followed in the footsteps not of Hindenburg but (with variations and precautions) of his late brother-in-law King Alexander of Yugoslavia. The leader of the numerically insignificant National Christian Party is a transparent screen behind which can be discerned the features of the real dictator, Carol himself. Had the ruler wanted to turn the country over to a veritable, dynamic totalitarian, he would have called upon Codreanu or Vaida Voevod, the dissident peasant chief. In aims and program these three differ not at all, and Codreanu is the only one to possess a private army. Goga's threat to mobilize 200,000 of his troops is an idle boast, and he as well as the King knows it. Carol did not even make the army over to his new Premier, but intrusted it to General Antonescu, a soldier independent of parties and ideologies whom the monarch could control separately.

The purpose of the royal move is thus clear enough: it was a maneuver to preserve and consolidate the throne, to crush the peasant left, and by the same stroke to take the wind out of Codreanu's sails. But surprises may yet come. It is doubtful, for instance, whether the King, for all his sympathies with nearby despotisms and his repugnance for the French Popular Front, intended to precipitate a break with the traditional foreign policy of the country. There was no compelling reason why he should swing over in the direction of Rome and Berlin at this particular moment. Along with Colonel Beck of Poland and Premier Stoyadinovich of Yugoslavia, he rather relished sitting on the fence, being courted by both groups of great powers, and committing himself outright to neither. Wherefore the speedy and somewhat vigorous reaction in Paris must have come to him as a shock. M. Daladier's prompt stoppage of arms shipments may possibly serve to sober Rumania's ruler. The question is whether events have not slipped out of Carol's scheming hands. Coups d'état, like revolutions, often fail to do what their makers expect of them. Ideological sympathies are all very well, but France and Czechoslovakia are in a position to furnish arms on credit, whereas Germany and Italy, having poured the contents of their arsenals into Spain and being hampered by lack of raw materials, are hardly able to supply them even for cash.

As a matter of fact, even internally, Carol must already realize that he has loosed a bigger avalanche than he could have wished. The racial policies of Goga cannot fail to make worse the position of other minorities besides that of the Jews and thereby to increase tension with Hungary, Bulgaria, and Russia. If Goga weakens he will be overwhelmed either by the Iron Guard or by the National Peasant party of Maniu, which, be it remembered, has military resources of its own. In the last analysis the issue may depend on the attitude of the army. For the moment the army is faithful to the monarch. But should the situation become confused, it is at least conceivable that, in a country where corruption is not unknown, its loyalty may be shaken. In that case the German and Italian press may have triumphed prematurely.

Can Hitler Be Bought?

BY ROBERT DELL

Geneva, December 20

FOUR years of refusal to learn by experience—of persistence in a policy of capitulations and concessions to gangsters and blackmailers although its disastrous consequences had again and again been demonstrated—have ended as sooner or later they were bound to end. Anglo-French diplomacy is bankrupt, and the poor-spirited incapables to whom the two great Western democracies have intrusted the management of their affairs still refuse to face realities and to reverse the policy that has put them in an almost inextricable situation.

Neither in Paris nor in London has any definite information been given about the Anglo-French conversations of last month. It is doubtful whether all members of the British and French governments have been fully informed about them. It is, however, certain that the conversations did not result in a decision to make a stand against the arrogant and aggressive policy of the new Fascist Triple Alliance. So far as Japan is concerned, the capitulation is already complete. As the London New Statesman and Nation said on December 18, the Brussels conference was a "degrading farce," for which the United States, England, and France are equally responsible. Not one of them was prepared even to join in an embargo. An attempt appears to have been made to induce the Soviet government to take action alone against Japan. Potemkin is said to have replied that the Russians were not prepared to be cannon fodder for the Western powers. The Brussels conference should never have been held in the circumstances, and it cannot be denied that President Roosevelt's Chicago speech misled European opinion. He should not have talked as he did if he had not the power to act. Now the Japanese feel they can do anything they like, as the attacks on American and British ships show. As the New Statesman said in the article already quoted, "it would be sensible for Englishmen to prepare their minds for the peaceful liquidation of British interests in the Far East" and to "face the fact that Japan is now mistress in the Pacific."

In Europe, on the other hand, all is not yet lost, and it would still be possible to redress the situation if the British and French governments were willing to take the initiative in organizing collective defense against the alliance of the aggressor states. It is clear, however, that they are not willing. They cannot do it without the cooperation of Soviet Russia, and the British government refuses to cooperate with Soviet Russia. Under British influence the French government has been for some time past becoming less and less friendly to Russia. If England, France, and Russia declared tomorrow that they would tolerate no aggression against and no interference with Austria or Czechoslovakia or any other European country, it is extremely improbable that there would be any such aggression or interference, and if there were none, there would be no war. If England, France, and Russia joined in a pact of mutual assistance open to every other country in Europe, every other European country except Germany and Italy would ultimately be brought into it. Even Austria and Hungary could hardly stand out permanently. It is not true that further concessions to the fascist powers are the only alternative to war.

The tour of Delbos in Eastern Europe, which was arranged before the visit of Chautemps and Delbos to London, has been a complete failure if its purpose was to restore French influence in Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia and to strengthen the Little Entente. In Warsaw the divergences between Delbos and Beck were so evident that even the official communiqué did not venture to say that they were in agreement. Poland has not formally adhered to the Fascist Triple Alliance, but it belongs to it for all practical purposes, although there is little doubt that the majority of the Polish people are opposed to Beck's policy. It can hardly be doubted that the majority of the Yugoslav people are also opposed to the policy of their government. The arrival of Delbos in Belgrade was the occasion of an incident that must be unprecedented in such circumstances. The police charged and shot down demonstrators for the crime of showing their sympathy with democratic France and their hostility to fascist Italy. When Benes visited Belgrade, there were similar demonstrations, and the roads into the capital were closed to prevent the inhabitants of the neighboring country districts from joining in them. The visit of Stoyadinovich, the Yugoslav Prime Minister, to Rome on the eve of Delbos's visit was an insult to France, and it is clear that there is some sort of secret agreement between Italy and Yugoslavia, even if it be not a written one. Yugoslavia is now definitely in the German orbit, and the reconciliation with Italy was brought about by German and British influence. The Yugoslav government did not consult France or its partners in the Little Entente before signing the "Pact of Accord" with Italy on March 26 last, but it did consult Mr. Campbell, the British Minister to Belgrade, who recommended the signing of the pact, acting no doubt on instructions from his government. Thus Mussolini has regained the influence in the Balkans that he had lost by his own blunders.

In Bucharest Delbos was perhaps a little less unsuccessful than in Warsaw and Belgrade, but he could not shake the determination of the Rumanian government not to accept the pact of mutual assistance offered by the Blum Cabinet to Yugoslavia and Rumania about a year ago on condition that they agreed to convert the Little Entente treaty, which at present provides for mutual assistance only in the event of an attack on any of the signatories by Hungary, into a general pact of mutual assistance. It is not even certain that he tried to shake it. The Blum Cabinet, under British influence, had previously refused a similar proposal made on behalf of the Little Entente in June, 1936. When, later, the French government took fright and itself made the proposal that it had previously rejected, it was too late. Yugoslavia and Rumania had passed under German influence. This was perhaps the worst of the many blunders in foreign policy made by the Popular Front government, which has a great responsibility for the present situation.

In Prague Delbos had, naturally, an enthusiastic reception, but by agreement with Neville Chamberlain and Eden he urged the Czechoslovak government to make concessions to Hitler. Hitler is trying to impose on Czechoslovakia a "cultural" agreement on the lines of that already existing between Germany and Poland. The effect of the agreement would be, among other things, that the Czechoslovak press would cease to publish anything distasteful to the German government, especially information about what is going on in Germany, that the German government would have a free hand to send into Czechoslovakia as many spies as it pleased masquerading as newspaper correspondents, and that the Czechoslovak government would suppress all the periodicals published by German refugees in Prague and forbid German refugees even to write for Czechoslovak papers. The fact that the Czechoslovak government is actually negotiating on the subject is significant.

It is extremely probable that Delbos advised the Czechoslovak government to make such an agreement with Germany, for he himself is negotiating about a similar agreement between Germany and France. The suggestion was made about a month ago by Aschmann, head of the press department of the German Foreign Office, in a letter to Pierre Comert, who holds the same position in the Quai d'Orsay. Delbos sent Comert, much against the latter's will, to Berlin to discuss the matter with Aschmann. When Delbos was passing through Berlin on his way to Warsaw, Neurath, in the course of their short conversation at the Berlin railway station, again raised the question of a "cultural agreement" and said that one of the conditions insisted on by the German government would be the suppression of all the periodicals published by German refugees in France. Delbos consented to consider the matter and telegraphed from Warsaw instructing Comert to go to Berlin without delay. It may be hoped that the negotiations will come to nothing, but the fact that Delbos insisted on them is a sufficient indication of his abject attitude toward Nazi Germany.

The very existence of the League of Nations is now at stake. The German manifesto against the League was undoubtedly a signal for an offensive with the object of destroying it. It seems likely that the political offensive will be started by Poland. On December 15 a communiqué issued by the political information bureau in Warsaw expressed the fear that the League would now become the representative of an "ideological bloc" opposing Germany, Italy, and Japan. "This would mean," the communiqué said, "that the Geneva institution would be turned into a mere doctrinaire camp without due regard to realities," in which case "the Polish government would have to reconsider very carefully whether this is not in conflict with the basic principles of Polish foreign policy and as a result of such consideration to regulate Poland's future attitude to, and her relations with, the League of Nations." The Polish government has sent the text of this communiqué officially or semiofficially to the Secretary General of the League of Nations with a covering letter saying that it expresses the views of the Polish government.

This is in effect a threat on the part of the Polish government to leave the League of Nations unless the Covenant is amended by the suppression of Article 16 and the League formally renounces any form of collective defense and any action against an aggressor. It is believed in Geneva that Poland will probably raise the question at the next session of the Council of the League, which will begin on January 17. If so, Poland is quite likely to have the support of the British government, and even of the French government if Chautemps has his way. French correspondents accompanying Delbos on his tour have been openly saying that a change in French policy is contemplated in the sense of an abandonment of the idea of collective security.

An article by Pierre Etienne Flandin published in the Journal des Nations on December 19 undoubtedly expresses the views of Chautemps. This article shows that Flandin has become, at any rate temporarily, as pro-Nazi as Lord Halifax or Lord Lothian or the Astor family. He says in so many words that the Covenant of the League of Nations must be conciliated with the political principles set forth by Hitler in "Mein Kampf," and that for that purpose there must be "a partial and momentary abdication of the ideal expressed in the Covenant." France, Flandin says, must aim at conciliation and "the future reorganization of European relations in a League of Nations amply remodeled." It is clear from internal evidence that the article was written before Italy gave notice of withdrawing from the League and therefore before Germany declared that it would never return to the League in any circumstances, but it is none the less ominous.

The offensive against the League is to be economic as well as political, and the economic offensive will be led by Van Zeeland, who recently resigned his post as Prime Minister of Belgium in not very creditable circumstances. He has now drafted his report on the economic situation. A few days ago he had an interview in Paris with Chautemps, to whom he showed his report, but he refused to show it to the Quai d'Orsay. At the time of writing, Van Zeeland is in Rome, where he has shown his report to the Italian Foreign Ministry. His presence in Rome was at first denied by the Italian press, which has now, however, admitted it, adding that Van Zeeland has not seen and will not see Mussolini, which may or may not be true. In his report Van Zeeland recommends all that the fascist powers have demanded. His report is in direct opposition to those of the economic and financial committees of the League of Nations, which have recommended financial assistance to autarchic countries only for the purpose of enabling them to abandon autarchy, control of exchanges, and so on, and then only with political guaranties to prevent the use of the credits for armament purposes. Van Zeeland recommends that credits and financial assistance should be given to autarchic countries to enable them to continue their autarchic system and without any political guaranties at all. He proposes a five-power conference of the United States, England, France, Germany, and Italy, to draft a scheme which would then be submitted to a world conference. In his conversation with Chautemps, Van Zeeland said that if the League Covenant were amended in the sense desired by Germany and Italy, and those countries returned to the League, it could be the organ for executing the decisions of the world conference. If not, a new economic organization would be set up, as was proposed by the King of the Belgians in his letter of July 21 last to Van Zeeland, which was instigated, if not actually written, by Van Zeeland himself.

BURLIN

Van Zeeland's proposals are an attempt not only to destroy the economic organization of the League of Nations, which is one of its most valuable departments, but also to strengthen the fascist powers economically and politically. We know Van Zeeland at Geneva. More than once he did the dirty work of the British delegation, notably during the Abyssinian affair. It has been clear for some time past that he is equally prepared to do the dirty work of Hitler and Mussolini. It is to be hoped that the United States will give no encouragement to his intrigues.

The Life and Times of "Red" Kuhl

[We print herewith from the verbatim report of the La Follette Committee on Civil Liberties the typical sections of the testimony of C. M. ("Red") Kuhl, a labor spy who had worked for various agencies. Senator La Follette had begun by questioning Mr. Kuhl about the companies he had served and the "jobs" he had been assigned to.]

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE. You have been in the business a long time, Mr. Kuhl. Can you tell us and just describe in your own way how they get these strike-breakers, where they get them, and what kind of men they are?

Mr. KUHL. There is a kind of an underground grapevine system that puts out this call, and everyone hears it. They have certain places they congregate. For instance, in New York they have got a certain place at Forty-second and Broadway. In Chicago it would be down in the Loop around Randolph Street. In Philadelphia, for instance, it is down around the Reading Depot. And one of them will hear about it. For instance, these agencies will put out the word to one fellow, and he will go down and spread the word, and they are all around there looking for the job.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. How do they sign them up for these jobs?

Mr. KUHL. Well, they sign them up on a contract where the fink or strike-breaker practically signs away his life. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What else?

Mr. KUHL. Well, that is about all. They get paid.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Where did they put the men up on this New Orleans job?* Where did they house and feed them?

Mr. KUHL. They slept in car barns. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. And who were MacGuffin's aides on this job?

Mr. KUHL. Well, there were quite a number of aides there. It covered five barns. . . . MacGuffin was in charge. This C. W. Williams was next. And then I was sort of an assistant to C. W. Williams. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Are there different rates of pay between finks and nobles and lieutenants?

Mr. KUHL. Yes. Well, I can go down the line, start from the top and tell you the pay. MacGuffin received $50 in salary.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. A day?

Mr. KUHL. And $50 expenses a day, and a bonus.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What is the bonus for?

Mr. KUHL. Well, probably if it is a good job, a very good paying job, why there would be a bonus connected with it. Williams received $25 a day and a bonus. That bonus was a verbal bonus, and went something like this: For all of the time he laid off the drink or the booze why he would receive a bonus. Myself and the rest of these fellows I mentioned, we received $20 a day. Naturally, we make more money on these jobs, you know, when these men are housed up in these barns, and take particularly a street-car job where there is a lot of money transacted, why these finks, they keep all the money, you know, that they take in on the cars. And they do a lot of gambling. These lieutenants of the barn take care of the games, and that is their cut. And they cut pretty heavy.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What do you think some of them made on that job?

Mr. KUHL. Well, I don't know. The word come out that Williams had himself $15,000 or $18,000. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Were you on the Republic Rubber job?

---

* A street-car strike against the New Orleans Public Service.

Mr. KUHL. Yes; I helped hook a man on that job. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Where did you get the names of the prospects that might be hooked?

Mr. KUHL. Why, the manager there, the man that bought this service.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. The personnel manager or the manager of the company?

Mr. KUHL. I would say the manager of the company.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. He gave you a list of men he thought you might hook?

Mr. KUHL. He gave the National Corporation Service salesman a list of the men he wanted hooked.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What type of men were they?

Mr. KUHL. Radical men; union men.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Did you hook one of them?

Mr. KUHL. Yes. There was one of them hooked. I am pretty sure this fellow Cameron, or Campbell, or some name like that, he was hooked.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Were you on the Johnson Bronze Company job at Newcastle?

MR. KUHL. Yes, sir.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Do you know who sold that job?

Mr. KUHL. I think the first service that was sold to the Johnson Bronze that Harry R. Hill sold it. And that was inside stool-pigeon service that went on for a year or a year and a half before a strike occurred there.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Do you know who did most of the hooking on that job?

Mr. KUHL. Well, I done some. Bill Gray done some. That is that W. H. Gray. And there were a number of street men that worked on that job, and they naturally wouldn't have to be hooked.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What was the situation among the employees of that company, if you remember?

Mr. KUHL. Well, they were poorly paid. . . . There was quite a few girls and women working in there, and they received 10 cents an hour. I heard that even the telephone operator received 10 cents an hour. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. And who was in charge of the strike-breakers and the street operators?

Mr. KUHL. Well, John McCabe was in charge. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Do you remember how many were used there?

Mr. KUHL. Oh, about a hundred.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Was any gas used on that job?

Mr. KUHL. Yes, sir.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. How did you get it?

Mr. KUHL. Why, the Johnson Bronze bought that gas direct from the Lake Erie Chemical Company. The National Corporation Service wouldn't let their name enter in that they would buy gas.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Was there much trouble?

Mr. KUHL. Yes, sir. There wasn't anybody killed, but there was considerable beat up, and they finally run all the strike-breakers out of town.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Did the street operators help to cause the trouble?

Mr. KUHL. Well, I don't know whether this is the truth or not, but G. W. Fiske, one of the street operators, told me when he seen this riot, or all these bricks and gas flying around, he said, "I was trying to hit you with a brick," and says, "I don't know whether I got you, but I probably got somebody else in there." He was right out there in the pickets throwing them bricks.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Is that customary, for one operator to heave a brick at another?

Mr. KUHL. Well, he told that. I don't know whether it is a fact or not. But the chances are if he got a chance he would throw a brick at me.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Was there any work done there to form a company union?

Mr. KUHL. Yes, sir. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. How did that work out?

Mr. KUHL. Well, from both inside and outside. These inside operators would talk and talk against the union, the American Federation of Labor, and use a point similar to this, "Well, why pay dues to a lot of organizers, presidents, secretaries, one thing and another?" And another, "For instance, if we give a dollar here in our particular local only a quarter stays here, and so much goes down to Columbus at the state headquarters, and the rest goes to Washington. So out of an actual dollar we put in the American Federation of Labor union, why we only keep that quarter here. Now, if we keep a company union we don't pay any dues, and we save those dues, which will amount to $2 or $3 a month." . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Did you have anything to do with the Akron rubber accounts, at Akron, Ohio?

Mr. KUHL. Yes, sir.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Tell us about that.

Mr. KUHL. There were three companies that the National Corporation Service had business with. On the Goodrich I paid those "ops" over there, and contacted McLaughlin, Cassell, Bailey, and one or two others I can't recall. I also was arrested in Akron.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What were you arrested for?

Mr. KUHL. Causing a disturbance, trying to break up a union meeting.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Where did that happen?

Mr. KUHL. At one of the public schools.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Just describe that for us, how you operated, how you went about it, and what happened.

Mr. KUHL. MacGuffin got me to carry there a supposed bunch of gorillas.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What are gorillas?

Mr. KUHL. I don't know, you read the newspapers, that is where I got the word—these strong-arm men.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Are they the same as finks?

Mr. KUHL. Yes. They wanted this union meeting busted and there was a party that Bill Gray had in tow by the name of Felix Catlin, quite a soap-box orator. He was supposed to get in there and make a speech. I went over the first Sunday, and Felix failed to connect, and didn't make any speech. I came back to the office and was reprimanded by Mr. MacGuffin that the job didn't go through, so the next Sunday we went back again and practically the same thing happened.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. With the same plans laid?

Mr. KUHL. With the same plans, and this Felix, he fell through again.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Did you talk to Felix to find out why he didn't make these speeches?

Mr. KUHL. I am not supposed to talk to him, I am supposed to be on the opposite side of the fence when Felix goes in to make his speech. It didn't happen, and I thought, well, I will go back to Youngstown again, and I will hear about this, so I thought I would start a little commotion in there.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What did you do?

Mr. KUHL. Destroyed a little property, broke some chairs and windows.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. All by yourself?

Mr. KUHL. There was another fellow with me by the name of J. P. South. We were caught and brought down to the police station. We didn't say very much, naturally; the unions wanted us to, but we kept our mouths shut, and MacGuffin's attorney came over and got us out. . . .

Senator LA FOLLETTE. What do you recall about the Lake Erie Power and Light job at Bellevue, Ohio?

Mr. KUHL. That was against a municipal power plant that the mayor and probably two or three councilmen were in favor of putting in this power plant. This would be financed by one of the government agencies, I don't know what it was, the FRA or one of them that finances, and naturally this Lake Erie Power Company was opposed to it. A fellow named Fiske and myself went up there and opened this job. Our cover was that we told about the bad water, and that in fact they needed a new water plant more than they needed a light plant, but we convinced them, that is, this management of the power company, that two of us wasn't enough, and we built the job up to about six.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Was the water really bad there?

Mr. KUHL. Yes; the water was bad, it was a good talking point. Three or four of us were arrested in that town, too.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. How did that happen?

Mr. KUHL. Well, these city councilmen or mayor became suspicious of us, and one of these fellows, by the name of Earl Smith, he happened to look like some fugitive from the law from Detroit that the authorities were looking for, and they picked him up on suspicion and held him there, and then went around and found the rest of us, and they thought probably we might be all broke out of jail.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Was he really wanted, or was it a case of mistaken identity?

Mr. KUHL. It was a case of mistaken identity.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Why did you leave the work in 1935 for the Corporation Service?

Mr. KUHL. I was fed up with it; I didn't want any more.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Why was that?

Mr. KUHL. I can't explain just the way I would like to explain, but I thought the work was pretty dirty, and I thought I would get out of it.

Haven at Hankow

BY CRISPIAN CORCORAN

Hankow, December 1

NANKING has come to Hankow. Old residents, used to nodding to every foreigner met along the street, glance bewildered at the flood of new faces. Evacués from Nanking, on the other hand, recognize in the crowd moving snakelike along the river front the continuation of the evacuation parade along Chungshan Road, chief artery of the capital—with the difference that here the crowd is on foot. In Nanking the procession was made up of thousands of passenger cars, light trucks, and heavy Diesel buses. Hankow moves on foot or in rickshas, sometimes in old-fashioned victorias drawn by shaggy, half-starved Mongolian ponies.

I came to Hankow with the rest of Nanking, and with the rest of Nanking spent my first day here seeking a place to stay; room is rare and precious now in this city which has become the vortex of a swelling flood of refugees—from Shanghai, from Nanking, from the lost north. Like many others, I found a place only through submitting to robbery—the charge was $15 a day for accommodations normally costing $3. The room, moreover, was not entirely my own; in the other bed was a White Russian general turned instructor in Chiang Kai-shek's Central Military Academy. The general was fat, erudite, and beamingly pessimistic. He cheerfully pointed out "fatal errors" by the Chinese high command and expressed his belief that the regular forces of the country were being wiped out and his disbelief in the possibility or efficacy of popular resistance in the form of widespread guerrilla warfare. It was too bad, he burbled.

Downstairs, at lunch, I found myself at a table with two French fliers who after fighting Franco for nine months in Spain had come to China as part of a group organized by an American bombing expert to fight Japan —for a consideration. They were full of news, but weren't telling any to a newspaperman, only discussing it among themselves in French. The gist of it was that foreign pilots were already flying with the Chinese army; some had been shot down, and among the dead were four Americans. The chief talk of the town is of the Soviet planes, their superlative speed and general excellence. China's official Central News Agency has reported that seven Japanese naval units composing part of the fleet attempting to force the boom at Kiangyin were bombed and sunk by planes of the new Chinese air force, which is composed not only of Soviet planes but also of imported French and German machines and Curtiss-Hawk models manufactured in China, except for the engines, by American concessionaires. Nobody seems surprised or particularly skeptical. Planes buzz over the city constantly. They are new—and good.

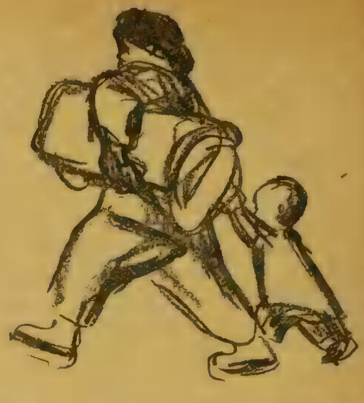
In the afternoon, a walk through the chief streets of the city. On every hoarding are fresh wall newspapers and cartoons. They are signed by various National Salvation groups composed of workers, students, intellectuals. The bookstores are full of new publications. Predominant are the works of National Salvation leaders—notably of the seven who were arrested early this year and released after the outbreak of hostilities. One paper can be recognized as the organ of China's battle-hardened Communist Party—its name a slogan, People's Front. One is the Hankow edition of an extremely successful venture started in Shanghai, a resistance newspaper made up entirely of cartoons. The War News Pictorial is devoted to photographs taken at the various fronts.

In dilapidated Chungshan Park, crowded Hankow's only pleasance, a fête was being held in honor of five thousand members of the citizens' military training corps who had completed their three months' course. The citizen soldiers, surrounded by a huge mass of townspeople, wounded soldiers, and tough-looking Kwangsi warriors on their way to the front, watched a popular play performed on an open-air dais. The play was "Throw Down Your Whip!" foretelling the end of oppression. The star was a famous Shanghai actress, Lily Li. Afterward the citizen soldiers went through smart military evolutions, marched up one of the arterial roads, were dismissed, instantly dropped their martial bearing, and ran to their friends in the crowd, proud and smiling.

Nanking was a collection of handsome administrative buildings scattered about as if at random, with wide spaces between them. The people tilled their fields calmly in the interstices of the city, walked humbly along the unpaved sides of gleaming asphalt thoroughfares, did not count for much. But Hankow is a city of the people, so brimful that officials who have spent their lives writing things on little bits of paper in spacious rooms now are unable to write because of the mass of humanity jiggling their elbows, and sit bewildered in all sorts of holes and corners serving as bedrooms, storerooms, file-rooms, and offices. In Nanking they looked at the crowd from Olympian heights; here they are dwarfed by the massed humanity, a mass which is becoming increasingly conscious of its own strength.



Six months ago Liu Liang-mo, moving spirit of China's patriotic singing movement, told me of the readiness with which the great commonalty learned words and music and assimilated the lessons of songs of resistance —and told me of Japanese pressure and official efforts to hush the full-throated chants of the people. Today the "March of the Northeastern Volunteers" with its thundering Cheelai (Arise!) is on the lips of everyone. Wherever you go on the streets of Hankow, someone is humming it. Soldiers, townspeople, children, all sing it. You hear it in trains, on the lips of sailors on Yangtze steamers. Wherever men march in groups it keeps time with their swinging stride.

There are two mass movements here. One is officially inspired, dignified, fairly well supplied with money. The other is just beginning to stir and be articulate; it is given no encouragement because the fear of "radicalism" still pervades official ranks. But the air is charged with it as it is charged with the song of the Volunteers, whose ringing appeal Tungpei Tungpao (Brothers of the Northeast) has now been altered to Chuan Kuo Tungpao (Brothers throughout the country), Cheelai! Arise!

Drawings by John Groth

Uncle Sam, Privileged Boss

BY STERLING D. SPERO AND SAMUEL PAUL PUNER

THE recent decision of the C. I. O. to establish a union of federal workers has again brought the question of the government's relation to its more than 800,000 civil employees into the public forum. President Roosevelt used the occasion to say:

> Organizations of government employees have a logical place in government affairs. The desire of government employees for fair and adequate pay, reasonable hours of work, safe and suitable working conditions, development of opportunities for advancement, facilities for fair and impartial consideration and review of grievances, and other objectives of a proper employee-relation policy is basically no different from that of employees in private industry.

Then, true to the traditional practice of the government employer of hedging every recognition of its employees' rights with partially nullifying restrictions, the President continued:

> All government employees should realize that the process of collective bargaining, as usually understood, cannot be transplanted into the public service. . . . The very nature and purposes of government make it impossible for administrative officials to represent fully or to bind the employer in mutual discussions with government-employee organizations. . . . Particularly, I want to emphasize my conviction that militant tactics have no place in the functions of any organization of government employees. . . . Since their own services have to do with the functioning of the government, a strike of public employees manifests nothing less than an intent on their part to prevent or obstruct the operations of government until their demands are satisfied. Such action, looking toward the paralysis of government by those who have sworn to support it, is unthinkable and intolerable.

This is merely a restatement of the government's long-established labor policy. Every guaranty of freedom of action which federal workers have in law or public regulation is accompanied directly or inferentially by some restriction limiting its full exercise. Thus an act of Congress permits them to join a labor organization but, if they are postal workers, not one "affiliated with any outside organization imposing an obligation or duty . . . to engage in any strike . . . against the United States." The Civil Service rules recognize their right "to vote as they please," but declare that they must "take no active part in political management or in political campaigns." The law says that they may "individually or collectively . . . petition Congress," but the President says that "militant tactics have no place in the functions" of any of their organizations.

On what does the government base its claim that it is entitled to special privileges as an employer? It bases this claim, first, upon the necessities of sovereignty, second, upon the exceptional social importance of the functions which it performs, and third, upon the impartial or neutral character of the public services. These assumptions have long been accepted as political axioms, but closer examination reveals that the government employer is receiving special consideration hardly warranted by the facts of the situation. The functions of government employees, disregarding for the moment the distinction between federal and local, fall roughly into four categories: administrative, industrial, service, and law enforcement. For the most part, these activities parallel, compete with, or supplement non-governmental activities. The administrative functions are similar to those which any large business concern or institution must carry on in order to operate at all, and include clerical work, auditing, correspondence, and the like. Certainly there is nothing in the character of these services to justify the government's claim for special consideration as an employer. The industrial functions include the operation of plants for the manufacture or repair of supplies and equipment, and they supplement or compete with private industry. It would be difficult, indeed, to maintain that the manufacture of armament in government arsenals or ships in government navy yards is more greatly affected with the public interest than the manufacture of these in private plants. The service functions—the conduct of utilities, education, welfare institutions, and so on—are likewise paralleled by the work of private organizations.

Nor do the law-enforcement functions of the state present a problem different from the rest. The fact that they are peculiarly the functions of public authority endows them with no sacrosanct characteristics which entitle them to special consideration. Like all other social functions they must be judged and tested by their social validity. Furthermore, the processes by which law-enforcement functions operate, like other social processes, are dependent upon the smooth running of the whole social machine. New York or Chicago could not be policed at night if employees of private industry did not keep the lights on. The law could not be enforced and public order could not be maintained in modern society if the privately owned communication and transportation systems did not continue to operate. The continuity of governmental functions depends upon society as a whole, not exclusively upon the government's law-enforcement employees. If the governmental agency can insist upon special privileges here which would restrict the civil rights of its employees, including the right to strike, its claim can logically be extended to all employees in socially vital industries. The definition of a socially vital industry can obviously be almost indefinitely extended until the working class has been stripped of its defenses.

The government's claim to special privileges as an employer does not merely limit employee activity in the larger field of action; through restrictive laws and practices it has also served to deprive the government worker of adequate redress when official superiors have disciplined him for organization activity specifically guaranteed him by law. There has been a surprising number of such cases, not only in past years but during this Administration. One of the most flagrant of these cases is that of Jonathan Levine, who before he was brought up on charges had been employed as a clerk in the New York Post Office for eight years, and had achieved an efficiency rating of 98 per cent. The case begins with the dismissal of another clerk, Herman Edelsberg, whose union activities had got him into trouble with the department. Edelsberg was dismissed for a technical violation of the rules, a violation which fourteen of his fellow-clerks, over their signatures, declared was necessary and had therefore been condoned for years by the supervisors in his station. The offense was changing die stamps on the cancelation machines five minutes before instead of on the hour.

At a meeting of the New York Post Office Clerks' Union, Local 10 of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, an A. F. of L. affiliate, a resolution was unanimously adopted by the membership condemning the department's action and setting up a special committee to work for Edelsberg's reinstatement, as well as for the broader objective of legislation providing for the right of appeal, by dismissed workers, to an impartial agency. The members of this committee, which included Jonathan Levine, were all service veterans, having been on the job for twenty-seven, eighteen, thirteen, nine, eight, and seven years respectively. In the midst of the committee's campaign, the department, without any warning, cited each of the members for removal "for composing, aiding, and abetting in the preparation of untruthful statements, thereby reflecting discredit upon the service, and causing the publication in newspapers of said ambiguous, untruthful, and misleading statements tending to bring the service into disrepute." While it has always been the practice of government departments to dispose of removal cases in comparatively short order, these cases hung fire for nine months. Suddenly the removal citations against five of the committeemen were dropped and lighter sentences imposed; Levine alone was dismissed from the service, despite the explicit provision in the Civil Service rules that "in making removals or reductions, and in other punishment, like penalties shall be imposed for like offenses."

The Levine case, in its disregard of established employee rights, is by no means unique. The sanctimonious formulas of "bringing the service into disrepute," "conduct unbecoming a government employee," "for the good of the service" have been used many times to give the record the appearance of truth and to avoid bringing particularly flagrant cases before the public. The law places no effective restrictions on the power of governmental executives to discharge their employees, and such discharges, with minor exceptions, cannot be reviewed by the Civil Service Commission, the courts, or such agencies as the National Labor Relations Board.

Dismissals for union activity have not been confined to old-line departments like the Post Office but have taken place in New Deal agencies as well. The cases of William Sumpf and Bernard Schultz, who were dismissed from the Baltimore office of the Social Security Board, were referred to an arbitrator as a result of pressure by the C. I. O. union, the United Federal Workers of America. Hearings on the case began on August 11, 1937. A decision recommending the reinstatement of the employees was rendered on October 26. But since this arbitration was extra-legal, the two employees improperly removed suffered loss of pay for the time they were out of the service. And even after the arbitrator's decision, it appeared for a time that one of the employees, Schultz, might not go back to his job. His reemployment medical examination disclosed diabetes, though several very recent examinations, both governmental and private, had not discovered it. Whether or not this examination report was correct is actually less significant than the fact that many government workers were ready to believe it a subterfuge to evade a decision against a department. These workers know that governmental agencies are not above resorting to devices which the government condemns or actually forbids by law in private industry.

A case in point is the disclosure of incipient company unionism in the Department of Agriculture. Last July the personnel director of this department issued a "Memorandum for Employees in Washington" announcing the establishment of an Employee Activities Council, "to consist of a board of five members . . ., three to be selected by the officers of the Welfare Association, and two from all other employee organizations which care to participate." One of the "duties of the council" is to "contact the Director of Personnel on matters of general policy in order that the employee activities . . . may conform to the standards desired by the department."

Another variant of company unionism, a sort of limited "employee-representation plan," was recently launched in, of all places, the Department of Labor. Back in 1933 Secretary Perkins set up a Conciliation Committee to handle grievances in the department, but the Committee functioned so rarely that it had been all but forgotten. Then suddenly, after three requests for conferences with the United Federal Workers had come to her desk, the Secretary ordered that whenever an employee felt that he had a grievance which had not received proper consideration, the matter should be referred to the Conciliation Committee. Reference was thus made compulsory to a committee consisting of six supervisors, including the Secretary's assistant acting as chairman, and six employee members appointed by the Secretary, responsible solely to her, and required to keep the proceedings confidential. True, the Secretary appointed nominees of the unions—the National Federation of Federal Employees (formerly A. F. of L. and now independent), the American Federation of Government Employees (A. F. of L.), and the United Federal Workers of America (C. I. O.). This, however, only made matters worse by giving an illusion of union representation not justified by the facts, since the Secretary was free to reject these nominees, who actually were her representatives, not the employees', and were not permitted to report to their unions.

The United Federal Workers protested against being compelled to submit to the judgment of six officials and four rival union members, and to lend its sanction to the plan by participating as a hopeless minority. When the newspapers printed the report that the C. I. O. union would carry its demand to represent its members in direct negotiation with responsible departmental officials directly to the President, the Secretary of Labor yielded.

These events should make it clear that statements of enlightened personnel policy or broad legal guaranties of civil rights to government workers are not sufficient to prevent governmental employers from pursuing policies forbidden to employers in private industry. Unless machinery is devised to curb the power of public authorities to interfere with the free organization of their employees through their practically unlimited power to discipline, the law's guaranties will continue to mean but little.

Los Angeles Grows Up

BY OLIVER CARLSON

Los Angeles, December 20

"UNUSUAL," "amazing," "unique," those words so commonly associated with a description of Southern California's climate, have this year been used by awe-struck Angelenos to describe the sudden metamorphosis of Los Angeles from an open-shop paradise into a seething center of labor unrest. That this year-round health resort and realtors' paradise should become a great industrial metropolis was inevitable, given its favorable geographical location, low taxes, cheap power rates, modern harbor, and abundant supply of labor, recruited in part from movie-struck youngsters and semi-retired Middle Westerners. But the amazing growth of unionism and the imminent arrival of the closed shop in every major industry are still incomprehensible to many of the inhabitants.

Los Angeles leads the nation in airplane manufacture, oil refining, and motion-picture production. It ranks next to Detroit in automobile assembly, next to Akron in the manufacture of tires, and is number three in furniture. In the manufacture of wearing apparel, in printing and publishing, meat packing, and machine shops it is well up among the leaders. Only yesterday all these industries were completely open shop. Mere skeleton organizations existed among the building trades, teamsters, clothing workers, machinists, retail clerks, musicians, and screen actors. Printers and longshoremen were not much better off. Strikes were a rarity. The Labor Temple, shabby and forlorn, was inhabited by a handful of organizers, low in spirit and lower in funds. The leading business men had banded together as early as 1890 under the leadership of General Harrison Grey Otis, publisher of the Los Angeles Times, to fight the inroads of unionism. When the McNamara brothers confessed to the dynamiting of the Times building in 1910, a body blow was delivered to the local unions. Labor was to remain impotent for nearly a quarter of a century.

The inauguration of the NRA did a little to arouse the giant from his apathy. A come-back was staged at that time by the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union and, to a lesser degree, by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. Federal requirements for union labor on PWA projects proved a godsend to the building-trades organizers. The successful strike of the San Francisco longshoremen in 1934 brought a campaign of organization in San Pedro. Labor's forces were also strengthened by the "Production for Use" slogan of Sinclair's EPIC movement, which awakened thousands to the power of organization. And the depression wrenched the dominant middle class from its narrow sheltered groove, threw thousands of its members into a precarious economic state, and made them particularly receptive to labor's point of view. Later the establishment of the National Labor Relations Board and the fearless and aggressive manner in which it functioned here under its regional director, Dr. Towne Nylander, did much to stiffen the backbones of employees long used to threats and discrimination, while news of the successes achieved by labor in the Midwest and East inflamed their spirits.

Labor began to stir on so many fronts that organizers were at a premium. Unions advertised in the daily papers for them. Boys and girls fresh from college, ex-organizers for the many political reform movements that had swept over Southern California, workers direct from bench and lathe rushed to the leadership of organized labor. Desire for organization blossomed in groups hitherto looked upon as hopeless—teachers, lawyers, doctors, technicians, social workers, screen actors, screen writers, newspapermen, even movie directors. The lowly Mexican laborer earning five dollars a week became a union "brother" of the famous screen hero.

The threatened destruction of the cherished open-shop tradition was immediately combated by the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association. Spearhead of the militant "open-shoppers" since 1897, this organization uses intimidation, propaganda, and violence, and serves as both board of strategy and financial fountain-head in the fight to keep "labor racketeers" out of Los Angeles. Its membership is kept secret, but that it embraces a large percentage of the heads and personnel managers of every important factory, merchandising organization, and farm association in Los Angeles and environs is well known. The association's offensive at first caused many of the old-time union organizers to beat a retreat. But the leadership was soon seized by younger spirits from the Middle West and East, who took advantage of the friendly attitude of the federal Administration to lay the groundwork for new unions.

Two years ago Los Angeles had less than 20,000 unionists. Today there are about 125,000 almost evenly divided between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O.—although the former alone claims 100,000. The Labor Temple is a beehive of activity with business agents and organizers everywhere. No fewer than 191 local unions are affiliated with the Central Labor Council of the A. F. of L., and 30,000 union members marched in the Labor Day parade. The Los Angeles Citizen, official organ of the A. F. of L., once a feeble four-page sheet, has quadrupled in size and circulation. Its columns are filled with advertisements and greetings from business houses. Local politicians have become labor's "dearest friends."

The impetus given to mass organization of labor by the formation of the C. I. O. seems to be more obvious in Los Angeles than elsewhere. During the past year powerful C. I. O. unions have been set up in more than twenty industries, with a membership which today amounts to more than 50,000. The largest of these is the Automobile and Aircraft Workers' Union, with from 13,000 to 15,000 members. It embraces a majority of the men in the General Motors, Chrysler, Ford, and Willys plants and has strong representation among the Northrop, North American, and Douglas Aircraft companies. Ten thousand steel workers of Southern California, fully 50 per cent of all steel and steel-fabricating workers in the region, are also in the C. I. O. And what is important, the men already organized are in the large plants of United States Steel, Bethlehem Steel, the American and Continental Can companies, and other key corporations. The Rubber Workers' Union has enrolled nearly 4,000 members in the great plants of Goodyear, Goodrich, and United States Rubber. The Oil Workers' Union has more than 5,000 members, and in the face of relentless opposition is winning its way against the giant corporations, Standard Oil and Shell. The Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers' Union already has from 8,000 to 10,000 members. The longshoremen, about 3,600 strong at the port, have added approximately 3,000 new members from the warehousemen. Between 3,000 and 5,000 agricultural workers and more than 1,000 dairymen are now enrolled under the banner of the C. I. O. In addition organizations have been set up in the electrical and radio industry, among the shipyard workers, office workers, government employees, laundry workers, newsboys, and communications workers; and thousands of persons in the motion-picture, meat-packing, and furniture industries are openly sympathetic with the C. I. O. and await the opportunity to join.

These figures make the picture seem a rosy one, but in reality the C. I. O. is in a critical situation. It must subdue the open-shop interests now organized for militant self-defense. It must fight the company unions which have been set up to prevent its inroads. It must carry on the battle with the Old Guard of the A. F. of L., who are leaving no stone unturned in their effort to wipe out this lusty competitor. And last but by no means least, it is torn by bitter internal struggle for control between Communist and anti-Communist groups.

Here as elsewhere Communists have been active in the C. I. O. almost from its inception. Though a decided minority, they have managed by bloc action and clever maneuvering to obtain an influence in the local Industrial Council and in some of the unions out of proportion to their numerical strength. And they have used their influence to push forward their party, its program, its fringe organizations, and its publications.

The red scare is being whipped up all through California but particularly in Los Angeles, and it has already weakened many C. I. O. groups. The whole officialdom of the A. F. of L. has joined in the hue and cry. At the state convention a veritable witch-hunting campaign was launched against what State Secretary Edward D. Vandeleur described as "the C. I. O.–Moscow combine." A resolution proposing the appointment of a commission by President Roosevelt to bring peace between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. was voted down on the ground that "under the guise of 'unity' it would give aid and comfort to the Communist-controlled, secessionist, would-be union-breaking, so-called C. I. O." The appointment of Harry Bridges as C. I. O. director for the West Coast did not help this situation, since, able as he is, the red label has been firmly attached to him.

With a labor movement still in its swaddling clothes, Los Angeles has become the scene of the most violent conflict in the whole country between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. The arguments used have been court injunctions, blackjacks, crowbars, and six-shooters. Four months ago Dave Beck's mop-up boys descended upon Los Angeles to remove the menace of the C. I. O. for all time. William Green's white-haired boy was hailed with joy even by bitterly open-shop industrialists. But while they were willing to give his men aid and encouragement in fighting the C. I. O. unions, they were not prepared to let Beck run them. This he tried to do, and in their anger the open-shoppers have almost forgotten the red menace. In tens of thousands of working men and women this fratricidal struggle has aroused a growing skepticism of the value of unions controlled by either organization, and masses are enrolling under the banner of "independent" unions which to all intents and purposes are company controlled. The big push of the legitimate unions is over for the time being.

The scent of orange blossoms is still in the air. Stately palms still line Los Angeles streets and boulevards. Trim little stucco bungalows, set amid shrubs and flowers, make a picture of peace and contentment. These are but surface appearances. Beneath is a gigantic commercial-industrial set-up; new economic and political forces are surging. Los Angeles has grown up!

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE news that President Roosevelt is going to ask Congress for more money for the navy, somewhere between $560,000,000 and a billion, in addition to the regular appropriations for army and navy, which have now risen to the astounding total of $1,250,000,000 a year, is disheartening but not surprising. I was so sure that he would plunge us into militarism and navalism if elected that I refused to vote for him in 1932 and 1936. I have no doubt that Congress will grant the money and that the business world will approve of it despite all the howls about balancing the budget. We are in a state of hysteria because of the Japanese developments, and most people say that they are for any amount of armament if that will only keep us out of war. But as Calvin Coolidge said to the American Legion, no amount of armaments ever kept any country out of war; Stanley Baldwin, now Earl Baldwin, said a few years later that if Europe rearmed it would not mean peace but war.

The new Roosevelt program is being represented to the country in the newspaper dispatches as "rearmament." That is, of course, an absolute falsehood. We have never been armed as this program now proposes to arm us. Next it is represented as a good thing because it will put a lot of men to work building battleships and cruisers, and so prime the pump once more for the heavy industries. That is also dubious. The chief beneficiaries of battleship and cruiser building will be the six shipyards that have a monopoly, whose bids on the last two battleships advertised were so high that the government decided to build them in two of its own yards. When done, the battleships will represent pure economic waste. At best their life will be twenty years; there are plenty of army and navy officers who believe, as did the late General William Mitchell, that the day of the battleship was over long ago. As for priming the pump, even the New York Times has found it necessary to warn the country that rearmament programs abroad and in this country are not helping recovery but injuring and delaying it. Rearmament creates an entirely fictitious prosperity. England is now spending $7,500,000,000 for rearmament over five years. Hundreds of factories are expanding their plants, taking on workers, operating day and night. When that money is spent, there will be unemployed workers and idle factories unless the demand which will then go up for manufacturers to continue rearmament so that employment and profits may keep up becomes controlling, and a need for still more battleships, airplanes, tanks, heavy artillery, and all the other paraphernalia of modern war is suddenly discovered.

It is a dance of death—economic death—even if war does not come. Here my star witness is again Stanley Baldwin, who said three years before he began rearming England that if the rearmament race were undertaken in Europe, several nations would go into bankruptcy. Yet he swallowed his words, and wound up his career by fastening this terrific program upon England. These are totally unproductive expenditures. They create no great public works, like the TVA or the magnificent bridges that we are getting all over the country, thanks to government funds. A single invention may make utterly useless and antiquated a large portion of the armaments created. But we are told that it is a necessary insurance and that we must no more cavil at the size of the premium than would a business man who insures his plant and inventory. Yet the simple fact is that these rearmament programs make nowhere for lasting prosperity, but bring grave evils in their train.

The most criminal part of the Roosevelt program is the fact that it is not being thought through. The President insists that we are arming only for defense, but asks for offensive battleships, and he cannot deny that there is no comprehensive plan for a defense of the coasts of the United States that anybody has ever heard of. Generals like Smedley Butler and Johnson Hagood have pointed this out repeatedly, but nothing happens. We just pour money out with no plan, no established government policy. We have never settled what we are going to defend or where we are going to defend it; nor have we coordinated army and navy. We even have four government air forces uncoordinated and buying airplanes separately. No business man would dream of embarking on so vast a program without having the objectives and aims carefully worked out by experts; he would go bankrupt if he did. The President, however, gives no sign that he realizes the ramifications of what he is now doing. More battleships and cruisers mean more officers and more men, who become a permanent charge if only because they constantly increase the retired lists—more privileged persons entitled to government support until they die. They mean more shipbuilders and armament manufacturers who feel that the government is committed to support them to the end of time. Those companies which are monopolies, like the one which builds parachutes, have every reason to rejoice, but not the taxpayers, or those who feel that in the long run we must balance the budget, a decent budget which shall take care adequately, as we never yet have done, of the humanitarian needs of the country. To say that we need to arm more against the Japanese is ridiculous, as I pointed out last week on the authority of no less a person than Franklin D. Roosevelt himself. We cannot war upon them with fleets, nor they upon us.

BOOKS and the ARTS

CAPITALISM AS MAGIC

BY MAX LERNER

WE are a perverse lot. Thurman Arnold has written a witty, learned book,* full of principles and examples, to prove for all time that learned books full of principles and examples are feckless and insubstantial things — mere symbols to mediate between our lingering illusions and the advancing world of reality. And having been told that learning and theorizing are so much eyewash, we flock in hordes to buy and devour this particular offering.

This is Mr. Arnold's second book, his first, "The Symbols of Government" (published last year), having had little more than a succès d'estime. He pursues pretty much the same theme in both books, for Mr. Arnold is a tenacious sort of fellow, who has got hold of some ideas that are good things; and with these ideas he has been poking about, like a photographer with a good camera and a remarkably fresh eye, in all sorts of corners and emerging with pictures of men, their minds, and their society that have been shot from startling angles.

It is rather characteristic of the book that one's first impulse is not to tell what it says, but to give examples. The book is molecular. It mounts up by aggregation, like Burton's "Thousand and One Nights," rather than by systematic exposition, like John Stuart Mill's "Principles of Logic." The beautiful thing about it is that the author has violated every rule on how to write a treatise—which may account for his brilliant achievement. I nominate him for whatever prize, from the Pulitzer up, is awarded to the man who best succeeds in being the enfant terrible of his craft and in standing our world on its head.

The total effect is joyous. To give a connected account of the theme of the book would be, therefore, like giving a solemn report on a gay and buoyant Mardi Gras one has just come away from. It is not so much what happened that counts as the general spirit of the thing. Everyone was dressed in costume, and there was a lot of snatching off of false faces, and Dorothy Thompson and Westbrook Pegler and Walter Lippmann looked rather sheepish when theirs were torn off, but no one could feel upset about it because eventually it happened to everyone. The place was a veritable shambles before you got through, with punctured windbags going off everywhere and shirt-stuffing lying about inches thick.

But there is far more in the book than wit and paradox and iconoclasm. There is a heroic attempt to see our economic system and our ideas about it in anthropological terms. Mr. Arnold adopts what Kroeber has called the "anthropological attitude" toward our own culture. He watches us much as an ethnologist might watch a ceremonial dance among the Hopi Indians, with the same detachment and lively curiosity. His basic thesis is that the "society" we live in is actually a whole set of smaller social organizations within larger social organizations, like boxes within boxes—family, club, church, business firm, university, government; that these organizations have in common certain creeds, rituals, and mythology; that the so-called "sound thinking" of law and economics and political theory is in itself so much folklore, used in order to give the members of the tribe a sense of tribal unity; that in expounding this folklore the high priests of scholarship and opinion in university and editorial room start with pictures of the world, already formed in their heads, which obscure their vision of the things they are trying to describe; that the result is that corporations are treated like glorified persons, the economic system as if it were an assemblage of hucksters instead of an army of industrial organization, government as if it were the malignant monster which tribal tradition says will eventually destroy the tribe; that the real function of the folklore of capitalism is not realistic accuracy, but consolation both to the thinker and the mass, and the shutting out of the unpleasant things that the encroaching world of reality is always trying to force on our consciousness; that our thinkers—radical, liberal, and conservative alike—are so obsessed with the ceremonial of logical consistency that they would rather be ineffective than follow the wrong ceremonial; that the best platform for an observer of government and society is to see the whole thing as a dramatic spectacle with a religious theme—a sort of miracle play, with opposing devils, angels, and gods; but that the art of political dynamics is secular and not theological, that it must deal not with logical systems and eternal verities but with functioning social organizations which yield to the skilled compromiser far more than to the scholar or the martyr.

As I reread this summary I know that I have not done the book justice. I shall attempt a very different sort of summary on another occasion, for Arnold's mind is so supple, so full of all sorts of marginal meanings, that you cannot make your full reckoning with it at once. He has been given some pretty lavish praise in the reviews, Fred Rodell comparing him with Karl Marx—to Marx's disadvantage; Alfred Bingham saying that the book will rank with Darwin's "Origin of Species" in the history of human thought; Stuart Chase seeing him as the new Machiavelli of our age; and Ralph Thompson calling the book the most penetrating political study in America since Thorstein Veblen's "Theory of the Leisure Class" in 1899. I think I see what they are driving at, but those are large orders. Mr. Arnold does not pretend to be, like Machiavelli, Marx, and Veblen, a system-builder, an articulator of a new world consciousness. But his book is one of the most hopeful signs I have seen in some years of the vitality of American social thought.

---

The Folklore of Capitalism.* By Thurman W. Arnold. Yale University Press. $3.

That vitality has stemmed from the very thing that Mr. Arnold says the universities are not doing—the transcending of the boundaries between social disciplines. In fact Veblen's importance, forty years ago, was that he broke down the fences between economics, politics, anthropology, psychology, and law. Arnold himself is, as the reviewers say, "a phenomenon"—a Wyoming lawyer, formerly Mayor of Laramie, Dean of West Virginia Law School, now teaching law at Yale, a man who has brought some of the Wyoming horse sense into the pomposities of the academic disciplines. But that "phenomenon" cannot be understood unless we remember that Mr. Arnold is part of a whole movement of thought that has been indigenous to America—the "realist" school in law, the "institutionalist" school in economics and social theory, the "psychological" school in politics. What he has done has been to set down the insights of those schools, along with his own wit and sense of paradox, in the most sustained study of existing ways of thought that we have had in the post-depression years, of whose disillusionments it is to some extent a product.

Its weaknesses, like its strength, flow from the weaknesses of the institutionalist, realist, psychological schools. It is basically anti-rational, anti-intellectual, atomistic; it takes what is at best a metaphor—that society is a drama or a battle—and extends it until it becomes the basic method of analysis; it fails to see that the enormous strides that men have made since their beginnings have been due to the rational thinking about themselves and their world which is science, technology, social science; it concentrates on the words and ideas that we use, while in the tensions of our day we have a more dire need of understanding the economic realities. Nowhere does Mr. Arnold differentiate between the levels of symbolism—between the symbols that are mere abbreviations and those that are powerfully evocative ways of thought hard to displace. Nowhere does he distinguish between the over-rational symbols of law and economics and the too little rational symbols of popular opinion. Nowhere does he set the folklore that challenges the status quo against the folklore that hems it in and defends it—both systems of folklore, but how different in their class base, how vastly different in the resources of social power that are brought to their support! And nowhere, finally, does he make us understand that the battle of the symbols is not a bloodless battle of categories, and that history will be decided not by symbols alone but by the strength of what they stand for.

I have no objection to brilliant talk about capitalism as magic, and I get a lot of fun out of it. But I want more light on how capitalism works or doesn't work, and how to control it or displace it. The emphasis of the recent stream of books on the tyranny of words and the folklore of ideas is a healthy emphasis. We need to sharpen our tools, but the basic jobs still remain.

Red in the East

RED STAR OVER CHINA. By Edgar Snow. Random House. $3.

TODAY the future of the United States is generally admitted to be bound up with the future of the people on the other side of the Pacific. We have been nationally interested, and occasionally absorbed, in China for many years, but for the first time since the United States became a Pacific power we find that we can no longer afford not to know what China is about, and what the Chinese people really are like. Of course missionaries, school teachers, and the like generally have told us about the Chinese at great length. But what we want at this point is to hear the "inside story" from an unpretentious and representative American. Edgar Snow is such an American and he has given us the inside story.

Snow has not attempted to cover all of China. He has confined himself instead to that small and, until yesterday, nomadic minority—the Soviets. And he has portrayed them in the act of releasing that "discharge of katabolic energy" which, no matter how the present war ends, will never dissipate itself until China finally becomes a nation. This is why Snow had no need to cover non-Soviet China, and it is also the reason why he has written a social drama instead of another political polemic or survey. For decades foreign authorities have dogmatized about the impossibility of ever infusing social and political consciousness into the filth and squalor and indescribable horror that is Chinese peasant life. Snow himself recalls how in 1932 the peasants outside Shanghai continued to till their tiny patches, unperturbed by the fact that a war was raging on every side of them for the future of their country and inevitably of their precious land as well.

Snow's point is simply that the Soviets have changed all this. He shows how, wherever the Soviets have come—and they have covered many thousands of miles—peasant horizons have widened and peasant life has suddenly swept out of its age-old ruts and into the broad stream of Chinese life. To be sure, the red peasants and the Red Army men, or boys, talk in clichés. They attribute their success with the peasants to this or that factor. And if they do, why do they? Here is the answer. "Every youth there seemed to have a personal experience to relate to prove that the 'peasants like us.' I see from my notes that I wrote down seventeen different answers to that question."

In the middle of 1936 Snow learned about the political situation that had developed in northwestern China, in those same provinces which over 2,000 years ago had catapulted the Hans into China's first crusade for nationhood—the achievements of which are still visible in the Great Wall, where China's former red armies are now fighting the invader. The Young Marshal and his expatriated and irreconcilably nationalistic Manchurian troops had achieved an understanding with the Soviets whom they had been commissioned to extirpate. Snow himself was offered the opportunity to go to Sian, the Young Marshal's capital, soon to be Chiang Kai-shek's seat of judgment, and to fly in the Marshal's own airplane into the red districts. He accepted the offer and after some adventure ran the blockade on foot, the first white man to reach the first section in China where landlordism, Confucianism, illiteracy, taxation, and all the rest of it had been swept away. This is not to say that Soviet China was Communist or anything else but primitive. But unquestionably it provided the only base from which the progressive elements in China could operate until the entire nation would again be swept up in the national and democratic revolution which was interrupted in 1927. Snow quotes Mao Tse-tung, the Communist leader, as saying that the present union with the Kuomintang is "a great retreat" from the days when a proletarian dictatorship was the immediate goal. Be this as it may, the world is today agreed that China's outlaws and "bandits" of yesterday are playing a vital role today; and the outcome of this war becomes less significant beside this new and basic fact: China can never again rest until it is not only a united nation, as the Kuomintang doubtless wanted to make it, but a democratic one also, as the Kuomintang did not try to make it. And in this fact alone the Soviets can find more than vindication. This is why Snow's book about Soviet China is really a book about the new China.

Pages on pages of absorbing material tempt the reviewer: here is a brisk and comprehensive, not to say comprehensible, retelling of Chiang Kai-shek's kidnapping; here is an epic narrative of the great Long March; here are excellent and unique photographs. But above all here is a picture of the people who have revolutionized the old China. Take Mao himself first. Compressed into his life have been all the events of modern civilization. Born in 1893, he first saw a newspaper in 1911 and first came into contact with workers in 1920, by which time he had become a well-known revolutionary. And when he became a Communist, what were the three books that made up his mind for him? First the "Communist Manifesto," and then Kautsky's "Class Struggle," and an obscure history of socialism. From such seeds grew the strength of the man who is now opposing a formidably mechanized army in a war upon whose outcome the future of the Western world may well hinge.

Then there is leader P'eng Teh-huai. Listen to him tell what he came from:

> My grandmother regarded us all as her slaves. She was a heavy smoker of opium. I hated the smell of it, and one night, when I could stand it no longer, I kicked a pan of her opium from the stove. She was furious. She called a meeting of the whole clan, and formally demanded my death by drowning because I was an unfilial child.

And General Hsu Hai-tung, who had managed not to think of his family, until Snow got him to talk of them, since the time when the sixty-six relatives who could be traced to him had been executed for his sins. He related this incident that occurred in 1933, after the reds had recaptured a peasant district from the enemy:

> They led us out to a valley and showed us the scattered bodies of seventeen young women lying half-naked in the sun. They had all been raped and killed. The white troops had evidently been in a great hurry; they had taken the time to pull off only one leg of a girl's trousers. That day we called a meeting, the army held a memorial service there, and we all wept.

And there is General Chu Teh, the Hannibal of the 6,000-mile Long March:

> One might have thought he had everything he desired: wealth, power, love, descendants (by the score), poppy dreams, eminent respectability, and a comfortable future in which to preach the proprieties of Confucianism. He had, in fact, only one really bad habit, but it was to prove his downfall. He liked to read books.

And, finally, there is the very dignified Beau Brummel of the Young Vanguards, the snappiest-looking soldier in the town:

> Beside him Mao Tse-tung looked a tramp. But his name happened by some thoughtlessness of his parents to sound very much like chi-pa, and so to his unending mortification he was often called Chi-pa, which simply means "penis." One day he came into my little room in the Foreign Office with his usual quota of dignity, clicked his heels together, and addressed me as "Comrade Snow." He then proceeded to unburden his small heart of certain apprehensions. He had his name carefully scrawled down on a piece of paper, and this he deposited before me. I half expected him to offer me the choice of swords or pistols. But he thanked me, made a grave bow, and once more gave that preposterous salute. "I wanted to be sure," he said, "that when you write about me for the foreign papers you won't make a mistake in my name. It would give a bad impression to the foreign comrades if they thought a red soldier was named "Chi-pa."

With that remark, Snow says, the lad walked right into his book beside the generalissimo, the dignity of history notwithstanding. But this page and every other page in the book will absorb you with its sense of a people's consciousness—every last one of them—of the making and changing of history.

ELIOT JANEWAY

The Ways of Philosophy

FOUR WAYS OF PHILOSOPHY. By Irwin Edman. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

PHILOSOPHY is a discipline in which only the naive expect to find agreement, progress, or demonstrably true conclusions. In this it is more like poetry than science. Every generation is sure to discover some philosophers who protest that the situation is scandalous and attempt to reform the ways of philosophy. The history of philosophy is largely a history of these reforms. Many of these reforms yield insights which become part of a common heritage, but all fall short of their objective. For either their point of view or their method, or both, rests on certain assumptions. And not all assumptions can be proved. A starting-point, an emphasis, a canon of intelligibility, a bias of one sort or another is always taken for granted. But what cannot be proved in a philosophy can at least be understood. Criticism which is not preceded by an understanding of the contexts, occasions, and intent of doctrines is apt to run out into thin exegesis. Any approach to philosophy which fails to illumine the key assumptions and compulsions of philosophers makes the history of philosophy appear as a succession of incredibly fantastic mythologies compounded of pseudo-science, bad logic, and worse rhetoric.

The usual introduction to philosophy fortifies this impression. It expounds and refutes positions without really convincing sober and critical minds that they were ever seriously entertained or, even less, firmly believed. In welcome contrast, Professor Edman's discussion of four perennial ways of philosophic thought is a brilliant interpretative study. Its great merit is the imaginative skill with which it recreates the moods and attitudes whose compulsions make formally invalid arguments and conclusions appear plausible to those who hold them. The performance is all the more noteworthy because Professor Edman does not accept most of the philosophies he seeks to understand. But he presents them in such a way that they appear to be natural articulations of a specific kind of experience and vision. Adherents of the philosophies he does not accept will find it difficult to retort that they have been misunderstood, because he has expounded their central assumptions, as distinct from their detailed argument, more persuasively than most of them have ever succeeded in doing themselves.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRA
Burlingame,

The four ways of philosophy considered are philosophy as logical faith, as social criticism, as mystic insight, and as nature understood. The author does not claim that they exhaust the possible philosophies or that they are necessarily exclusive of each other. He asserts, and rightly, that they must appear in every account which aims at reasonable completeness. That he is primarily concerned not with the dialectic of philosophy but with what controls its direction is explained by the interpretative frame of his exposition. The intelligent layman will have to go far to find a comparable introduction to the systems of thought whose vital nerves are here so deftly laid bare. Professional philosophers can learn from Professor Edman the difficult art of imaginative reconstruction of points of view different from their own. They are also sure to enjoy the penetrating and effortless prose in which philosophical ideas are communicated.

Professor Edman's own philosophy is a form of experimental naturalism. If his style suggests that of Santayana, without its burnished opacity, his thought reflects that of John Dewey, without the technical incrustration. In the light of his naturalism Professor Edman reveals the sources in nature and experience of doctrines that are supernatural and non-experimental. For all his sympathetic exposition he does not neglect to raise questions and doubts at crucial places. In his effort, however, to enlighten without wounding, his criticisms are so gentle and painless that those at whom they are pointed will probably look over their shoulder to discover the ones meant.

Although Professor Edman gladly admits that every philosophy has a social context, his own study accents a little too strongly the determinations of personal temperament. And although he affirms that the principles of logic are "the grammar of merely human and earthly discourse," not laws of metaphysical being, he does not take note that this brings his naturalism close to the orbit of logical empiricism. To one reader, at least, Professor Edman's book suggests that his mode of interpretative exposition is a useful supplement to the rigorous syntactical analysis of the logical empiricists. For it indicates a way of avoiding the cultural crime of throwing the history of philosophy into the discard. "To make the philosophy by which men live the philosophy by which they speak" is a felicitous statement of a common program for all naturalistic and empirical philosophies. Psychology, sociology, and imaginative reconstruction then become the appropriate instruments for understanding philosophers who cannot make themselves clear to others.

SIDNEY HOOK

"Mexican Modern"

THE NEW ARCHITECTURE IN MEXICO. By Esther Born. William Morrow and Company. $3.50.

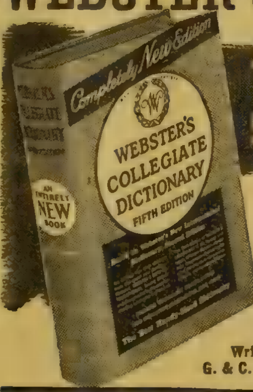
CONTEMPORARY MEXICAN ARTISTS. By Agustin Velazquez Chavez. Covici-Friede. $2.75.

MODERN housing, mainly low-cost and in functional style, has made more headway in Mexico than anywhere else on the American continent. This may be partly accidental—because a cement company intelligently boosted the use of its product—but fundamentally it is the result of a progressive drive in all fields of Mexican life. Like painting, modern housing has been encouraged by the government, but it has also been helped by the good sense of modern architects, who have demonstrated that "modern" is the cheapest and best-looking housing obtainable. It is now a matter of course that the private citizen prosperous enough

SCHOOL

WORKERS SCHOOL
Winter Term Registration
COURSES IN:
Science and Dialectics
Economics
Dialectical Materialism
Marxism Leninism
Literature
American History
Labor History
Current Events
China and the Far East in World Affairs
Psychology
Labor Journalism
Russian, Spanish
And many other courses
For Descriptive Catalogue D write to the School Office, 35 E. 12th St., N. Y. C.

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE
NEW FIFTH EDITION



The Best Handy-Sized Dictionary

because it defines all the most commonly used words, selected from WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY, Second Edition — the "Supreme Authority" in courts, schools, and editorial offices — and is edited with the same careful scholarship. 110,000 entries; 1,800 illustrations; 1,300 pages; $3.50 to $8.50, depending on bindings. Purchase of your bookdealer, or order from publishers. Write for New Quiz and Picture Game — FREE.
G. & C. MERRIAM CO., 920 Broadway, Springfield, Mass.

8 UNUSUAL BOOK BARGAINS
Up to 75% Off Regular Prices

● Offered by America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House, these are all strictly the ORIGINAL EDITIONS—not cheap reprints, as the prices would seem to indicate.

1. FORTY THOUSAND QUOTATIONS. Prose and Poetical. Selected from the standard authors of ancient and modern times, classified according to subject and covering almost the entire range of thought and emotion. 1400 Topics. Over 2,000 pages. Original red cloth, gold top edition. ($5.00) $1.98

2. A HOLBEIN MASTERPIECE. "Portrait of Erasmus." By Hans Holbein. An exact replica so beautifully reproduced (on genuine artists' canvas, in full color) that only the most expert eye could distinguish it from the original in The Louvre. Size 13½"x16⅜". ($20.00) only $1.98

3. GEORGE WASHINGTON'S COMPLETE DIARIES. The first complete issue. From his first expedition as a youth of 16 to the days of his final illness. Illustrated from old prints, engravings and facsimiles. "The material contained in these handsome volumes constitutes beyond question, ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT HUMAN DOCUMENTS THAT HAS BEEN LATELY ADDED TO THE LITERATURE OF AMERICAN HISTORY."—Sat. Review of Literature. ($25.00) The 4-volume set only $3.98

4. DON QUIXOTE. By Cervantes. Profusely illustrated with over 400 drawings by the famous Gustave Doré. ($12.50) $1.98

5. A COMPLETE GUIDE TO PUBLIC SPEAKING. By Grenville Kleiser, America's foremost authority. Successful Methods of Public Speaking—Vital English for Speakers and Writers—How to Sell Through Speech—Word Power, How to Develop It. 660 pages. The [illegible] volumes, only $1.49

6. THE AUTHENTIC LIBRETTI OF TEN FAMOUS GILBERT AND SULLIVAN OPERAS. Ten Complete Operas with the scores of 12 of the most popular musical selections, the Operas being: The Gondoliers; The Pirates of Penzance; Iolanthe; H. M. S. Pinafore; The Mikado; The Yeomen of the Guard; Ruddigore; Princess Ida; Patience; Trial by Jury. Size 7"x10½". Our special price, 90c

7. BEVERIDGE'S LINCOLN. In 4 illustrated volumes. Abraham Lincoln. 1809 - 1858. By Albert J. Beveridge. Boxed. "The author has traced to its source every fact, incident, tradition or statement bearing on the life of Lincoln." ($20.00) The 4-volume set, only $3.98

8. THE ART OF MARRIAGE. By J. F. Hayden, B. Sc. Extensive, frank, complete, this book includes notable chapters on unequalized sexuality, frigidity of wives, sexual satiety, prematurity, lack of art in procedure, impotence, prudery, etc. Also contains the fullest treatise on Frigidity that can be found today, as well as one on Reservatus. ILLUSTRATED. Revised. Enlarged. $1.98

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-27
Established 1884
367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $.................... for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

(Mark circle around books desired)

Please send me FREE Catalog No. 289-N, containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains—just off the press!

Name ....
Address ....
City.................................... State.........................

to build will build modern; especially as the designers have flexibly adapted "functionalism" to Mexican needs and tastes.

The story of how modern housing became a part of Mexican life—what it costs, what it looks like, its adaptability to low-cost state projects for workers, who the builders are, and how they work—is of immediate interest to everybody who is aware of our urgent need to replace our obsolescent living-quarters with others more nearly parallel to our lives and industrial possibilities. It is a double story, technical and social, which only a person at once scholar, technician, and reporter is competent to tackle. This is a rare combination of talents; but Esther Born, photographer and reporter for the Architectural Record, proves she has them in the magnificent way she has put together photographs, data, and social insight to make "The New Architecture in Mexico." It isn't often anybody turns out a book as fine as this. Beyond its connection with Mexico, it should be a source of pleasure and excitement to anybody who has ever daydreamed "house."

In his book on modern Mexican painting Agustin Velazquez Chavez undertook to supply the growing need for a source-and-reference handbook of the "movement" which is exercising such a potent influence on modern American painting. The men who founded this movement in 1922 knew very well what an important job they were doing, that theirs was the most significant step in art since the revolt of the European moderns—the effort to join modern painting to current social needs and architectural development. Paradoxically, Mexico invented what industrial America needed. And today, fifteen years after, American painters are discovering this, and making modern mural art the continental, widespread, and familiar thing that the Mexicans planned.

Velazquez Chavez gives very little notion of what the "Mexican renaissance" was—and is—as a group impulse, though group impulse was its essence, as in Renaissance Italy. He views each painter as a separate individual, developing individually; in other words, he simply catalogues them and lists their outstanding works. This would be useful if it were complete, or complete at least as regards the earlier men, whom the writer had no excuse for ignoring. Xaxier Guerrero, Ramon Alba Guadarrama, Amado de la Cueva, Emilio Amero were all among the founding members of the famous "Syndicate of Painters and Sculptors" which transformed the work of all of them—including Orozco and Rivera—and created "Mexican modern." Yet Chavez, though he lists a good many men less important than these, omits them. There are still more glaring silences, dictated apparently by personal taste or obscure prejudice; for instance, Ramos Martinez, the founder of the open-air schools, is forgotten, as is Jean Charlot, to whom the syndicate owed most of its early technical guidance and aesthetic orientation. The author might argue that Charlot was born in France. With similar logic Picasso would be excluded from a list of the French moderns.

ANITA BRENNER

Misdirected Energies

PEACEFUL CHANGE. By Frederick Sherwood Dunn. Council on Foreign Relations. $1.50.

NO one can question the fundamental importance of the problem considered in this book, namely, how to bring about a more equitable distribution of the world's wealth among nations without resort to force of arms. Ordinarily, the dilemma is somewhat crudely stated as an issue between the so-called "have" and "have-not" countries. In this form, the inference is usually made that the "have-not" countries—the three fascist powers—should be granted concessions, both as a matter of justice and as a means of preserving peace. At the present moment such a position is tantamount to approval of Japanese aggression in China.

Mr. Dunn carefully avoids any such implication. In contrast with much of the current pacifist literature on the subject, his book shows that Germany, Italy, and Japan are not the true "have-not" nations, and that many other countries far inferior in economic opportunities have made no threats against the peace of the world. His analysis reveals that the desire for colonies does not rest on sound economic grounds: comparatively few inhabitants of the dissatisfied powers really desire to emigrate; raw materials can be obtained from colonies belonging to others; and the importance of colonial markets tends to be exaggerated. No ground is found for a transfer of territory to the dissatisfied powers either for the purpose of relieving population pressure or supplying raw materials.

Having eliminated, quite properly, any direct means of satisfying the demands of the "have-nots," Mr. Dunn is forced into a somewhat academic argument for a "code of fair practice" in the exploitation of natural resources, the extension of international credits for the purchase of raw materials, and a general reduction in trade barriers. While all these measures are readily defensible on theoretical grounds, the spectacle of the organized peace movement, following Mr. Dunn's lead, considering international planning and tariff reduction when the very structure of international law is being challenged by Japan and the fascist countries strikes one as worse than futile. Granting that the problem of "peaceful change" will have to be solved before we can have any assurance of permanent peace, the fact remains that those who dissipate their energies in that direction in the present crisis are, in effect, aiding those who would make force the sole arbiter of our destinies.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

ART

The Demuth Memorial Show

THANKS are due the discoverers of the efficacy of insulin at the very least for one American force. This is the painter whose representations of the inner life of American things now adorn the walls of the Whitney Museum in New York. It is the late Charles Demuth.

As an artist, Demuth came into being but a few years before he sickened dangerously with diabetes. A painter since his nineteenth year, at one time a pupil of Chase's, this shoot of old Pennsylvania Dutch families did not find himself before he was thirty. Around his thirtieth year, in 1912, he went to Paris. In New York he had seen Marin's water colors. In Paris he digested the new fauve and cubist art, including that of Duchamp, author of the notorious Nude Descending a Stairway. When the war drove him home, Demuth returned with a few sensitive water colors. They were the first original work of a man destined to become an important agent of American self-consciousness. And during the next few years he commenced developing his very personal art.

Popular Copyrights Are A Smash Hit!

Millions of Books Can Now Be Had at 20 BOOKS for $1

TAKE your pick of the Little Blue Books listed on this page at the rate of 20 books for $1, plus 1c per book for carriage. Choose yours now! Order today!

14 What Every Girl Should Know
19 Nietzsche's Philosophy. Durant
25 Rhyming Dictionary
39 Aristotle's Philosophy. Durant
42 Origin of Human Race
[illegible] Insects and Men. Instinct vs. Reason. Clarence Darrow
56 Dictionary of U. S. Slang
58 Tales from Decameron. Boccaccio
72 Color of Life and Love
74 Physiology of Sex Life
82 Common Faults in English
83 Evolution of Marriage
87 Nature of Love
91 Manhood: Facts of Life
92 Hypnotism Explained
97 Self-Contradictions of Bible
[illegible] How to Love
109 Facts About Classics
110 History of World War
125 Woodrow Wilson's War Speeches
126 History of Rome. Wood
133 Principles of Electricity
150 Lost Civilizations
159 Story of Plato's Philosophy
172 Evolution of Sex
175 A Hindu Book of Love
176 Four Essays on Sex
192 Book of Synonyms
217 Puzzle of Personality
218 Essence of the Talmud
228 Plain Talks With Husbands and Wives. Ellis
271 Is Death Inevitable?
286 Prostitution in the Ancient World
287 Best Jokes About Doctors
297 Do We Need Religion?
326 How to Write Short Stories
347 A Book of Riddle Rimes
364 How to Argue Logically
367 Improve Your Conversation
374 Psychology of Suicide
375 Love Story of an Old Maid
377 Psychology of Joy and Sorrow
383 Prostitution in the U. S.
403 Facts About Music
411 Facts About Phrenology
414 Art of Being Happy
431 U. S. Commercial Geography
439 My 12 Years in a Monastery
440 Baseball. How to Play
446 Psychology of Religion
447 Auto-Suggestion: How It Works
449 Auto-Suggestion and Health
452 Dictionary of Scientific Terms
467 Evolution Made Plain
473 Lives of Chorus Girls
475 Develop Sense of Humor
479 How N. Y. Girls Live
488 Don't Be a Wall Flower
491 Psychology for Beginners
493 Novel Discoveries in Science
501 How to Tie Knots
503 Short History of Civil War
509 Are We Machines? Darrow
518 How to Make Candy
524 Death and Its Problems
529 Woman the Criminal
536 What Women Beyond 40 Should Know
556 Hints on Etiquette
557 Is the Moon a Dead World?
603 The Electron Theory
606 How to Play Chess
609 Are the Planets Inhabited?
627 Short History of the Jews
629 Handbook of Legal Forms
637 German-English Dictionary
639 4,000 Essential English Words
644 Women Who Lived for Love
645 Confidential Chats with Wives
648 Sexual Rejuvenation
653 What Boys Should Know
654 What Young Men Should Know
655 What Young Women Should Know
656 What Married Men Should Know
657 What Married Women Should Know
658 Toasts for All Occasions
661 Neurotic America and Sex
679 Chemistry for Beginners
681 Spelling Self Taught
682 Grammar Self Taught
683 Punctuation Self Taught
687 U. S. Constitution
688 Teeth and Mouth Hygiene
689 Woman's Sexual Life
690 Man's Sexual Life
691 Child's Sexual Life
696 How to Pronounce Proper Names
697 4,000 Words Often Mispronounced

703 Physiology Self Taught
704 Facts About Palmistry
705 100 Professions for Women
710 Botany for Beginners
715 Auction Bridge for Beginners
717 Modern Sexual Morality
724 Burbank Funeral Oration. Judge Lindsey
726 Facts About Venereal Diseases
727 Psychology of Affections
730 Mistresses of Today
731 Mental Differences of Men and Women
734 Book of Useful Phrases
759 How to Conquer Stupidity
767 Facts About Astrology
768 Best Jokes About Lawyers
773 Good Habits and How to Form Them
775 First Aid for Investors
777 Riddle of Human Behavior
781 Catholicism and Sex
782 Psycho-Analysis, Mind and Body
784 Association Tests in Psycho-Analysis
789 Digest of U. S. Marriage and Divorce Laws
800 Sex in Psycho-Analysis
801 A Rapid Calculator
804 Freud on Sleep and Sexual Dreams
810 Scandals of Paris Life
815 Familiar Quotations
816 Shakespearean Quotations
817 Her Burning Secret
819 Book of Strange Murders
820 Jokes About Married Life
821 Improve Your Vocabulary
822 Rhetoric Self Taught
823 English Composition Self Taught
835 Handbook of Useful Tables
841 Future of Religion
842 Best Jokes of 1925
843 Can You Control Conduct?
845 Facts About Fortune Telling
846 Womanhood: Facts of Life
847 How to Play Card Games
850 Bad Habits and How to Break Them
851 Bible Myths and Legends
853 How to Know the Songbirds
855 How to Write Letters
856 Arithmetic Self Taught, 1
857 Arithmetic Self Taught, 2
858 Psychology of Leadership
862 German Self Taught
864 Chats With Husbands
869 Best Jokes of 1927
872 Manual Parliamentary Law
876 Curiosities of Mathematics
877 French Cooking for Amateurs
879 Best Jokes About Preachers
882 Psychology of Character Building
883 Capital Punishment
884 Debate on Prohibition
889 Jokes About Kissing
891 Your Talent and How to Develop It
893 500 Riddles
894 How to Advertise
895 Astronomy for Beginners
896 Wages of Sin
901 Woman: Eternal Primitive
902 Dictionary of Foreign Words
903 All About Syphilis
904 Sex Symbolism. Fielding
910 Is Life Worth Living?
911 Is Mankind Progressing?
964 How to be Happy Though Married
966 Rational Sex Ethics
972 Book of Popular Jokes
975 Cleopatra and Her Loves
984 Harmony Self Taught
986 How to Talk and Debate
987 Art of Kissing
988 The Art of Courtship
995 How to Play the Piano
997 Recipes Home Cooking
999 Latin Self Taught
1000 Wonders of Radium
1003 How to Think Logically
1004 How to Save Money
1005 How to Enjoy Music

1006 Children's Games
1007 Revolt Against Religion
1008 Origin of Religion. McCabe
1009 Typewriting Self Taught
1010 Amateur Magic Tricks
1011 French-English Dictionary
1012 Best Negro Jokes
1013 Best Irish Jokes
1014 Best American Jokes
1015 Comic Dialect Poems
1018 Humorous Limericks
1020 Why I am an Infidel
1021 Italian Self Taught
1023 Popular Recitations
1030 World's Great Religions
1049 How to Sing
1051 Cause and Nature of Genius
1052 Nature of Instinct and Emotions
1053 Guide to N. Y. Strange Sections
1056 Devil's Dictionary
1061 Human Origin of Morals
1062 Humoresque. Fannie Hurst
1064 Simplicity of Radio
1065 Lives of U. S. Presidents
1069 Conquest of Fear
1070 How to Fight Nervous Troubles
1074 Commercial Law
1078 Morals in Greece and Rome
1079 Phallic Elements in Religion
1082 Best Jewish Jokes
1084 Did Jesus Ever Live?
1088 Truth About Mussolini
1089 Common Sense of Sex
1091 Facts About Cancer
1092 Simple Beauty Hints
1093 Amusing Puns
1094 Insanity Explained
1097 Memory: How to Use It
1103 Puzzles and Brain Teasers
1105 Spanish-English Dictionary
1109 Spanish Self Taught
1111 Prostitution in Medieval World
1113 Love from Many Angles
1122 Degradation of Woman
1123 Facts About Puritan Morals
1124 On the Bum
1126 Eating for Health
1130 The Dark Ages. McCabe
1135 Prostitution in Modern World
1138 What Atheism Means
1139 Photography Self Taught
1144 Truth About Jesuits
1148 Sexual Crimes in U. S. Law
1164 Unlovely Sin. Ben Hecht
1167 Sinister Sex, etc. Hecht
1174 How to Write Business Letters
1176 A Mad Love. Frank Harris
1204 Dictionary of Musical Terms
1206 How to Swim
1207 French Self Taught
1208 Success Easier Than Failure
1209 Charming Hostess: Entertainment Guide
1210 Mathematical Oddities
1216 Italian-English Dictionary
1221 Facts About Will Power
1225 How to Avoid Marital Discord
1228 Jokes About Drunks
1231 Best Jokes of 1926
1233 Better Meals for Less Money
1238 Beginning Married Life Right
1239 Party Games for Grown-ups
1241 Outline of U. S. History
1242 Care of Skin and Hair
1244 How to Write Love Letters
1246 Best Hobo Jokes
1247 Psychology of Love and Hate
1249 Best Jokes About Lovers
1250 Companionate Marriage
1251 What Do You Know?
1257 How to Become Citizen
1278 Ventriloquism Self Taught
1279 Side Show Tricks
1285 Gamblers' Crooked Tricks
1292 Best Short Stories of 1928
1311 Real Aims of Catholicism
1316 Revolt of Modern Youth
1317 Meaning of U. S. Constitution
1318 Case for and Against Sexual Sterilization
1320 How to Get a Husband

1321 Fasting for Health
1322 Confessions of a Modern Woman
1329 Facing Life Fearlessly
1330 Facts About Digestion
1333 Common Sense of Health
1337 Breakdown of Marriage
1339 Crooked Financial Schemes
1340 How to Get a Job
1341 Unusual Menus
1342 Typical Love Problems
1347 Trial Marriage
1349 Life of Lindbergh
1351 How to Get Ahead
1354 Book of Similes
1356 How to Make Wills
1357 What You Should Know About Law
1358 How to Acquire Good Taste
1359 Is Birth Control a Sin?
1360 Pocket Cook Book
1361 Who Killed Jesus?
1362 Law for Women
1363 Law for Auto-Owners
1365 How to Build Vocabulary
1371 Sins of Good People
1379 President Harding's Illegitimate Daughter
1380 Flesh and the Devil
1382 Is Our Civilization Over-Sexed?
1385 Defense of Devil
1388 Are the Clergy Honest?
1389 Tobacco Habit
1392 Confessions of a Gold Digger
1395 Instantaneous Personal Magnetism
1412 Stories of Tramp Life
1413 My Prison Days
1419 Unusual Deaths
1420 Why Wives Leave Home
1421 How to Get a Divorce
1426 Foot Troubles Corrected
1428 Unusual Love Affairs
1430 Shorthand Self Taught
1434 How to Think Clearly
1436 Strange Marriage Customs
1437 Curiosities of the Law
1439 Intelligence. How to Test It
1440 Can Man Know God?
1442 Facts About Graphology
1445 Wild Women of Broadway
1448 Character Reading from Faces
1450 Do We Live Forever?
1455 End of the World. McCabe
1459 Psychology of Criminal
1460 American Statistics
1471 How to Become Mentally Superior
1475 Best Jokes of 1928
1476 What You Should Know About Your Sensations
1477 How Glands Affect Personality

1480 Causes of World War
1481 The New Immorality
1484 Why Preachers Go Wrong
1491 Power of Women
1493 Wine, Women and Song
1496 Sexual Factor in Divorce
1497 Companionate Divorce
1498 M. U. Sex Questionnaire
1500 Why I Am an Agnostic
1501 Mussolini and the Pope
1503 Effective English in Speech
1504 Overcome Self-Consciousness
1508 Facts About Poisons
1513 Statistics: How to Understand Them
1514 Edison's Inventions
1516 Facts About Gonorrhea
1523 How to Avoid Catching Venereal Diseases
1531 Can We Follow Jesus Today?
1532 Don Quixote
1534 How to Test Urine
1535 How to Throw a Party
1536 Facing Death Fearlessly
1538 Rational Sex Code
1542 Who Started World War?
1543 Is War Inevitable?
1544 Against Capital Punishment
1548 Chinese Cook Book
1553 Exercises for Nervousness and Indigestion
1554 Exercises for the Heart
1555 Rules for Success in Business
1556 How Sun Gives Health
1559 Can We Change Human Nature?
1563 Marvels of Sunlight
1565 Catholicism and the Public Schools
1566 How to Conduct Love Affair
1568 Full Text Edison's Scholarship Questionnaire
1569 Boccaccio—Lover of Love

How to Order

Just list titles desired by number. Order at least 20 books and enclose money order, check or currency at rate of 20 books for $1—minimum order $1. Add 1c per book to cover carriage, and books will be shipped prepaid. (Add 10c to personal check. It is best to remit by cash, postal money order or unused U. S. stamps.) No C. O. D. Canadian and foreign price, 7c per book, delivered. Canada or foreign must remit by international postal money order.

(Each order for $1 or more entitles you to a trial subscription to The American Freeman, at no extra cost, if you ask for it. This is the growing questions and answers magazine.)

Use This Simple Order Form For Popular Copyrights

HALDEMAN-JULIUS PUBLICATIONS,
Dept. A-206, Girard Kansas

Enclosed please find $......................which is payment at the rate of 20 books for $1 for the following popular copyrights which I have listed by number on the lines below. (Add 1c per book for carriage.)

Name..
Address..
City..State..................

Haldeman - Julius Publications, Dept. A - 206, Girard, Kansas

In point of form some of these subtle, in instances flowery, in other instances geometrical little designs of the early Demuth might be called fauve. Like Matisse's paintings, they are decorative arrangements of the pictorial elements. Others of them might be called cubistic, since they are compositions of the inherent straight and curved lines and surfaces of the depicted objects—acrobatics, peaked roofs, belfries, fruits and flowers—disposed on serried planes. Still, there is nothing derivative in the formal details or in the sums of these modest little pieces. All have a peculiarly American elegance, an elegance now jazzy and now refined. Again, they might be charged with a certain preciousness. There is no doubt that their tendril-like or ruled lines, their somewhat pink-and-blue color harmonies, their shapes and total forms, are excessively refined. Unlike Marin's free-running wash, Demuth's almost equally luminous one was scrupulously wiped and blotted. But there is nothing false, anemic, or merely ornamental in this exquisiteness, any more than there is anything derivative in the conceptions. Structural details and sums have vital qualities which make the beholder comprehend certain of the essences which give American existence its peculiar graces. Through the arch, half-ironic designs suggested to the artist by vaudeville stunts, circus acrobatics, jazz-band acts, and the night life of the streets, he comes into touch with the nervous alacrity, the devil-may-care momentum, the half-vulgar erotic flush which creates Broadway, that lane running from New York through the continent unto Alaska. Through the soberer ones suggested by the contents of gardens, the sea-light of Gloucester and Bermuda, New England and Pennsylvania dormered roofs and church towers, he faces the shy, puritanical, almost unadjustable sensitivity which underlies other, finer, but equally American expressions. And through the series inspired by the concrete and iron shapes of the industrial world, there speaks to him the mysteriously precise spirit, the physical accuracy, the almost mechanical sensibility, which makes Americans supremely able machinists and technicians.

Indeed, a deal of the scope of Demuth's feeling was already intelligible from this work of the years anterior to his crisis. Yet had he died at thirty-six, as in the Armistice year it appeared that he must do, we should be the poorer for an important force. Certainly, he had discovered his form. The general range of his themes, including the subjects of Zola's and Henry James's novels, had indeed defined itself. A few paintings in tempera and oil had evinced his endowment with gifts for mediums other than water color. Still, in comparison with the feeling which projects itself in his later work, that of his "first period" is relatively superficial and thin. It is no more than an exquisite and affecting minor artist's. Only a few of the strong, high-pitched Bermudan landscapes declare the dawning mastery.

But Demuth lived on for upward of fifteen years. During the war the value of insulin had come to light. Reprieved, almost as much a well man as he had ever been, and he had always been somewhat an invalid, Demuth once again hobbled sociably through the world—as ever very lively and spick-and-span—and in his native Lancaster enjoyed his mother's excellent cookery, and resumed his work. The old humor and impishness reappeared in it. Only, the feeling had deepened. Had death, in touching Demuth, rendered him clairvoyant? Or had he merely attained his normal maturity? We only know that during those last years his pictorial form grew very full. The intricate, partially overlapping washes in his water colors achieved the amazing bloom and depth of tone which give so many of his still-lifes a crystal-like luster. The line, which had sometimes got tangled in his earlier work, became certain and clear. With their beautifully synthesized gross and flowerlike shapes, his designs became broad. The color harmonies were strong, opposing and combining pearly tints with homely magentas, purples, the tones of aniline dyes, and with rare and sumptuous whites. They have been compared, these later lyrical water colors of Demuth's, to immortelles: because of their wax-like immaculateness and "studied" look. A comparison to Indian pipes, the chaste and fictile pine-saps of the American woods, might seem more justifiable. They have the small plant's crispness and translucency, and their roots in humid earth. And a dignity put in its appearance in the large late temperas and oils, with their Christopher-Wrenn-like shapes and Vermeer-like surfaces. The designs approached monumentality; the harmonies of blues, silvers, and whites, or of dusky reds and grays, a rare profundity. Only in certain of the late posterish designs, where Demuth used the forms of machine-cut block-letters, directive arrows, and other commercial products symbolically, did the inevitable cast its first shadow in the form of a noticeable attenuation.

But his feeling of life had fully been transmitted. Suddenly, as we stand among his later paintings, from one of them there reaches us the peculiar American snap. The communicative medium is a bright little "cubistic" pattern suggested to the painter by a display of striped and colored shirtings in a haberdasher's window. Instantly our mental eye perceives holiday-making young bucks en route to summer beaches. Even more than their appearances, we comprehend the common inner smartness. And one by one the other late pictures similarly unite us with other American forces; so drenched are they with the quality of the graceful driving powers central to the American being, not only of the past and Demuth's own prosperous epoch, but of the present and for all we know the time to come. Most frequently, like their forerunners among the earlier pieces, although with greater intensity, these works harmonize us with the inner tension which expresses itself in the American's perennially shapely, attractive appearance and love of shapeliness for its own sake. It is the parent of phenomena apparently as various and unrelated as physical style, athletic hardness, and the preference for gemmy, clean-cut contours, and, mirabile dictu, the extraordinary plasticity of the output of literary representatives as remote in time from one another as Hawthorne, Henry James, and Ezra Pound. In other instances his pictures connect us with the equally undying puritanical refinement verging upon morbidity and rejecting the flesh in the interests of a perfection impossible in life, possible only in death. In still others, and perhaps the most affecting, they relate us to the power—the artist's and the devoted workman's both—which carries certain of our people above personal ends, and sets them like bell-towers amid prismatic light, or sturdily erect with others of their kind like chimneys in all sorts of weather. We call this power faith in light and love.

Thus Demuth stands among the giant clan. Other artists possibly have given America a wider consciousness of its internal self than he has done. But he has beautifully added to and deepened our self-knowledge. As we quit exhibitions of his work such as his memorial show, we seem to see him standing in the general landscape in the form of one of his own church or factory turrets in blue and in gray weather: shapely, tall, serene, among the high agents of communal life.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Letters to the Editors

Thanks for Mary M——

Dear Sirs: You can't imagine what a relief the article by Mary M—— was to me and several of my Catholic friends. All these months we have been blushing with shame at the pro-rebel stand of our top hierarchy and our slavish "Catholic" press. We Catholics who have to sweat for a meager living understand well enough what is going on in Spain. The pro-fascism of our upper Catholic circles does not surprise us in the least. Their stake in big business is just as substantial as Hearst's. If you examine their newspapers (not unlike Hearst's, by the way, in general tone), you will find a rather high consistency in position. Mixed up with some pro-labor demogogy there is a marked sympathy for those who are opposing the much-needed reforms of Cárdenas in Mexico. There was enthusiasm among them when Vargas recently put Brazil on the fascist side. Some of them actually crowed with delight at the reactionary antics of the Quebec authorities a short time ago. Like Hearst they are trying to discredit every single progressive movement.

You see, even our Catholic world is torn by class lines—tories versus the people. My thanks to Mary M——, who had the courage to show that the church comprises more than a few bigwigs.

J. J. HUGHES

New York, December 27

Our Minister to Spain

Dear Sirs: I was a bit shocked in your issue of December 18 to find so intelligent a writer as Oswald Garrison Villard complaining of the choice of such men as Claude Bowers and John N. Willys for diplomatic posts, implying that they are of the same sort. Probably everybody would agree that Willys got his job because of his wealth and that he had no other qualifications for diplomacy—I'm not even sure that he was a good automobile manufacturer—but Mr. Villard should know that Claude Bowers could not have been appointed because of wealth. He happens to be an outstanding American historian and can hardly be grouped with a mere business entrepreneur.

Mr. Villard also comments that Bowers "has sat comfortably in Hendaye since the war in Spain." Where else should he have sat comfortably or uncomfortably? He stayed in Spain until the State Department ordered him to go to the French border. Incidentally, all the other diplomats also went there; Bowers has done a tremendously useful job, I am told, in offsetting the pro-Franco propaganda sent out by Sir Henry Chilton, the British ambassador. Besides having scholarship and a rare facility of expression, Bowers has a lot of the same brand of shrewdness and horse sense that made Benjamin Franklin a successful diplomat.

FRED C. KELLY

Hickory Hills, Ohio, December 25

Shade of Roger Williams!

Dear Sirs: Your readers may be interested to know of the inroads on civil and religious liberty that are being made, quietly, in Roger Williams's home state, Rhode Island.

On the religious front the leaders of the Catholic hierarchy are supporting a plan "to put a fourth 'R' in the curriculum" of the public schools, by means of voluntary courses of religious instruction. Protestants and Jews are opposing the proposal. The legislature has already passed an act appropriating public funds for transportation of parochial-school students to and from their sectarian institutions, and in one town, at least, the public-school building was made available for use as a parochial school during the summer.

The most striking infringement of civil liberties has occurred in connection with moving pictures. Last spring the Providence Bureau of Police and Fire prohibited the public showing of "Spain in Flames," and a few weeks ago it took similar action with respect to "The Spanish Earth."

The stated reasons for censoring these two films should be of considerable interest. "Spain in Flames," the censors argued in their official statement, was "reeking with communistic propaganda, tends to incite riot and class hatred, is distinctly disrespectful to two friendly nations, and is a sordid depiction of the terrors of a civil war, illustrated by many reproductions of newsreels, with numerous repetitions and some extraneous scenes and admittedly a Russian film—Amkino" (sic). In banning the commercial exhibition of "The Spanish Earth" six months later, the police officials exhibited an increasing sophistication. The censor ruled that its showing "might tend to antagonize and stir up racial hatreds among a large number of people of foreign extraction. We are living peaceably together in this community." The Bureau of Police and Fire, indorsing his recommendation, added that it considered the film "propaganda," and "taking cognizance of remarks made in the dialogue of the picture criticizing friendly powers," it decided to follow its "usual practice" and forbid the exhibition of the picture.

In the near future a court challenge of the Police Bureau's arbitrary exercise of its discretionary power will be instituted. In the meantime the struggle over religious education in the schools goes on.

IRWIN M. TOBIN

Providence, R. I., December 28

Not Only Spain Is at Stake

[The following letter was written to a friend in Paris by a German theological student who helped to organize the Hitler Youth in 1931 but was disillusioned when the Nazis came into power.]

Dear ——: Such important issues are being decided today in Spain and the Far East that many people are losing sight of internal political developments in Germany and giving no thought to the struggle which is being carried on by a small but tenacious opposition. Perhaps it is surprising that I speak of a "small" opposition. It is only too true, however, that those who oppose National Socialism with another political philosophy, for which they are willing to fight, are few in number. This political élite comprises perhaps from one and a half to two million persons. That does not imply that the German people as a whole are National Socialist. The overwhelming majority are completely apathetic toward politics. They are not National Socialist at heart; they simply give no thought to any kind of political activity. They offer, therefore, a fertile field for the efforts of the opposition.

And now I come to what I wish to say in this letter. The masses of the people are held back by a restraining sense of National Socialism's very successful foreign policy. One hears everywhere: Why bring on a struggle against a government which is continually widening Germany's sphere of influence? The Spanish government is about to fall; no attempt is made to turn back the Japanese from their slaughter of the Chinese—are not these facts proof that the democratic states care less about upholding their ideals than about preserving the peace of Europe?

What shall we reply? We can all see that the Spanish people are facing catastrophe, that another nation is falling into the arms of fascism. Anyone who knows how strong is the psychological and material pressure brought to bear on every German by National Socialism must understand how much inner idealism is necessary to carry on the struggle against it, must understand how we suffer at the sight of the collapse of European democracy—its spiritual collapse, its lack of energy.

It would mean a great deal to us here in Germany if the cry "Open the Spanish border!" became a reality, if England, especially, would recognize its responsibility to Europe. With Franco victorious, we shall confront a situation that is almost hopeless. But if the democratic states should finally be roused to action, the German opposition would be greatly strengthened; both its numbers and its inner stability would be increased.

Not only Spain is at stake, but our whole future. H. S.

The Furnases Defended

Dear Sirs: Permit me to register objection to the review of the Furnases' book, "Man, Bread, and Destiny" written by Hugh H. Darby and published in your issue of December 11. The reviewer says of the book: "In any department accuracy is at a low level," and he further states that the authors tend throughout "to jettison truth in favor of the spectacular." In substantiation of these serious accusations he brings forward three essentially frivolous examples. Thunder and lightning, Mr. Darby doubtless knows, are more or less closely associated; so are calcium and phosphorus in the formation of bones and teeth. This, obviously, is all that the authors meant to convey by their rhetorically vulnerable but otherwise entirely unimportant statement. The criticism is, as I say, frivolous. So are the others, about Cleopatra and Dr. John Hunter. Where in the book is truth jettisoned in the authors' serious treatment of nutrition?

In the last paragraph of the review Mr. Darby's general condemnation of writers of "popular" science has no application to the authors of this book. Dr. and Mrs. Furnas are good writers, they have full and expert knowledge of their subject, and they comprehend the scientific method. Their dramatizations are legitimate, they admit lack of knowledge where they should, and they show no tendency to debase or discard the scientific method.

Mr. Darby's review, by the way, fails also in positive virtue; it tells almost nothing about the contents of the book.

H. M. PARSHLEY

Northampton, Mass., December 18

Darby Sticks to His Guns

Dear Sirs: Replying to Mr. Parshley's criticism of my review, I wish to say first that I do not consider that the three examples I gave of the "low level" of accuracy in "Man, Bread, and Destiny" can be called frivolous. When an author opens his book with a challenging statement, and then can produce only a very poor case in point, he had better reconsider his statement. On the other hand, if he does not recognize the weakness of the example—and apparently even Mr. Parshley agrees with me that it is a poor example—then his ability as a thinker is brought into question. As to the "thunder and lightning" example, I do not know that they are "more or less closely associated." I know that thunder and lightning are two results of a common cause, and that no such relation exists between phosphorus and calcium. The criticism in my review was aimed at this very lack of precision.

One cannot quote ad infinitum, but here is a sentence that should refute the assertion that the writers have "full and expert knowledge of their subject": "Fats form a protective layer around the nerves, apparently to cushion these delicate wires from undue shock." The myelin sheath which surrounds certain nerves has a high fat content, but its function is still the subject of considerable doubt among physiologists.

The last paragraph of my review applies not only to the Furnases but now also to Mr. Parshley. I should have expected a science teacher at Smith College to have the history of nutrition and the present status of nutritional studies more clearly in mind than his letter indicates. HUGH H. DARBY

New York, December 26

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT DELL is a veteran journalist of international reputation. After representing the Manchester Guardian in France for many years, he is now that paper's correspondent at Geneva.

CRISPIAN CORCORAN is the pseudonym of an American newspaperman who has lived in China for a number of years.

STERLING D. SPERO is author of "The Labor Movement in a Government Industry" and "Employer and Employee in the Public Service."

SAMUEL D. PUNER is counsel to the American Labor Party delegation in the New York legislature.

OLIVER CARLSON is the author of "Hearst: Lord of San Simeon" and "Brisbane: A Candid Biography." He has had wide experience in the labor movement.

ELIOT JANEWAY contributes a monthly column, "Trade Currents," to the magazine Asia.

SIDNEY HOOK is chairman of the Department of Philosophy at Washington Square College of New York University. His latest book is "From Hegel to Marx."

ANITA BRENNER has written two books about Mexico—"Idols Behind Altars" and "Your Mexican Holiday"—and has contributed critical articles on modern art to various publications.

PAUL ROSENFELD, author of "By Way of Art," is a well-known critic of modern painting. He has contributed articles on art to The Nation, the New Republic, and other periodicals.

Correction—The pages of last week's issue, Number 1, Volume 146, should have been numbered 1 to 28.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 15, 1938 NUMBER 3

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 57
EDITORIALS:
VICTORY AT TERUEL 60
WANTED: THREE-YEAR PLAN 60
THE LUDLOW AMENDMENT 61
REMEMBER CHICAGO! 62
MR. ROOSEVELT, RINGMASTER by Max Lerner 63
FIGHTING FASCISM BY LAW by Lucille B. Milner 65
YALE NEEDS THE C. I. O. by George Butler 67
MUSSOLINI SCHEMES FOR EGYPT By Leonard Carlton 68
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 71
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
KEEPING THE PEACE by John Chamberlain 73
DANCE THROUGH THE AGES by Lincoln Kirstein 74
THE PROBLEM OF MORALS by Eliseo Vivas 76
EDUCATION UNDER THE FÜHRER by G. S. Anders 76
FOR WILLIAM TYNDALE by Donald A. Roberts 77
OUTLINE OF WESTERN ECONOMICS by R. K. Lamb 77
SHORTER NOTICES 78
THE ARTS: THE BATTLE OF THE ROOF By Douglas Haskell 79
DRAMA: ELIZABETHAN FROLIC By Joseph Wood Krutch 80
FILMS: A WIDE WESTERN by Mark Van Doren 82
DRAWINGS by Georges Schreiber and LOW

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
*
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

NOT SINCE THE HOOVER ADMINISTRATION has a federal budget been proposed so lacking in economic realism as that presented by President Roosevelt last week. Despite the business recession, the President assured Congress that no new money would be borrowed between now and June 30, 1939. Although a theoretical deficit of $950,000,000 will appear in the 1938-39 budget, there will be an actual surplus of more than $200,000,000 when account is taken of the collections under the federal Social Security Act and the railroad- and government-employees' retirement funds. This surplus is to be achieved in the face of declining revenues and increased armament appropriations by a reduction of nearly $600,000,000 in governmental expenditures. Included in this heavy slash are cuts of $500,000,000 in the appropriation for the WPA and other relief agencies, of $40,000,000 in the outlay for reclamation, rivers and harbors, and flood control, and of $21,000,000 in the amount set aside for new public buildings. In other words, the recession is to be met in precisely the same manner that the Great Engineer met the depression—by a stringent curtailment of government spending. The budget will be balanced, for all practical purposes, by means of the taxes imposed by the Social Security Act on the wage-earners, and there is no indication that an effort will be made to levy increased taxes on those best able to pay. In the face of fundamental facts such as these, the President's attack on the malefactors of great wealth would appear to have little more than political significance.

*

MOST DISTURBING OF ALL IS THE BILLION which the President has requested for national defense, and the implication that this is just the beginning of a rearmament program comparable to those recently imposed upon the peoples of Europe. Mr. Roosevelt is supposed to favor a plan calling for the construction of 237,000 tons of naval vessels in excess of our commitments under the London and Washington treaties. An attempt is being made to defend this subsidy to the armament makers on the ground that it "gives employment to American workers" and also that a strengthening of our armed forces is necessary to resist fascism. Both arguments are rank hypocrisy. Naval construction gives much less employment per dollar than road building or housing and represents sheer economic waste. Our defense establishment, as Mr. Villard recently pointed out, is already far greater than is necessary for any legitimate purpose. It is true that the demand for rearmament has been backed by some advocates of collective security on the ground that it would be helpful in enforcing peace against would-be aggressors. Actually, however, an armament program of these proportions would be needed only if the United States were planning to tackle the job of law enforcement single-handed and by force of arms. As has repeatedly been stated in these columns, economic pressure by a group of determined powers would be sufficient to bring any aggressor to terms. Some degree of responsibility for the rearmament program must be attributed indirectly to the opposition of the isolationist group to any form of international cooperation. For if the United States is to play a lone hand in world affairs, the demand for a navy and an air force second to none is bound to win large popular support, however much it may be opposed by pacifists in the isolationist camp.

*

ANY HOPE THAT THE PANAY INCIDENT would strengthen the moderate elements in the Japanese government has been dissipated by the events of the past week. Reports from Hangchow indicate that Japanese troops looted the city with as little restraint as at Nanking and Paotingfu. At Shanghai imperious local Japanese units came into conflict with both British and French police when they sought to extend military rule into the concessions. The sharp struggle over fundamental policy which has been going on for some time in Tokyo appears to have ended in complete victory for the extremist groups. Rumors are current that Prime Minister Kenoye, a moderate reactionary, may soon resign in favor of Home Minister Suetsugu, a leader of the fascist clique. Former War Minister Araki, usually regarded as the most extreme of the ultra-nationalists, has been named to the Cabinet advisory council and is expected to be admitted to the Cabinet in the near future. The effect of the extremists' triumph can only be guessed. It is significant, however, that Suetsugu openly advocated war with Britain only a few weeks before he was appointed to the Home Office. Araki is known to favor war with the Soviet Union. No one can say which group will triumph, but it is clear that Japanese militarism has headed into an adventure from which there can be no retreat.

*

JUSTICE SUTHERLAND'S RETIREMENT MARKS the passing of the old Supreme Court as we have known and not loved it. Justice Van Devanter was the real brains and strategy of the diehard group of four that dominated court policy for years and held at bay the whole movement for government control of business. But he wrote almost none of the group's decisions; that was left chiefly to Justice Sutherland, a faithful wheel-horse who was thrust forward to write the opinions because his manner was mild and ingratiating and he could always supply the right words and citations—and plenty of them. The court conservatives have thus through the last two resignations lost their leader and their front man. Justices McReynolds and Butler are doomed, at least for several years, to be rather lonely company for each other. President Roosevelt has for the first time a chance to clinch a liberal majority on the court. But the question is: what kind of liberal will he appoint? Even Justice Sutherland was, on occasion, at least a civil-liberties liberal. And so also, on most occasions, are the Chief Justice and Justice Roberts. Mr. Roosevelt may be tempted to play a generous role toward business by selecting a mildish liberal whose economic philosophy is nebulous. But he will do well to consider that the coming three years will be crucial if Congress should decide on a program that approaches genuine economic planning. Only a man with a grasp of economic reality will have the clarity and strength to follow the great Holmes tradition of giving to legislative enactments the benefit of every reasonable legal doubt.

*

THOSE WHO SUPPORTED SENATOR BLACK'S appointment to the Supreme Court on the ground that he would bring to it a new economic realism have reason to take satisfaction in his dissenting opinion last week in the Indianapolis Water Company case. The press has given a good deal of attention to the reformed court attitude in the matter of the PWA loans to municipalities for power plants; and, notably in Arthur Krock's column, has assessed the importance of the Pacific Gas and Electric decision, which represents a wedge for reintroducing historical or prudent-investment cost as a principle of valuation in place of reproduction cost. But the press appears to have quite generally overlooked the importance of the Black dissent in the Indianapolis case. The opinion is written with clarity, vigor, and a grasp of the relevant legal and economic material. It cuts cleanly through the maze of judicial opinions about principles for arriving at fair valuations of utilities, through the fantastic delays of due-process procedure, and through the overgrowths of legal learning which screen the fact that in the last analysis it is the consumer who bears the burden of excessive prices. In this dissent Justice Black stands not only against the Old Guard on the court but even against his liberal colleagues. The opinion indicates that the battle of valuation is by no means over, and that in time Black may perform the function that Brandeis performed twenty years ago—of gathering about himself a liberal minority whose basis of decision is economic realism and not the lesser of two oppressive legal doctrines.

*

IF WE WERE A TALL, GAUNT MAN LIVING IN rooms in Baker Street with a certain Dr. Watson, nothing would give us greater pleasure than the Case of the Missing Robinsons, or the Adventure of the Phony Passports. But since our name is not Holmes, we make no sense of an affair involving both Tammany Hall and the Kremlin, and we think the best thing we can do is to sit tight and make no further comment, even if Herbert Hoover is dragged into the case, followed by the Dionne girls, Lin Yutang, and Ted Healy's stooges. Until all the characters are rounded up in the last chapter and all the loose threads pulled together in a knot, our only opinion in the matter is that the Soviet Union has the worst publicity department in the world. Why is so much Soviet news dished up as mystery garnished with melodrama? If the Russians have tracked down a couple of spies, let them say so. Let them at least announce whether or not their suspects are in prison, whether they are Americans, perhaps even what their names are, and when they will be tried. As it is, there is some doubt that Mrs. R. is even in Russia; one report has it that she has already been expelled from the country under promise of silence. Surely the Soviet government would be revealing no state secret if it answered these simple questions of fact—and it would leave a better taste in the mouth of a world still wondering what has become of Bukharin, Rykov, Romm, and others who have vanished from sight. If the heads of the Russian state had an ounce of good publicity sense they would clear up this mystery before you could say Jack Robinson-Rubens-Lepke-Marinelli-and-Trotsky.

*

MAYOR HAGUE OF JERSEY CITY GATHERED his loyal supporters about him on the evening of January 6 by the simple device of ordering his political machine to order jobholders to come out and put on a "monster rally"—or else. Its numbers were set at 75,000 by the faithful and at 15,500 by disrespectful newspaper men; and with one voice—the voice of Hague accompanied by several echoes—it denounced the "un-American invasion of Jersey City." The two principal echoes were Governor-elect A. Harry Moore and Judge Robert Carey, once Hague's bitterest Republican enemy. With remarkable illiteracy and a brutish eloquence, Hague roared out his usual defiance, denouncing the C. I. O., the "civil liberties," and various and sundry individuals, including "Mr. Ernest," as communistic, atheistic disturbers of his peace. Professing the tenderest sentiments for labor, he dared it to prefer the C. I. O. to the A. F. of L., with which he has worked so harmoniously in the past; in the name of Americanism and liberty he made it clear that neither would be tolerated in his jungle; invoking the Constitution, he made it equally clear that any attempt to exercise the rights guaranteed by it would be met with assorted blows over the head. Two days later the C. I. O. answered Mayor Hague by filing in the federal court an injunction which would open up Jersey City to other Americans and incidentally allow the natives to practice the right of free speech and assembly. Meanwhile we have to keep reminding ourselves that Hague is a national committeeman of the enlightened Democratic Party, which controls the federal Administration. Isn't it time Washington crossed the Delaware again?

AMERICANS WILL HAVE TO FACE SOONER or later the problem of what to do with the growing openness and arrogance of Nazi activities in this country. We print elsewhere in this issue an article by Lucille B. Milner on the working of the British Public Order Act, passed to deal with fascist incitements. The record is a disheartening one. Yet we do not believe that the proper conclusion to draw from it is that every attempt to control this menace does more harm than good, and that inaction is better than action. The moral is rather that such legislation should be drawn with care and scrutinized with anxiety, lest it be used to hamper legitimate activities of all groups. We hope in a later issue to deal in some detail with the problems that such legislation would have to solve in this country. Here we want only to say that the Nazi camps scattered throughout the country, with their military organization, their uniformed men, their drilling, and their preparation for what can only be violence, represent a potential state within a state that no nation could ignore. We believe that any legislation to control such developments should be limited strictly to their military aspects. We believe also that its enforcement cannot be left, as it was so largely left in England, to the discretion of the local police authorities, but should be at least partly a federal concern. If the depression deepens, as seems almost inevitable, fascist doctrines will find fertile ground among the unemployed, the insecure, the demoralized. It is better to deal with the problem now than to wait until it has become an unmanageable growth.

*

DURING THE WINTER A BIG ITEM IN THE consumer's budget is the price of coal. That gives an importance to the work of the National Bituminous Coal Commission which has not been reflected in newspaper accounts. The work of the commission is an experiment in price control by a seven-man board made up of representatives of the producers, labor, and the "public." Usually the result of such a set-up is, as in the case of the NRA codes, that labor and the producers get what they want and the public (the consumer) pays and pays. The present commission has had rough sledding, with charges of graft and patronage made openly in Congress, and a four-to-three division developing within itself between supporters of the operators and supporters of labor. These inner difficulties have delayed the work of the commission, but recently it announced a price schedule which is far better than had been hoped for. This schedule should bring in $40,000,000 in increased revenue, to make up the losses under which the industry has been operating. The burden of increase falls on the heavy industries and railroads rather than on the domestic consumers, who actually get a slight reduction in price. Naturally the big industries have been lobbying vigorously against the schedule during the past two weeks. These facts may lead consumers to assume too readily that they are being helped by the commission. Although the commission is undoubtedly a stabilizing force in the industry, the increased prices for railroads and heavy industry will of course be passed on in the form of higher freight rates and increased commodity costs. The consumer cannot hope to benefit from this sort of sleight-of-hand.

Victory at Teruel

TERUEL is a great victory, not only because the Loyalists have occupied terrain, shortened their line, repulsed a monster counter-attack, lessened the threat of a Franco thrust to the sea, and completely ruined the rebels' chance of an offensive in the near future, but also because it should teach those who believe "events in Spain are moving to an insurgent victory" that they are wholly wrong.

Between 1914 and 1918 Germany won most of the battles, but lost the war. The Allies got started late but their resources and strength grew, while the fortunes of the Central Powers followed a descending curve. So, too, in Spain. Teruel must be judged against a background of past Loyalist performances. Between July 18, 1936, and November, 1936, the green government forces, except in the Guadarrama Mountains, were incapable of defense. Then began the historic resistance at Madrid. The republican army, nevertheless, was still weak and badly led, and in February Malaga fell. March brought an Italian offensive at Guadalajara. The government counter-attacked and routed Mussolini's legions. But the Loyalists did not themselves stage an offensive until July, 1937, a year after the war started. That was at Brunete. At the time the government leaders said that they proposed to initiate several limited offensives to teach their new army the art of attack. At Brunete some mistakes were made. Inexperience showed. The Loyalists won territory and in the inevitable counter-attack had to relinquish 30 per cent of it. The army fought better in the September offensive at Belchite.

The lessons learned at Brunete and Belchite helped the Loyalists to win their first big victory at Teruel. Instead of taking government territory with few losses as in the past, Franco has lost thousands of men and much equipment in a vain effort to recover his own ground. Teruel thus marks a turning of the tide. Although still inferior in artillery and aircraft, the republic can attack and win and hold its gains. The government army has progressed from a retreating militia to a no pasaran defense force and now to a powerful forward-thrusting machine. Franco's military establishment has deteriorated.

Barcelona looks ahead hopefully to the near future when the output of its recently regenerated industries will offset the rebels' advantage in foreign supplies. It is reasonable to expect, too, that the defeat at Teruel will still further depress the morale in Franco's territory. Loyalist spirit has been high despite the unbroken chain of defeats in the first year of the war, while Franco has had serious difficulty behind the lines despite considerable military success. This trouble should now be aggravated. If the resulting situation at last convinces Hitler and Mussolini that Franco is an empty barrel and that all their assistance is wasted, they will find themselves in a quandary. They will give the rebels more help because there is no alternative. But fascism cannot win in Spain. The struggle, however, will be long and bitter, and the Loyalists need strong support from foreign enemies of aggression.

While Teruel weakens Franco's hold on the civilian population, it serves to consolidate the Negrin Cabinet. The Caballero opposition is no more. In May, 1937, when Caballero ceased to be Prime Minister because he refused to relinquish the war portfolio although his inefficiency had provoked a demand for his retirement, he tried to take the large Socialist U. G. T. trade unions into the opposition with him. The majority resisted and voted to support Negrin. Before long Caballero's hold on the membership of the U. G. T., which he had led for so many years, became extremely tenuous. And now, having to reckon with the mounting prestige of the Negrin ministry and the workers' natural urge to support it, he has finally stepped down from the leadership of the U. G. T. This move reinforces the cohesion of the Popular Front, and reduces internal political friction. Loyalist Spain is today more united than ever. It is eager and increasingly able to cope with the fascist enemy.

Wanted: Three-Year Plan

IN HIS Jackson Day address, which within its limits was a fine fighting speech primarily addressed to the problem of party unity, the President referred again to the financial power concentrated in the hands of a few, to the holding-company tail that wags the dog of industry, and to the evils of price-rigging, unfair competition, and monopolistic practices. "Give to me and give to your government," he added, "the credit for a definite intention to eradicate them."

We do not doubt the President's intention, or that of a minority of progressives in his Administration. What we have questioned is the nature and even the existence of their program of eradication. The picture drawn in our Washington dispatch elsewhere in this issue is of men of good-will, expert at political tactics and showmanship, who have failed to come to grips with their essential economic problems. Mr. Cummings's report on anti-trust enforcement, written by Mr. Jackson, instead of presenting a program, passes the buck to Congress. Senator Wheeler's program for breaking up the railroad holding companies is still being kept a secret. Perhaps the outlines of a general program will merge in the President's special messages. At its best, it will probably call for a strengthening of the trade associations of small producers, a revision of the patent laws so that big industry will not be able to build empires on exclusive patents, and a strengthening of the intercorporate dividend tax. It may not go as far as that. And even if, as seems unlikely, we should succeed in stopping the further growth of the leviathan of big business, we should still have the existing business structures to deal with.

That is why we feel that the remedy either for the present depression or for our long-run economic ills does not lie in breaking up holding companies or prohibiting unfair practices. Those purposes are in themselves desirable and we favor them strongly. But it is well not to mistake the vanguard of the enemy for his main columns. And the best starting-point we have seen for grappling directly with the basic problem of poverty and unemployment amid potential plenty is to be found in the President's message. He used to talk merely of bringing back prosperity. He has substituted for that glittering generality a new concretion. He now talks of our national income of sixty-eight billion dollars for the past year, and of a potential national income of ninety to a hundred billion a year. That marks an important step forward—if he will follow it up.

It marks a step forward because so far what planning we have done has been a piecemeal restrictive planning, in single industries, in which the program has at best been to adjust the industry's price and production to what the rest of the country could absorb. This has been true of the NRA, the AAA, the bituminous-coal industry, the oil industry, the present Ellenbogen plan for the textile industry. The result is the familiar one—a measure of stabilization accomplished at the expense either of workers or consumers or both, or at the risk of cartelization. It would be far better to start with an estimate of national income (Mr. Roosevelt's figures are taken from the National Resources Committee) and an estimate of potential consumption for the products of each basic industry based on that national income. Each industry—automobiles, steel, oil, cement, copper, electrical products, chemical products, textiles, coal—could then produce for an expanded market; and in the very process of doing so it would create the employment and purchasing capacity that would constitute such an expanded market.

This is clearly planning instead of empirical blundering. And planning is exactly what we must have, whether under that name or some other. The present Administration will be in power for three years. If it had the courage and vision, it could start a three-year plan reaching toward the President's goal of a national income approximating his figures. The first year's goal might be seventy-five or eighty billion, the second year's ninety billion, the third the full hundred billion. Given the economies of large-scale manufacture in the mass-production industries, the expanded volume of automobiles, steel rails, electric refrigerators, and other products that this would mean could be produced at relatively low prices; and the savings could be pumped back, not to swell existing profits, but mainly into wages and lower costs—that is, into greater purchasing capacity.

Many intricate problems would be involved. We have just begun to get some real knowledge in our government departments of how the industrial processes work. Strangely enough, in the Department of Commerce, where you would most expect it, there is none; more material is in the Federal Reserve Board and the National Resources Committee. There would be other problems: the margin of error in estimates of production or consumption, the allocation of production between the capital-goods and consumer-goods industries, the need for maintaining a broad area of private initiative within the government controls. There would be finally the problem of bringing the intrenched forces of big industry to an understanding that their own interests lay with those of the community. These are always the problems of a rational production policy. We have the resources. We have the established democratic processes that alone would make economic planning safe. Have we also the necessary will to master the problem and force the minority that Mr. Roosevelt has been talking about to accept the solution?

The Ludlow Amendment

ALTHOUGH the Ludlow amendment has been buried by a close vote, we may assume that its bones will rise again—perhaps even during the present session. It obviously represents a large body of pacifist opinion, and ultimately it will be forced out of committee despite the opposition of the President and the State Department. Many of the objections to the measure are discussed by Mr. Villard elsewhere in this issue. While we are naturally in sympathy with what we take to be the objectives of this amendment—the lessening of the possibility of war and the spread of popular responsibility for vital decisions—we feel that Mr. Villard's catechism has omitted some of the practical dangers in the proposal.

When critics of the plebiscite declare that it undermines representative government, they are not denying that it is perhaps even more democratic than the present system. Nor do they imply that national referendums could not be developed alongside our present representative system. They are merely pointing out that the proposal stems from a wholly different philosophy of government, one that is as yet untried and untested on a national scale. The assumption that the people as a whole are better equipped than their elected representatives, either in information or native intelligence, to deal with the most vital questions affecting national policy is, to say the least, questionable.

Behind the theoretical case for representative government may be found certain practical considerations that we dare not overlook in considering the Ludlow amendment. Mr. Villard makes much of the point that the proposal, if adopted, would deprive the President of his war-making powers. Actually, the reverse would almost certainly be true. In an international crisis threatening to involve the United States in war, decisions would probably have to be made very quickly. Lacking time to set up the machinery for a national referendum—which we believe would take far longer than Mr. Villard suggests—the President would be forced to act independently. Thus in the end the people—like the German population—might be asked merely to ratify accomplished facts. Once hostilities had actually broken out, formal ratification would be inevitable, given the agencies of propaganda which are available to the government.

In placing checks on the declaration of war rather than on the pursuit of policies likely to lead to war, the Ludlow amendment would serve to strengthen one of the most sinister developments of recent years—the tendency to wage war without a formal declaration. In this respect it reveals a lineage similar to that of two other American peace proposals, the Kellogg Anti-War Pact and the Neutrality Act.

The most serious count against the Ludlow resolution, however, is that of poor timing. Not since 1918 has the threat of a war provoked by deliberate aggression been as great as at the present time. Since cooperation among the democracies is the one bulwark against such a conflict, nothing could be more encouraging to existing and would-be aggressors than the belief that the policy of the United States is dominated by the elements that pushed through the Neutrality Act and oppose the idea of collective action. Whether justifiably or not, adoption of the Ludlow amendment at this moment would surely have been interpreted abroad as a triumph for the isolationist elements. No one can say how far a Hitler, a Mussolini, or an Araki would be willing to gamble if America's aloofness were apparently confirmed to this extent.

Remember Chicago!

CHICAGO has long had the reputation of being a city where you can get away with murder; that reputation was sustained by the sequence of events after the Memorial Day demonstration in which ten persons were fatally shot and many others seriously wounded; and it was confirmed, with insolence, when sixty-three of the marchers, including some of the injured, were recently convicted of unlawful assembly—the original charge was criminal conspiracy—and fined $10 each. The dead were not prosecuted.

The sensational films of the Memorial Day incident and thousands of words of first-hand testimony given before the La Follette committee prove to any person with normal senses that the crowd which straggled across the field that day was a peaceful crowd, peacefully assembled, in which women and children and old men mingled. It is known that although the police pleaded self-defense to explain the shooting and claimed that the marchers had guns, not one of the officers was touched by a bullet; and there is extremely convincing testimony to indicate that after their victory the police, in an effort to prove that they had been attacked, systematically collected from the field and from dumps at its edges tomato stakes, rocks, and other refuse that had been there before the rout took place.

Finally there are photographs that show policemen clubbing helpless men already down, and there are gruesome tales, thoroughly substantiated, of wounded and beaten men denied first aid and then dumped one upon the other in patrol wagons where some of them bled to death. Yet in the face of this evidence a state court in Indiana and an official coroner's jury in Chicago have upheld the police in the crimes they committed on Memorial Day in collusion with the Republic Steel Corporation, which provided both tear gas and extra police power for the occasion. Presumably the police may repeat the performance with impunity; the labor-police history of Chicago practically guarantees new murders, new investigations, new acquittals of the murderers.

Is there no recourse? In this case the only possible legal redress seems to lie in an appeal from the convictions mentioned above or in suits for damages, of which some are pending. The Department of Justice made no move, at the time of the steel strike, to bring Girdler to terms, and apparently has no intention of doing so now. The La Follette committee has done its part, but its sensational findings have not, so far as we know, found their way into any court record. There remains otherwise only the recourse of continued agitation inside and outside Chicago. In the city itself the issue is not dead; on the contrary, there is a chance that it will become an important factor in the next mayoralty campaign. With the help of liberal opinion throughout the country it is conceivable that the issue can be forced; and the South Chicago massacre will not have been entirely in vain if the corrupt machine which rules the city can be turned out as a result of the events of last Memorial Day.

Meanwhile there remains the larger question of how the federal government intends to make effective the excellent work now being done by such agencies as the La Follette committee and the National Labor Relations Board. In Detroit a local judge acquitted the Ford service men who beat up U. A. W. organizers on May 26, though he had before him the same evidence on which the NLRB based its scathing verdict of guilty. In the Rand case still another judge, a federal judge this time, directed acquittal in the face of overwhelming evidence against a company which has boasted of its anti-union policy and which, like the Ford Company, was the subject of a thoroughly damning NLRB report. The Chicago case was somewhat different, involving as it did city officials and not a private employer. But in all these cases the spirit if not the letter of important federal laws has been violated; in each case a duly constituted federal investigating agency has proved violation beyond any reasonable doubt; in each case the culprits have been acquitted and the evidence gleaned by the investigating body ignored like so much water running down a waste pipe.

One remedy would be to strengthen the federal laws involved. Even more important is a will on the part of the Department of Justice to prosecute a billion dollars with the same fervor with which it goes after the malefactors of little or no wealth. For all the name-calling of the past few weeks, that will is not yet in evidence.

Mr. Roosevelt, Ringmaster

BY MAX LERNER

Washington, January 9

DURING the past two weeks the Administration has managed to survive a crisis in morale. I wrote in this space a month ago that the President had about made up his mind to move left and was uncertain only about the timing. I have since learned that what determined the timing was a confluence of factors—the unemployment figures, the down-at-the-heel demoralization of the departments, the lull in press and radio, the need for catapulting Robert Jackson into national prominence if he was to be available for the New York governorship race, the reassembling of Congress and the need for action before the tories could get to brooding again over the ills that business has suffered.

Concerning the political success of the President's new move, there is little disagreement here, whatever may be said for public consumption. Mr. Roosevelt has always been strongest in the attack; he is happy in being able once more to assume this role and is spreading the contagion among his followers. He has left the enemy, on the other hand, addled and bewildered. There can be little doubt of his showmanship. The daring succession of speeches by his lieutenants and himself, the deft turning of what might have proved a fatal attack on the Administration because of mounting unemployment into an attack on big business, the handling of the Panay incident so as to capture public attention, and the linking of big armaments with the fight against the depression—these prove once more that Mr. Roosevelt knows how to provide circuses for a distraught people. What is far less clear is whether he can provide bread as well, and how he proposes to deal with the grim and intractable material not of politics but of economics.

Not all the speeches have been just verbal pyrotechnics. But they have been perilously close to it. There are many who have wondered at the "violence" of Mr. Ickes's speech, and Mr. Jackson's, while more substantial, contained some strong medicine. But it is understood that the President allowed them to talk that way—perhaps even encouraged them—because it was an effective riposte to the recent Wall Street talk. It was a way of saying to the New York banking and industrialist group who have been running down the Washington bureaucrats, and whose muttered threats about direct fascism have been leaking through to the White House, "Well, here's the sort of demagogic material we have, if we want to use it. In an exchange of demagogic strength, let's see who has the edge." Which proves very little more than that Mr. Roosevelt is a born ringmaster.

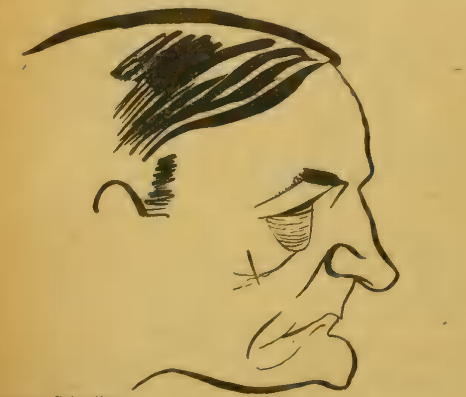
If you ask for action rather than words around here, the answer you get is that to fight a war you must have soldiers, and that before the President can fight either the depression or capitalism, he must first command his own party battalions. He will need all his skill for that task, because the second Civil War is still being fought in the halls of Congress, and along with the secession of the South there is the threatened secession of the New York delegation as well. That is why the two big events of the past week, in their repercussions on Washington, have been events in local politics—Lister Hill's victory in Alabama and the auspicious start of the Robert H. Jackson boom for Governor of New York.

Hill, running on a straight New Deal platform, licked the stuffing out of Tom Heflin in the primary race to determine the successor to Justice Black's seat in the Senate, which Mrs. Dixie Graves has been occupying in the interim. I am told that the politicos here had been predicting either a Heflin victory or a very close race, since plenty of utility and industrialist money was poured into the Heflin campaign. The issue was clearly the wage-hour bill, and so far was Hill from pulling his punches in defense of the bill that he came back from his campaign to the House, of which he is a member, in order to vote against recommittal of the measure. The spirit of the whole progressive group in Congress has picked up because of this victory. It is taken to indicate that the incredibly reactionary Southern bloc by no means represents the Southern rank and file, although it may represent the textile-mill owners, steel manufacturers, and lumber kings of the South. The Hill majority, which was large, is all the more impressive because even the labor strength in Alabama, concentrated at Birmingham, is A. F. of L. Since the wage-hour bill was strongly opposed by William Green, Hill's victory may indicate not only that the South is not represented by its Congressmen, but that the A. F. of L. is not represented by its officers. These conclusions would be more persuasive, of course, if it were anyone except doddering Tom Heflin who had been beaten, and if this were not his third successive defeat. Nevertheless, it has made the Southern tories in Congress jittery.

The first concrete result of the attack on monopoly, curiously, has been that Robert H. Jackson is now out in front in the race for the New York governorship. New York is crucial in New Deal calculations, both for its own strength in Congress and because the election of any except firm New Dealers in the coming contests for Governor and Senator would be widely interpreted as a defeat for the President in the labor stronghold of the country. It looks now as if it will be hard to head Jackson off, not because the New York machine has any love for him, but because he is the only man except Senator Wagner who could get the Labor Party indorsement. There is little belief here that Wagner would allow himself to be drafted for the governorship fight, largely because he is happy here, because the Democrats would lose his seniority rights, and because the other members of the progressive bloc would enter strong protest. They would not regard either of the candidates eager for Wagner's seat—Governor Lehman or Boss Edward J. Flynn of the Bronx—as capable of replacing him.

I find among some of the Administration advisers a strange confidence that the present "recession" will be conquered—a confidence that is disheartening because it is not accompanied by any economic realism to match the political realism with which the place is cluttered. As far as I can see, all that the Administration is relying on to combat the present phase of the depression is the remaining WPA appropriation of a half-billion and the armament appropriation of a billion. Beyond relief and battleships, there is a lingering hope that materials and labor in the building industry will go down in cost, and that the building boom will start.

The most ominous sign that the attack on big business may lead to nothing or worse than nothing was the President's press conference on the day after his message. It was a masterpiece of anti-climax. The progressives had looked for signs of an effective program for dealing with the irresponsible power of business, and what they got instead was a vague reference to the co-operative control of inventories by government and business—a reference that sounded rather NRA-ish. The fact is that the ghost of Donald Richberg still hovers over the White House—and Richberg himself not infrequently lends his more substantial presence. I find a tendency here to regard Richberg as an amazing Scheherezade who has found some story-telling secret that allows him to live on from night to night. All the past favorites—Moley, Tugwell, Professor Warren, Hugh Johnson—have been retired, but Richberg lingers on, more dangerous perhaps when he is not in power than when he was. The probable truth of the matter is that it is not so much Richberg that is fascinating as the idea he stood for. The President still believes that capitalism is essentially sound, and needs government merely to smooth out its rough edges. Each time he finds he is wrong, as happened when the big break came two months ago, he gets flustered and thrown off his balance. Then he rights himself again and continues on his way.



Georges Schreiber

Senator Minton

To those who urge him to undertake a deliberate program of industrial control, his answer is that all his economic advisers have differing versions of the economic picture, and their advice cancels out. There is some force in this. There are inflationists and deflationists, those who think that only a drastic economic plan will be effective and those who feel that it would be incredibly naive to base an economic plan on the scanty knowledge of the detailed industrial and financial processes that Washington now possesses, those who would break up the big business structures and those who would leave them alone. Most of these battles are waged between theorists and chart experts in the bureaus and commissions, and never reach Congress, which is completely innocent of economic theory and has the amateur's distrust of it. The only exception is the industrial-expansion bill, introduced by Representative Jerry Voorhis of California and based to a considerable extent on the plan set forth in Mordecai Ezekiel's excellent book, "$2,500 a Year." But Ezekiel himself has been in the doghouse for almost two years, so far as the President is concerned. Amid these cross-purposes Mr. Roosevelt's mind turns more to arms and navalism, where he feels himself on firm ground, and away from economics, where (if I may be allowed the pun) he is at sea.

But the time will come when Mr. Roosevelt will enter a new phase. With the present program, even if there is an upward turn this spring, business indices are bound to drop again and unemployment to rise. The President will be compelled to act on the phrase in his message about our potential national income being ninety to a hundred billion a year, and to force production and price policies to gear themselves to a purchasing power that will approach that level. When that time comes, perhaps in 1940, the President will find an old problem reviving itself—the question of the Supreme Court. For there is considerable doubt whether even some of the liberals on the court would be enthusiastic about so vigorous a program of control. That is why the question of the successor to Justice Sutherland is so important now. Such "liberals" as Donald Richberg, Judge Harold Stephens, and Judge Bratton, whose names have been mentioned, might turn out to be frail supports. Senator Minton of Indiana and Solicitor General Stanley F. Reed are most prominently discussed, but the liberalism of both is an unknown quantity. Minton stands up as one of the better progressive Senators, and the appointment would come well as a reward. But there is little more to say for it. Reed is a good lawyer and has won his court cases, but much the same applies to him. It is thought that he will be held in reserve until Justice McReynolds resigns. The chances are that the selection will be from the Middle or Far West, and Lloyd Garrison, Governor La Follette, and Governor Murphy have been mentioned. But here again, the best guess is that Mr. Roosevelt will do the incalculable.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

Fighting Fascism by Law

BY LUCILLE B. MILNER

WHEN, after considerable verbal warfare in Parliament and press, England passed its Public Order Act early in 1937, optimistic anti-fascist forces hoped that here was a positive cure for the black-shirted plague that had been festering on the island. But only two months after the passage of the act, London witnessed the emergence of anti-Semitism as a political issue for the first time in the long history of the County Council. Hooliganism unparalleled in British political life marked the March elections, with Sir Oswald Mosley baiting the Jews at their very doorsteps in East London and demanding a "mandate on this Jewish question." Gangs of fascists wearing British Union of Fascists badges and carrying the Union Jack paraded through the Jewish sector shouting anti-Jewish slogans: "We gotta get rid of the Yids"; "Perish Judah"; "Roll on the pogrom." Shops were wrecked and citizens were brutally assaulted.

Fascist candidates polled almost 8,000 votes in three London districts—18 per cent of the total vote. As a result there was an intensification of Jew-baiting and violence, followed by a period of comparative quiet. "The grosser forms of Jew-baiting diminished," according to the Commissioner of Police. But not for long. A report of the National Council for Civil Liberties presents an alarming list of outrages in the Jewish district. On May 4, at a large fascist meeting in Glasshouse Street, Mick Clarke, known as the Julius Streicher of the British Union of Fascists, indulged in anti-Semitic taunts through a microphone from the top of a van. After the meeting the crowd, escorted by foot and mounted police, marched through Whitechapel shouting: "Dirty Jew bastards . . . get back to Palestine." In June a fifteen-year-old Jewish boy, on his way home from work at midnight, was knocked to the ground, viciously kicked about the head and face, and left unconscious with a serious injury to one eye. In July an East End shopkeeper, opening his door late one night, was met by two fascists who yelled: "Filthy Jew, we'll settle you later on." A few days later three men walking through Bethnal Green were attacked by a band of fascists; one, an elderly man, was beaten on the face with the buckle of a belt and severely injured. A bomb which failed to explode was thrown at a Jewish shop. A shopkeeper's supply of eggs was destroyed. Fascists whitewashed the initials "P. J." (Perish Judah) on a shop front, declaring the symbol stood for "Poor Jews." Investigators report that almost every evening some trouble develops in the Jewish districts.

It is generally believed that police partiality and police-court leniency are responsible for the continuance of these outrages, and that the Home Office has permitted this state of affairs to reach its present proportions. An increase in the number of police in the Jewish district and the introduction of nightly patrols and plain-clothes officers have been of little avail. Actually, there has been an increase in the number of assaults on Jews since these steps were taken, and there is considerable evidence to prove that the plain-clothes officers are the worst offenders. No improvement can be expected, responsible individuals in the district insist, until the police are instructed by the Home Secretary and the Commissioner of Police to enforce the Public Order Act impartially.

Cases of obvious police leniency are many. At the fascist demonstration in Glasshouse Street on May 4, police were present in large numbers, but made no attempt to put an end to Mick Clarke's anti-Semitic tirade. No curb was attempted in July when Clarke led a procession of fascists through East London, singing provocative songs and obstructing traffic in direct violation of the ban imposed by the Commissioner of Police on all processions in that section; or at another fascist meeting where the speaker attacked prominent living Jews, including Lord Melchett, and described them as "hook-nosed, yellow-skinned, dirty Jewish swine"; or at still another meeting where the fascist speaker referred to Jews as "venereal-ridden vagrants." All these utterances are offenses under the Public Order Act, which prohibits insulting words and behavior from which a breach of peace might result. Yet in each case the police officers refused to issue a summons against the speakers.

Police-court magistrates have shown provocative leniency toward those offenders who have been haled into court. On one occasion, when twenty fascists had attacked four men, the magistrate discharged the assailants with the mere comment that it was unwise for private individuals to take the law into their own hands. In another case the magistrate imposed only a small fine, remarking, "I can see you are decent young fellows." After fascists had assaulted a Jewish storekeeper and damaged his property, the magistrate at the Old Street Police Court chided them for behaving "very stupidly." One of two men summoned to court for insulting behavior at an East End meeting had been before the court on a similar charge six months earlier and been promised imprisonment if his offense was repeated, but the magistrate decided to give him still another chance.

Occasionally, however, so-called violations of the Public Order Act are prosecuted. A newspaper vender calling out the caption on his placard, "André executed by Nazis," was charged by the police with using insulting words and behavior likely to cause a breach of the peace, although the words were true. At an exhibition at Hendon Aerodrome a man was charged with insulting behavior because he put up a small pacifist poster on a fence near the aerodrome. A man was convicted of using insulting words when he called out "Give us bread!" at a demonstration of the unemployed.

A striking example of discrimination against anti-fascists was the charge of mounted police into a Thurloe Square meeting called to protest against the repeated denial of the use of Albert Hall to anti-fascist organizations. The speakers included a clergyman, a Liberal candidate for Parliament, and a member of the Labor Party. The meeting was orderly. At 9 p.m., during the clergyman's address, a squad of mounted police rode their horses into the crowd, swinging their clubs indiscriminately and injuring many persons. Public indignation was aroused and a government inquiry demanded. But the Home Office refused to intervene. An unofficial inquiry was set up by the National Council for Civil Liberties, and in a preface to the report of the investigating committee Harold J. Laski, professor of political science at the University of London, wrote: "There is no use denying that there is an ugly body of suspicion abroad about police behavior in dealing with the problems created by the fascist movement." In a public address A. M. Wall, secretary of the London Trades Council, declared:

> I am appalled by the glaring instances of the failure of the authorities to enforce adequately the law against Sir Oswald Mosley and his associates. The British brand of fascists have slavishly copied the Jew-baiting tactics of Hitler. Their use of insulting epithets and filthy language has, however, probably excelled even the most vulgar of Hitler's henchmen, and I am filled with apprehension by the failure of the authorities to apply the law [Public Order Act] to these cases. Perhaps a reason why the police hesitate to charge these ruffians is the leniency shown by magistrates when convictions have been secured.

The Public Order Act was passed in January, 1937, in response to the demand of certain Liberal and Labor members of Parliament for legislation to deal with the militarization of politics and the wearing of semi-military uniforms. Friends of civil liberties pointed out that the existing law was satisfactory if the police would exercise its powers against the fascists as it had against labor and radical leaders, and warned against the dangers of further legislation of this type. When the text of the government's bill was published, it was found to go much farther than the existing crisis. Repressive measures which the government had had under consideration for over two years were included. The opposition was ineffectual, and the government measure was passed.

The act makes it an offense to wear political uniforms in any public place or at any public meeting, but police chiefs may sanction the wearing of political uniforms in public for any "ceremonial anniversary or other special occasions" if it is believed that this will not cause public disorder. This loophole practically nullifies the section, for "anniversaries" and "special occasions" are the very times when the wearing of the uniform may be provocative. A political uniform is not defined in the act; it rests with the magistrate or judge to decide what constitutes such a uniform.

Members of an association, the act provides, may not be trained or equipped for the purpose of usurping the functions of the police or of the armed forces of the Crown, or "for the use or display of physical force in promoting any political object," or merely "arouse reasonable apprehension" that they are so trained.

Police chiefs are given discretionary and virtually dictatorial powers to forbid processions if they have a "reasonable ground" for fearing serious public disorder. Further, the police chief may apply to the local council for an order prohibiting all public processions for a period not exceeding three months. The requirement of an order from the local authorities was considered a concession to members of Parliament who insisted upon some slight element of democratic control. But shortly after the act was passed, the Home Secretary circularized local authorities advising them to delegate these powers to their Watch Committee. Since the police chief is the executive officer of the Watch Committee, this advice voided the slight concession. Police chiefs may also forbid banners bearing provocative slogans. Since it is well known that the fascist groups carry only Union Jacks and black flags similar to Italian military standards, and that trade unions and democratic organizations use banners bearing slogans, this clause is considered a direct attempt to interfere with the expression of legitimate political opinion by labor, liberal, and radical groups.

The section of the old law penalizing the use of "threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behavior" whereby a breach of the peace is likely to occur formerly applied only to streets and public places in large towns, but the act extends the offense to the entire country and to meetings held even in private halls. The warning of liberals that this section might be abused has been justified by the behavior of pro-fascist police officers and courts. In the Harworth Colliery strike the section was used against the miners in a half-dozen or more cases.

The Public Order Act has had one good effect and one only. It has deprived the fascists of uniforms which had proved valuable in advertising and recruiting. Marching in mufti, the British Union of Fascists has lost much of its conquering-army glamor. However, while the uniform was an aid in recruiting members to the Mosley forces, it is questionable whether the ban on it has actually affected their numbers. The decline in Mosley's strength evidenced by the defeat of his candidates in the November elections was due more to financial difficulties and the defection of some prominent members than to the act. In addition to the British Union of Fascists certain other groups of a more or less political nature wore uniforms. Sections of the Independent Labor Party wore red shirts, and the Social Credit Party displayed green shirts. These too are banned by the law. Such organizations as the Boy Scouts and the Salvation Army continue to wear uniforms because they are regarded as non-political.

The act has enormously increased the power of the police to interfere with the legitimate activities of democratic and left-wing organizations. For instance, the Commissioner of the London Police on June 21 prohibited all political processions in East London for a period of twelve weeks and recently renewed the ban for another six months. Since the act gives the authorities the power to place a ban on any kind of procession which is likely to cause a breach of peace, the general order was unnecessary. It has become obvious that when circumstances necessitate any kind of action against fascists, the government uses the opportunity to take action also against democratic groups.

Yale Needs the C.I.O.

BY GEORGE BUTLER

New Haven, January 8

YALE UNIVERSITY is one of the largest educational institutions in the world, spending over $8,000,000 each year and employing thousands of professional and non-professional workers in its colossal plant. It is also one of the most prosperous institutions of its kind. Among the members of the Yale Corporation are representatives of the Chase National Bank, the New York Trust Company, the Morgan interests, United States Steel, and various railroads and public utilities.

Since Yale University is such a large and prosperous and well-governed institution, one might expect it to maintain model labor standards. What are the facts? A few years ago one of the professors became interested in this question and attempted to study hours and working conditions in Yale and other institutions of higher learning. But when the Yale treasurer heard of the project, he protested to the dean of the Divinity School, saying that thousands of dollars were at stake. The dean tactfully suggested to the professor that he turn his researches into less dangerous channels. An unhampered investigator, however, soon discovers that in the Divinity School itself wages and working conditions for the lower-paid employees lag far behind the best practice. Maids, most of the janitors, and all of the gatemen work a seven-day week. Practically all service employees work intolerably long hours. None receive adequate compensation. Few receive vacations with pay.

Consider Mrs. X, who has charge of the steam table in the refectory. Mrs. X starts work at 7:30 a. m. and finishes at 6:45 p. m. She is supposed to have three-quarters of an hour free in the morning and two in the afternoon, but she lives too far away to go home and Yale provides no rest room for her. This system of long hours split by rest periods but with no rest rooms provided is practiced throughout the university. Mrs. X receives $12 a week for her six-day week. And at the start of the school year she must work many hours of overtime without pay.

Maids throughout the university work five hours a day seven days a week, and receive $8.75. Mrs. Y, a Law School maid, must clean fifteen suites, or forty-five rooms, in five hours. She was responsible for only thirty-six rooms until Yale's economy program went into effect a few years ago. Since almost all maids and janitors are laid off for the entire summer vacation, Mrs. Y's yearly wage is $332.50.

Compare these conditions with those in the laundry industry of Connecticut. According to the official survey of 1935, the median wage for women laundry workers in cities of 100,000 and over is 29.1 cents an hour. Yale's rate is 25 cents. Of 967 women employed in laundries, only 15 received less than 25 cents an hour. In other words, more than 98 per cent of the women laundry workers of Connecticut received as much as or more than the maids in Yale buildings. Yet not Yale but the laundry business is considered a sweatshop industry.

Connecticut laundries pay male workers a median wage of 38.8 cents an hour. Yale University pays a night watchman, whose position is one of trust and responsibility, $25 a week for ten hours a night, seven nights one week, six the next. Averaging sixty-five hours a week, he receives 38.5 cents an hour.

The New Haven Hospital receives $50,000 a year from Yale University because of its close relationship to the medical and nursing schools. A study of wages paid non-professional help, such as orderlies, ward helpers, messengers, and kitchen assistants, shows that four-fifths of them receive an average wage of $51.30 per month, or $615 a year—hardly a health and decency wage. True, meals are supposed to be furnished to these workers, but no allowance is made for family men who prefer their meals at home. The hospital workers also work long hours, averaging 53.7 a week.

During the depression the Yale Corporation did not reduce the salaries of professors and deans in the $10,000 class, but it cut the pay of the lowest workers and laid many of them off. In the main library, for instance, seven maintenance persons were discharged, their duties being added to those of the workers who remained. In one of the departmental libraries so many were discharged that the librarian said it was physically impossible for those who were left to handle the work. In 1935 wages of about 600 of the lowest-paid workers were reduced 5 and 10 per cent. Janitors were cut from $20.77 a week to $20 a week; library maintenance workers from $23.07 to $22; campus police and gate porters from $38.50 and $24.50 to $35 and $22, respectively.

As a result of this economy program, $28,000 was saved, not a large item in the Yale budget. Many students protested vigorously in letters to the Yale Daily News and the Alumni Weekly, pointing out that a 1 per cent cut in faculty and administrative salaries would have saved $30,000, or more than was saved by the 5 and 10 per cent cuts in workers' wages. David B. McCalmont, '32, editor-in-chief of the Yale Law Journal, wrote:

> The affair is probably just an April Fool false rumor, for the university seems to be spending just as much money as ever on luxurious upholstery to soothe our backs, expensive wood carvings to delight our eyes, fertilizer for the lawns to delight our noses, and new books on stained-glass windows and ancient English poetry to satisfy our aesthetic sense. For these noble purposes, to be sure, our janitors will be more than willing to give up the luxury of riding two or three miles to and from work on a trolley car, or the luxury of serving milk to their children.

With the return of prosperity and generous gifts, Yale restored the pay cuts in the academic year 1936-37.

Members of the Divinity School Student Council last spring sent a vigorous protest to President Angell about the inhuman working conditions which obtained at the Divinity School. After waiting two weeks and receiving no reply, they tried to obtain an appointment with Dr. Angell. They were referred to the associate treasurer and comptroller, Mr. Farnum, who granted them an interview late in May, 1937. In response to a request that Sunday work be abolished at the Divinity School, Mr. Farnum said that since the work was light, he felt that a seven-day week was good for the employees—it kept them occupied and out of trouble. He said further that he had received no complaint from the employees concerned, and he was sure there would have been no trouble if agitators had not stirred them up. As a result of this interview, the Student Council appointed a continuation committee to carry the matter farther this year. That it will be carried farther is now assured by the promise of Michael F. Widman, Jr., regional director of the C. I. O. for New England, of an immediate organizational drive among Yale's service employees. The drive is to be aided by a permanent student committee and will have the support of a specially created alumni advisory committee for which Alfred M. Bingham has consented to serve as secretary.

The head of the New Haven Charities told me that not only are Yale employees forced on relief during the summer months, but that even during the winter some of them unfortunately blessed with big families receive supplementary relief to piece out Yale's parsimony. Doubtless New Haven citizens will be glad to know that their welfare agencies keep Yale's workers from starving during the summer. Some may even consider it a privilege to pay taxes and contribute to the Community Chest, knowing that such contributions make it possible for Yale's workers to buy milk for their children. How happy should New Haven taxpayers be to know that their tax money is in reality a contribution for God, for Country, and for Yale!

Probably few corporations in the country, from Republic Steel to Henry Ford, are in more desperate need of the C. I. O. than Yale.

Mussolini Schemes for Egypt

BY LEONARD CARLTON

THE imperial systems of both hemispheres watch with a jealous eye the half-dozen strategic centers of military power. Singapore, Gibraltar, the Dardanelles, Suez, the Panama Canal—all of these are key points which may determine the outcome of future wars. Today the attention of the world is riveted on events in Egypt. An eighteen-year-old king dismisses his government and unrest sweeps the land, but the ratio of royal to civil power is a domestic issue, of little importance beyond the nation's borders. Europe's chancelleries are concerned about something quite different: does the action of King Farouk foreshadow a changing foreign policy at Cairo which will replace London with Rome as guardian, policeman, and adviser?

It is still too early to say with assurance what Farouk and his advisers have in mind, but the chances are that no major shift in Egypt's international orientation is impending. Italy cannot meet the bills, equip and pay the army, extend the loans which an ambitious ruler wants. Mussolini is aggressive; Chamberlain is willing to bargain. Cairo knows that nothing would end this desirable state of affairs more quickly than a turn toward Rome. London is reasonable now, but that does not mean—and King Farouk knows it—that John Bull will let control of the land bordering the Suez slip through his fingers.

In the bitter rivalry between Italy and Great Britain over Mediterranean supremacy, the land of the pyramids is the ace of trumps. Those who have viewed Mussolini's pact with Germany as a transitory phase of Italian foreign policy have paid inadequate attention to the shifts in basic strategy which Rome has carried out since 1935. There is nothing temporary in a policy which looks on with complete tranquillity at the spectacle of Germany making hay along the Danube but reacts galvanically to every ripple on the surface of the Mediterranean. General Vallee, Under Secretary for Air, recently commented on the "radical change which has occurred in the strategic field assigned to our air arm, under which the center of gravity has clearly shifted from the valley of the Po toward the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, and the Indian Ocean." In the development of naval and air bases there has been a definite shift eastward; Taranto, for example, is being developed at the expense of Spezia, and Messina and Brindisi are receiving attention which formerly would have gone to Venice and Pola.

Twice in the last two years Italy has struck at France and Great Britain by moving troops to North Africa. In 1935 the Duce answered League of Nations sanctions by swelling his Libyan garrison to some 50,000 men. This autumn, when there were indications that France was about to open its border to allow shipment of arms to Loyalist Spain, one entire army corps was assembled on Libyan soil and the organization of another begun for a total of about 80,000 men. Egypt, to be sure, was assured that these reinforcements were no threat to it, but the British and Egyptian military organizations have been speeding up their preparations against attack ever since. Maneuvers have been held, appropriations increased, soldiers moved to their desert stations, and military training extended. Both Cairo and London know that there is only one military justification for such a striking force to the westward. They know that the Duce as early as 1924 declared, "We must have Egypt; we shall be great only if we can get Egypt."

If Mussolini's pretensions to empire are to be maintained, he must break the British hold on the bottlenecks at Gibraltar and Suez. The clear object of the Italian navy's building program is to convert an excellent force of small craft eminently suitable for operations in narrow waters into a full-fledged high-seas fleet. As General Franco makes the English position at Gibraltar increasingly precarious, so the flames are creeping closer to Suez. The only great public-works project which Italy has completed since the Ethiopian campaign is the $5,000,000 trans-Libyan road—pointed unmistakably at the heart of Britain's empire.

How much does London know of these plans? Surely enough to take them seriously. In June, 1936, Geoffrey Mander, a Liberal M. P. asked Anthony Eden if he would "state the nature of the plans for an Italian attack on Egypt which were found in the Italian staff plane that crashed in the Sudan in August, 1935 . . . and what representations were made to the Italian government on the matter and what action was taken." He got little satisfaction from the cautious Foreign Secretary, of course, but it is worth noting that the British military, in September, 1935, began to develop the little desert port of Mersa Matruth, 140 miles from the Libyan frontier, and in four months made it a strong right flank against invasion from the west. By the end of 1935 the Egyptian government had decided to extend the Alexandria-Fuka railroad to Mersa Matruh, a distance of forty-nine miles. And in the incredibly short time of seventy-seven days the rails were laid. It almost seems as if there were some point to Mr. Mander's question.

Egypt, without question, is the strategic center of the British Empire. Admiral Mahan wrote in 1900:

> Egypt in military situation approaches the ideal; for to a local concentration of forces, defensive and offensive, operative in two directions, toward Gibraltar or toward India, it adds several streams of supply, so diverse in origin that no one navy can take position to intercept them all. . . . If the Mediterranean be blocked, the Red Sea remains, always the shortest route to India. . . . The truer solution for a state already holding Malta and Gibraltar would seem to be to grasp Egypt firmly, to consolidate local tenure there, and to establish in India, Australia, and the Cape sources of supply of ammunition and arms, against the chance of temporary interruption on the side of England.

Its importance may decrease when the Admiralty achieves its dream of an independent Far Eastern fleet based on Singapore, but at present the ability to get to Singapore quickly is crucial, and the Cape route to China takes a good seventeen days longer than by way of Suez. At least one Japanese authority has frankly admitted that the outcome of an Anglo-Japanese war would depend in large measure on London's ability to send a battle fleet to its great Far Eastern base in time. If Japan's good friend at Rome can block the passage of warships through "his" sea, Great Britain must be able to base a fleet in the eastern Mediterranean.

Actually, how well can Egypt be defended? Developments of the twentieth century have certainly weakened its position. In a British Admiralty report issued in 1912 it was laid down that no possible opponent should be permitted to hold a naval base less than one thousand miles from Suez, or in other words east of Malta. Italy now has two within the proscribed area—in the Dodecanese Islands of the Aegean and in Libya at Tobruk, only 60 miles from the Egyptian border and less than 450 from Port Said. Italy's naval strength is often sensationally overestimated. A strong British naval force in the eastern Mediterranean should be able to protect its bases and keep the Haifa pipe line and the Suez Canal safe from any purely naval attack. Mussolini's announced new building program, which will give him the largest number of submarines of any navy, will, however, make the task more difficult.

To some extent the chances of a successful land campaign against Egypt from the west will be determined by naval control. Should the British retain freedom of movement in the eastern Mediterranean, the Libyan seacoast road along which the large mechanized Italian army would have to travel would be under the fire of the fleet's big guns. The Italians are seeking to counteract this threat by building desert roads to the Egyptian frontier at more southerly points. One of these is said to reach the border at Jarabul, while another runs from Tobruck to the Sudan at Oweinat. There is little doubt that the army in Libya is becoming formidable. Last September the Cairo correspondent of the London Daily Herald reported that the Italians were organizing mechanized forces for desert service made up of equal numbers of air-borne, motorized, and camel-mounted troops, and that native Askari soldiers were being sent into the interior while newly arrived, highly trained Italians were taking over the border positions. He asserted that great stores of food, fuel, and munitions were being accumulated along the strategic roads.

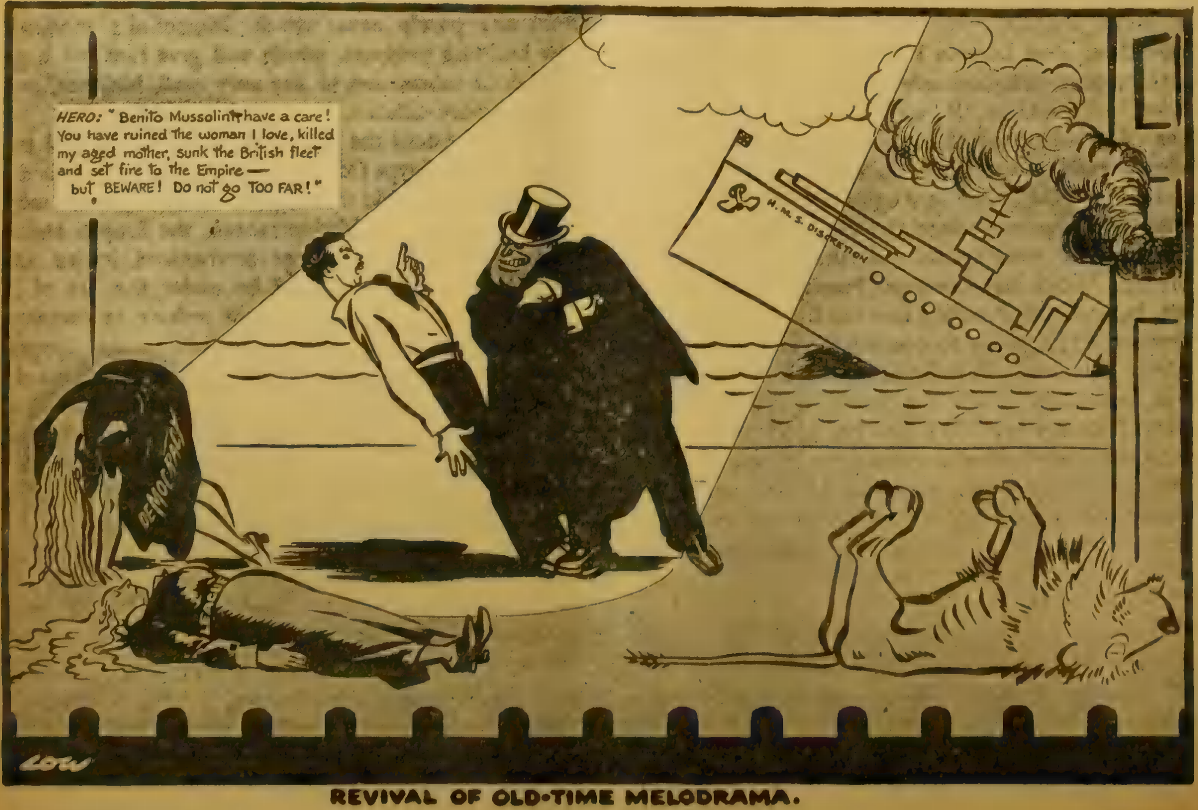
But it is the air weapon which has stripped Egypt of its island-on-the-land position. The new Italian bombers care little for the 400 miles of desert to the west or the 90 miles of cruel, rocky terrain which lie between the Nile Valley and the Gulf of Suez. The lack of bases in the immediate vicinity of Suez should not be too great a handicap. In last summer's Sicily maneuvers, air-force units working from widely distributed bases covered as much as 560 miles on the flight to their objectives. Planes operating from Ethiopia would be only from 100 to 250 miles from important centers in the Sudan.

Egypt has indeed cause to fear the air raid. Not only are its cities vulnerable, but it must guard the Suez Canal, the all-important Nile irrigation barrages, and the great dams of the Sudan which control floods and store the water on which the farmer depends for his crops. Italy, for its part, has pioneered in the development of long-range bombers. In the Savoia-Marchetti 79 three-engined bomber, the Regia Aeronautica boasts one of the world's best. Visitors to last year's Milan air show were impressed with a new twin-engined craft, the Piaggio 32 bomber, which is said to maneuver like a small plane and to be able to work with a minimum of fighter protection. It has a stated speed of 260 miles per hour carrying a load of 7,700 pounds, and is reported already in quantity production.

What is Great Britain going to do about it? Ironically enough, the nationalist agitation which gave Prime Minister Baldwin a severe headache in 1935 has resulted in an Egyptian defense organization much superior to that which London would otherwise have been able to command. The very concessions which the Wafd Party fought for are taking a considerable burden off English shoulders. A British military mission has been transforming an army of some 13,000 men, without machine-guns, armored cars, or tanks, into a strongly mechanized and motorized force of twice that size with a strong air force. The new Premier, announcing his adherence to the Anglo-Egyptian treaty clauses, has talked about raising an Egyptian army of 50,000 men. Two Egyptian infantry battalions have moved into the Sudan, closed to them for the past thirteen years. It is reported that they will take over the development of Port Sudan, the defense of Khartoum's great Gebel Aulia dam, furnish coastal defense, searchlight, and anti-aircraft units, and patrol the Eritrean and Ethiopian borders.

Even the pending withdrawal of British troops from Cairo and Alexandria will not be the blow it might once have been. Since the Romans the conquerors of Egypt have held it by garrisons at Alexandria, Cairo, and Aswan. Until the Anglo-Egyptian treaty restrained their infantry to the canal zone, the British had held to the same strategic disposition, for which, in fact, there was considerable military justification in the lack of desert roads and railroads necessary for freedom of maneuver. These are now being built and extended. Mechanization leads to mobility, and today Cairo lies within two hours of the canal areas. Moreover, squadrons of the Royal Air Force are to remain in the areas which will be evacuated by the infantry.

The defense of Egypt depends on the cooperation of the Egyptian throne and government with the British government. As has already been said, this will most probably be continued. In any case, however, the land of the pyramids is likely to see harsh and bloody days. If Italy and England fight they will fight about Egypt first.



HERO: "Benito Mussolini, have a care! You have ruined the woman I love, killed my aged mother, sunk the British fleet and set fire to the Empire — but BEWARE! Do not go TOO FAR!"
DEMOCRACY LEAGUE
H.M.S. DISCRETION
LOW

REVIVAL OF OLD-TIME MELODRAMA.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

That War Referendum

BELIEVING that there is much public misunderstanding of the Ludlow war-referendum proposal—a misunderstanding sedulously cultivated in reactionary and military circles and by all who would profit by war—I have endeavored to bring together the arguments against the proposed amendment and the answers to them. If any important ones have been overlooked, it is not intentional but due to necessary space limits.

1. The referendum would be a blow to our whole system of representative government.

Answer: A national referendum in which the people could vote on important issues has been successively urged by Theodore Roosevelt, William J. Bryan, Robert La Follette, Sr., Woodrow Wilson, and, I believe, Franklin Roosevelt. War is the most important of all issues. The referendum is in use in many American states, notably in New York; it has for centuries been in use in the democracy of Switzerland. No injury to representative government arises from the use of referendums.

2. The referendum will cripple our diplomacy and tie the President's hands.

Answer: This is true only if diplomacy and the President cannot function without being prepared to use war as an instrument of national policy—this use of war was formally renounced by the United States when it pledged its name and honor to the Kellogg Peace Pact. The purpose of the Ludlow referendum is to deprive the Executive of the war-making power as far as possible.

3. The President can be trusted not to put us into war; he will know when the cause is just and what the people want.

Answer: General Grant denounced the war in Mexico, in which he served as an officer, "as one of the most unjust ever waged by a stronger against a weaker nation"; he called it "unholy." In the Spanish War, as history now records, Spain surrendered to the United States completely before President McKinley went to Congress asking for a declaration of war. The President deceived Congress by withholding the Spanish surrender. James Ford Rhodes and other historians assert that this was done for purely political reasons, to strengthen the Republican Party. Mr. Wilson put the country into war seven times and only once asked consent of Congress.

4. The Congress can be trusted to vote as the people wish because the people are its constituents.

Answer: As shown above, the war-making power, lodged by the Constitution in the hands of Congress, has been usurped by the Executive, who can and does render Congress impotent to exercise its free will by using the prestige of his office, the power of Presidential propaganda, and even, as did Woodrow Wilson in the case of the armed-ship bill, public denunciation of the legislators opposing him as "twelve wilful little men." By the use of army and navy and the diplomatic service the President can maneuver us into a position where there is nothing left for Congress to do but to vote yes.

5. But this state of affairs will not be altered if the referendum is voted because the President will still be commander-in-chief of army and navy and head of the diplomatic service, and will still have the power of prestige and propaganda.

Answer: This is true. A President can put this country into war no matter what laws may be framed, until such time as the American people definitely forbid the resort to war. The referendum will, however, slow up the President, put an additional brake upon him, and impress upon him the desire of the people to reserve to themselves the war-making power. President Roosevelt admitted the present control by the President when he said at Chautauqua on August 14, 1936: "Nevertheless . . . the effective maintenance of American neutrality depends today, as in the past, on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State."

6. The President, bearing his tremendous responsibilities for the maintenance of peace, is less likely to be swayed by passion or propaganda than are the people, who may be misled by demagogues using the radio and other means of communication.

Answer: The case of McKinley is again in point here. But the best witness is Franklin D. Roosevelt, who in the same speech at Chautauqua declared that if war should break out again, thousands of Americans would attempt to break down our neutrality, "seeking immediate riches—fools' gold." He continued: "To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace." He demanded that the nation, confronted with a choice between profits and peace, should answer, "We choose peace"; and he said, "The answer will be clear and for all practical purposes unanimous." He gave us the truthful picture of a President subject, when war nears, to terrific pressure by interested groups, as Wilson was in 1914-17, to put us into war for the sake of profits. The passage of the referendum would relieve the Executive to some extent of such pressure. As for the possibility that the people may be misled by propaganda and induced to vote for war, there can be no doubt that that may happen. It is a risk of democracy, and it pertains not only to war but to every election. But at least the parents of the boys then about to die, and the boys themselves if twenty-one, will have voted on their fate.

7. A referendum would advertise the differences of opinion and so encourage possible enemies.

Answer: There has never yet been a war fought by the United States to which there was not tremendous opposition up to the very moment when war was declared—even in 1812. There is much evidence to show that had there been a referendum in the United States in 1917, while the Atlantic seaboard would have voted for war, the people in the West would have voted no. There will always be differences of opinion in Congress as to any war, as well as in the public press.

8. The country may be attacked, in which case (a) there will be no time to take a vote, and (b) the President and the military forces will be weakened if not estopped by the referendum.

Answer: (a) The amendment will not be operative if the country is attacked, and every foreign war in which the United States has engaged has approached slowly; months and years of preparation have preceded the declaration. A vote could be taken today on whether the people of the United States wish this country to go to war with Japan or not. It is preposterous to assert that there would be long delays in ascertaining the people's will by the use of existing or new electoral machinery. A vote could be obtained within seventy-two hours, since by means of the radio the government could notify the remotest hamlet what the question was and when the voting. (b) The referendum will offer no grounds for the army and navy to cease preparing for hostilities. If, as Mr. Stimson declares, the necessity of waiting for a decision "would destroy the initiative and spirit of our personnel," there must be something very wrong with that personnel and its leadership.

9. As Mr. Stimson asserts, "the power and speed of modern naval and air attacks" would make possible in twenty-four hours "a devastating blow upon one of our great cities and its neighboring industrial centers and the landing within a week of 100,000 men . . . "

Answer: This is the purest guesswork. It presupposes the defeat of the fleet, the passing of all mines, the conquest of the coast defenses of the harbor, and ability to force a landing. If one begins by conceding everything to the enemy, one can prove the conquest of Washington in two weeks. Obviously Mr. Stimson is entirely misleading when he declares that an army of 100,000 men could be landed a week after a surprise attack. There is no nation except England which has the merchant fleet to move such a force and its impedimenta quickly. It is absolutely unthinkable that the preparation for such a gigantic undertaking, which must use hundreds of ships loaded with tanks, airplanes, poison gas, heavy and light artillery, plus enormous supplies of ammunition and gasoline, could be hidden. There are only a dozen ships which could move soldiers across the ocean in a week.

10. But naval ships might be sunk and the government could not mobilize the nation for self-defense.

Answer: If every ship in our Asiatic squadron were sunk tomorrow by Japan, we should have plenty of time simultaneously to mobilize and to await the taking of the referendum on whether the American people wished to plunge the country into war to revenge the loss of those ships. Further, the question is an indictment of our military and naval preparations. If our war departments have today no plans for immediate mobilization of the first and second lines of defense in case of attack, then they are entirely incompetent to defend us.

11. Why should we, as Mr. Stimson asks, take up with "untried panaceas" in this critical hour of the world's history?

Answer: We progress only by trying new methods and measures. Our whole neutrality legislation, whether good or bad, is a new venture in diplomacy. There is no precedent for it to be found anywhere; it is a complete reversal of our historic policy. Yet no fair-minded judge will deny that that legislation was passed three times in response to the overwhelming sentiment of the American people. It may be an unsatisfactory device to keep us out of war, but the American people wanted it and were not deterred by the fact that it was an "untried panacea."

12. The referendum would fatally cripple, if not end, the Monroe Doctrine.

Answer: If this is true it presupposes that the American people would decline to fight to protect Central or South American nations from European attack. Is there any reason why they should not decide whether they wish to sacrifice their sons, the national wealth, perhaps our institutions, to keep Germans out of Brazil or the Argentine? They are competent and have the right to pass upon such a question. As a matter of fact, Senator La Follette's alternative to the Ludlow plan specially exempts cases in which there is an attack on the territory of any North American or Caribbean nation.

13. The amendment cannot be phrased to cover every case.

Answer: This argument is true, but it is not controlling. No neutrality legislation can be framed which will foresee every possible contingency, but that is no reason why there should not be the best possible neutrality laws which it is in our power to draft. Mr. Ludlow's referendum is intended for debate and amendment.

14. Could not Executive usurpation of the war power be ended and Congress still left in control of it?

Answer: In the eyes of those who support the Ludlow resolution the war-making power should rest only in the hands of the people because a war today, as distinct from the Civil War, or the war with Spain, would jeopardize the very life of the nation, and destroy our democratic institutions. Modern war involves every citizen, probably the children; even if victory comes, it means staggering debts, world-wide industrial depression and unemployment, complete industrial dislocation through the turning over of a large portion of industry to the war machine. There is every evidence that the country would come out of it with a fascist rule established. The American democracy is the most precious thing in the world today. Only the American people should have the right to decide whether its very existence shall be risked by their going to war.

BURLINGAME
LIBRARY

BOOKS and the ARTS

Keeping the Peace

THE FINAL CHOICE: AMERICA BETWEEN EUROPE AND ASIA. By Stephen and Joan Raushenbush. Reynal and Hitchcock: John Day. $2.50.

NOT so long ago a group of New York editors, economists, and authors sat around a table to discuss American foreign policy. Nearly everyone began by taking a stance on one of several high barrels each labeled "IF." IF the great democracies—England, France, the United States, and (by courtesy) Russia—would stick together and take a strong hand with the berserker nations . . . IF the so-called satiated nations would collectively apply economic sanctions, withholding steel, scrap iron, oil, rubber, and credits . . . IF the "haves" would make a really magnanimous gesture and give Herr Have-Not Hitler the old German colonies, plus a loan, plus Anschluss, plus a free commercial hand in the Danube basin . . . IF the United States would stick firmly to neutrality-plus-cash-and-carry . . . IF the United States would forget Europe and Asia and fight for socialism at home . . . and so on. Before the evening had ended, every single barrel had been knocked into kindling: each defender of an IF had brilliantly exposed the flimsy nature of every other IF. Whereupon each defender—including yours truly, the writer of this review—went home to reconstruct his barrel on the theory that it is better to have a flimsy barrel than no barrel at all.

The virtue of the Raushenbushes resides in their cantankerous, obstinate, mulish insistence upon analyzing the tacit assumptions that underlie most of the IF's. They start with no parti pris for "isolationism" or "internationalism," the two polar abstractions that tend to shut off rational discussion. The historical section of their book traverses a territory made familiar to us by Grattan, Millis, Borchard, and others. But even in going over old ground the Raushenbushes contribute new detail, new insights. Since they are Multiple Causationists, they waste no time trying to isolate the war bacillus: in their opinion the United States entered the World War through the dynamic interaction of cultural predisposition, promise of profits, fear of economic collapse, idiocy in Washington, an obsolete conception of international law that made no provision for technological change in armaments, and many other things. But they are certain that fear of economic collapse (see the Page cablegram) was the final preponderating factor. And since the fear of economic collapse tipped the scales once, the Raushenbushes think that we shall drift belatedly into the next major conflict unless war sales are forcibly held to some norm that is based on peacetime plant requirements and the ability of foreign nations to pay in cash for what they take.

But to come to the IF's. The trouble with them, as the Raushenbushes show, is that they do not arise out of demonstrable realities: as abstractions, they have no one-to-one correspondence with existing groups or interests pursuing certain existing diurnal ends. "IF the great democracies would stick together . . ." Yes, but who leads the democracies and to what ends? Let us assume that "we" as a "liberal" nation ought to champion the cause of the Chinese. Does this mean that the State Department career boys would stand by "us" if and when a triumphant Chinese communism threatened to paint the features of Stalin on the Japanese Rising Sun? Does it mean that United States business—the men who now profit by selling oil and scrap to Japan—would rather see Russia dominate and develop the Orient than sell their own capital goods to a victorious Japan for the industrialization of China? Hearst, after a lifetime of irresponsible cultivation of the Yellow Peril, is now discovering the Peril of Red China. This is merely amusing when taken by itself. But it suggests a conclusion—that American "interests" would let China down should Russia threaten to become a predominating factor in any Far Eastern settlement.

Again, let us assume that Germany and Italy can be licked by force of arms. I am not at all afraid that England, France, the United States, and Russia would come out on the short end of a war with the fascist bloc. But there is no evidence that British and French capital wants to lick either Germany or Italy. All the evidence is, in fact, the other way: the idea of certain powerful British and French interests is seemingly to prop up Hitler and Mussolini domestically, and to finagle them out of any clear-cut victory in Spain or Rumania or elsewhere. Now, how are you going to get finaglers and people who don't want to think of fascists as inevitable enemies to unite on any strong, positive program? Even assuming that they could unite, I cannot visualize the peace resulting from a war against the fascist bloc as being any better than the "peace" we have now. It takes an act of pure faith—yea, one has to be as trusting as the ewe lamb—to believe that progressive elements could maintain control in democratic countries throughout a war. And if the progressive elements couldn't stay in power long enough to dominate the peace, then what is the use of "collective action" to defeat fascism? Would a "democratic" coalition run by a Soviet of Dollar-a-Year Men representing British Tories, French peasants, and United States Morgans and du Ponts be willing to guarantee the right of the defeated and by-that-time revolutionary nations to self-determine their way to communism, even to a democratic communism? If not, would the United States be willing to help police central Europe for the sake of upholding democratic puppet states? The answer to all this would seem to be obvious: imperialism, even defensive imperialism, doesn't mix with communism, nor is American provincialism, always rampant after war, compatible with "mandates" to play God across the water. This same provincialism, when disappointed in the results of a crusade, is apt to turn ugly. Remember the treatment of the wobblies and the breaking of the steel strike in 1919?

The IF about purely economic sanctions is just as unreal as the others: ineffective sanctions are futile, while effective sanctions would very likely lead to war (it is the cornered rat that bites the cat). As for the IF about neutrality-plus-cash-and-carry, the Raushenbushes say "there is no certainty that the United States will reorganize itself domestically to afford peace." It is here that we come to the crux of the matter: there are powerful interests at work in the world that tend to make peace impossible no matter which way liberals turn. If it is collective action that United States liberals want, these interests can be counted on to dominate the collective action and turn it to greedy ends. If neutrality and a Ludlow amendment are desired, these same interests can be counted on to forestall them or to render them innocuous. A united program for liberal journalists, then, would seem to be this: to name names and to cite statistics which go to prove that certain groups are blocking both the international and the isolationist roads to peace. (Eliot Janeway's investigation of the so-called capitalist international is an example of proper technique.) There is no use constructing hopeful programs based on "if" clauses that present falsified pictures of reality.

In the end the Raushenbushes mount a barrel of their own. But their "contract for peace or war," which provides for an implemented super-League with the guns, the war vessels, and the men to beat chiseling nations into line, is a Wellsian fantasy whose chief merit is a negative one: it shows that sovereignty extends no farther than the police power. If and when we do get a real League of Nations, it must be along the lines the Raushenbushes propose. But that is another IF which has no one-to-one correspondence with 1938 reality. If the Raushenbushes intended their "contract for peace or war" as irony, it stands as a fitting close to a superbly hard-headed book. If not, it shows what a hell of a way we still have to go before the Parliament of Man becomes a working proposition. Meanwhile this reviewer will go back to his own neutrality-plus-cash-and-carry barrel with little hope that he is going to be effective but with the assurance that he is going to be no more disillusioned than the collective-action liberals who think they are taking the only realistic path. Continued neutrality is probably a vain dream in a world that is marching to war. But a strong neutrality bloc in the United States is a pragmatic desirability now. It is desirable because uncertainty about the ultimate stand of any strong nation means more hesitant betting by the other nations as they go about playing the great poker game of balancing the power.

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

Dance Through the Ages

WORLD HISTORY OF THE DANCE. By Curt Sachs. Translated by Bessie Schoenberg. W. W. Norton and Company. $5.

THIS book is certainly one of the most important books that can be read about the dance in general, and in particular about the dances of primitive peoples and the emergent social dances of the Renaissance. It is called a "World History of the Dance," but it is something rather different from what its title indicates. Upon a solid base of colossal industry, erudition, and scientific organization the chief root types of the dance are set and analyzed in a frame which exemplifies the best German scholarship of recent date. Even if one did not know that Dr. Sachs was a distinguished musicologist, even if his book were unsigned, one must immediately mark the scope of its reference, its richness of analogy, the breadth of its correlations combined with almost Wagnerian overtones, elevating physical facts into the realm of mystical experience. Dr. Sachs is in the tradition of the Nietzschean dance lover, but Freud has also colored his categories. It would be impertinent, ungracious, and arrogant to question the value of this great work as a whole, but I should like to clarify several problems resident in Dr. Sachs's attitude which have bearing on dance in relation to theater. In this I am assuming that Dr. Sachs's opinions have cogency for anyone working with dance today, but most of us seriously occupied with dance must be so from a predominantly theatrical angle. Dancing is not done in our streets but in our theaters, and yet Dr. Sachs and many other dance enthusiasts, such as John Martin of the New York Times, have a profound resentment of dance in the theater, a resentment not always clearly stated but everywhere clearly felt. This anti-theatrical bias is, I feel, very dangerous for the general future of the dance.

Dr. Sachs feels that the dance is the first of the arts, living at once, unlike music, poetry, painting, and architecture, in time and space. And yet, just at the moment when the dance asserts itself on an equal and conscious footing with the other arts, Dr. Sachs leaves it, almost with resentment that it has quit its original communal function to become, what he himself first calls it, an art. He says, "Let us consider as dance all rhythmical motion not related to the work motif." He should further extend his restriction to dancing in theaters. He investigates "pure convulsive" dances, "weakened convulsive" dances, he relates the East African to the Cambodian, and in a philological paragraph analyzing the Hebrew verb rakad he asserts that King David skipped rather than danced before the ark. Fact after fact is examined, qualified, and presented in the first half of his book, "Dance Throughout the World."

In part two, "Dance Throughout the Ages," he traces the development of social dancing in the Western world, primarily in Europe, from the Protolithic period, through the lower Paleolithic, through the middle Paleolithic, down through the Protoneolithic to the later tribal cultures and Greece. His discussion of Renaissance social dances is no less detailed and no less interesting, but it is curious that he gives so much space to remote antiquity and comparatively little to more recent periods, which are as completely documented as they are completely unorganized for students. These later periods do not admit of theorizing or reconstruction and have the additional impact of their immediacy for us. In a special study this glaring gap might not be so noticeable, but in a "world history" it is hard to explain. It is not that Dr. Sachs does not know everything about maxixe, tango, charleston, shag, and big-apple. Only they do not for a variety of reasons deeply occupy him, since he considers them phenomena of a social degeneration from the primitive typus.

He divides his basic dancing types into introvert and extrovert, the one "incorporeal, transcendental," the other having "faith in his senses and in his sensual perceptions, in his strong limbs, and in the power to cause the metaphysical to become physical." As long as Dr. Sachs can occupy himself with dances of the Dinka, the Nauru, the Nilotic Nanda, or the Toba of the Gran Chaco he seems temperamentally approving. He believes in the value of an instinctive impulse which is so pure that it is almost subhuman. And even more complex forms, such as the passecaille, chaconne, sarabande, have the safely remote charm of a puzzling past. But when he comes to dancing that is to be seen and not done, when he attacks the spectacular as a degeneration of the purely communal forms, one is at a loss to follow him. He feels that the "ballet of the Orient is in the deepest sense true and inspired," since the religious tradition has kept its connection with dancing, and the natives (up to the European conquests) believed what they saw danced. Yet "the European ballet is no longer in the service of God and nature, but in that of ruling princes. Its beginning and end are cringing flattery, not god-fearing piety and devout prayer—and what goes between is empty play." Play, we grant you, but by no means empty play, unless much of princely commissioned music, poetry, architecture, sculpture, and painting is equally servile. Also dismiss all Italian mural painting,

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

A Report on

LISLE STOCKINGS

with ratings of 14 brands

What are the "Best Buys" in non-silk hose?

Which brands compare most favorably with silk stockings in appearance and in wearing quality?

How do lisle and rayon hose compare in wearing qualities?

These questions are answered in a report in the current (January) issue of Consumers Union Reports giving test results on lisle and other non-silk hosiery. More than 14 brands are rated by name as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable" on the basis of wear and laboratory tests. There is also a supplementary note on the labor conditions under which these brands are made.

Other reports in this issue cover—

HOME BUILDING and BUILDING MATERIALS. The first of a series of reports intended to supply a "layman's technique" for buying or building a home. If you want the cold facts about home ownership read this report.

STORAGE BATTERIES. This report rates 13 makes of storage batteries for comparative quality, naming those which will get a car going most readily in cold weather.

MEN'S SHIRTS and SHORTS. Of the 14 kinds of broadcloth and madras shorts tested and reported upon in this report only two are rated "Best Buys." Undershirts are also rated.

VITAMINS and COD-LIVER OIL. This report—also the first of a series—deals with vitamins and in particular with Vitamin D and cod-liver oil. The series will attempt to give a summary of what is actually known about vitamins and to estimate the value of vitamin products.

LIFE INSURANCE. This report—the third in a series which aims to supply a sound basis for judging the value of insurance policies—examines three representative contracts: renewable term, ordinary life, and 20-year endowment.

To secure a copy of this issue fill out and mail the coupon below. The membership fee of $3 will bring you 12 issues of the Reports and, without extra charge, the 250 page 1938 Consumers Union Annual Buying Guide which will appear early in 1938 and which will contain ratings of over 1500 products. Membership can be started with the current issue or with any of the following previous issues: JULY—Miniature Cameras, Gasolines, Motor Oils; AUG.-SEPT.—Refrigerators, Films, Ice Cream, Inner Tubes; OCT.—Oil Burners and Coal Stokers, Breakfast Cereals, Auto Radios; NOV.—Life Insurance, Portable Typewriters, Men's Hats; DEC.—1938 Radios, Cigars, Lipsticks, Electric Shavers.

WHAT CONSUMERS UNION IS. Consumers Union of United States is a non-profit, membership organization established to provide ultimate consumers with accurate and disinterested information on the products they use, based on laboratory and use tests by competent technicians. The results of these tests are reported monthly in Consumers Union Reports, in most cases with ratings of the products tested by brand name as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." Information is also given on the labor conditions under which products are made. If you cannot afford to spend money unwisely read Consumers Union Reports.

To: Consumers Union of U. S.
55 Vandam Street, New York, N. Y.

Send me CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS for one year (12 issues) starting with the .... issue. I enclose $3 for membership, $2.50 of which is for subscription. I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Name ....
Street ....
City .... State ....
Occupation N-1

Coming in February—
RATINGS OF THE 1938
AUTOMOBILES

CONSUMERS UNION of UNITED STATES, Inc.

COLSTON E. WARNE, President ARTHUR KALLET, Director D. H. PALMER, Technical Supervisor chamber music, and ecclesiastical architecture. The dialectic of Marx would have balanced the puritanical dogmatism of Freud in Dr. Sachs's categories. Dr. Sachs feels a sacred value in primary forms of social dancing as such, resenting its entrance into conscious art. The ballet left the royal court theaters before 1750 and has been a genuinely popular bourgeois spectacle ever since, rivaling drama and opera. It is so today. Louis the Sun King dancing only reminds Dr. Sachs of the ecstatic dances of the kings of Mexico and the Sudan. "The dancing Louis is feared by none but admired by all. He is not possessed by the god, for he is not dancing the God in whom he believes. The dance of the Sun King is the futility of egomania."

What use is there in facing this Savonarola of the dance with a protest that Louis was an artist in the direct line of the Renaissance humanist creators, whose ego was a belief in the divinity of themselves as human beings? The ballet has always been expressive of the glory of the human body released into actions which are symbols of the infinite possibilities which human beings by their own efforts may obtain. It has borrowed many decorative cloaks, as Dr. Sachs admits in one of his few late paragraphs, when he makes a half-hearted attempt at amend in speaking of the Russian ballet of Diaghilev. But these few words of praise do not compensate for the profound distaste he has of theater, a distaste which one feels is bred not of a prejudice but of a lack of familiarity. Abstract purity, or even the concrete intellectual purity of communal dance as such, has a far more distant, decorative, and romantic meaning to us than a discussion of what Noverre really meant in his reaction against the Paris Opéra. The Opéras are still with us, here in New York, in Philadelphia, Chicago, San Francisco. The stage is the place of the dance today as it was in Greece, as it was in Rome, and primitive peoples are still primitive. We need facts for the stage to help us be a better audience. Even if we are seated, we are participants. But no one can afford to omit Dr. Sachs's researches from his library, and our debt to him can never be repaid. LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

The Problem of Morals

THE CONCEPT OF MORALS. By W. T. Stace. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

MR. STACE'S book is not the usual academic treatise on morality; it was written by a man who has sought to solve the problems of ethics in terms acceptable to his own age. For this reason, if for no other, it deserves the careful scrutiny of practical and worldly men.

For our author morality is a human device, relative to the needs that created it. Because the reviewer also calls himself a modern, and because he also believes that modernity involves the acceptance of a whole-hearted empirical attitude, he has no quarrel with the avowed temper of the book. His quarrel is based rather on Mr. Stace's failure to appreciate fully the implications of empiricism in ethics.

An empirical morality, we are told, must be grounded on three universal human traits—man's desire for happiness, his social nature, and his altruism. To the first of these traits one must object. For the term happiness is too widely used to retain any meaning. But the central objection refers to the author's arbitrary selection of these three traits from among a larger number, although morality is defined by him, and correctly from his empirical point of view, as "the proper and natural functioning of human personality." But if it is so defined, morality should include all universal human traits without exception and not only those which Mr. Stace happens to prefer. Otherwise morality is not the proper and natural functioning of human personality but its improper and most unnatural functioning. And the result is not an empirical and realistic morality but a "humanistic" one, in the Babbitt-More sense of the word; with this advantage however, that the "humanistic" conclusions have been arrived at without the silly and primitive pseudo-psychology of Babbitt and More.

If moral theory is to refer to the proper and natural functioning of the human personality, its fundamental problems must be redefined, for until now its problems have been those of either an authoritarian or a rationalistic morality, chiefly concerned with discovering the means of arriving at the correct judgment of right and wrong. The fundamental problem of an empirical morality, however, arises out of the need to satisfy the permanent and urgent impulses of men in society. This is, in other words, the problem of devising techniques of satisfaction, of discovering "moral equivalents" for all genuine human impulses, those which have been traditionally repressed no less than those which have been traditionally preferred and fostered. And this in turn may call for a thoroughgoing reconstruction of human institutions. It is indicative of Mr. Stace's half-hearted empiricism that he deals with ethics without making any reference whatever to politics and economics. Now an empirical ethics will still have to face some of the traditional problems, for instance, those arising out of the effort to define with adequate clarity the concepts of right and good. But an empirical ethics cannot consider these problems as purely theoretical, but must seek to solve them by direct and constant reference to the fundamental problems of practical adjustment.

When we shall have worked out a satisfactory theory along these lines, we shall have a morality that is truly empirical or scientific. But such a theory will have to wait until we actually begin to build a society which is capable of meeting the fundamental human demands of its members. And only when we shall have tested action and theory in terms of each other, as natural scientists do in their own fields, shall we be able to avoid the duplicity which today so deeply infects all our living—a duplicity arising from the possession of theories which are "noble" but irrelevant and practices which are "low" but inevitable.

These remarks do not imply a disparagement of Mr. Stace's book. Half-hearted in its empiricism though it is, it makes some very incisive remarks on the problem of morals for modern man. ELISEO VIVAS

Education Under the Führer

THE GERMAN UNIVERSITIES AND NATIONAL SOCIALISM. By Edward Yarnell Hartshorne, Jr. Harvard University Press. $2.

THIS book is written by an expert in German history who not only has used official legal documents and extensive unofficial text material unknown abroad (vide the three hundred items of the bibliography) but has also had wide personal experience: Dr. Hartshorne spent the year 1935-36 in Germany in order to compare the documents with reality.

He reports the introduction of the Führer principle into the universities, the destruction of the self-governing machinery of the faculties, non-intellectual criteria for selection of candidates, the introduction of military science, compulsory gymnastics, the prohibition of all and any scientific publication without the imprimatur of the politically appointed Führer-rector; and last but not least he describes the ironic situation of the students who struggled to establish National Socialism and who are now more strictly regimented than any other group.

Although his data do not favor his final conclusions, Dr. Hartshorne presents them fairly and enables us to make our own independent interpretation. In striking his balance he asks how these university "reforms" should be evaluated, and peculiarly enough, he answers that they are destructive to truth and science but favorable to Germany. He thus accepts the suppression of truth in the name of national advantage—which is the first unintentional step toward fascism.

Mr. Hartshorne is right in referring repeatedly to the so-called Wehrhaftigkeit which plays a decisive role as criterion in school and Gymnasium examinations. This word Wehrhaftigkeit is translated here (as in most books of this kind) as "defense-mindedness," whereas its actual meaning is "fighting spirit." The German word is thoroughly aggressive; the English translation awakens harmless associations. Entirely absurd is the translation of the German term völkisch as "eugenic." It must be admitted that a translation of this term offers more than technical difficulties. For völkisch has no descriptive function but is a political and ideological weapon unknown in American history. Let us hope that it will remain impossible to translate German history into American terms.

G. S. ANDERS

For William Tyndale

WILLIAM TYNDALE. By J. F. Mozley. The Macmillan Company. $4.

APPEARING as it does near to the four hundredth anniversary of Tyndale's martyrdom and within a few years of the same anniversary of the achievement of the ideal for which Tyndale lived and suffered death, this sturdy book is a clear reminder not only of Tyndale's courageously honest life and zealous endeavor but as well of the large debt all lovers of English prose owe to the father of the vernacular Bible. Without special pleading but with keen and thorough scholarship the author makes clear the extensive and direct borrowings indulged in by all subsequent translators and revisers of the Scriptures, particularly the New Testament. This dispassionate but positive analysis of the later and enduring fame and influence of Tyndale grows naturally out of a complete and thorough biographical and critical study in which traditional sources are carefully re-examined and several sound new conclusions are reached. Tyndale emerges from the pages of this book a strong personality and a thorough scholar, a priest in whom there was faith and through whom flowed good works, a fierce and selfless fighter for brave ideals.

Though marred by awkwardness of style, the book gives special satisfaction by its integrity. It is the work of a real scholar, who, because he is master of his field, is naturally just not only to his secondary figures like Sir Thomas More—who is less noble in relation to Tyndale than in some of the studies brought forth by his recent canonization—but also to Tyndale himself, who is not spared the revealment of his weaknesses by a light as bright as that which illumines his massive accomplishment and his saintly life.

DONALD A. ROBERTS

Outline of Western Economics

AN ECONOMIC HISTORY OF THE WESTERN WORLD. By Harry Elmer Barnes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.50.

IT IS a very delicate task to apportion the amounts of praise and blame which I feel are the due of this compendious history of Western economic life. At this date it would be possible to stand on the shoulders of previous reviewers, if they had not seemed to suffer from a similarly delicate disorder.

From this it may be gathered that the disorder is at least in part generated by Mr. Barnes. Previous reviewers have found it possible to praise his well-known skill as a bibliographer and to admire the sweep of history which he has comprehended in one volume. They have mentioned in varying tones of praise his display of journalistic abilities. It is when they come to consider his point of view that they find themselves in trouble. To this trouble Mr. Barnes contributes by his preface. Here he explains:

> No preconceived notions or historical dogmas have guided its execution. The purely narrative and chronological approach has been supplemented by the more fundamental technique of institutional economics as expounded by Veblen, Sombart . . . and others of this school. A consistent effort has been made to let the dominant and cogent facts of material progress tell their own story, basing the organization and interpretation of the abundant materials upon the historical data themselves rather than upon any rigid or dogmatic philosophy of history.

It seems fair in the light of this quotation and other evidence to take Mr. Barnes to task by holding him up against the standards set by his acknowledged master, Thorstein Veblen. In an essay entitled Economics and Evolution which appeared in the Quarterly Journal of Economics in 1898 Veblen wrote, "From what has been said it appears that an evolutionary economics must be the theory of a process of cultural growth as determined by the economic interest, a theory of a cumulative sequence of economic institutions stated in terms of the process itself." Nowhere in this extensive new work does Mr. Barnes demonstrate that he has ever achieved a complete grasp of these principles laid down by Veblen. The "purely narrative and chronological approach" does not seem to have been "supplemented by the more fundamental technique of institutional economics as expounded by Veblen."

This is a highly useful book, especially for teachers of modern economic history. By devoting more than two-thirds of his space to the period since 1700 and more than 300 of the 750 pages to contemporary economic life beginning with what he calls the second industrial revolution, Mr. Barnes has provided us with a narrative of worldwide economic development for which any teacher of an elementary course should be grateful, if only because of the references to the outstanding works on the different sections of the subject. Mr. Barnes's particular brand of "liberalism" has insured that his work devotes much more space to many of these topics than does any similarly compendious recent work.

The shortcoming here under criticism is the invertebrate character of the book. Chronology and topicality seem to have dictated the material and its organization. Having no adequate understanding of what Veblen has called cumulative causation, Mr. Barnes is unable to state his theory of the sequence of economic institutions in terms of the process itself. The interrelationships of the various parts of his subject are for him purely mechanical. The reader who observes and our thanks, Mr. McAree

Our hand across the border

"We suppose there is no weekly journal so widely read by newspaper editors on this continent as The Nation. Many of them disagree with it, but they cannot afford not to read it, even if only to know what to denounce. We have been indebted to it for many a fourth column, for it often publishes news that never appears in any daily newspaper. No advertising considerations ever occur to the editors of The Nation. Its literary standards are of the highest, and its reviews of books, the theater, and the screen are unsurpassed. It is a great institution, and over the years has probably indirectly exercised more liberal influence than any other publication, daily or weekly, in the United States."—Excerpt from a column by J. V. McAree in the Toronto Globe.

Read America's ⁎ most influential ⁎ liberal weekly

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5 ☐ two years for $8 ☐ three years for $11 ☐ I inclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name____________________________

Address__________________________

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50¢
1-15-38

that, in conclusion, Mr. Barnes predicts that "the days of monopoly and finance capitalism are definitely numbered" may object that it is unfair to say that Mr. Barnes has no theory of cumulative causation. In reply it is impossible for me to say how Mr. Barnes arrived at these conclusions, but it is certain that he has not led his reader to arrive at them by any theory of cumulative sequence within this book.

The materials he presents are assertions, most of them out of the mouths of others; these are not usually well related one to another, and their value lies for the most part in their impetus to the reader to seek out the original and find what it was intending to say. It is to be hoped that the time will come when slightly less comprehensive histories of Western economic life will be written according to the formula set forth by Veblen. It is easy to predict that when they are written, Mr. Barnes will not write them.

Teachers of economic history will hope that they may go on having the benefit of Mr. Barnes's editorial hand, and the lay reader will stand prepared to read the next Barnes work as he has the last. The liberals will continue to be confused by Mr. Barnes's confusion, and the Soviets will forgive him much if he will devote the last thirty-five pages of each of his books to the experiment in Russia.

R. K. LAMB

Shorter Notices

YEAR'S END. By Josephine W. Johnson. Simon and Schuster. $2.

The hypersensitive personality so clearly revealed in Miss Johnson's novels finds in this book of poems perhaps a better medium for expression. These are not great poems, but they are interesting—largely because of their almost neurotic intensity. Relying not on the fine line, not on the extraordinary image, not, certainly, on music, but almost wholly on the uniqueness of her feeling about life and social injustice, Miss Johnson is an original if not a finished poet. The two poems entitled The Mortal Companion are almost first-rate. The larger number of poems here will be remembered because of the inner drama analyzed in them or because of the story told. Obviously Miss Johnson works intuitively and without much critical check; she is able to penetrate into the more subtle personal feelings but gives very little universalization. Nevertheless, one is impressed by the sincerity and the occasional power of these lyrics.

TOMORROW'S PHOENIX. By Ruth Lechlitner. Alcestis Press. $3.

The cause of left-wing poetry will not be appreciably advanced by this volume. It contains little evidence of the integration which social interests have brought to a number of writers in recent years. These pieces were obviously written out of intense conviction, but the author has not acquired the intellectual control or undergone the technical discipline which would enable her to achieve a poetic rendering of her faith. The combination of artiness of technique with artlessness of idea has become all too familiar, and it has proved a blind alley. The mode of statement here is mannered instead of forthright, the imagery is cloudy, and vigor of rhythm is sought through dispersion rather than by means of pattern and cumulation. With a few exceptions the poems give the impression of set pieces on assigned themes. They seek to corroborate an idea, not to create an experience. The exceptions, such as Recitation on Going Abroad and Noon: Southwest, suggest that Miss Lechlitner does best when she makes use of direct observation.

THE ARTS

The Battle of the Roof

TO THE hysterical thirties was reserved the insanity which made a political isue out of the slope of a roof. The battle is still going on. Hitler, shortly after coming into power, proscribed flat ones. Time has modified even the German practice; but the emotion engendered by the question of the pitch of a roof illustrates how humankind still approaches its "technical" problems. Flat-roofers and pitched-roofers throughout the European world are still Guelfs and Ghibellines; the flat roof is rational and modern, the pitched roof traditional and mystical. Since the roof is by all odds the most important sheltering element of a house, perhaps noncombatants may be interested in a few notes on the background of the great roof battle.

Historically our interest centers neither on the cavemen and cellarmen, who had no great roof problems, nor on the Mediterranean peoples, whose equable climate permitted them flat roofs at an extremely early date, but on those of our ancestors who lived in the woods of northern Europe. Their earliest known form of dwelling was a sort of tent or tepee, which combined extreme structural simplicity with efficiency in shedding rain or snow. The great drawback was the cramping of space. If the cavemen may be said to have lived in cellars, the tent man lived exclusively in the attic. The sides of the tepee or charcoal-burner's hut, by sloping inward like rafters, permitted a man to stand full height only in the center, as the camper stands in his tent today.

An improvement over the tepee such as the Saxon "cruck" house is therefore to be rated as a great technical advance. A cruck was a straight tree trunk, cut off just above a straight diagonal branch. Two parallel rows of such trunks with their branches meeting at the center produced the equivalent of two vertical side walls surmounted by a gable. The trunks were the posts and the branches were the rafters. The roof was now up and out of the way. Under the attic, at last, there had been inserted a house! The inhabitant could walk upright through any part of his long hall. Spaciousness having been won through the upright wall, further improvements were mere matters of detail. A flat ceiling could be inserted under the rafters converting the attic into a storage loft; then the number of floors could be multiplied as the framing improved, and so on. Every subsequent step was a victory for the house proper at the expense of the attic, which had once been the whole thing. With later structural advances not even our warehouses any longer take the steep gabled form of the great warehouses of Nürnberg, since storage as well as living is easiest with vertical walls. Given the vertical wall as the boundary of the useful room, then attics are mere residue; and since a flat roof has the least area to frame and cover, the builder makes his roof as flat as he can. Under modern conditions, a steep pitched roof is aesthetically no longer shipshape; it expresses nothing of what goes on inside but on the contrary conveys the impression that someone is in there bumping his head against angles and dormers.

To say that a good builder makes his roof as flat as he can is not to say that it must always be a "flat roof." At the very moment when the followers of the rationalizing Le Corbusier were out to impose his flat roofs on America as a matter of

THE BOOK THAT TELLS WHY

JAPAN CAN'T WIN!

"The greatest single feat performed by any journalist of our century. . . . A book as fresh and honest and illuminating as anything that has been written about the background of the war in the East."
—New Republic.

RED STAR OVER CHINA

BY EDGAR SNOW

460 pages, $3.00 Random House

Already in its 3rd large printing

THE FIRST BIG SUCCESS OF 1938!

THE
JULIA ELLSWORTH FORD FOUNDATION
Announces the 1938 Annual

Children's Book Contest

$3,000 AWARD

THE Julia Ellsworth Ford Foundation, created in 1934 for the encouragement of better literature for children, sponsors each year a contest, open to anyone. Any unpublished manuscript written in English for children is eligible for the $3000 award. The judges are Ellen Lewis Buell, Associate Editor, Children's Book Page, New York Times; Constance Lindsay Skinner, well-known author and reviewer of children's books; and Nora Beust, Associate Professor of Library Administration, University of North Carolina.

This year's contest closes March 31, 1938. Write today for circular giving full particulars, and entry blank.

●

THE JULIA ELLSWORTH FORD FOUNDATION
Dept. N • 257 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

LECTURE

Dr. Massimo Salvadori
Lecturer on Colonial Economics at University of Geneva
Will speak on:

JEWS, ARABS and MUSSOLINI in the NEAR EAST

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21, 1938, at 8:15 P.M.

•

RAND SCHOOL
7 East 15th Street, New York City
Prof. GAETANO SALVEMINI will preside
Admission 49 cents

TOSCANINI'S Big Stick • By DAVID EWEN

If you like good music, this intimate picture of the world's greatest conductor is to be treasured in your permanent library. A genius and his art; and woven into the pattern, some of the least-known and most amazing stories of Toscanini's fabulous memory and miraculous ear.

SIBELIUS • By ROBERT POLLAK

Have you wondered why we so seldom hear the work of Sibelius? The answer will surprise you, and you will enjoy, we believe, every word of Mr. Pollak's unique article on the celebrated Finnish master.

★From these two absorbing articles, typical of those on music (in February and January issues, respectively) you can see why, to an increasing number of people, the Magazine of Art is an important, entertaining and necessary possession. For this one magazine more completely satisfies cultural interests than any other single publication in America. It alone gives you, side by side with painting, architecture and sculpture, the arts of music, theater, archaeology, photography—in short, all the arts—with more than 1,100 large illustrations a year.

GET-ACQUAINTED OFFER

As a new reader, you are invited to accept a special introductory offer of the Magazine of Art—six issues for $2—a saving of $1 (single copies, 50 cents; full year, $5). And if you aren't enthusiastic, your money will be refunded. Simply send your name, address and remittance to The American Federation of Arts, Barr Building, Washington, D. C. and mention "The Nation."

The Vendome
"Your Winter Home"
MADISON AVE. AT THIRD ST. LAKEWOOD, N.J.

Private Baths—Private Sun Porches—Southern Exposure. All sport facilities. Intelligent supervision of diets. Moderate rates.

M. SCHWARTZ, R.N. Phone Lakewood [illegible]

Blocking Japan—

How China's Eighth Route Army is stopping Japan's advance in the Northern Provinces will be told in a startling article in an early issue of The Nation by T. A. Bisson, who has just returned from the scene of battle.

modern "discipline," their leader was experimenting with roofs that were composed of a series of low arches.

Like any element in a wisely designed house, the good roof reflects, in each instance, a different balance of forces. And these forces are psychological as well as technical. There is a sense in which, in the complexity of factors, the good architect finds the best house but cannot force it. Floods of water and curses punish the wilful transgressor. Unexpected blessings flow upon the imagination not bound by rules. Thus, in some recent California houses by R. M. Schindler a stupid site restriction calling for a sloping roof was transformed into a positive asset. The gradually rising ceiling of the large living rooms so opens the inside space toward the sky as to rouse a sense of exhilaration. A strictly rational flat ceiling could never give exactly the same pleasure.

To meddle in the balance that produces the best roof for a particular house is a privilege usurped only by dictators. The battle of flat against pitched roofs, in its extreme form, is a battle of antagonistic tastes frozen to dogma. The general tendency toward the low roof is the tendency of reasonableness, economy, the desire for free movement and openness, a readiness for new adventures; the extreme pitched roof is usually an expression of atavism, flourishing among the "dream houses" of the ignorant, desired by obfuscating dictators, welcome to those who love best to rummage in attics. And whenever M. Dali and his friends convince their followers that their homes should provide an escape to something nearly approximating the mother's womb, we shall look upon still another set of roof forms, which only the psychiatrists will be able to explain. DOUGLAS HASKELL

DRAMA

Elizabethan Frolic

ONE of Orson Welles's many gifts is apparently the gift for discovering "social significance" in places where most contemporary directors have neglected to look. I very much doubt that all that he and his critics seemed to find in "Julius Caesar" was really there, or at least that Shakespeare himself intended anything of the sort; but the case of Thomas Dekker's "The Shoemaker's Holiday" (Mercury Theater) is different. It is both the rollicking farce which Mr. Welles's company has made of it and also a genuine social document. To have brought it back to such vigorous and amusing life is a real achievement.

I, to be sure, should have preferred to see a little less "gagging" of the play itself. The permanent set—bare platform, three curtained recesses, and a sketchy background of high-gabled houses—is excellent, but there are moments when we are asked to laugh at rather than with the play, and I should have preferred to have omitted those moments of satiric emphasis on the conventions of stagecraft when the thing is treated rather after the manner of "Princess Turandot" or "The Yellow Jacket." Nevertheless, there can be nothing but praise for the lusty playing of the low-comedy parts and for the general air of brisk good fun which makes the short performance pass very swiftly and gives the audience as good a time as it is likely to have anywhere in the theater. All of Dekker's hearty bawdiness is there, but so too is the full flavor of his romantic, middle-class optimism.

As historians of the drama have long been in the habit of noting, the play is somewhat unusual for its time. Not only Shakespeare himself but most of his contemporaries as well preferred to soar. Whatever their own origins might have been, their sympathies and their imaginations were chivalric. They preferred to write about kings and princes, and if the simple citizen appeared he was more than likely to be treated with derision. Even Shakespeare's bumpkins, though doubtless in many instances drawn from his memory of the people of Stratford, and though treated with his all-embracing sympathy, are looked down upon from a tremendous height with the delighted amusement of a man perfectly aware that he is living in a different world. There is no class loyalty or class solidarity, intellectual or emotional, for Shakespeare does not feel himself any longer a member of that class. But Dekker, perhaps out of the simplicity of his heart, writes about his middle-class people with what seems to be a complete accord with their ideas and ideals.

The play is said to have been first performed before Queen Elizabeth, but it might with greater propriety have been performed before an audience of apprentices, who are pictured exactly as they liked to picture themselves. They are gallant lads, self-reliant and proud of their craft. Some day they may be masters themselves, with the prospect beyond that of becoming, like their master in the play, a lord mayor who can talk as man to man even with a king. At the same time there is a distinctive middle-class romanticism, with its pleasant belief in the substantial virtues as well as its firm conviction that love conquers all.

To those more keenly on the alert to make distinctions in such matters I leave the question whether the class consciousness of Dekker is of an authentic and commendable sort or whether he was only an escapist helping to delude his fellows with romance and unconsciously conspiring with their oppressors to keep them foolishly contented with an Elizabethan version of the hope that any boy may be President some day. What does concern me is the fact that the spirit is a very clearly defined one and that the production—incidentally it replaces "Julius Caesar" only on certain nights—conveys it to a remarkable degree.

J. B. Priestley never seems to be entirely at home in writing for the stage, and that is doubtless one reason why "Time and the Conways," now being acted at the Ritz Theater by an English cast with Dame Sybil Thorndike at its head, is structurally so cumbersome and unsatisfactory. Ostensibly the central theme is some rather Proustian conception that the true significance of any group of lives cannot be grasped by looking at any temporal cross-section of it but only by considering the pattern formed when successive relationships are contemplated as existing simultaneously in eternity. What one actually gets is one fine act, the second, which presents a grimly absorbing study of the hates and frustrations of a family group, and two other rather pointlessly meandering scenes which fail to be either interesting in themselves or to establish any special relevance of the Proustian moral, delivered in the form of a set speech, to the story here told. The second act is written and acted with real power, but the effect is more or less spoiled by the anti-climax of the last. As for the first, Mr. Priestley himself is said to be aware of some of its defects, though I doubt whether he knows that Americans can be as acutely annoyed by this sort of distressingly British coyness as the British themselves are at some American peculiarities. A jolly family doing charades is simply not our idea of an exhilarating spectacle.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE THEATRE GUILD presents the
ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
production of JEAN GIRAUDOUX'S comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:40
Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40. 300 Seats at $1.10
No one admitted during prologue

THE CRADLE WILL ROCK
Sam H. Grisman
presents
A MERCURY THEATRE PRODUCTION
by MARC BLITZSTEIN
WINDSOR THEATRE 48th St. East of Broadway. BRy 9-0178
Evenings, 8:40. Matinee Wednesday & Saturday 2:45.
SEATS, 50c to [illegible] (plus tax) NOW ON SALE

The NEW SCHOOL presents
WEBSTER AITKEN
4 TUES. EVGS. at 8:30
JAN. 25 — FEB. 1
FEB. 8—FEB. 15
at The NEW SCHOOL
For SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 WEST 12th STREET
in Four Recitals devoted to the PIANOFORTE SONATAS of FRANZ SCHUBERT. Subscriptions by Mail or at New School—$10, $5 and $2 for the Series. (Steinway Piano)

BENEFIT TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY
Sidney SUKOENIG Pianist
At The New School for Social Research, 66 West 12th Street
SUNDAY EVENING, JANUARY 23 at 8:45
Tickets: 55 cents, $1.10, $1.65 on sale at room 901, 125 W. 45th St. and Neighborhood Book Shop, 141 E. 29th St. (Steinway piano)

DANCE FOR SPAIN
MARTHA GRAHAM
ANNA SOKOLOW
HANYA HOLM
TAMIRIS
and their Groups
BALLET CARAVAN
ARTHUR MAHONEY
PAUL DRAPER
HIPPODROME 43d St. at 6th Ave.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 28TH—8 P. M.
Tickets 50c, 75c, $1, $1.50, $2.00 (plus tax) all agencies
— Benefit —
MEDICAL BUREAU and NORTH AMERICAN COMMITTEE TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY 381 4th Ave., N. Y. C.

SYMPOSIUM
"LENIN'S Contribution to Modern Thought"
LOUIS BOUDIN PROF. V. J. McGILL
ROBERT W. DUNN MOISSAYE OLGIN
MALCOLM COWLEY, Chairman
WED. Jan. 26 8:30 P.M. Admission 35c
HOTEL CENTER
108 W. 43rd St., N. Y.
Auspices: AMERICAN FRIENDS OF THE SOVIET UNION
Tickets at Bookshop, [illegible] E. 13th St. or AFSU, 822 Bway.

SCHOOL
FREE Correspondence Course in
Fundamental Economics and Social Philosophy
Write for descriptive booklet N
HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
Chartered by University of State of New York
JOHN DEWEY, Honorary President
211 West 79th St., New York City

Harpers
MAGAZINE

Great events are often more thrilling in the making than in the happening.

HARPERS MAGAZINE, ever sensitive to important trends, ferrets out for you the beginnings of new developments—explains for you the reason behind the news—weighs for you the possible consequences of incidents, big and little,—makes brilliantly clear for you the course of human progress or decline, long before the actual end has materialized.

And generously interspersed with these articles of vast import are others light and gay, satiric and amusing, stories by the best contemporary writers, and departments designed to cover the interests of all readers.

6 MONTHS FOR $1
Special Introductory Offer

To introduce you to HARPERS MAGAZINE, we are making, for a limited time, a Special Introductory Offer of 6 months for Only One Dollar—exactly half price.

Send us at once the coupon below to make sure of reading:

Coming Articles

THE AMERICAN WAY, by David Cushman Coyle.
DO YOU KNOW AARON SLICK?, by Merrill Denison.
THE RIDDLE OF HITLER, by Stephen H. Roberts.
BRASS TACKS ON THE WAR PROBLEM, by Elmer Davis.
MEN WITHOUT WHEELS, by John W. Vandercook.
DEBUNKING THE FUTURE, by Arthur Train, Jr.
THE STORY OF "MISTRESS NELL," by Henrietta Crosman.
BUSINESS FINDS ITS VOICE, by S. H. Walker and Paul Sklar.
A LITTLE GIRL'S NEW YORK, by Edith Wharton.
THRICE MARRIED—Anonymous.
ETHIOPIA NOW, by Ernest Wiese.
Short Stories by Dorothy Thomas, Charles W. Ferguson, James R. Aswell, and others.
Departments: The Easy Chair—The Lion's Mouth—Among the New Books—Personal and Otherwise.

This offer is for a limited time only!
MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY!

HARPERS MAGAZINE N-1
49 East 33rd St., New York, N. Y.

I am enclosing one dollar, for which please send me HARPERS MAGAZINE for six months in accordance with your Special Introductory Offer.

NAME ....

STREET ADDRESS ....

CITY AND STATE ....

FILMS

A Wide Western

"WELLS FARGO" (Paramount) is one of those modern Westerns which demand of the producer as much research as poetry. The time is gone when such a film could do with simple and familiar properties: a patch of desert, a saloon (exterior and interior), a dozen cowboys, and several guns ready at a moment's notice to be drawn for soft-eyed Sally's sake. Now we must have a sense of history, perhaps a million square miles of background, and several hundred persons faultlessly attired in the coonskins and the silk hats of their day; everything must be authentic, and there must be a lot of it to accompany the tune played by time as it marches past milestone after milestone of subtitled dates. The danger, of course, is that we shall get from all this a narrative educated beyond its intelligence—heavy with misplaced learning, bloated like one of its own hoop skirts. The danger is seldom avoided, nor has "Wells Fargo" completely avoided it; the film is a little too long, and too many of its people are conscious of the history they are helping to make. But it is the best of its kind to date.

It begins at Buffalo in 1840 with Ramsay MacKay (Joel McCrea) arriving on an authentically primitive train from New York with the first oysters ever to get so far inland. He is bringing them to his employer, Mr. Wells, who within perhaps ten minutes of film time has extended his influence to St. Louis and within another half-hour is a force in San Francisco. The two thousand miles beyond St. Louis are filled in a little later by the pony express, an Indian raid on a stagecoach, and still later by Confederate attempts during Civil War time to capture cargoes of bullion coming overland to Washington—a glimpse of which we are not denied, with Lincoln talking to his Cabinet and Joel McCrea waiting to assure the President that the next cargo will arrive. The gold rush has its place, as have vigilantism and the Mexican War, not to speak of a romance between Mr. McCrea and Frances Dee which runs from first to last and involves perhaps six meetings after long separations. There is more still if I could remember it, and I have doubtless given the impression that there is too much. This is not, however, the case. Frank Lloyd, the director, has set his mass of material in continuous and significant motion; when he should be brief he is—brilliantly so—and when he should pause somewhere he does, and takes his time. He has had, indeed, a perfect sense of time; not as a historian perhaps, but certainly as an artist creating and cutting a film. Few pictures have been more steadily and naturally exciting.

The steadiness and the naturalness come in large part from the presence in almost every scene of one Hank York, an uncouth, heroic humorist played to perfection by Bob Burns. His slow, loud speech, his friendly common sense, his genius for understatement, his absolute courage, and his rather wild eyes which never look straight at the camera because they are rolling in contemplation of the next wise thing their owner is going to say—these do not quite tell all the story, but they are enough to suggest Hank's value as a natural. Without him the film would have been a mere whirl and a mess, a Wells Farrago. With him in it to slow it down and keep it human it is both rich and ordered. MARK VAN DOREN

Letters to the Editors

A Meat Packer Explains

Dear Sirs: In the article Why You Pay More for Food in your issue of December 4, Ruth Brindze stated that the difference between the price to the farmer and the retail price of beef was greater in October, 1937, than in October, 1936. She added, "The inference is inescapable that the increased margin is increased profit."

As a matter of fact, the average profits of the meat packing industry are at no time large enough to affect noticeably the prices of meat in the quantities purchased by the typical consumer. Government figures show that about 600 meat packers doing business last year, including large companies, earned only about one cent per dollar of sales, which is only a fraction of a cent per pound of meat sold. During the past ten years the average profit rate of all meat-packing companies conducting slaughtering operations has been less than 4 per cent on net worth—comparable with normal bond interest—and less than one cent per dollar of sales (according to reports filed annually with the Packers and Stockyards Administration by meat packers conducting slaughtering operations). Only a few companies have indicated in published reports their earnings for the current year, but those which have done so have reported profits generally lower than those in 1936. One large company reported a substantial loss for its operations during 1937.

The writer's figures concerning margins also were erroneous. According to figures of the United States Department of Agriculture, the margin in October, 1937, between the price of good steers in Chicago and the retail values in New York of cuts or products obtained from 100 pounds of live animal was 3.47 cents per pound. In October, 1936, the margin was greater—3.87 cents per pound. The wholesale value of the beef obtained from 100 pounds of steer of good grade increased only $3.52 from October, 1936, to October, 1937, whereas the price of 100 pounds of live steers yielding meat of that grade increased $4.44 during the same period. In other words, the increase in the value of dressed beef was less than the increase in the value of the live animal. These figures are typical of most other grades of beef.

Meat products are perishable and must be sold promptly for the going market price. Price-fixing would be economically unsound and impracticable. The prices at which meat packers sell their products to retailers are determined not by the desire of meat packers but by the amount which consumers are able and willing to pay for the available supply of meat.

WESLEY HARDENBERGH
Institute of American Meat Packers
Chicago, December 21

Dear Sirs: My statement on the spread between the farm and retail price of beef was based on data in "Price Spreads Between the Farmer and the Consumer" issued by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture. According to this report, which runs as far back as 1913, the "actual margin" in October, 1936, on 2.16 pounds of beef cattle on the farm and its equivalent of one pound of beef in the retail market was 16 cents. In October, 1937, this margin had increased to 19.6 cents, which according to the government's statistics was one of the all-time highs. In indicating the spread between farm and consumer prices, these figures, which are averages for the country, are more germane than the cost of meat at Chicago and the value in New York.

I am entirely familiar with the figures quoted in Mr. Hardenbergh's letter. The 1 per cent profit on net sales was widely publicized in New York during the meat strike. But corporate finance is far too intricate to accept such figures on their face. We must know more about items written off as losses, about depreciation reserves, profits from by-products, profits of subsidiary corporations, officers' salaries, and similar matters. In the Federal Trade Commission's report on the milk distributors, the difference between the profits reported and those estimated by the commission's staff indicates that business men sometimes do not know just how well they are doing.

RUTH BRINDZE
New York, January 3

"Tae Help Spanish Bairns"

Dear Sirs: You've probably heard of the fine thing the British cooperatives are doing in the matter of milk for Spain, but I thought you might be interested to learn of the "sixpenny tokens" that are on sale in every co-op branch. The response has been magnificent—they've collected well over two thousand pounds in the two or three weeks since the tokens went on sale. It's touching to hear some of these Scottish village women, many of them pretty hard up themselves, asking for a token. "It's a saxpence well spent," they say, "tae help thon puir Spanish bairns." Don't judge all the British by what their government is or isn't doing. There's a live and growing opposition to that government, particularly up here in Scotland, and among the working people.

I also want to tell you how tremendously The Nation is appreciated here. When we've read our copy it passes from hand to hand through a dozen little stone cottages in this village, and from there to the workers in the local paper mill, and always read from cover to cover until, I suppose, it disintegrates from sheer use.

CHRISTINE H. STURGEON
Currie, Midlothian, Scotland,
December 7

Addendum from Mr. Thomas

Dear Sirs: Will you be good enough to give me a little space to answer a question which has been raised concerning my recent article on America's peace policy in your pages. The question is: why did I not discuss in that article the Ludlow amendment, and what is my opinion of that amendment? I did not discuss the matter originally because the article was written to deal with the subject of collective security, and after I had seen the proof of Mr. Buell's article, there was no space to deal with the Ludlow-La Follette proposal.

Briefly my position in regard to a referendum before a declaration of war, except in case of invasion, is what I have frequently declared it to be in the past fifteen or twenty years. The amendment is no implement for peace. A 51 per cent vote would not of itself make a particular war right when a 49 per cent vote would make it wrong. No popular vote on the declaration of war could keep us out of war if a President's whole policy had been set toward war. Such a President might even along modern lines put us in war without declaring it. Nevertheless, I favor the amendment, partly because of its probable effect on Presidential policy. To believe in democracy and the right of the people to pass on, let us say, a bond issue but to refuse them a right to pass on the desperate issue of peace or war is to my mind insincere to the verge of hypocrisy.

There are no practical difficulties in modern times about taking a rapid referendum, and the populace in modern times is probably less likely to be stampeded into a foreign war than Congress. Most arguments against the amendment assume that despite the Kellogg Pact war must still remain an instrument of national policy and the threat of it a necessary element in our diplomacy. It is precisely this that I do not believe. The fact that a referendum in America was necessary to a declaration of war except in case of attack would somewhat tend to strengthen that popular opposition to war throughout the world which has been our main defense against a new cataclysm. It would not weaken the United States except on the theory that the strength of the United States depends upon the ability of an Administration to put a nation into war regardless of the opinion of the people who must fight.

NORMAN THOMAS

New York, January 6

Why Balance the Budget?

Dear Sirs: You appeared to concede in your leading paragraph on December 11 that the time has come for the federal government to balance its budget. I realize that this is a belief which is held with a great deal of conviction by many people of all political shades. To me, however, it seems to be a dangerous superstition which should be attacked and exposed at every opportunity.

Just what is it that we have to fear from a continued unbalanced budget? Inflation? All that inflation means is a larger volume of spending, and that is, by common consent, precisely what is most needed at the present time. If the increased spending goes so far as to draw into productive use the bulk of present unemployed resources and hence to threaten a sharp rise in prices, the time will surely have come to call a halt, that is, to balance the budget. But how is it possible to take the inflation bogy seriously when everyone is racking his brains to think up ways to induce an inflation through the more usual private agencies?

Or perhaps it is the "burden" of paying interest on the increased debt which ought to frighten us? The simplest way of solving this difficulty would be to have the government create the additional money directly instead of going through the ritual of having the banks create it (out of thin air in either case) and allowing them to tax the government for turning it over. But this solution, it may be conceded, runs too directly counter to received fiscal thinking to be practical. Let us admit that interest must be paid. The fact still remains that interest paid in this way is no "burden" but only a transfer from some of the rich to others of the rich, and if the social-security program continues unchanged, it will in time become in part a transfer from some of the rich to the aged poor.

On the surface it would appear that there is more substance to the fears entertained by some that a continuation of deficit financing will have a disastrous effect on the market for government bonds and hence on the government's credit. Stripped of phraseology, this means simply that there is a danger that the big bankers and their followers will refuse to buy government bonds; and indeed it is reliably rumored that they have already intimated to the Administration that this is their intention. In other words, they are saying to the Treasury, "Balance the budget, or else . . ." The example of France is sufficiently fresh to remind us that this may be no idle threat. And yet it can be successfully defied by courageous and resolute action. If the interests refuse to go along with a policy of deficit financing, the Administration has only to use the Federal Reserve system and its tremendous resources to checkmate this blackmail threat once and for all.

The problem facing the progressive movement at the present time, and perhaps for some time to come, is to make capitalism work in spite of the opposition of the capitalists. This can only be done if the purse-strings are taken out of the hands of Wall Street bankers and turned over to those who will know how to loosen them when the situation demands an expansion of spending. The best defense which the reactionaries have against such a development is the popular superstition about "economy" and a balanced budget. It seems to me that The Nation is doing no service to the progressive cause by lending its authority to this ideological bulwark of reaction.

PAUL M. SWEEZY

Cambridge, Mass., December 23

[It should be noted that The Nation has never advocated balancing the budget by economies, as the reactionaries have urged, but by increased taxes on the wealthy. Granting that much of the hysteria over the unbalanced budget is politically inspired, we submit that a pay-as-you-go program based on social taxation is open to fewer dangers than an attempt to beguile the cooperation of wealth through deficits. Mr. Sweezy himself has indicated one of the gravest defects in his plan—the fact that it permits reactionaries to sabotage necessary social expenditures by uttering the old but highly effective shibboleth that a government, as well as an individual, must live within its income. This may be untrue, but we defy anyone to demonstrate the fallacy to the average citizen.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

CONTRIBUTORS

LUCILLE B. MILNER, secretary of the American Civil Liberties Union, spent last summer making a special study of fascist propaganda and activities in London and Paris.

GEORGE BUTLER is a Methodist minister in New Haven. He is the delegate of the National Religion and Labor Foundation to the Central Labor Council of New Haven.

LEONARD CARLTON is a New York newspaperman.

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN, formerly the daily book reviewer of the New York Times, is now on the staff of Fortune magazine.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN, the author of "Dance," is the director of the Ballet Caravan.

ELISEO VIVAS is a member of the Department of Philosophy of the University of Wisconsin and a frequent reviewer of works of philosophy for The Nation.

DONALD A. ROBERTS is a member of the Department of English of the College of the City of New York.

R. K. LAMB teaches economic history at Williams College.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 22, 1938 NUMBER 4

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 85

EDITORIALS:

THE FALL OF FRANCE'S POPULAR FRONT 88
SQUABBLE IN THE C. I. O. 88
FRANCE IN CRISIS by M. E. Ravage 90
CITIES THAT CONSUME MEN by Harold Ward 91
MEMPHIS IS SAFE FOR FORD By George Lambert 93
BOOK PRICES AND THE LAW By Christopher Lazare 95
BEHIND VANSITTART'S PROMOTION By Robert Dell 97
THE ELDERS OF KOMIONKA by Gerold Frank 98
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 100

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE PRODIGAL LEWIS by Louis Kronenberger 101
SEMANTICS FOR THE MILLION by George Genzmer 101
WEALTH AGAINST SOCIETY by Louis M. Hacker 102
HELL by Paul Rosenfeld 104
THAT HAPPY ITALIAN PEOPLE! By Gaetano Salvemini 105
A NOVEL OF PERSIAN LIFE by Milton Rugoff 106
DRAMA: MUSICAL CARTOON By Joseph Wood Krutch 107
FILMS: FAIRY TALE IN FIVE ACTS By Mark Van Doren 108
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 109
DRAWINGS by John Groth

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER

Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER

Literary Editor Associate Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

THE APPOINTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL Stanley F. Reed to the Supreme Court comes as a reward for services rendered the Administration. Mr. Reed is a good legal technician and one who labored mightily to convince the Supreme Court that the New Deal administrative efforts could be rephrased in constitutional terminology and given a place in the respected file of past precedents without undue violence to the judicial mind. A man with such abilities, the President may have reasoned, clearly belongs on the court, where he will appreciate the arduous efforts of subsequent Solicitor Generals to make the living economic and administrative realities square with the formulas of past decisions. Even more persuasive may have been the fact that Mr. Reed, in the words of one of his colleagues in the Department of Justice, "is not a professional New Dealer." We are a bit mystified by the allusion, but presume it refers to some of the more progressive candidates who had been discussed. The appointment met with an immediate favorable response from many of the Senate liberals, who called Mr. Reed a "liberal," and from most of the conservatives, who called him "an able lawyer of the conservative type." Mr. Roosevelt has, in short, made an appointment calculated to soothe the opposition while giving the progressive wing of his party no tangible reason for protest. For while Mr. Reed's liberalism is putative, his conservatism is equally nebulous. The fact is, he has had no clear chance to demonstrate either quality clearly, and the question remains: for what social ends will he use his technical abilities? It is no reflection on Mr. Reed to say that he probably owes his elevation more to the President's determination to undo the damage he has suffered from the storm over Justice Black than to any desire in the White House to assure a genuinely progressive court.

*

MR. ROOSEVELT'S SWOLLEN VISITING LIST of big-business executives during the whole of last week may mean any one of a number of things. It may mean that the President is determined to carry through some of the policies he and his lieutenants have been talking about, and that he is choosing the personal conference as his vehicle for breaking the news to the big boys. It may mean that the President is still exactly where he started in the days of the NRA, and is laying plans with the industrial leaders for some fresh variation on the old theme of "industrial self-government." Or it may mean neither of these, but merely that the President is puzzled and worried and marking time. We tend to the view that Mr. Roosevelt's eclecticism is such that all three of the above possibilities contain elements of truth. The signs point to the use of taxation in the long run to relax the grip of the holding companies, without, however, giving more than rhetorical force to Mr. Roosevelt's sensational remark about doing away with all holding companies. But the signs point also to business-labor agreements to stabilize employment on the one hand and halt demands for wage increases on the other. It is significant in this connection that Mr. Lewis and Mr. Murray appeared as labor representatives alongside the industrial and banking magnates. What distinguished the discussions from previous NRA conferences, of which many members of the group are veterans, remains to be seen. Meanwhile the testimony of business leaders at the hearing of the Senate Committee on Unemployment must have made it abundantly clear to the Senators that business men are as innocent of real knowledge of the larger processes of industry as are Senators themselves.

*

THE STIFFENING OF CHINESE RESISTANCE IN Shantung is but one of many signs of growing unity within China in the struggle against Japanese aggression. Even more significant facts are the transfer of veteran Communist troops to the south and the striking victories achieved by the Eighth Route Army in Shansi. The execution of Chu Min-yu, former general secretary of the Executive Yuan, and Han Fu-chu, former Governor of Shantung, for cowardice gives further support to the belief that Chiang has decided to continue resistance until Japan is either economically exhausted or becomes engaged in a struggle with some major power. Despite the huge losses suffered in the past six months, China is in many ways stronger than at any previous time. The Japanese have been trapped into extending their lines into greater areas than they can possibly control. Guerrilla tactics have immobilized large detachments not only in Shansi, Suiyuan, and parts of Hopei, where the Eighth Route Army has operated, but also in the area around Nanking. A steady stream of supplies and modern aircraft appears to be coming in through Hongkong and French Indo-China. Moreover, there are increasing indications of Japanese disunity. The failure of the imperial conference to announce an immediate decision on policy concerning China may be due, as Tokyo implies, to a desire to await Chiang's answer to a Japanese peace offer, but it suggests with more likelihood serious differences on basic policy.

*

A FRONT-PAGE STORY IN THE NEW YORK Times reports that Japanese industrial interests have approached American business men for a $50,000,000 loan "for the purchase of machinery." Since credits for war purposes are unobtainable because of Japan's shaky financial position, the borrowers are making a vigorous effort to give the proposal financial and moral respectability by asserting that the machinery is to be used solely for the development of Manchurian industries. It is even intimated, but not stated categorically, that American engineers might accompany the shipment to see that it is actually installed in Manchuria. While the story carefully avoids all reference to political factors, it rather opportunely kills two birds with one stone. It suggests that Japan is strong enough to turn attention to the development of Manchoukuo at this time, and gives the impression that the Open Door is about to be restored in that unhappy country. But our suspicions are aroused by the fact that the head of the syndicate requesting funds is Yoshisuke Aikawa, chief supporter of fascism among the business leaders of Japan. Aikawa, more than any other one person, is responsible for the remarkable development of Japanese heavy industry in recent years; and he is credited with a dominant role in throwing the support of these interests behind the army's expansionist policies. With such a tie-up, one cannot be blamed for suspecting that there is a very interesting story involving the proposed loan which is not set forth in the Times. We shall make it our business to try to unearth it.

*

THE BUDAPEST CONFERENCE OFFERS A new ray of hope to those who believe that the tide is turning against the fascist international. Although the official statement issued at the close of the parley reaffirmed the close cooperation of Austria and Hungary with the Rome-Berlin axis, which representatives of those two countries referred to as "a guaranty of peace and reconstruction," Count Ciano failed in his effort to persuade them to withdraw from the League and to join the "anti-Communist" pact. After Teruel recognition of the Franco regime in Spain gave the appearance of a rather forlorn effort to bolster up the prestige of the weakening rebel cause. The gesture appears even less significant when it is realized that Franco has maintained diplomatic representatives in Vienna and Budapest since last September. No one expects Austria or Hungary to line up with the democracies on any crucial issue, but their failure to toe the mark for Mussolini indicates a wariness which is particularly welcome after recent developments in Rumania. It demonstrates once more the potential influence which the democratic powers might still exercise in European affairs.

*

THE FAILURE OF PRIVATE MEDICINE TO meet the health requirements of the American public has never been more clearly demonstrated than in the preliminary report of the National Institute of Health. After a house-to-house investigation of 740,000 families in 84 cities, the institute found that sickness disabled twice as many persons in families on relief as in families with incomes of $2,000 or more. Individuals in the relief families were disabled, on the average, three times as many days per year as individuals in the upper income groups. The rate of disability among families not on relief but with incomes of less than $1,000 a year was found to be more than twice as high as the rate among families in the highest income category. Yet the latter received 46 per cent more care from a physician for each case of illness. Families with incomes of more than $3,000 were twelve times as likely as relief families to have the services of a private nurse in a case of serious illness. We may assume from these figures that if the same type of medical care were available to the whole population as is now available to families with incomes of more than $3,000 we could cut the amount of illness in this country by approximately 33 per cent. This would mean a gain, according to the survey, of approximately 415,000,000 days of health a year, or three and one-third for every person in the United States—a sufficient inducement, we believe, for revitalizing existing efforts to improve our outworn system of medical care.

PUBLIC

*

THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT IS SELDOM MORE grotesque than in its periodic protests against "foreign criticism." So abundant is Germany's export trade of violent propaganda that these outcries are as arrogant as they are transparent. William E. Dodd, retiring American ambassador to Germany, has once more wounded Nazi sensibility, an offense rendered especially significant by his having had so outstanding an opportunity to observe the new Germany at first hand. He saw, as he recalled in his New York address last week, how men were "denied religious, personal, and press freedom, how universities and schools were put under party control, and how almost as many personal opponents were killed in five years as Charles II had executed in twenty years of the seventeenth century." It was an impressive indictment. Even more damaging was Mr. Dodd's reminder of the reckless attacks against the democracies delivered by high Nazi officials at Nürnberg and elsewhere. Needless to say, these attacks on the United States were never suppressed in American journals, as Mr. Roosevelt's speeches are now being banned in Germany, or condensed into three lines, as the German papers have done with Mr. Dodd's remarks. The Nazis will do well to drop the subject. Their most recent outcry comes appropriately at the moment when the propaganda they have subsidized in Yugoslavia has succeeded in driving the last Jewish representative out of the parliament at Belgrade.

*

IT WOULD BE IDLE TO PRETEND THAT the service on American ships is all that it should be. But it is both dishonest and futile to center the blame for inferior service and outright abuses on ships' crews and on the unions to which many of them belong. The fact is that the maritime unions which became firmly established as a result of the 1934 and subsequent strikes have put an end to many abuses. Another important fact is that adequate laws for enforcing discipline are already on the statute books. The trouble lies elsewhere. Marine ownership in this country is shot through with the corruption that goes with huge indirect subsidies and the fight for profits. Daniel C. Roper's bureau of inspection has never fulfilled its function when the function went against the interests of the shipowners. And in particular the living conditions of mere seamen have been the last consideration, though the government has poured millions into the industry. The remedy does not lie in crippling the unions. The testimony of irate passengers is being given a big play in hearings in Washington in connection with possible changes in the maritime laws, especially as regards labor. The C. I. O. is protesting that much of this testimony is false and stating the case for its members. It is a good case, backed by official reports on the state of our merchant marine. Seamen are not perfect, but passengers with personal grievances are easily found. Certainly their testimony must not be used as a basis for laws which would hamstring the unions and leave the basic situation untouched.

*

RECENT UNPUBLISHED INFORMATION CLEARS up a doubt regarding Italian intervention in Spain. In November reports appeared in the European press about the repatriation of Italian troops, said to have been transported from Spain to the Italian colony of Libya. At the same time Mussolini's representative on the London Non-Intervention Committee minimized the presence of Roman soldiers in Franco's ranks and announced officially that only 40,000 Italians were in the Spanish army. Had Mussolini really taken the non-intervention debating club seriously enough to withdraw his army from Spain? Not at all. But he did consider British pressure for withdrawal serious enough to cloak his activities. We now learn that 8,000 Negro and Arab troops from Libya recently arrived at Melilla, Spanish Morocco, where they were housed in newly built barracks; and that 900 Tripolitans disembarked from a Nazi steamer at Malaga on December 29. The reason for substituting colonials for white Italians is obvious: the Libyans can be taken for Moors. The Non-Intervention Committee has never even considered evacuating Moors from Spain, although under the Algeciras treaty the Moors are non-Spanish. The French oppose such a move because if the Moors of Spanish Morocco are not Spaniards, it follows that the Moors of French Morocco are not French—a conclusion that would rule out the future use of French colonials in Europe. For Mussolini an additional advantage of sending Africans to Spain is that reports of their casualties and the return of their wounded will not cause discontent in Italian cities and villages.

*

"THOSE REDS ARE TRYING TO CONVINCE the country that I'm a tyrant and a dictator . . . the people have invested me with . . . power, and I am applying it for the benefit of the people." This was the beginning of an inimitable interview last week with Frank Hague, in which Jersey City's mayor tried to convince the country that there is no ground for comparing him with Hitler and Mussolini. When asked if it were not a violation of civil rights to expel men arbitrarily from the city without bringing them into court, Mr. Hague replied, "No. They went peacefully, didn't they?" He denied charges that he had brought pressure to bear on owners of private halls to prevent their lease for C. I. O. meetings but said he "thought it natural" that the owners should refuse their halls to groups hostile to the local administration. Right to the end the interview was so convincing that we found ourselves tracing a fascist chin and a Nazi mustache on the latest newspaper photograph of the Jersey Terror before throwing it into the wastebasket. Meanwhile we had been wondering just how happy the happy workers of Jersey City are under Mayor Hague's I-am-the-lawship. We read that while Hague waves the flag all city employees have been asked to waive their right to full pay in order that reductions of 15 to 23 per cent made last spring might continue in effect. We were also told by William J. Carney of the New Jersey C. I. O. that 292,000 workers in New Jersey receive less than the state minimum of $17, that 45,300 of these draw from $5 to $7.99 a week, that 34,000 get less than $5, and that in many Jersey City establishments workers get $3, $4, and $5 a week. He also said that 150,000 New Jersey workers and even some employers had succumbed to the alien blandishments of the C. I. O. That threatening fact and the horrible example of what happened to Tammany may explain why the political boss of one of the oldest of our sweatshop states has been perspiring so heavily since the C. I. O. sent him a Bill of Rights, collect.

The Fall of France's Popular Front

WITH the collapse of the second Popular Front government France has slipped back to the political uncertainty of pre-Popular Front days. Despite their overwhelming majority in the Chamber, the left parties, as in 1932-36, have found it difficult to work together. As a result, France came perilously near having a right government under Bonnet, and has in prospect at the moment a makeshift ministry which is a far cry from the vigorous left Cabinet with which Blum started two years ago.

It is easy to say that the Popular Front was bound to disintegrate as soon as the immediate menace of fascism was removed. There was little to unite two such different parties as the middle-class Radical Socialists and the Communists except the fear of an immediate fascist coup. Once that fear was lifted, it was inevitable that the two would clash on fundamental issues of both domestic and foreign policy. But to lay too much stress on this point is to ignore the fact that the threat of fascism in the international sphere is far greater today than it was in 1936. And it is precisely in this respect that the Popular Front has suffered its greatest failure.

If it is true that the Communists were first to desert the Popular Front, in spirit if not in votes, it was because the Spanish policy of both the Blum and the Chautemps government aided rather than curbed the growing menace of fascism. The lack of a strong Foreign Minister, like Briand or Barthou, to lead rather than follow England, has probably contributed more to the disintegration of the left coalition than doctrinal disputes over domestic policy.

It cannot be denied, however, that the Chautemps government was afflicted with the same sort of paralysis in the domestic field that ruined Ramsay MacDonald, and that to a certain extent hampers the New Deal. Any attempt to push through basic reforms for the protection of the working class while clinging to laissez faire economics is bound to fail. The Conservative Party of Great Britain has pushed through more reforms than either the Liberal or the Labor Party precisely because it made no effort to insist on the forms of laissez faire. In demanding exchange restrictions the French Socialists and Communists appear to recognize the necessity for economic controls even under capitalism, but the Radicals have found it extremely difficult to throw aside their traditional policies. This divergence of principle is probably the greatest weakness of the Popular Front as a practical bulwark against fascism. It is difficult to form a coalition to save traditional democracy without accepting, as a more or less unwelcome guest, democracy's shadow in the economic sphere—the doctrine of laissez faire.

Given these problems, it is difficult to be optimistic regarding the prospects of a new French Cabinet. There is no indication that it will be more realistic in either domestic or foreign policies. Broadening the base of the government may give it more initial support, but it adds to the number of issues on which internal disagreement may arise. An election at this time would be of little value, since it would probably bring only slight, if any, changes in the relative strength of the various parties. Unless unexpected leadership develops from within the ranks of the Popular Front, there is grave danger that France may become progressively more disorganized until it faces once more an immediate threat of civil war.

Squabble in the C. I. O.

WHEN two C. I. O. leaders like John L. Lewis and David Dubinsky begin airing their dissensions in public, as they have been doing, it is a cause for concern to all friends of labor. For it gives aid and comfort to labor's enemies and it diverts the energies of the leaders. Yet we are not seriously worried by the quarrel itself. Such squabbles are signs that a growing young labor movement has not yet petrified. If they did not crop out at this point in labor history, we should begin to suspect that machine dictatorship was suppressing them. For in building a new unionism, harmony is possible only in the arc of great and rapid growth. When the growth is halted, as it has been now by the depression, then the disparate elements of personal temperament, trade-union tactics, and social philosophy are bound to emerge to view. That is what Mr. Dubinsky means when he says that the C. I. O. honeymoon is now over.

Mr. Dubinsky's charges turn on Mr. Lewis's role in the peace negotiations with the A. F. of L. We may dismiss the rhetoric that has been bandied about, because Mr. Lewis would agree that "no man has a mortgage on the labor movement" and Mr. Dubinsky would agree that it is not "peace at any price" that he wants with the A. F. of L. What it all comes down to is differing versions of what happened during the peace negotiations and a difference of opinion as to what constitutes an "honorable peace."

Mr. Dubinsky accuses Mr. Lewis of not having tried hard enough to effect peace, and of not having followed up offers that might have constituted the basis of peace. There is no record available, unfortunately, to indicate what peace terms were actually offered or why the negotiations failed. No records were kept, and the A. F. of L. delegates were understood to have objected to a joint public statement of the terms discussed. But we do have the statements of Philip Murray, head of the Steel Workers' Union and chairman of the C. I. O. peace delegates —a person with a mind of his own and a will for realism. And from his comments several things are clear. The A. F. of L. delegates were at every point extremely vague; nor was it even certain that they had been given authority by the Executive Council to negotiate a peace. The basic C. I. O. condition was that all their members were to be reaffiliated, that where they had a preponderant strength their unions were to receive recognition along with the recognition of the principle of industrial unionism. Any situations in which serious jurisdictional differences existed were to be settled by negotiation between the two unions, and the C. I. O. leaders understood that they would have to make considerable concessions in this respect. The A. F. of L. delegates, on the other hand, insisted that they would not take back any except the original ten C. I. O. unions and that the remaining twenty-two unions that have joined the C. I. O. in the past two years would be enabled to come back only when they had reached an agreement with the corresponding A. F. of L. union leaders.

On several points there is considerable doubt. It is not clear whether the twenty-two C. I. O. unions were to come back singly or whether after negotiating singly they were to be readmitted as a group. It is not clear by what methods these agreements were to be reached: while there was some talk of appointing impartial arbitrators, this was never made definite. Finally, there was never any explicit statement as to the method by which the A. F. of L. Executive Council, which had enlarged its powers for disciplining the member unions, was to strip itself of those powers again. Clearly these enlarged powers would be a continuing threat to the C. I. O. unions returning under any arrangement.

The great weakness in Mr. Dubinsky's contention is that no evidence has been offered indicating that the A. F. of L. showed any inclination for an "honorable peace." And the reason is clear. The Executive Council feared that it would be overwhelmed by the new membership that would come pouring in from the C. I. O. It preferred, in Mr. Lewis's phraseology, to take back only what it could digest, and the members of the Executive Council seized the present occasion for a showdown because they felt that the depression gave them the whip hand. The depression is hitting the heavy industries, and therefore the C. I. O., first; the A. F. of L., being more institutionalized, is less dependent upon the size and welfare of its rank-and-file membership.

There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of Mr. Dubinsky's intentions, but the effect of his indictment will be other than what he intends. He has already become the darling of the editorial writers of the conservative press, which may be relied on to extend an eager welcome to those who stir up a tempest within union ranks. What is clearly necessary is that any evidence Mr. Dubinsky and Mr. Lewis and Mr. Murray and others may have should be presented to an impartial committee of the C. I. O.'s undoubted friends. The shouting of dictatorship and Communist influence in the C. I. O. may be useful in the political situation that Mr. Dubinsky finds in his own union, but it cannot do him or anyone else any credit. As president of the I. L. G. W. U. he is caught between the pressure of thirty-one vice-presidents, many of them under the influence of anti-C. I. O. sentiment such as is represented in the group clustering around the Jewish Daily Forward, an Old Guard Socialist paper. These groups are basically A. F. of L. in their thinking, and it would be unfortunate if Mr. Dubinsky, reacting to such pressure, should forget that there is a basic difference between the old unionism of the A. F. of L. and the new unionism of the C. I. O.

This whole dispute will be determined less by recriminations and accusations than by what the next few months will add to the volume of unemployment. If the C. I. O. unions are hit even harder than they have been thus far, the negotiations for a labor peace will undoubtedly be reopened and pushed to a conclusion regardless of personalities, but it is well to remember that the labor movement today is being split by the same basic cleavages that are splitting the Democratic Party. In both instances there are cries of communism and dictatorship. Mr. Lewis, like Mr. Roosevelt, undoubtedly has a flair for power and at times he sees the labor movement and himself in organic terms. We should be the first to say that the new unionism cannot grow to a healthy stature unless democratic checks are placed on him as well as on any other leader. The true health of American labor can lie only in its being thoroughly democratic. As for the charges of communism, they are as absurd when leveled against Mr. Lewis as they are when leveled against Mr. Roosevelt. The need of the hour is for firmness of tactics, militancy of effort, and the achievement of a unity that will not undo the great work of the past two years. Otherwise, at the very moment when labor needs its greatest strength because capitalism is breaking down, it will find itself without a fighting spirit and without a decisive social program.

France in Crisis

BY M. E. RAVAGE

THE first Popular Front government was overthrown from without; the second collapsed from within. Last June it was the defeated minority that struck the blow at Léon Blum; on Friday Camille Chautemps surrendered to the left wing of his own majority.

On the surface the two events are quite unrelated. In fact the one followed logically and inevitably from the other. With the departure of Blum from the Hotel Matignon and the arrival of Bonnet in the rue de Rivoli, the soul had gone out of the left coalition. Thenceforward it was a matter of time when one or another of the component parties would find courage to pronounce the coroner's verdict. Repeatedly in the last six months the moment seemed to be at hand. Each time it was averted through fear of the consequences.

Appearances to the contrary notwithstanding, I venture to say that Yvon Delbos and the foreign policy of the Chautemps Cabinet had at least as much to do with the crisis as Georges Bonnet, the instability of the franc, and the renewed wave of sitdown strikes. M. Bonnet was less reluctant to go than he cared to admit. The Socialists, on the other hand, would have greatly preferred to let well enough alone. This is not saying that Bonnet did not want to remain Finance Minister or even to become Premier, that Blum was not serious about exchange control, or that the Communists were indifferent about the "pause" degenerating into a standstill. The truth is that ever since his entry into the Cabinet Bonnet had dreamed and labored to head the next combination. Unhappily his much-advertised wizardry in finance did not measure up in practice to his task. He balanced the budget on paper. But despite his efforts, capital continued to emigrate, and the franc which he had set afloat sank lower than it had sunk since 1926. He sought an alibi for his failure, not without some justification, in the monetary agitation of the Socialists, in the intrigues of the Communists, and in the supposedly political labor unrest. But the Chamber was what the election had made it; so that it was not without relief that, failing to oust the Communists from the majority and fill their place with the Flandin-Reynaud Democratic Alliance, he saw an opening to leave with honor. His acceptance of President Lebrun's offer to form a new government was, he well knew, a gesture that deceived no one, since even his own party would not stand by him.

Technically, the Socialists upset the government by withdrawing their ministers from the coalition. But they did so under duress. In the present state of labor opinion it would have been not far removed from political suicide for them to withhold solidarity from their fellow-Marxists. Blum and his party had more reason than the Radical Socialists for being weary of the latter-day tactics of the Communists. Blum had known for an entire year the taste of Thorez-Duclos backing, which consisted of support in the Chamber and opposition outside. He liked no better than Chautemps the Communists' flirtations with clericalism and the "outstretched hand" to the Pope. And his party watched with uneasiness the maneuvers of their Communist "brothers" to bring about unity with the Socialist masses over the heads of the leaders. But precisely this last strategy made any appearance of Blum's compromising with Bonnet a mortal danger for the very existence of the Socialist Party.

The curious fact is that for more than five months Thorez and Duclos let the Socialists fight the Finance Minister single-handed. Their own sector was the Quai d'Orsay. They battled with Delbos-Blum for not retiring Alexis Léger, the permanent chief of the department. They sulked when Delbos-Chautemps met Chamberlain-Eden in London over the head of Moscow. And when Delbos made his swing around the circle recently and failed to include Russia in his itinerary, they vowed vengeance. There can be little doubt that some of the recent strikes were provoked by them for foreign-political objects. But Chautemps and Bonnet are mistaken if they imagine that the entire strike wave is of Communist inspiration. They need only compare the increases in wages and in living costs for the past year and a half to be convinced of their error.

It is extremely unlikely that Delbos will be Foreign Minister in the next government. But unless Thorez himself obtains that portfolio—which I think highly improbable—the new head of the Quai d'Orsay can scarcely be expected to adopt a very different policy toward the U. S. S. R. from that of his predecessor. The key to that difficulty lies not in Paris but in London.

The crisis as a whole promises not to be easy to resolve. Herriot, whom the Communists would like above everyone else, wants to succeed Lebrun in the Presidency, and has a veritable phobia for the Premiership. Daladier has declined the honor. Blum, having rallied to the "Van Zeeland formula"—national union under left leadership—advanced by L. O. Frossard (Ex-Communist, ex-Socialist, and a minister in the last Laval Cabinet) has tried and failed, and as I write Chautemps is once more trying his hand.

There remain two other possibilities—Flandin or new elections. I incline to the former, eventually if not at once, as the likelier solution. A new election would scarcely change the complexion of the Chamber; the nation continues faithful to the Popular Front. And the country has already had more turmoil than it needs or can afford.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Cities That Consume Men

BY HAROLD WARD

AMERICAN cities are on the march. True, most of them do not know where they are going, and those that do are weighed down by such a pack of troubles—technical, economic, financial, administrative, and social—that their progress suggests comparison with those "Deserts on the March" so vividly portrayed for us by Paul B. Sears in his book of that name.

Some twenty years ago Sir Patrick Geddes, one of the founders of the regional-planning movement, warned against the dangers of an urban development that neglected the fundamental question of balance between town and country. He was particularly struck by the enormous human and social waste involved in the cancer-like growth of huge cities—a growth which he dramatized as a regressing cycle in four stages: Megalopolis, Parasitopolis, Patholopolis, Necropolis.

Were Sir Patrick alive today he would find much to confirm and not a little to qualify his fears in the first of a series of monographs to be issued by the Urbanism Committee of the National Resources Committee. This report, entitled "Our Cities, Their Role in the National Economy," is the first comprehensive official study of this vital topic since R. D. McKenzie's "Metropolitan Communities," issued as part of ex-President Hoover's inquiry into "Recent Social Trends." As such it is a document of great value and significance—especially to those 70,000,000 or so Americans who today find their destinies linked, for good or evil, to what McKenzie has aptly called the "gravitational field" of the city.

Nowhere has the acceleration of urban life been more marked and decisive than in the United States. A century ago we did not have a single city with 100,000 inhabitants, and a clear nine-tenths of the country's 13,000,000 people were classified as rural. Not until 1880 did the combined forces of industrial expansion, immigration, transportation development, and world markets make New York our first metropolis of a million inhabitants. Today New York is only one of ninety-four cities in the 100,000 class which dominate the economic and social life of nearly one-third of the American people. Another 3,071 communities listed by the census as "urban"—containing 2,500 or more inhabitants—bring the proportion of city dwellers to more than half the total population. All this means that since 1790 our urban population has increased 300 times over, as against a meager 15-fold increase in the rural districts.

Standing alone, facts like the foregoing mean very little. What is important is not the reality of urbanization, whose progress can be observed in every industrialized country, but its characteristics, its problems, and its social consequences as we are beginning to understand them in America. From the mass of contradictory and confused tendencies underlying our urban development three major strands can be disengaged. We have, first, the strikingly uneven regional development of our cities, resulting in part from the physical struggles with what Isaiah Bowman has called the "pioneer fringe" but even more from artificial handicaps imposed by wasteful methods of agriculture and by a socially unsound exploitation of "cheap labor" in the interest of larger industrial and manufacturing profits. Closely associated with this is the second factor in urban concentration, the drift of population away from economically starved rural areas toward a small group of highly congested "metropolitan areas," of which three—New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia—have an aggregate population density of 18,000 per square mile, against the national average of 42. The third factor, dynamically related to the second, is that of dispersion, an outward drift from the central cities into suburbs and satellite areas, of which there are nearly 500 in the New York region alone (a territory embracing 5,000 square miles in three states).

No more eloquent proof of America's failure to balance its rural-urban budget can be found than in the text and photographs of "You Have Seen Their Faces," by Erskine Caldwell and Margaret Bourke-White. In the region pictured in this book, in and around the southern Appalachians, the triple plagues of resource exhaustion, human exploitation, and political barbarism have reduced the proportion of those living in urban communities to about a third of the population. Mississippi rates a national low of 16.9 per cent, followed by Arkansas and Alabama—the TVA power development and industrial migration from the North are so far little more than shots in the arm of a very sick region. In sharp contrast, the New England states of Massachusetts and Rhode Island are over 90 per cent urban, New York and New Jersey over 80 per cent, and California—thanks largely to Los Angeles and San Francisco—about 75 per cent. An urban development which gives us a range of anywhere from 17 to 95 persons out of 100 living in cities, and this despite amazing technological advances in every field of production and distribution, is certainly nothing to be complacent about.

Outside the thirty-three major industrial areas recognized by the census, millions of Americans, lacking more balanced economic opportunities, look for an escape by drifting first into the great cities, then out again into the neighboring satellite areas. The Urbanism Committee tells us that "nearly one-half of the population lives within a radius of from twenty to fifty miles of cities of over 100,000 inhabitants," and that the percentage of our total population growth absorbed by these cities has increased from 46 per cent in the decade 1890-1900 to nearly 75 per cent in the period 1920-30. Commenting on this "urban magnetism" (in the remarkable study of "Migration and Economic Opportunity" by Carter Goodrich and associates) C. Warren Thornthwaite writes that in the twenties "the four areas of New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, and Detroit attracted four and a half millions of people—a figure more than half as great as the total number of people who left the farms for the cities." Metropolitan New York alone absorbed one and a half million; this despite a contrary tendency of the great cities to spill their excess inhabitants into surrounding communities whose "independence" of the center is more an administrative fiction than a social fact.

It is true that both these drifts were partially checked during the depression, but neither town nor country gained by the exposure of (1) the economic and technical incapacity of cities to take care of the millions of people—mostly under twenty-five—who had deserted impoverished rural districts for an imagined future in the Big Town; and (2) a compulsion to "live off the land" entirely out of focus with economic realities. An internal migration movement of nearly 700,000 people a year, most of them merely shuffling along in obedience to forces of which they have no understanding, following the line of least resistance toward the nearest job opportunity, piling up an enormous backlog of housing problems, health and hygiene deficiencies, crime, delinquency, suicide, and destitution—this is the seamy side of the brave outward show of American cities on the march.

It is all very well to say, as Chairman C. A. Dykstra and his associates of the Urbanism Committee declare, that "urbanism is a symptom of national maturity." Sir Patrick Geddes, and long before him Frederick Engels, understood that the real maturity of an industrial society dependent upon technics for its mastery of a physical environment implies "the abolition of the antithesis between town and country." If cities are the nerve junctions of the social organism, responsible for the smooth and prompt transmission of myriad stimuli to the remotest parts of the country, no real health is possible without the type of long-range planning which can integrate a complex of factors into one functioning whole. A balanced town-and-country economy will understand the connection between municipal zoning laws and the industrial possibilities of a large adjacent territory; it will weigh natural against human resources, and oppose to a decentralization which gives this country 175,000 separate governments costing (in 1932) more than four billion dollars some kind of unified but democratic control.

Since we are, so to speak, paying through the nose for the privilege of living in cities which are six parts traffic congestion, three parts living expenses, and about one part all-around satisfaction, we may as well think through the head about our possible urban trends. What is the probable course of urban life in the next generation or so? A shrewd hint on this is provided by a "Memorandum on the Selection of Manufacturing Areas for the Housing Program" submitted by Carter Goodrich and his coworkers to the Suburban Division of the Resettlement Administration. On the safe assumption that population will follow where wage opportunities beckon, and that these latter will accompany manufacturing developments, the "Study of Population Redistribution" group worked out a system of areas that might be expected to assimilate most of our slowly increasing population. It is noticeable that all these areas are in established industrial regions; the fifteen most promising ones, in addition to New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and Detroit, include the cluster of cities around Bridgeport and Providence, Midwestern communities like Youngstown, St. Louis, and Cincinnati, and one Pacific Coast city, Los Angeles. Baltimore, Cleveland, and San Francisco are second-choice cities, while among the eight that do not deserve official attention at this time we note Indianapolis, Toledo, Rochester (New York), and two vigorous West Coast cities, Seattle and Tacoma. Ignoring size in favor of estimated "job stability," we may expect more urban development in the three Southern cities of Nashville, Chattanooga, and Knoxville—how much is this due to the combination of Northern capital and cheap Southern labor?—in Dallas, and in Denver, a central point in the Western ranch and mining country.

The interesting thing about this forecast based on "the probable stability of employment" is the concentration of possibilities east of the Mississippi: only two of the fifteen best choices—St. Louis and Los Angeles—seem to justify Horace Greeley's dictum, at least on any mass scale. It would appear that economic opportunities, far from becoming more evenly spread over the map, exhibit a centralizing tendency of their own. The half-million or more migrants who annually swarm over the country in search of elementary security must still depend on a relatively small group of what C. S. Stein has called "dinosaur cities"; and when they get there most of them must be prepared to find a heartbreaking assortment of hardships, of which bad housing is only the most conspicuous.

There is no escaping the fact—stressed by the Urbanism Committee—that "the large cities of the country as a whole have grown more rapidly than the small cities." The economic counterpart of this trend is indicated by figures showing that the great metropolitan areas account for from two-thirds to four-fifths of all industrial establishments, all wage-earners and salaried employees, all wholesale trade, and the value of all industrial production. This tremendous concentration of our productive forces within a relatively small area—10 per cent of the people of the country are living on .02 per cent of its surface—is a basic problem of our time. How to solve it, how to transform our cities from mere manufacturing centers or trading posts to well-rounded communities linked in a network of intelligently planned social services, is something for the entire American public, not merely planners and engineers, to worry about.

One point, at least, is clearly brought out by the preliminary report of the Urbanism Committee. It is that the entire urban development of the country got off to a bad start. Our first cities found their own economic and social level in accordance with a relatively simple economy based on agriculture and maritime commerce. With the opening up of a fabulously rich continent there came an attitude of reckless, devil-may-care exploitation: natural resources were inexhaustible, human resources could be had from a stricken Europe; mix them both together with a proper eye on the main chance of profit, and the rest would take care of itself.

It has—with the result that American cities, despite amazing technical facilities, quite justify their description as "consumers of men." Having to a great degree grown at the expense of their rural environment and in isolation from it, they have become social liabilities where they should be assets. Valuations imposed by a competitive agricultural and industrial economy have set one region against another; so that the very idea of obtaining a genuine balance seems utopian.

Too utopian, perhaps, for the National Resources Committee, whose "recommendations," eleven in number, stay well within the safety zone of more and more facts, more and more education, more and more cooperation with agencies, public and private, hopelessly prevented from taking any drastic, long-range action.

Memphis Is Safe for Ford

BY GEORGE LAMBERT

"I HAVE seen a man as gentle and as deserving of the protection of the law as you and I, whose head was hammered to a bloody pulp with an iron hammer on the main street of a great American city in plain view of many witnesses . . . but because the man was a union organizer, no arrests were made." The words are those of J. Warren Madden, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, speaking before the United States Conference of Mayors; the "great American city" to which he referred is Memphis, Tennessee; and the man whose "head was hammered to a bloody pulp with an iron hammer" is Norman Smith, organizer for the United Automobile Workers of America. Unfortunately Chairman Madden did not give the facts behind the attack on Norman Smith. If he had, he would have laid bare a lamentable state of affairs in the city of Memphis—political bossism, police brutality, wholesale violations of civil liberties, and corporation domination of the city government.

On September 18 of last year Mayor Watkins Overton announced to Memphis newspapermen, "Imported C. I. O. agitators, Communists, and highly paid professional organizers are not wanted in Memphis. They will not be tolerated." Police Commissioner Davis indorsed the Mayor's remarks and added, "We know Norman Smith and his whereabouts and will take care of that situation very soon." Three days later the "situation" had been "taken care of." Norman Smith was in a Memphis hospital being treated for cuts and bruises caused by a beating administered by at least twelve men using empty bottles and cables. From the hospital he was taken to jail. On the same day Charles Phillips, a Memphis resident and an employee of the Ford assembly plant who had been active in organizational work, was also beaten. Prior to that time Ben McCullough, a Ford worker, had twice been beaten.

After his release from jail on the following morning Smith decided to take his case and that of the automobile workers to the people of Memphis by means of the radio. During the next two weeks he arranged for a series of broadcasts over station WMPS and made one radio talk. Meanwhile the police made a pretense of investigating his beating, the American Civil Liberties Union offered a $1,000 reward for the apprehension and conviction of his assailants, and the Automobile Workers sent three organizers from St. Louis as reinforcements.

On October 5, while on his way to the radio station for his second broadcast, Norman Smith was dragged from his car by six or seven men, slugged over the head with a pistol butt, and beaten with a hammer and pistols so brutally that he had to be treated for fifteen cuts, one of which required twenty-four stitches. His companion, Harry Elder, beaten less severely, managed to reach the radio station, where he made the talk Smith had intended to make. The police have the license number of one of the automobiles used by the thugs, and there were several eyewitnesses to both of Smith's beatings, but if any arrests have been made, the fact hasn't been published.

The Ford Motor Company has tried to prevent the organization of its outlying assembly plants by the same methods that it has used at the giant Ford plant in Dearborn, Michigan, methods which were outlined in the decision against the Ford Company recently handed down by the NLRB. These include the establishment of company unions, the open flouting of the principle of collective bargaining, the use of thugs to coerce workers and to beat organizers, and the use of the machinery of the city government both to assure the immunity of the thugs and to harass union workers with false arrests and police intimidation. But while in Dearborn the Ford Company has for some time completely controlled the political machinery of the city, in other cities it has had to persuade local officials either to give active aid in opposing organization or at least to remain passive while Ford agents took the necessary steps. The threat of moving the huge Ford pay roll elsewhere seems to have been sufficient in most instances to make officials decide to "cooperate."

This threat has certainly worked in Dallas, where in the past six months eighteen persons suspected of being interested in C. I. O. unionism have been beaten and not a single conviction has been obtained. In Kansas City the Ford Company closed its assembly plant early in the autumn and announced that it would remain closed unless the city could guarantee "proper protection to Ford employees." It was only reopened after City Manager McElroy went to Dearborn and evidently gave such a guaranty. Since his visit city police have been used as strikebreakers. Many Memphis citizens believe that the city government made an agreement with Ford that not only the Ford plant but also the giant new Firestone Tire Company plant should be kept unorganized. This plant, scheduled to open soon and to employ 5,000 or more workers, is requiring that all applicants for jobs must have been born in Shelby County, that is, in Memphis. With its opening Firestone's chief production center will no longer be Akron, Ohio, where the Rubber Workers' Union is very strong.

For more than twenty years Memphis has been ruled by a political machine headed by Boss Ed Crump. The influence of the Crump machine extends to the courts and the schools, and particularly to federal and state patronage; and until recently it took in the labor movement. The chief agency for suppressing any anti-Crump tendencies which may now and then spring up is the police force, headed by Chief Will Lee, one of the South's most notorious red-baiters. Chief Lee has used his police force to raid, twice, the offices of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, to break up picket lines, to raid and suppress meetings of the Workers' Alliance, and to jail anyone whom he labels a "Communist," which means apparently anyone interested in a labor organization not bearing the stamp of Crump approval.

To illustrate the police tactics of the Crump machine: during the 1936 political campaign I found it necessary to go to the Memphis police department to secure permission for Mrs. Kate Bradford Stockton, Socialist candidate for Governor of Tennessee, to speak in Memphis parks. Lee asked me first why we had held "a secret meeting" the night before, referring to an informal public meeting at which reporters were present. I assured him that the meeting had not been secret, but wanted to know if he proposed to forbid secret meetings. The Chief disregarded this question completely and told me that he knew that the meeting had been secret since he had a man covering it who reported that he couldn't get in. He then warned me that he could not guarantee police protection to Mrs. Stockton if she said anything against Gordon Browning, the Crump candidate for governor. Permission to use the parks was granted only after the Commissioner of Public Safety arrived and gave Lee instruction to issue our permits. Even then Lee made a final "telling" observation; after I had referred to Mrs. Stockton as "Comrade Stockton," he turned to the Public Safety Commissioner and remarked, "See there. They call each other 'Comrade.' Wasn't I telling you that them and the Communists are the same thing?"

In January of 1937 Memphis police arrested Herbert Harris, Socialist Party organizer, at a meeting of the Workers' Alliance where he was to show a labor film. I found out about the arrest a short time later and went over to the jail to learn the nature of the charges. The desk sergeant said they hadn't decided on the charge. A plainclothes man standing behind the sergeant then wanted to know who I was. When I told him that I was a Socialist organizer associated with Harris, he said, "We'd better hold you, too," and took me back to a cell. The next morning in court when charges were read I discovered that I had violated a fire ordinance and that Harris had operated a motion-picture machine without a license and had also violated a fire ordinance. We were released in court, but when Harris, accompanied by a Memphis attorney, went to the office of Chief Lee to reclaim his sound truck and motion-picture apparatus, Lee gave him twenty minutes to get out of town. He said that if Harris was not out of town in that time he would arrest him for vagrancy, and if that charge didn't stick he'd arrest him for being a suspicious character, and if that didn't stick he'd arrest him for having an improper license on his truck and keep on arresting him until he would be glad to get out of town.

After the police had disposed of Norman Smith, they turned to the Communists and arrested W. H. Spradling, organizer for the Communist Party, in his room at the Y. M. C. A., where he had been living for three months. Charged with vagrancy and with being a suspicious character, Spradling was fined $25 on the first charge and $50 on the second. As he was unable to pay the fine at the time, he was sent to the workhouse, where he remained for more than a week, until his organization was able to raise the money. A short time later Police Chief Lee called to his office H. L. Mitchell and Newell Fowler, secretary and attorney, respectively, of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union. In an affidavit to the La Follette committee, Mitchell states that the police chief threatened to raid the offices of the union again, as he had done three years before, unless the union cleaned out "the communistic literature which it has out there" and stopped "letting cars with foreign licenses park out in front of the office."

With liberals in Memphis so few and so thoroughly intimidated, there has been no loud protest even against such flagrant violations of civil liberties as those committed by the Crump machine during the past few months. However, the National Committee for People's Rights late in November sent in Laurent Frantz, a native Tennessean and a graduate of the Law School of the University of Tennessee, to organize the liberals of the city to demand the observance of constitutional guaranties and the arrest of those guilty of the series of anti-union beatings. As a final demonstration, if any were needed, of the insincerity of the claims of Boss Crump's henchmen that they were doing all they could, Mr. Frantz had hardly started on his work before police arrested him in his hotel room and took him to headquarters, where he was finger-printed, photographed, and questioned by Chief Lee for more than an hour concerning his intentions.

PUBLIC

Book Prices and the Law

BY CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

IN THE last six months two events of major interest have occurred in the publishing world. Both directly affect the buyer of books. One, an act of legislation, may result in the raising of book prices; the other, a commercial venture, may keep them where they are, or possibly lower them in general. The Miller-Tydings bill, signed by the President in August, authorizes what is equivalent to a national price-fixing plan for the resale of manufactured goods 97.5 per cent of which are drugs, cosmetics, or liquors, with books coming in through the back door—but in, none the less. Modern Age Books, Incorporated, is an experiment in the publication of new and reprinted paper-bound books to be sold at 25 and 35 cents, and in cloth for 85 cents.

The Miller-Tydings bill, which seems to be what producers have been waiting for since the strangulation of the NRA codes, legalizes interstate price-fixing agreements between distributor and manufacturer and brings national legality to fair-trade contracts already in effect in forty-two states. These fair-trade contracts, originally created for the purpose of maintaining merchandise-resale prices and thereby eliminating price-cutting, more specifically enabled the producer of trademarked goods to dictate the price at which his commodity was to be resold, within the state, by the retailer. The first statute of this kind was passed in California in 1931, under the tutelage of the druggists' association, after the defeat in the Senate of the Capper-Kelly bills, which sought to circumvent the Sherman Act. The California fair-trade act was, in fact, a successful evasion of two Supreme Court rulings: in 1911, in the case of the Dr. Miles Medical Company vs. Park, and in 1921, in the case of the Federal Trade Commission vs. the Beechnut Packing Company, the Supreme Court had found price-fixing unconstitutional, a bar to fair competition, and consequently a violation of the Sherman Act.

California slid from under these decisions by simply limiting price-maintenance contracts between manufacturer and retailer to the state boundaries. Within a short time similar laws were passed in Washington, Oregon, New York, New Jersey, and Wisconsin. In 1935 Doubleday, Doran and Company, in an attempt to test the New York law (the Feld-Crawford Act), haled R. H. Macy into court for price-cutting. The case was thrown out by Justice Frederick P. Close of the New York Supreme Court, who declared the act unconstitutional on the ground that the contracts bound non-signers as well as signers and gave "private persons unlimited power over the property of others." This was a severe blow to fixed-price advocates and of course in this state invalidated their best efforts. In December, 1936, however, the Supreme Court reversed Judge Close's opinion, as well as all past precedents, in decisions on four cases, two of which had reference to the California law, two to the Illinois law. The non-signer clause was found valid on the theory that non-signers interfered with the functions of contracts; the producer, the court also decided, had the right to protect his trademark against the "damage" of a price cut.

Twenty-seven states after this interpretation passed fair-trade laws, to be followed in Congress by the Miller-Tydings bill, presented as an amendment to the Sherman Act and providing for the exchange of uniform price contracts between the states.

The publisher, naturally, welcomes the fair-trade price and the protection it affords the small bookshop by eliminating the competition of the price-cutter. His reasons are practical rather than paternalistic. Unlike magazines, which enjoy the advantages of a reduced postal rate and have developed a large subscription and mail circulation, books are distributed almost exclusively through retail outlets. These outlets, the bookshops, derive 20 per cent of their profit from best sellers, or from what department stores have, in the past, largely converted into "loss leaders." The device of the "loss leader" is a simple one. An article, in this case a book, is sold at a minimum profit or even at a loss as a bait to patrons, to create a "bargain myth," and to increase the sale of non-trademarked goods at prices which more than compensate for the loss on the bait. Macy's, for example, sold "Gone with the Wind" ($3) at cut prices which went as low as 89 cents, and handled 18 per cent of the total 1,300,000 copies sold. Naturally, the bookseller with no other merchandise to offset his losses was unable to compete with the department store on those terms. Twelve stores throughout the country were in this way seriously undermining the profits of the local bookshops. Some of the booksellers (there are only about 800 with whom publishers have direct dealings) were driven out of business, unable to survive on the sale of poetry and gardening tracts, and the publishers began to give serious thought to a practice that threatened their outlets and, what was more alarming, themselves.

Their aroused interest in fair prices coincided with the campaign for price maintenance being waged by the National Association of Retail Druggists, and finally a committee headed by Donald Brace, vice-president of Harcourt, Brace and Company, developed a plan whereby minimum prices would be set by contract with the dealers, on "all titles which the publisher elects to protect" (leaving a loophole for the Literary Guild and other price-cutting organizations with which the dealer is still unable to compete). In a short time the publisher and the retailer were welded more closely than ever before, books were selling throughout the nation at the prices listed on their jackets, and Macy's was forced to return 36,000 copies of "Gone with the Wind" to the Macmillan Company.

But what of the consumer? What, now, is to prevent the price of books from rising? An important competitive factor has been disposed of, and a new kind of price coordination established between book manufacturer and retailer. In the only other price-fixing arrangement known in the book industry, namely, the NRA Booksellers' Code, a provision was inserted protecting the consumer from price-manipulation by the publisher. The present fair-trade act contains no such clause. The arguments against the possibility of price-raising are, on the whole, unsatisfactory. For example, Frederic Melcher, editor of the Publishers' Weekly, wrote in the Atlantic Monthly:

> No merchandise offered to the public encounters such extended competition as books. If a prospective buyer wants a book, he can get it from a local, county, or state library; he can borrow it from a friend; or he can buy a used copy; or he can rent a copy from a lending library. Is it probable that a publisher is going to jeopardize his chances to sell his product by putting an uneconomic price on it?

The conditions which Mr. Melcher describes are those which have always existed and which have never in the past "jeopardized" the publisher's "chances to sell his product."

A new condition is the uniform price which permits the bookseller to "push" a $3 book in preference to a $2 book without fear of being undersold elsewhere. The margin of retail profit is an important factor in price-raising. The retailer obtains his books from the publisher at discounts varying from 30 to 45 per cent of the list price, in proportion to the size of his order. It is no more than logical for him to "promote" those books which offer him a higher margin; 40 per cent of $3 is better than 40 per cent of $2.

An illuminating case in point is the experience of Pepsodent Toothpaste with the California fair-trade act in 1935. Pepsodent achieved national popularity through price reduction. After the passage of the fair-trade act it decided to void its contracts and return to its former low-price policy. Almost immediately it was neglected by the retailers in favor of other brands with a higher list price and consequently a higher profit margin. Within a few months Pepsodent not only was compelled to raise its prices but found it strategic to contribute $25,000 to advance the cause of additional fair-trade legislation.

Books, of course, are not as interchangeable as brands of toothpaste—nor are they daily necessities. They are bought and read for a variety of reasons, not always the most discriminating and discerning ones. In their extensive sale as gifts, for example, the element of personal selection is rarely as strong as that of shop recommendation. Many a customer bound for a hospital bedside or a birthday party has been gently guided by a clerk in the choice of an appropriate novel or biography. The clerk is being more than just "obliging." Very probably he is pushing a book which offers his employer the best profit in marginal discount.

An example closer home than the drug market is to be found in the failure of the Bonibooks. These books were published to sell for $1, or in the dealer's terms at about half the discount of the usual trade editions. From the beginning they were badly displayed or completely shelved, neglected in a way that was almost equivalent to a retailer boycott. When they subsequently failed, it was more because of a lack of dealer cooperation than of consumer demand.

If one or two publishers hoist their prices, it is not difficult to imagine the retailer having a similar preference for a $3 book over a $2 book. Nor to imagine the publisher of $2 books objecting, in turn, to the neglect of his output while the somewhat higher-priced editions of his competitors benefit by the retailers' sales pressure. Before he allows his cheaper books to go under the counter he will raise his prices, and the consumer will have to meet them, just as now people who buy books have to pay list prices in place of the former reduced prices offered by the department stores.

There is, however, another competitive condition which, while not as drastic as the "loss leader," may keep prices down—the publication of new books retailing for no more than most magazines, and competing almost as magazines with the "trade editions." Modern Age turns out minimum first editions of 50,000. Its profit lies in mass production, a manufacturing cliché which publishers have never been able to carry into practice, chiefly because of a lack of distributing facilities and retail outlets. The Modern Age books, small and paper-bound, are on sale on newsstands and in drug and chain stores in addition to bookstores. They have reached 7,000 outlets so far.

The average publisher loses money on 80 per cent of his books and makes his profit on 20 per cent—best sellers which fortuitously run into mass production. His editions are for the most part small; his production costs high. If Modern Age succeeds, and it is, of course, still in the experimental stage, the sale of any of its list books will be equivalent to the sale of the "moderate" best seller. On this basis the 25-cent book is commercially possible and beyond that should put a check on price-raising. The consumer responds to low prices. Perhaps that is why price-cutting became a menace to publishers who had nothing to gain from the "loss leader" practices of department stores. Books were sold to these stores at the usual discount. The profit was made by the stores themselves on articles in other departments. The habit of buying low-priced reading matter was being cultivated in the public. Modern Age is cultivating this same habit —and with prices being fixed and possibly going up, who can say that it is a bad one? There is one other habit which low-priced books encourage and which publishers themselves must welcome. And that is the habit of reading.

Behind Vansittart's Promotion

BY ROBERT DELL

Geneva, January 10

THE appointment of Sir Robert Vansittart as England's "Chief Diplomatic Adviser responsible directly to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs" appears on general grounds, leaving aside all personal considerations, to be a reactionary measure which justifies grave apprehension. The official announcement issued from the Foreign Office on December 31 says:

> The functions of the new officer will be analogous to those fulfilled by the occupants of the similar posts attached to other departments (the Chief Industrial and the Chief Economic Advisers to the Government), and will include advising the Secretary of State upon all major questions of policy concerning foreign affairs remitted to him for that purpose, and representing the Foreign Office on any occasions, whether at home or abroad, on which the Secretary of State may wish to avail himself of his services.

Incidentally, it would appear from the official announcement that the decision to create the new post and to appoint Sir Robert Vansittart to it was made by the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary without consulting the Cabinet. This procedure may be technically constitutional, but it is surely unusual. A change of such importance should not have been made without the consent of the Cabinet as a whole or without consulting Parliament.

The functions of the Chief Diplomatic Adviser as they are defined in the official announcement make it seem likely that in practice he will be a permanent Foreign Secretary, responsible only to his nominal superior, who will be obliged to cover him and to take the responsibility for his policy. This means that British foreign policy will be more than ever directed by a permanent official and withdrawn from the control of Parliament and public opinion. The only "Chief Diplomatic Adviser" to the government ought to be the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and if the government has so little confidence in him that a permanent official has to be appointed to look after him, it should find a more competent person to take his place.

The reason—or excuse—officially given for the creation of the new post is that conditions have for some time past "placed an increasing strain upon the personnel of the Foreign Office." That might be a reason for increasing the staff of the Foreign Office. It is no reason at all for creating a post hitherto unknown to the British constitution, which will confer on its holder power without responsibility. It is true that Vansittart, as Permanent Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has had the predominating voice in shaping British policy. For example, he was primarily responsible for British policy in the Ethiopian affair and was the real author of the so-called "Hoare-Laval plan." He loyally recognized his responsibility by his offer to resign when that plan had to be abandoned. But hitherto the functions of the Permanent Under Secretary have been mainly administrative, and his influence on policy has depended on the will of the Foreign Secretary in office at the time. Men like Palmerston or Gladstone or Salisbury or Curzon did not allow any permanent official to shape their policy. This is the first time that a permanent official has been relieved of administrative duties for the express purpose of giving him a voice in the decisions on major foreign questions.

No doubt one of the reasons for the creation of the new post is a desire to secure continuity of foreign policy. There was no such continuity in the nineteenth century, when general elections were sometimes, as in 1880, fought almost exclusively on questions of external policy, and a change in government meant a changed course of action. When, however, Edward Grey became Foreign Secretary in 1905, he set the fashion of continuing the foreign policy of his predecessor, because in fact he was controlled by the permanent officials. The two Labor Cabinets to a great extent followed his example. Now, when a Labor government comes into office, it will find a permanent Chief Diplomatic Adviser whose advice on all major questions of external policy it is expected to ask and to take. It is to be hoped that it would have the courage to abolish the post, although no doubt there would be an outcry in interested quarters. Perhaps it is not a bad thing that this question should be raised now, for, as the deplorable experience of the Popular Front government in France has shown, a government of the left cannot hope to pursue a left foreign policy with a staff of permanent officials and a diplomatic service violently opposed to such a course.

The appointment of Vansittart to the new post shows that the temporary eclipse of his influence mentioned in my article published in The Nation of December 18 is at an end. Neville Chamberlain sent Lord Halifax to Berlin against the will of Vansittart, and the complete failure of the visit justified Vansittart's opposition to it. Evidently Vansittart has now once more the upper hand and his position will be stronger than ever. He will replace Halifax as Eden's mentor. Hitherto, whenever Eden has been away, Halifax has replaced him at the Foreign Office. The fact that Neville Chamberlain himself is going to take charge of the Foreign Office during Eden's forthcoming absence is therefore significant. It is clear that the influence of the pro-German group has been weakened, but it must not be assumed that there will be any change in British policy. The policy of an understanding with the fascist powers is likely to be pursued more consistently and perhaps more openly than hitherto. There has been a conflict between Eden and Vansittart on the question of the League of Nations, and events are likely to show that Vansittart has come out on top. He agrees with the German and Italian policy of suppressing Article 16 of the Covenant and depriving the League of any coercive powers against an aggressor, and it is probable that he will now pursue that policy openly, but time will show.

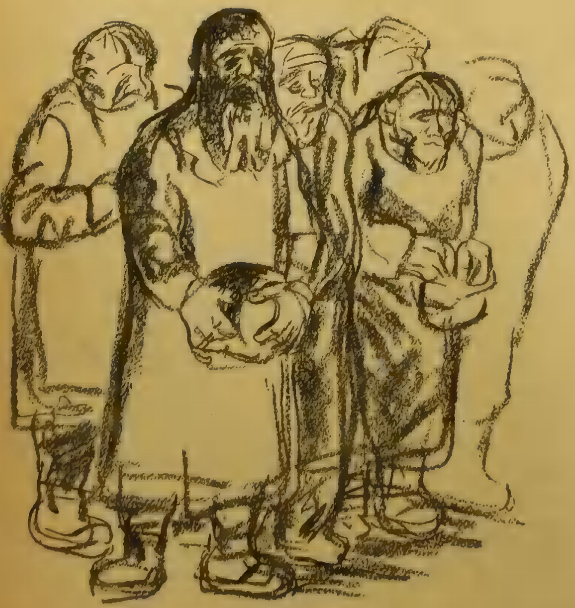
The conduct of the pro-German group, in which the Astors, Lord Londonderry, Lord Lothian, and Lord Halifax are particularly active, had become a scandal. It was at a conclave at Lord Astor's country house that it was decided to ask Neville Chamberlain to send Halifax to Berlin, after it had been ascertained that Hitler would like to see him, and it was to this group that Hitler communicated his demands mentioned in my previous article. Naturally Vansittart resented irregular negotiations of this sort behind the back of the Foreign Office, and he appears to have induced Neville Chamberlain to put a stop to the activities of the Astors and their friends. By the way, on December 21 a member of Parliament, Mr. John Parker, said in a speech in the House of Commons, "It is a great pity that we should have what used to be considered the leading organ in this country, the Times, becoming an organ on behalf of a foreign government." In the Times report of the debate next day Mr. Parker was made to say "on behalf of the British government." This is a pretty bad example of journalistic dishonesty, which suggests a guilty conscience.

The Elders of Komionka

BY GEROLD FRANK

I WONDER if they are still waiting for a reply from me, the Jewish elders of Komionka? We came there one cold spring morning by horse and cart from Skidel, which is a one-minute stop on the Warsaw-Wilno line, and we came to visit grandparents we had never seen.

They told us we were the third American couple to set foot in the village in the last fifty years; we could well believe it. Two lonely, rutted roads in the heart of Poland cross, and where they cross, that is Komionka. The roofs are thatched in Komionka; the ovens are of whitewashed brick. When night comes, oil lamps cast a yellow glow on bare wooden walls and earth-packed floors. In Komionka the Polish peasant buys cigarettes—sometimes as many as three at a time—and curses the Jew who refuses to sell on a holy day. And though you are as likely to see pigs as children at the peasant's door, his son finds joy in defiling the Jewish graveyard (preferring a Jewish grave to a Polish privy), and a Jew has yet to see the inside of the village hall.

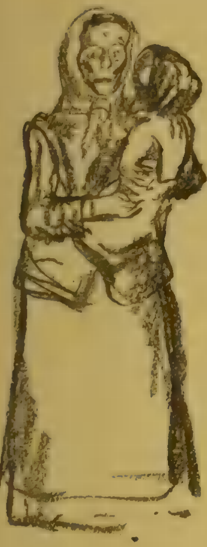


There are no doctors in Komionka. The child born gasping dies; the child born crippled limps through life. No man can tell a child's age in Komionka, for girls who appear to be twelve may be eighteen, and boys who look six may be ten. One talks of bread, not vitamins. Now and then the government tax appraiser comes, and since all Jews are rich, the cobbler and the cigarette dealer know his stamp. They feel the very metal in their flesh.

In Komionka the children stared at us with wide, dark eyes. They followed us wherever we appeared. If we halted, turning to look at them, they froze in their tracks, panic-stricken, ready to flee. My grandmother would shake her finger at them, crying, "Go back! Go back! You foolish children you, what do you want?" But when we turned and went on, they came to life again, scrambling after us hastily, whispering and giggling, the crippled bobbing grotesquely in their eagerness, the tiniest ones falling as they ran—a fantastic beggars' crew, gaunt and wizened little people in rags and cast-off clothes patched and patched again.

The older people grew tongue-tied in our presence. Or else their reticence fell away, their eyes filled, and they wept. What of her son, her prosperous son in New York, asked this old, barefooted woman; why had he forgotten? This aged man with his white, patriarchal beard, his eyes blue as a prophet's, his worn prayerbook never out of his hand—he, too, had a daughter in New York. What evil lay in the air of Golden America that made the heart ice and turned the eyes elsewhere?

The night before we left, the Jewish elders called upon us. We were packing, leaving behind us such pathetic possessions as we never expected to leave: a hot-water bag (how much better than a heated rock!), a box of aspirin tablets (with caution as to their use), odds and ends in every traveler's bag—soap and toothpaste and toothbrushes, iodine and laxative tablets, towels and safety pins, every available scrap of cloth and thread. We left behind, too, socks for the men, a little colored box for the children (they played with stones before we came), a sweater, bed sheets—"We shall cut them up and make shirts of them," exulted an aunt—clothing and money, zloties to buy a cow or pay for a funeral.



While we were packing, my grandmother stole into the room. She plucked timidly at my sleeve. She said apologetically: "A delegation of the men of the village are here. I told them you were busy but they beg you to receive them, if only for a word."

For a moment I did not know what to do. "What can I say to them?" I asked. "If they want money we have none to give. What can I tell them?"

My grandmother shook her head. "But only talk to them," she pleaded. "It will mean so much to them."

We walked into the low-hanging kitchen. The lamp had been placed on the heavy wooden table, and the men—there were perhaps a dozen, standing stiffly, bareheaded, each with his cap in his hand—loomed before us. They were tall, and in that room they seemed to tower. Somewhere I had seen this all before—medieval, strange, memorable.

We shook hands ceremoniously. Then one of the men stepped forward. It is impossible to convey the dignity and color of his words. What he said, in essence, was this:

"We do not seek to impose upon you. We know well that this village of ours has been honored to have visitors from America, and that to your people has come such honor, such grace, as comes to a man but once in a lifetime—to see a son's son from America a guest in his home and under his roof. Because of this visit we shall shine in your brightness until we go to our graves.

"But we learn that you leave us tomorrow, and we ask: Do not the people in America know our lot? Do they not know how we suffer? How hard life comes, and in what groaning and lamentation we draw our breath?"

"We know, we know," I said, helplessly. "But—" I stopped.

The spokesman twisted his cap in his hands and looked at the floor, and began again.

"The whole world reads of the misery of our people in Germany, but they forget us here in Poland." His voice was low and labored. "The hate against us is not organized so publicly, but it is here none the less. They choke us and crush us, little by little. We live a slow death. We hold our crusts of bread as if they were gold."

Another raised his voice.

"And our children," he said, hesitantly at first, then more firmly. "Who under heaven's eye will have pity on them? To whom can they turn? Where can they go? Palestine is closed save to the rich. And here they cannot live. The youth has no means to marry; the maiden has no dowry to offer. Without money, without hope, they live in this land like thieves in a prison. Aye, it is they who inherit a lot even sadder than ours."

The lamp wick sputtered, and shadows trembled.

"I cannot do much," I said at length. "I am only a tourist, an unimportant man. But I have eyes, and I will tell what I have seen here. Perhaps someone I tell these things to can help."

A murmur of voices and exclamations. "Ah, if he could do anything . . . if America could know . . ."

The spokesman voiced their thoughts.

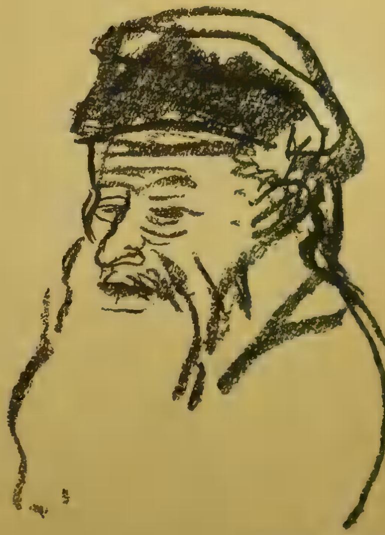
"Yes, yes," he said. "Only tell our people in America. Tell them of our lot. Tell them whatever can be done we shall be grateful. Let all America know. If the world only knew—"

"I promise," I said. "I will do what I can."

"Then we may go," said the spokesman humbly. "We are content. And when you leave us, our deepest prayers and blessings go with you."

Again, ceremoniously, we shook hands all around. They filed carefully out of the room.

The next morning we left.



Drawings by John Groth

Shall I write to them? Shall I say, I have told their story, and it is known? We all know. Three years have passed since my visit. Do the Jewish elders wait, in the cold, barren, hungry village of Komionka, in all the cold and barren and hungry villages of Poland, do they wait still?

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

COULD anything be more idiotic than the present armament race? If it were not carried on by alleged statesmen, it would be properly characterized as worthy only of morons. It is all of a piece with the horrible incompetence and stupidity which plunged the world, especially the United States, into the Great War. It may be, of course, that there is something radically wrong with me, but when I study the dispatches and letters of Colonel House and Walter Page and the twistings and contradictions and failures of Woodrow Wilson, I am staggered and then horrified that such vital decisions, resulting in the death of 50,000 Americans and the wounding of 250,000 others, should have been in the hands of men so utterly incompetent.

The same feeling of nausea comes over me when I read the details of this naval-armament race now going on. No sooner does England announce that it is building battleships than we follow suit and lay down two. Then Japan makes trouble in the Far East, and we propose to build three more battleships despite the fact that Admiral Sims, commander-in-chief of our fleet during the World War and one of the ablest officers this country has ever produced, publicly stated that in the next war our battleships would all be safely moored way up the Mississippi River. Then along comes Italy and announces that it is going to lay down two battleships which will be more effective ships than any now possessed by any other country, whereupon within three days it is announced from Paris that leading spirits in the government have decided that France will build three more battleships to offset Mussolini's new craft, and that it will continue to lay down ship for ship with the Italians. Just what the Germans are doing nobody knows. They are pretending to be bound by their naval treaty with England by which they have pledged themselves not to have a fleet larger than 35 per cent of the British fleet, but if there are those so innocent as to trust anything that Hitler says, I am not one of them. I wouldn't believe him after what he wrote in "Mein Kampf," and after his subsequent career, if he should stand at the throne of God and raise his right hand and swear to a statement—any statement.

Then there is the Soviet Union. For some unknown reason—perhaps because they have not the necessary facilities in view of our own orders—the American shipyards announce that they will not build any battleships for Russia. Therefore, according to the New York Times, the Russians are contracting for huge machinery in England which will enable them to make the necessary armor plate. When this machinery is set up, Russia too will enter the battleship race. When it does I will bet my best suit of clothes that Germany will tell England how sorry it is that it cannot keep its word but it will have to build more ships to meet the Communist menace. The more ships Germany builds, the more Russia will build. As for Japan, there again we do not know what is happening, but according to a dispatch in the Giornale d'Italia, three super-battleships, in addition to sixty-three other men-of-war, are being built now or are projected in Tokyo. Meanwhile England is straining every nerve to complete a 1938 naval program which Hector C. Bywater, the well-informed naval correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph, believes will include three, four, or five new battleships. Britain plans to send a squadron of at least five battle-cruisers to Hongkong to overawe Japan—a procedure which seems to me just about as futile as to put five British submarines in the Baltic as a threat to Russia.

Speaking of submarines, the race there is also in full swing. It is announced that Italy has more submarines than any other country, but this is disputed by friends of Russia, who say that the Soviet Union has secretly built a far larger number than anybody knows and has enough of them in Vladivostok to make the Japanese extremely uneasy. Then, of course, there is the aircraft-carrier race, and the aircraft race too. The head of our headquarters air fleet, General Frank M. Andrews, sagely wags his head and says that we are falling alarmingly behind European countries in the number of our air pilots—as if that had any bearing whatever on our own defense problem. From London comes the startling announcement that England will soon have no fewer than 12,250 airplanes, more than France, Germany, and Italy together. At least it thinks it will have, but if Artemus Ward were by my side I am certain he would bet all his wife's relations on the Germans producing, when the 12,250 are ready, 1,000 more airplanes than the British General Staff thought Berlin had. Really this is the grandest child's game invented since ticktacktoo, and it has the advantage of being played with human lives and the resources of all the nations.

So once more we have the vicious circle before us. More ships, more armaments, greater expenditures, and then again more ships, more armaments, greater expenditures, with financial bankruptcy and the lowering of the standard of life of all workers right ahead of us. Stanley Baldwin said that another armament race would bankrupt a number of nations and make war absolutely certain. Then he put England into the armament race, and out of gratitude they made him a lord and retired him with all possible honors. Do I hear anybody assert that this is a sane world? If there is any such person he is a liar.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Prodigal Lewis

THE PRODIGAL PARENTS. By Sinclair Lewis. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

I WILL put it very briefly. During the 1920's Sinclair Lewis was surely our most significant writer of fiction; today he is the author of "The Prodigal Parents." Whether he wrote this unfortunate book because he was naive or because he was canny, I am not prepared to decide; but it should as much restore him to favor with a class of people he once disconcerted as "Reflections on the French Revolution" restored Burke. This class of people are commonly called Babbitts. Fifteen years ago Mr. Lewis also turned his attention to them, and the general impression then was that he wanted to slaughter them skin and hide. Today it would seem as if he wanted to kiss and make up.

"The Prodigal Parents" is concerned with the revolt of a middle-aged couple named Hazel and Fredk Wm Cornplow against their uppish daughter Sara and their parasitical son Howard. Fredk Wm is a prosperous dealer in motor cars, a Republican, a creature of habit, a good provider, an easily touched and easily ruffled human being. To Sara he certainly is all these things, and that is his crime: Sara spends her life participating in all the most advanced movements, lives off her father while despising his way of existence, and clashes with him when she is not busy ignoring him. To Howard he is a source of supply, whether it be for education, pocket money, an automobile, or a job. After a while these things begin to stick in Fredk Wm's crop, in particular when his unbearably intelligent daughter and his unbearably stupid son become radicals. Mr. Lewis is very deft in showing us how badly Sara and Howard understand radicalism, and how well Fredk Wm understands Sara and Howard. On the whole he comes off far better than they do, especially since they remain Communists for a most indecently short time.

But after that, there is Howard's loafing on the job and Sara's interior decorating and Sara's efforts to thwart and enslave her father; and Fredk Wm gets pretty much fed up. All these years, though he may not have had a soul, he has fancied going off to see the world, and here are his children keeping him in harness so that they can be eternally provided for. But Fredk Wm fools them. One night he and Hazel steal off, and next are heard from amid the historic ruins of Europe.

Well, it is easy enough to sympathize with Fredk Wm Cornplow, one of whose children is a prig and the other a bum, and to clap hands admiringly at his successful revolt. I, personally, would approve of throwing Howard into an incinerator and Sara down a well. But it is worth pointing out that in creating Sara and Howard Mr. Lewis has had recourse to what is technically known as a set-up. Dreadful as the pair of them are, they are even more unconvincing. Their reality has been thrown to the dogs so that their father may have his innings.

But it is to be feared that these dummies of Mr. Lewis's are stalking-horses as well. It is to be feared that this book implies more than the shocking advantage which children can take of their parents; that it is, in fact, a paean to all middle-class, middle-aged virtues—to common sense, to plain bread and butter, to Yankee Doodle, to vox populi, to "You can fool some of the people" etc., etc. Mr. Lewis shows us the dried-up, contemptible snob who snoots good Fredk Wm; he shows us the new-fangled psychiatrist with his palaver and his high fees; he shows us, finally, the Communist organizer who steals money from the pockets of boys knocked unconscious in a motor accident. By contrast the sane, industrious, kind-hearted Fredk Wm becomes immensely touching—the only thing left in America whom we can point to as an example, now that everything else in America, including its novelists, has turned sour. Very mean of Sara to sneer at Fredk Wm. Although fifteen years ago, when his name was George F. Babbitt, Mr. Lewis sneered at him too. But each man kills the thing he loves.

"The Prodigal Parents" is, it seems to me, a fatally illiberal book. Not because satire at the expense of young people a great deal better than Sara and Howard, and young people's radicalism a great deal less shallow than theirs, isn't legitimate and mightn't prove salutary, but because it is always important to know the underlying attitude from which the satire springs; to realize whether a satirist aims at correcting abuses or at stifling progress. Mr. Lewis's novel is not just reactionary in its political implications; it is equally anti-intellectual in its whole view of life. If there is something good and useful and resistant in Fredk Wm Cornplow, let us at least measure it against what is good and useful and resistant in other ways of life. To measure him against two such imbeciles as his son and daughter, two such caricatures as the organizer and the psychiatrist, is to load the dice. But much more is involved than fairness of portrayal. The question of values is involved, of Mr. Lewis's standards of civilization—of what to his mind constitutes enlightenment, culture, a progressive society. On pages 99-100 he extols, in his own person, the achievements of the middle classes, and proudly exhibits how many great men have come out of their ranks. But, to go no farther, has he forgotten how many of these men became the sharpest critics of bourgeois life, how many suffered from its smugness, narrowness, and materialism, how many in desperation broke away? It is all very well to show that Fredk Wm Cornplow is no monster, but it is hardly necessary to imply that he is a hero. At any rate, Mr. Lewis has convinced us of nothing here except his own philistinism. And philistinism, in a writer, is the sin against the Holy Ghost.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Semantics for the Million

THE TYRANNY OF WORDS. By Stuart Chase. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

IN "The Tyranny of Words" Stuart Chase turns aside for the nonce from questions of economics and sociology and occupies himself with some of the problems of communication. How do meanings get attached to words? How do words get attached to meanings? What is the meaning of "meaning"? By what mechanism and with what degree of accuracy is thought conveyed from mind to mind? Does thought mold language or does language mold thought? Does the structure of our language influence our ideas of things? Why is failure of communication so frequent? And can anything be done to improve communication? These and similar questions have been running through Chase's mind for some time, as they ought to run through the mind of any writer who respects his craft and desires to say his say honestly and effectively. Having a gift for turning experience into copy, he has made a book out of his quest for the answers.

The book falls into two parts of approximately equal length—the first an outline of what Chase, a little grandiosely, calls "the semantic discipline," the second an application of the discipline to various cases. Neither part, however, is all that it purports to be.

Except for minor embellishments drawn from the writings of P. W. Bridgman, Lancelot Hogben, Thurman W. Arnold, Jerome Frank, and various others, Chase has gone for his theory directly to Alfred Korzybski's "Science and Sanity" and to Ogden and Richards's "Meaning of Meaning." It is unfortunate that he did not go to them indirectly by way of a few standard works on semantics and the theory of language, for these books are unwholesome reading for anyone unprepared to deal with them critically. From Korzybski Chase has derived, inter alia, an extravagant notion of the utility of semantics as an instrument for extirpating pernicious thinking and emotional reactions, a serious misunderstanding of "the is of identity," a slogan demanding "a language whose structure corresponds to physical structure," and the practice of littering his exposition with irrelevancies, physical, mathematical, psychological, and what-not, until the effect is that of a literary scavenger party. From Ogden and Richards he has borrowed more useful apparatus, such as their discussion of levels of abstraction and their diagram explaining the relations of symbol (word), reference (meaning), and referent (thing meant). With profit he might have borrowed more. He could have found no better weapon to his hand, for instance, than their fivefold analysis of meaning into the item presented for attention, the speaker's feeling toward the item, his tone toward the hearer, and his intention. Yet he seems to have missed it altogether.

The outline of "the semantic discipline" that he presents is decidedly fragmentary and is simplified and puréed to a fineness that Helen Hokinson's clubwomen could ingest without discomfort. It is finally summarized in fifteen propositions such as: that words are not things; that words mean nothing in themselves; that meaning in words arises from context of situation; that abstract words and terms are especially liable to spurious identification, and so on. "We are in sight of a technique," says Mr. Chase, after listing these fifteen propositions, "which will let us take a political speech, a dictator's ukase, a masterpiece of philosophy, a plan to save the world, a column by Mark Sullivan, analyze it, and tell specifically what is wrong with it, down to counting the blabs." One suspects that some people have been semanticists unawares all their adult lives. But in the presence of such ebullient enthusiasm for the dry axioms of an academic discipline there is really nothing to be said.

The second half of "The Tyranny of Words" is different stuff. In it Chase turns, with something like relief, to the practical examination of verbalism and the mischief that verbalism works in contemporary notions of economics, law, politics, international affairs, and other subjects. Except for the occasional appearance of such a term as "operational test" (taken from Bridgman) or "referent" there is hardly a trace of the semantics discussed in the earlier chapters. The method of attack is quite untechnical and is, in fact, nothing very different from the witty, realistic, commonsense, debunking technique which, from Benjamin Franklin to Mr. Dooley to Thurman Arnold, has been the favorite American method for removing stuffing from shirts, ideas, or institutions. The chapters on philosophy and logic, it must be said, are not so good as the others. In them Chase is on unfamiliar ground. His attack on "philosophic method" is obviously a sham battle; where is his referent? As examples of logic he exhibits syllogisms that every elementary textbook is engaged in destroying. What is the use of "the semantic discipline" if it doesn't deter a man from such follies? But the rest of it is very good Stuart Chase, in fact, Stuart Chase at almost his best, shrewd, witty, humane, open-minded. You have probably seen some of it in Harpers Magazine, and you will not want to miss the rest.

It is twenty years since the English periodical Mind opened its pages to a symposium on "The Meaning of Meaning," almost fifteen years since C. K. Ogden and I. A. Richards published their book of the same title. Few Americans seem to have been aware that in the intervening years an important study, almost an educational movement in itself, has been developing. Mr. Chase's treatment suffers, as I have indicated, from various shortcomings. But it is something to have sensed the wider aspects of semantics, as Ogden and Richards conceive the subject, and to have made the first attempt to write a popular book about it.

GEORGE GENZMER

Wealth Against Society

AMERICA'S 60 FAMILIES. By Ferdinand Lundberg. Vanguard Press. $3.75.

WITH all its faults—and there are many, although, it should be said at once, none is fatal—Mr. Lundberg's "America's 60 Families" is a very important book. It belongs in that group of "exposure" works that have been so typically American—inadequately grounded philosophically, yet instinctively right morally because they have sprung from a passionate human and humane conviction—and that have had such a profound influence on human action. We have not produced many pure thinkers of the very first flight; we haven't had our Miltons or Lockes or Marxes. But we have had our goodly share of the prophets—our Hinton R. Helpers, Henry Demarest Lloyds, and Gustavus Myerses. And it is in this latter company that Ferdinand Lundberg belongs.

What are the preoccupations of Mr. Lundberg in this big, sprawling, humorless work of his that looks and reads so much like an encyclopedic compilation? I have found three, largely: first, that present-day capitalism has ended in concentrating economic power in the hands of a top group of individuals; second, that our political leaders have been the conscious and wilful pawns of the owners of great wealth; and, third, that wealth has corrupted taste, neglected culture, and bastardized intelligence. I think that the author has oversimplified and hence distorted the validity of his first two points; his third, however, he drives home again and again unerringly.

It is from his first point that the current sensational interest in Mr. Lundberg's book derives. Through an analysis of the 1924 income figures—the only ones ever made public—Mr. Lundberg has come to the conclusion that private wealth is largely collected in the hands of some sixty family groups

COMMENTS on THE TYRANNY OF WORDS have come from leaders in almost every profession—Law and Politics, Business and Economics, History and the Social Sciences, the Arts, Journalism, Creative Writing, Mathematics, Education, Philosophy.

JAMES ROWLAND ANGELL
Educational Counselor, National Broadcasting Company
(1) THURMAN ARNOLD
Yale School of Law, author of "The Folklore of Capitalism"
HARRY ELMER BARNES
ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES
(2) CARLETON BEALS
CHARLES A. BEARD
CARL BECKER
Cornell University
THOMAS BEER
E. T. BELL
California Institute of Technology
A. A. BERLE, JR.
ALFRED M. BINGHAM
Editor of Common Sense
ISAIAH BOWMAN
President, Johns Hopkins University
P. W. BRIDGMAN
Harvard University
C. M. CHILD
Stanford University
CHARLES E. CLARK
Yale School of Law
GEORGE S. COUNTS
Columbia University
PAUL DE KRUIF
(3) JOHN DOS PASSOS
WALTER PRICHARD EATON
MORRIS ERNST
P. H. EPPS
Furman University
(4) JOHN T. FLYNN
FELIX J. FRAZER
W. HORSLEY GANTT
Johns Hopkins University
C. JUDSON HERRICK
University of Chicago
HAMILTON HOLT
President, Rollins College
(5) BASSETT JONES
HOWARD MUMFORD JONES
Harvard University
MARIETTA JOHNSON
School of Organic Education
(6) C. J. KEYSER
Columbia University
SINCLAIR LEWIS
ARCHIBALD MAC LEISH
KEMP MALONE
Johns Hopkins University
HUGHES MEARNS
New York University
WILLIAM F. OGBURN
University of Chicago
RAYMOND PEARL
Johns Hopkins University
(7) JULIA PETERKIN
PAUL ROSENFELD
FERDINAND SCHEVILL
ALBERT STERNER
SIMEON STRUNSKY
(8) RAYMOND GRAM SWING
JOHN R. TUNIS
HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON
JOHN B. WATSON

STUART CHASE'S

The Tyranny of Words

Stuart Chase is serving notice on all who blab-blab. He is telling the public, sick to death of talking and being talked at over radios, in newspapers, from lecture platforms and campaign stumps, that they'd better ask, "What do you really mean by that?" He has discovered a new discipline which promises a revolution in the process of thinking and is attempting to give a muddled world a virtual consumer's research report on words. For the misuse of words is the most insidious evil of this age. Here is a book of far-reaching, yet everyday, importance. To one who reads it the world can never look quite as it did before.

Typical Comments

(1) My guess is that THE TYRANNY OF WORDS will be one of the most exciting and influential books of this decade.

(2) Everything he writes is hot off the bat of reality, but no book he has ever done is more exciting than this one. I have already gone through it twice and shall read it again.

(3) I read it through at one gulp. It's exhilarating reading.

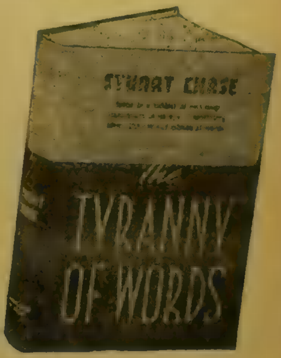
(4) The best thing Stuart Chase has ever done. Having read it through, I promptly proceeded to read it again and I expect to read it at least once more.

(5) If his book does no more than stop a few people from talking, particularly politicians, he will have done a humanitarian work.

(6) It is bright, quick, nimble, lively . . . The thesis so brightly handled is an exceedingly important one.

(7) It pleases me no end . . . I wish from my heart that you could somehow induce every politician, teacher, preacher, and all who listen to them to read it.

(8) On reading the last page I wired Stuart Chase that I never again would be the same person. I still feel changed. I also feel that this is one of the most needed books of this chaotic time.



Just out, $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO.
383 Madison Ave. New York

in America. Deriving their power from the ownership of the essential means of production and distribution, these families today constitute a closed ruling oligarchy. It is next to impossible for outsiders to be admitted into this charmed circle—for their scions intermarry—and it is impossible for single individuals, no matter how profligate, to destroy their towering accumulations.

Of course, there is much that is sound in this kind of analysis. More important, the symbolism of the "sixty families" is socially useful. Already, as we know, the symbol has become a social weapon (the New Dealers have already made it their own); and other weapons are being forged—advertising censorship, threatened libel suits—to weaken its strength. But the whole argument cannot be defended. Fortunes do disappear in modern times, especially when they are not linked with a special kind of monopolist privilege or when they are not to be found in the very first circle of finance capital. Mr. Lundberg, because his analysis is not very sensitive, has not sought to differentiate among various categories of modern private fortunes. Why do not our railroading and mercantile fortunes last as long as our industrial and banking fortunes? Why do our banking fortunes—even if, dollar for dollar at any given moment, they do not mount as high as any of the others—outlast them all? Where really is economic power to be found? The Goulds (railroading) and the Friedsams (merchandising), despite the fact that they are still very wealthy, have virtually disappeared from the reigning oligarchy; the Guggenheims (mining) are on their way out. The Morgans, the Rockefellers, the Mellons will remain; for in their possession rests power more than accumulated wealth. They have institutionalized power in finance capital just as the merchant capitalist class of the eighteenth century sought to institutionalize power in land and urban property.

In other words, Mr. Lundberg makes the mistake of viewing our plutocracy statically—as though they represented a kind of frozen privilege. The assumption would be: if only we would try to break their incrustated form off the body economic and politic (we could, for example, in terms of such an analysis, tax them out of existence), then once more the rest of us could live and breathe. We know and Mr. Lundberg knows that this is not so. Our "sixty families" cannot be cut away, for they do not constitute a lifeless mass. The fact is, by a kind of chemical action, they have succeeded in getting into and poisoning the whole circulating system of our economy and polity. We are confronted not by a physical malformation but by an active blood disease for which there is no specific.

The second of Mr. Lundberg's theses, that our recent political history is simply the obverse side of the nasty story of the processes of private accumulation, goes too far, as well. One would be on safe ground if one argued—leaving out the lesser fry and the obviously corrupt—that Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt were the captives of their own class educations and backgrounds; that since they were members of the middle class and inheritors of the middle-class tradition, their loyalties could not be other than they have been. But Mr. Lundberg is not content with saying simply this. He feels it imperative to show that virtually every political decision of consequence with which these political leaders were associated was dictated by a conscious awareness of the presence of economic masters behind the scenes. One does not have to go to great lengths to disprove such a claim. What if certain malignant financial powers did benefit from the construction of an isthmian canal at Panama? The fact is, with or without the special stake of the Panama Canal Company of America, such a canal was bound to be built. Again, Cleveland H. Dodge (copper) did have great personal influence with Woodrow Wilson. But, I venture to say, even greater mentors were Thomas Jefferson, Edmund Burke, and John Bright. To present the argument in its crudely determinist form as Mr. Lundberg does, is to weaken the effectiveness of a sound materialist interpretation of politics.

It is the third strain in Mr. Lundberg's work that makes his book so truly important. Piling up an extraordinary mass of factual detail—he has examined every aspect of the personal living of people of great wealth—Mr. Lundberg has proved that the effects of private accumulation have been anti-social. It is around this point that the greatest popular indignation is likely to collect. If our wealthy are not really using their fortunes as public trusts as their apologists contend they are, if instead of furthering the dissemination of intelligence they really prostitute it, if instead of cultivating the arts they really sterilize them, if instead of acting as the leaders of taste they really vulgarize it, then our ruling class is reigning without conviction or loyal supporters. After all, the outstanding hallmark of a class in power, when it was still performing a vital historical mission—witness the Periclean, Renaissance, Victorian, Third Republic ages—was such a leadership or, at worst, patronage.

Mr. Lundberg proves devastatingly—in long recitals of how our wealthy have acquired educational institutions, philanthropies, venal journalists, yachts, golden bathroom fixtures—that the processes of private accumulation have no social meaning. It is in these chapters of his book that the author does his extraordinarily effective, indeed profoundly disturbing work. If private wealth no longer has a creative function to perform in either the economic or the cultural sphere and if the voices of its sycophants have no echoes, then historically the middle class is finished. At this point we can say that the twilight of an epoch has set in. How long or short it will be will depend upon the rapidity with which a large enough group of Americans can assimilate the lesson at the heart of Mr. Lundberg's book. LOUIS M. HACKER

Hell

GOYA'S "THE DISASTERS OF THE WAR." Eighty-five Plates. With an Introduction by Elie Faure. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

COUCHED in sharp aristocratic prints, a macabre epic becomes generally accessible in this volume of facsimile reproductions. The book itself is perhaps the least triumphant as well as the least expensive of the remarkable Phaidon series. Certain of the reproductions represent inferior pulls, apparently taken after the aquatint had seriously impaired the singing quality of the original etchings. Others of them lose the almost matchlessly kinetic lines of their originals, and with it the fineness of the wonderful and terrible expressions. But a masterpiece is a thing no interpretation quite can compromise, not even interpretations far grosser than the Phaidon's all-in-all passable one of "The Disasters of the War." And the eighty-five plates handed to his friend Cean Bermudez by the old exile in Bordeaux in 1824 constitute such a thing. The sovereign beauty of six or seven of them and the terrific nature of the experience fully articulated, with the magic of passion, by the lot render the set not only one of the most imposing but one of the most masterly products of the etcher's art.

A record of Spanish resistance to Napoleon, because of its impartial attribution of the war-time horrors savagely depicted by it—butchery, rapine, miseries of all sorts—to both defendants and aggressors, and because of the very general character of the uniforms upon the figures of its soldiers, the grisly series remains one of the most terrible of all revelations of the horrors of organized warfare; and something besides a revelation of these horrors. The experience it projects by means of architectural organizations of harsh light and shade, prodigious varieties of dynamic motion, and cosmic effects of space, above all by the strange, almost sensual delicacy of its representations of suffering, dying, and dead human flesh, may have been crystallized in Goya by events of the invasion of 1808, the famine in Madrid in 1811, and the post-war reaction under Ferdinand VII. But the drawings' ultimate reference is to something timeless, beyond mere war and merely wakened and monumentally actualized by war. It is the hell in man. The sharp blacks and whites are saturated with the ferocity and sadism, the physical and mental suffering and pain almost boundlessly potential in the human creature and periodically his master. In moods of rage, of interrogation of causes, of compassion, and of utter despair, nightmarish design upon design makes us feel within ourselves and without these perennial almost uncontrollable impulses of brutality and savagery, bestial delight in cruelty and hateful satisfaction in destruction, and their terrible, pitiable aftermaths. "The Disasters of the War" indeed! Rather say "The Disasters of Living"!

Still a progress does obtain in this experience—possibly as the consequence of Goya's self-riddance of much perilous stuff. The third of the three books of plates, the one beginning after the projection of the feeling of the nihility of all things, and supposedly full of references to the reaction, is not only more fantastically, less naturalistically visionary than the preceding two, the books of the shambles and the famine. It also is more luminous, more hopeful and prophetic in all senses of the word. It delves profoundly into causes, symbolizing the friends of man's bestiality in the forms of brutes and eagles, churchmen and rituals; and, in the beautiful shape of a young woman, the light and the love that are its enemy and the friend of his ideal. In a sort of radiant future we find her significantly standing beside a Man who holds an implement of labor in his hand. But in the end the epic returns us to the actuality. It closes with three tragic prints of fettered captives.

PAUL ROSENFELD

That Happy Italian People!

THE PLOUGH AND THE SWORD: LABOR, LAND, AND PROPERTY IN FASCIST ITALY. By Carl T. Schmidt. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

MR. SCHMIDT describes the concrete bearing of fascism on the life of the Italian agricultural classes. He has read carefully the more than two hundred publications listed in the selected bibliography at the back of his book, and has not confined himself to copying their title pages as authors of long bibliographies so often do. He has lived in Italy for about a year, keeping his eyes open to discover the realities of life behind the official reports and the speeches and writings of Mussolini and his Italian and foreign propaganda agents. Moreover, he has realized that he could not appreciate the behavior of the fascist dictatorship today without taking stock of the physical conditions of the country and

BARGAINS in BOOKS
UP TO 75% OFF REGULAR PRICES
Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House
ALL STRICTLY THE ORIGINAL EDITIONS
(Not cheap reprints as the prices would seem to indicate)

1. THE WORLD WAR IN PHOTOGRAPHS. Chosen from 10,000 uncensored, authentic photographs. "A Pictorial Review with the lid off." Size 9" x 12". ($3.50), Our special price, $1.11

2. MAXFIELD PARRISH COLOR PLATES. THE KNAVE OF HEARTS. Illustrated throughout with magnificent full-page Maxfield Parrish color plates. Size 11½" x 14". ($10.00) Boxed. Ideal for framing, $2.98

3. FAMOUS VAN GOGH PAINTINGS IN FULL COLOR. Zuave—Still Life—Cornfield—Blooming Apple Orchard. Four famous Van Goghs beautifully reproduced in full color. Ideal for framing—they look like original oil paintings. Together with Introductory Booklet by G. Benson, containing 17 Van Gogh halftones. Size 14¼" x 18". ($10.00), Our special price for all, $1.98

4. THE FAMOUS MASTERS IN ART SERIES. Fifty long out-of-print paper-covered books. Size 7¼" x 10". The fifty books are illustrated with 500 beautiful full-page plates and have 2,000 pages. The titles are: BARYE, BELLINI, BOCKLIN, BONHEUR, BRETON, CARPACCIO, CHARDIN, CONSTABLE, COPLEY, CRIVELLI, DAVID, DA VINCI, DE CHAVANNES, DE HOOCH, DEL SARTO, DOU, DUCCIO, DURER, FORTUNY, FRANCIA, GIOTTO, GOYA, HALS, HOLBEIN, INGRES, INNESS, LA TOUR, LAWRENCE, LE BRUN, LEIGHTON, LIPPI (Fillippino), LORRAIN, LOTTO, LUINI, MANTEGNA, MEISONIER, METSU, MORETTO, MURILLO, NATTIER, RAEBURN, RENI, ROSSETTI, ROUSSEAU, RUISDAEL, STEVENS, STUART, VECCHIO, VERMEER, WATTEAU.
Our special price, for the 50 books, only $4.88
Any 8 books, for 98c

5. NUDISM. ADVENTURES IN NAKEDNESS. By Julian Strange. Illustrated with 74 unretouched photographs of nudists. $1.59

6. DIEGO RIVERA'S PORTRAIT OF AMERICA. By Bertram D. Wolfe. With 60 full-page illustrations from Diego Rivera's frescoes. "Diego Rivera is not only the world's foremost fresco painter today, but the foremost fresco painter of modern times." ($3.75), Our special price, $1.49

7. RUSSIA. RED BREAD. By Maurice Hindus, author of "Humanity Uprooted," etc. Fully illustrated. "One of the best books about Russia that I have read."—Howard Vincent O'Brien. ($3.50), Our special price, $1.11

8. OUR FASCINATING WORLD. VAN LOON'S GEOGRAPHY. By Hendrik W. Van Loon. With 150 illustrations. Original publisher's edition. Our special price, $1.98

9. THE GREAT WAR. Edited by Sir J. A. Hammerton. With 800 illustrations and 200 maps. 3,840 pages. Complete in 6 volumes, size 5" x 7¼". ($12.00), Our special price for the 6 volume set, $4.48

10. WOMAN: IN HONOUR AND DISHONOUR. By R. J. Blackham. Fully illustrated. Women as law makers, magistrates, dangerous criminals, warriors, blackmailers, scientists, spies, perverts, etc. "There is not a dull page in the book." ($5.00), Our special price, $1.69

11. THE COMPLETE POEMS OF CATULLUS. Translated by F. A. Wright. "Although often marred by gross sensuality, Catullus has been placed among the greatest poets of all time." Our special price, $1.11

12. WORLD TRAVELS. Six volumes containing 800 interesting illustrations from photographs. "Covers the surface of the globe." Size of volumes, 6¼" x 9". ($25.20), Our special price for the 6-volume set, $7.89

13. SIGNED BY COLE PORTER. RED HOT AND BLUE. Containing the complete score of that Musical Comedy. Edition limited to 350 numbered copies, signed by Cole Porter, one of the foremost composers of our generation. Size 9¼" x 12⅜". Handsomely bound. ($10.00), Our special price, $3.88

14. TAHITIAN ADVENTURE. TIKI. By C. J. Lipscomb. Fully illustrated. "The fascinating, ever eluding picture-puzzle of Tahiti." ($2.75), Our special price, 98c

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-28
Established 1884
367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $....................for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14

(Mark circle around books desired)

Please send me FREE Catalog No. 290-N, containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains—just off the press!

Name ....
Address ....
City.................................... State...................

of historical precedents. His first two chapters, Rural Italy and A Struggle Against Poverty, are models of learning and understanding. Under his searching inquiry all that card-castle of false information which fascist propaganda has built up about the achievements of the Mussolinian dictatorship crashes to the ground.

To be sure, the "wheat battle" has led to an increase in domestic production and to a marked approach toward self-sufficiency since 1930. But to a large extent self-sufficiency is due to a substantial decline in the consumption of wheat products. Moreover, self-sufficiency in wheat does not mean self-sufficiency in all foodstuffs. The increase in domestic production has been purchased at the cost of seriously unbalancing Italian agriculture. Commodities other than wheat have been neglected. A general reduction of live stock, astonishingly severe in some regions, has been one of the worst consequences of the "wheat battle." Italy's dependence on foreign sources for animal products has increased.

Land reclamation started in Italy at least three thousand years ago. During the period 1862-1911, 550,000 hectares were drained. By the end of 1922, when Mussolini came to power, 47,000 more hectares had been drained, and reclamation works were then progressing on 623,000 hectares. For four or five years after the advent of the dictatorship the government showed little concern for reclamation, and outlays for that purpose declined. Work was largely limited to the maintenance and continuation of projects already begun. It was only in October, 1926, that Mussolini discovered land reclamation and made a solemn announcement: "It is our task to change beyond all recognition the physical and spiritual face of our country within the space of ten years." In the year 1927-28 expenditures began to rise appreciably. More than four billion lire were expended from 1929-30 to 1933-34. But since 1934 there have been a marked reduction in new works undertaken, a tendency to abandon all projects not urgently needed, and a concentration on those promising immediate political returns.

THE OXFORD COMPANION TO CLASSICAL LITERATURE

Compiled and Edited by SIR PAUL HARVEY

A new and particularly valuable reference volume which gives elementary information about the classical authors, works, proper names, etc. It includes: (1) Explanations of various elements in classical literature, forms, metres, etc.; (2) Short biographies, etc., of the principle authors; (3) Descriptive survey of the chief works of ancient literature. $3.00

A catalog of the Oxford Books of Reference will be gladly sent free on request.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
115 FIFTH AVENUE · NEW YORK

The Vendome "Your Winter Home"
MADISON AVE. AT THIRD ST. LAKEWOOD, N.J.
Private Baths — Private Sun Porches — Southern Exposure. All sport facilities. Intelligent supervision of diets. Moderate rates.
M. SCHWARTZ, R.N. Phone Lakewood 555

One of these projects is the reclamation of the Pontine Marshes. This region, within sixty kilometers of Rome, offered the fascist regime an opportunity to carry out a project of great demonstrative value. Its conversion, regardless of cost, into small farms has become, with appropriate publicity, an important source of prestige for the regime. Nearly a third of all funds spent for reclamation since July 1, 1932, has been directed to the Pontine Marshes. Other projects, many of which would have had greater social and economic significance, have suffered in consequence. Maintenance of the work accomplished will call for further heavy outlays in the future. Some of the land has turned out to be poor. But the venture has been satisfactory in terms of publicity.

The last three chapters of the book are devoted to describing conditions among the Italian peasantry. Mr. Schmidt shows that the masses remain, as before, separated from control of the land but with even less hope of rising in the economic scale. The fascist era has seen a decline of small peasant proprietorship. The number of "operating owners" fell nearly half a million between 1921 and 1931. We have no statistics for the period after 1931, but there is reason to believe that there has been a continuous decline in the number of small cultivating proprietors.

To read this book would perhaps be illuminating to a certain professor at Yale University who, having been able to shake hands with Mussolini "during an unexpected audience," paid for that high honor by sending to the New York Herald Tribune of December 18, 1937, a letter in which he attributed to Mussolini, among many other miracles, that of having "astonishingly improved Italy in a material way."

GAETANO SALVEMINI

A Novel of Persian Life

THE WELL OF ARARAT. By Emmanuel Varandyan. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

OSTENSIBLY a tale of modern Persia, "The Well of Ararat," winner of the Avery Hopwood novel award, reads like a translation of some traditional legend of the tragic fate of frustrated lovers. A sensitive boy, Sassoon, tells the story, and it is through his eyes that we watch as Marina, idol of his slowly awakening adolescent passions, becomes the object of the attentions of his uncle and one-time hero, Ardavaz. With confused feelings he sees his uncle virtually purchase the reluctant girl from her parents and marry her in the most joyous and elaborate of Persian rites, the wedding ceremony. But the high water of his disillusion comes as he realizes that Marina is really in love with another, the lusty Aris, and as he witnesses, with ever-mounting horror, the fierce conflict of the three adults and its tragic outcome.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Although all this has moments of considerable tension, the accent of the book is not on the plot, its somewhat familiar triangular struggle, or even on the turbid reactions of the aroused adolescent; it is rather on those customs that best embody—as do the nuptial rites—the Persian conception of the fine art of living. Indeed, from time to time the novel overflows altogether and becomes a lavishly colorful, biblically lyrical celebration of the more pleasant aspects of the Persian way of life. Much of this is interesting, but a supercargo of custom and ritual, no matter how rich, does not make a novel. Occupied by colorful incidentals and pleasant but cloudy touches of symbolism, Mr. Varandyan forgets, one fears, the necessity of giving flesh and blood to the characters he calls up out of his memories of a Persian village.

MILTON RUGOFF

DRAMA

Musical Cartoon

CHARLES LAMB once denounced the cantata as a corruption of the cheerful uses of the playhouse. What he would think of Marc Blitzstein's "The Cradle Will Rock" (now settled down for a regular run at the Windsor Theater) I hesitate to say, for if that unusual work is something like a cantata it is not a bit like Handel. It is only intermittently "cheerful," but it is by no means solemn; and if the author is aware that Robert Burns once wrote "The Jolly Beggars" in a similar form, even Burns cannot have helped him much. Mr. Blitzstein's unjolly proletarians are not beggars but demanders, and are much more interested in the steel strike than in warbling the delights of rolling in the hay.

All who follow the news of the theater know already the history of the piece, which was originally intended as a Federal Theater production and then, when that production was canceled for reasons generally assumed to be connected with the violence of its partisanship, given without costumes before a special audience. The present series of regular performances follows the method of the original impromptu rehearsal. The only accompaniment is furnished by the composer at a piano, and the uncostumed members of the company simply rise from chairs at the back of the stage to act or sing their sketchy roles. All this may sound a bit bare and forbidding, but given the nature of the piece, it is quite possibly the best way to perform it. One thing is certain—the interest is held and the evening passes quickly.

So many superlatives have been used by so many critics of such different complexions that the prospective spectator perhaps ought to be warned that he will almost inevitably expect too much. "The Cradle Will Rock" is a sort of musical cartoon, with no more shading than a cartoon is expected to have. The writing and the singing are as casual as the staging; so that the success of the whole depends upon two things—a certain dash in the performance and also a certain hearty partisanship in the spectator, by virtue of which he will be ready, when necessary, to assume that whenever malefactors of great wealth are being denounced violently they

Sweeping
the Country!

THE Folklore OF Capitalism

By THURMAN
W. ARNOLD

author of THE SYMBOLS OF GOVERNMENT

This stimulating, provocative and amusing book is being discussed by thousands of readers.

"I hereby nominate Thurman Arnold for whatever prize, from the Pulitzer up, is awarded to the [illegible] who best succeeds in being the enfant terrible of his craft and standing our world on its head."—Max Lerner in The Nation. 4th Printing.

YALE

Get your copy today
4th Large printing

$3.00
AT ALL BOOKSTORES

When Labor Organizes

By ROBERT BROOKS

The story of what is actually happening on the Labor Front. "Comprehensive . . . interesting, thoughtful . . . its value is enhanced by the skill with which it has been organized and written."—The Nation.

$3.00

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS New Haven, Conn.

How can low-income groups get adequate medical care?

explained in this timely volume—

HEALTH INSURANCE

THE NEXT STEP IN SOCIAL SECURITY

By Louis S. Reed

One-time member of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care

Already a health insurance measure has been introduced into 1938 New York State Legislature. Undoubtedly a Federal bill will be brought forward in Congress in the near future.

This book sets forth fully and objectively the facts about the extent and cost of sickness in America; tells how European countries have been using health insurance; and suggests the type of legislation which will undoubtedly be urged here.

Everyone—social workers, employers, doctors, legislators, labor unions, etc.—will find here the factual evidence on which alone enlightened discussion of this problem can take place. Price $3.00

HARPER & BROTHERS

THE NEW SCHOOL 66 West 12th St. presents

THE SOUTH: A NEW FRONTIER Karl Brandt
9 Tuesday evening lectures beginning February 1
The Series, $7.50 Single Admission, $1

In a world most frequently characterized as changing, the tempo of change in the South is more rapid, its character more fundamental perhaps, than elsewhere in the United States. Possible developments, political, social, agrarian and industrial, will be considered in their bearing on related problems in the country at large: Southern dictatorships; desperate plight of King Cotton; family farms, plantations, cropper labor; rise of Southern industries; the South and organized labor; the race question; what the rise of the South means to the American nation.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: THE BASIS OF DEMOCRACY
Roger N. Baldwin, Chairman
15 weeks. Thursdays, 8:20 P.M., beginning February 3
The Series, $12.50 Single Admission, $1

The practical function of civil liberties in social change; the philosophy and practice of civil and political liberty; preparation for further study and participation in active movements.

Speakers include: Arthur Garfield Hays, Elinore M. Herrick, Sherwood Eddy, Rev. John P. Boland, George Soule, Harry F. Ward, Max Lerner, Eduard C. Lindeman, Louis M. Hacker, Charles H. Houston.

ARMAMENT AND THE ECONOMIC STRUCTURE
Emil Lederer
15 weeks. Fridays, 8:20 P.M., beginning February 4
The Series, $12.50 Single Admission, $1

Autarchy, the total war and the relation of modern armaments to the economic system as a whole; their added significance in periods of economic recession or of slow economic growth. The effect of the economics of armament on other major economic phenomena: profits; the business cycle; the military vs. the economic system; armament and dictatorship; preparedness and democracy; socialization of armament industries; conscription of capital; who pays for war?; does war pay?.

• PROTEST •

FIVE YEARS OF HITLER TERROR

at a MASS MEETING

Carnegie Hall, Sunday Evening, January 30th

SPEAKERS: Governor George E. Earle of Pennsylvania
Representative Hamilton Fish, Jr.
Judge Jeremiah T. Mahoney

Oswald Garrison Villard • George Gordon Battle
Vito Marcantonio • Professor Franz Boas
Johannes Steel • Ernest Meyer • Heinz Liepmann
William E. Taylor, Dean of the Howard Law School

Added Feature
"FOUR LITTLE ANGELS OF PEACE"
FROM PINS AND NEEDLES
Presented by Members of the Labor Stage

ADMISSION FREE

Auspices: Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League
20 West 47th Street, New York City

are necessarily being denounced effectively as well. Mr. Blitzstein's vehemence is continuous but his wit is intermittent.

Having entered this caveat I can go on with a good conscience to conclude that "The Cradle Will Rock" nevertheless remains something which should certainly be seen. The very ferocity of the satire is remarkable, some of the lyrics are raffishly amusing, and there is a savagely cumulative absurdity hard to describe even in such minor matters as the successive introduction of the mill-owner and his family—Mr. Mister, Mrs. Mister, Junior Mister, and Sister Mister.

Certainly none of the other productions since my last report demands much attention. "Tortilla Flat" (Henry Miller Theater) is dramatized from Steinbeck's novel of the same name by Jack Kirkland, who was responsible for the stage version of "Tobacco Road." Like the latter it is again a study in total depravity, this time as cultivated by mongrel Mexicans living in California. It is supposed to be funny, but perhaps for the very reason that the grimness of "Tobacco Road" is absent it is not particularly effective. "The Greatest Show on Earth" (Playhouse) exhibits some ingenuity in costuming actors to suggest the circus animals they are supposed to represent, but I have no idea what the intention of the play is.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

Fairy Tale in Five Acts

THE question which everybody must have asked in advance about Walt Disney's "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" was whether it would justify its length. Not only was the film to be many times longer than anything Mr. Disney had done; it was to tell a story which he could be imagined as telling in the accustomed time. A fairy tale like an anecdote is by definition brief, and its form helps its content to be credible. We can believe three things that are done in three paragraphs when one of them alone, drawn out to epic length, would be preposterous. The question then was whether Mr. Disney had lost any of his secrets by abandoning his form.

The fact that everybody likes "Snow White" is not necessarily an answer, though it has its importance. Thousands are trampling one another to get into the Music Hall; but the question still is whether the good thing they are there to see could possibly be better. I am not sure that it could, and yet in view of the future which the film opens up I am sure that the matter should be argued. Mr. Disney has both expanded his story and contracted it. He has added animals; he has differentiated and named the dwarfs; and he has elaborated the wicked stepmother in her role as magician, giving her a laboratory with monster retorts and a long-legged raven to scowl in the corner. On the other hand he has suppressed two of her attempts on Snow White's life—the tight lacing and the poisoned comb—and he has stopped short of Snow White's wedding. The wedding is perhaps not missed, but my guess is that the queen should have had more things to do and less time in which to do them. She was the only one of Mr. Disney's creatures who even approached being tiresome.

Mr. Disney's other developments are all to the good, and indescribably delightful. The animals, for instance—I can remember no finer moment in any film than this one when at sunrise in the forest the banks of eyes which have looked so sinister all night turn out to belong to rabbits, fawns, chipmunks, bluebirds, and turtles. The transition is from shadowy evil to the clearest and most blithesome benevolence. The antics of these charming beasts vary henceforth between the beatific and the absurd; the pride of the baby bluebird in his voice, the ticklish turtle offering his belly for a washboard when Snow White starts housecleaning for the dwarfs, and the squirrels undoing cobwebs with their tails are but understatements of the very touching love for Snow White which they share with a helpless audience. Then there are the dwarfs—in their seven foolish ways as irresistible as the heroine, and of course no less devoted to her than the animals are; though one of them, Grumpy, remains a misogynist almost to the end. Mr. Disney's triumph with them, like all his other triumphs, is one of understanding. His technique, about which I know little, must of course be wonderful; but the main thing is that he lives somewhere near the human center and knows innumerable truths that cannot be taught. That is why his ideas look like inspirations, and why he can be good-hearted without being sentimental, can be ridiculous without being fatuous. With him, as with any first-rate artist, we feel that we are in good hands; we can trust him with our hearts and wits.

MARK VAN DOREN

RECORDS

A large number of readers, whom I thank collectively for their letters, have made known their wishes concerning this column. With one exception they prefer that I use my space for the records that are worth buying; from that point on they scatter. Some want a warning against an inadequate performance of an important work or a good performance of an unimportant work or a poor recording; others think I should not waste the space. Some want the comment to be extensive and detailed because they find it increases their understanding and discrimination; one asks me to limit myself to a concise statement about the performance and the recording and not to bother about the music.

Moreover, having taken pen in hand some writers go on to object to my giving space to jazz; an equal number ask me to give more space to it; and I will break the tie by saying that anyone with feeling for music should want to be told about trumpet-playing as beautifully imagined and sensitively phrased as Buck Clayton's (1) immediately after Billie Holiday's singing of "He's Funny That Way" (Vocalion 3748), and (2) at the beginning of the delightful "Good Morning Blues" of Count Basie's Orchestra (Decca 1446), which also provides a good introduction to Basie's distinctive piano-playing. He should want to know also about some of the old records of the incomparable Bessie Smith that Columbia has reissued in a special memorial album (six records, $5)—records that offer not only the singing of Bessie but the playing of outstanding jazz musicians like the pianist James P. Johnson in "Backwater Blues," the cornettist Joe Smith and the pianist Fletcher Henderson in "Weeping Willow Blues" and "Yellow Dog Blues," and Louis Armstrong in "St. Louis Blues" and "Reckless Blues." For my ears Armstrong has done nothing to equal his cornet obligatos in these records and in "Cold in Hand Blues," which has not been reissued and which you should clamor for.

There are suggestions to include comment on military-band

BOOKS FROM MINNESOTA

Victorian Critics of Democracy

BENJAMIN E. LIPPINCOTT'S stimulating analysis of the rightist arguments made by Carlyle, Ruskin, Arnold, Stephen, Maine, and Lecky—"as a group perhaps the most vigorous and distinguished critics of democracy in modern times." $3.75

The Unicameral Legislature

By ALVIN W. JOHNSON. Inclusive, up-to-the-minute history of the one-house legislature in the United States and abroad. Covers the Nebraska session of 1937 and the proposals in Ohio, California, and 19 other states. $2.50

Spain Poised: An Etcher's Record

By S. CHATWOOD BURTON. Full-page etchings of pre-revolutionary towns, each with facing text. Recommended by the Book-of-the-Month Club as "a poignant memorial to the Spain that is being destroyed." Limited edition, 1000 numbered copies. Quarto. $5.00

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA PRESS, Minneapolis

BURNING QUESTION

Making Your Living in a Monopolized World

By LOUIS WALLIS
Formerly of the Federal Department of Labor

Congressman Herbert S. Bigelow, of the Second Ohio District, says: "Economic distress is reviving the Henry George thesis as a practical truth to which statesmen must turn. Louis Wallis's book, Burning Question, is a welcome restatement and critical reappraisal of the George thesis."

Professor Edward A. Ross, of the University of Wisconsin, writes: "Your little book will be timely, for all over the world thinking people are searching for something else than having the state take charge of all production. I agree with all you say."

Pocket size, 75 cents, from your bookseller, or send check direct to—

●

WILLETT, CLARK & CO.
440 SOUTH DEARBORN ST.
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents the
ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
production of JEAN GIRAUDOUX'S comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:40
Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40. 300 Seats at $1.10

THE WORLD'S FIRST ANTI-WAR PLAY!
Presented by THE AMERICAN ACTORS COMPANY
A modern version of THE TROJAN WOMEN
by EDITH HAMILTON at the
MASTER INSTITUTE THEATRE—ROERICH MUSEUM
103rd Street at Riverside Drive
Prices: 55¢ to $1.65
For reservations
call ACademy 4-1700
Opening Monday, January 24

The NEW SCHOOL presents
WEBSTER
AITKEN
in Four Recitals devoted to the PIANOFORTE SONATAS of FRANZ SCHUBERT. Subscriptions by Mail or [illegible] New School—$10, [illegible] and [illegible] for the Series.
(Steinway Piano)
4 TUES. EVGS. at 8:30
JAN. [illegible] — FEB. 1
FEB. 8—FEB. 15
[illegible] The NEW SCHOOL
For SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 WEST 12th STREET

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY PARTY
Sunday, Feb. 13, at 8:30
BELASCO THEA., 44 St. E. of B'way
LILLIAN HELLMAN
Author of "The Children's Hour," Screen Adaptation "Dead End." Recently returned from Spain.
CAPT. HANS AMLIE
Former Commanding Officer, "Lincoln-Washington Battalion."
MILLY BENNETT
Former Chief of Press Bureau, Loyalist Ministry of State.
Tickets: 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50
at all Workers' Bookshops and all Agencies
Ausp.: FRIENDS OF LINCOLN BRIGADE
125 W. 45th St., N.Y.C. LOngacre 3-6215
Watch
THE NATION
for
MORE SURPRISE
SPEAKERS!

DANCE FOR SPAIN
MARTHA GRAHAM
ANNA SOKOLOW
HANYA HOLM
TAMIRIS
and their Groups
BALLET CARAVAN
ARTHUR MAHONEY
PAUL DRAPER
HIPPODROME 43d St. at 6th Ave.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 28TH—8 P. M.
Tickets 50c, 75c, $1, $1.50, $2.00 (plus tax) all agencies
— Benefit —
MEDICAL BUREAU and NORTH AMERICAN COMMITTEE TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY 381 4th Ave., N. Y. C.

SYMPOSIUM
"LENIN'S Contribution to Modern Thought"
LOUIS BOUDIN
PROF. V. J. McGILL
ROBERT W. DUNN
MOISSAYE OLGIN
MALCOLM COWLEY, Chairman
WED.
Jan. 26
8:30 P.M.
Admission 35c
HOTEL CENTER
108 W. 43rd St., N. Y.
Auspices: AMERICAN FRIENDS OF THE SOVIET UNION
Tickets at Bookshop, 50 E. 13th St. or AFSU, 822 Bway.

records, information about record-changing mechanisms, criticism of careless labeling of records—for example, Victor's putting the Clock Scene from "Boris Godunov" on the A side of a record and Boris's Monologue which precedes it on the B side. There is also a suggestion to omit: "I propose that you stop reviewing Columbia records entirely until the mechanical defects which you so properly keep remarking upon have been remedied. With their present abominable surfaces Columbia records aren't worth buying . . . and I for one never read the reviews of them. How a company can pursue such a suicidal policy is beyond me." And me.

"If you weren't so rabid against much of Brahms and Sibelius I'd think you were very fine. As it is, I must conclude that you haven't familiarized yourself enough with many of their works that you think so little of"—is the response of one of the more fanatical admirers of Brahms and Sibelius to my discriminating appreciation of these two composers; and a second otherwise highly approving letter ends with the plea, "But seem not splenetic about Brahms." And finally there are two complaints about the lateness of my reviews, one reader pointing out that by the time they appear he has already made his purchases. But if he wants the benefit of my judgment he can wait for it and gear his purchasing with my columns instead of with the companies' announcements.

As a matter of fact I would be discussing January releases now if the Victor special list had not intervened. I have not yet heard everything on the list, but so far it has given me my first experience, under ideal conditions, of three of the most beautiful works I have ever heard—works miraculous in their expressiveness and loveliness in the way that only Mozart's and Schubert's music can be: Mozart's Piano Concertos K. 450 (three records, $5) and K. 459 (3½ records, $7), and Schubert's Trio Opus 100 (five records, $10). By ideal conditions I mean superb performances: Elly Ney's of the Concerto K. 450, Schnabel's of K. 459, the Busch-Serkin Trio's of Schubert's Opus 100.

There are also superb performances by Hephzibah and Yehudi Menuhin and Maurice Eisenberg, excellently recorded, of Beethoven's Trio Opus 70 No. 1 (three records, $6.50) and Tchaikovsky's Trio Opus 50 (5½ records, $11); on the other hand the Busch Quartet, while it does better than the Lener with the first movement of Beethoven's Quartet Opus 131 (five records, $10), does less well with other movements; this work should have been done by the Budapest Quartet, which, with assisting artists, wastes magnificent playing on Brahms's Sextet Opus 36 (four records, $8). And other orchestral items are a fine performance of Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" (two records, $3.50) by the Vienna Philharmonic under Walter, with recording that includes much reverberation; a not too precise performance, well recorded, of the Vivaldi-Bach Concerto for Four Pianos (two records, $3.50); and Sibelius's Third and Seventh Symphonies (seven records, $12), well played by the London Symphony under Kajanus and the B. B. C. Symphony under Koussevitzky, respectively, with the Seventh less well recorded at a concert than the Third in a studio.

If you are one of those who love the simple songs Carl Sandburg has done for Musicraft (four records, $4.50) you will dislike his affected singing of them. A good Musicraft release is Kathleen Long's performance of Mozart's Variations on a Theme of Gluck (two records, $3.00). And Timely offers (four records, $8) exemplary performances, by the New York Simfonietta under Max Goberman, of a charming Quartet by Stamitz, a Concertino by Pergolesi of which the Andante movement is outstanding, and a dull Concerto Grosso by Locatelli.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

War and The Nation

Dear Sirs: For many years The Nation has stood for the very best in American liberalism. Its courageous opposition to participation in the World War and its defense of civil liberties then and later are bright pages in the history of that tradition.

But with a dangerous war spirit abroad in the land today, we are dismayed to find The Nation aligning itself with those forces, both of the right and of the left, which are pushing this country toward war. The Neutrality Act is a piece of democratic legislation expressing the will of the American people to keep out of war. The Administration has failed to invoke this act in the present Sino-Japanese conflict, and The Nation has editorially indorsed this failure. Had this act been invoked and its clearly implied purpose carried out, such a dangerous "incident" as the Panay bombing would have been unlikely. In commenting on this incident, The Nation seems to have ignored the embarrassing fact that at the time of the attack the Panay was convoying three Standard Oil tankers. Indeed, in its editorial of December 18 these tankers were actually described as "three American ships containing American refugees." Is this liberalism?

In this crisis The Nation has espoused an ambiguous policy of "collective security." If such a policy is not backed up by the willingness to use armed force, it is an empty threat and a program of rhetoric and wind. But if economic sanctions are implemented by military sanctions, The Nation itself has admitted that the result may be war. And war in defense of what? Of democracy? Of American civilization? Or of the interests of big business? The Nation for January 1 states editorially: "For years foreigners have enjoyed extraterritorial rights in China. In abrogating them the Japanese have virtually closed the Open Door in China, since few foreigners will care to do business —or indeed be able to—under the arbitrary supervision of the Japanese militarists. For these reasons, if for no others, we cannot believe that the State Department will bow to the latest Japanese decree." The journal which in 1917 so courageously exposed the economic motives behind our participation in the war, today in effect calls on the State Department to risk war to protect the scandalous extraterritorial rights of American imperialism in China.

We believe that the first result of another War to Make the World Safe for Democracy will be the establishment of virtual fascism in this country. Is it patriotism, under the guise of warding off the remote possibility of fascist invasion, to prepare the way for domestic despotism? And is it logical to combat fascism by methods which are certain to introduce it?

The issue is as clear as it is critical. Will The Nation continue to defend "collective security," with all the risk of war involved in such a policy? Or will it reassert its traditional opposition to all war and war-mongering, whether of the right or of the left? As readers, as contributors, as friends of The Nation, we protest against what seems to us a betrayal of its splendid liberal tradition. We hope the editors will reconsider their position on this crucial issue.

(Signed) THOMAS H. BENTON, ALFRED M. BINGHAM, ANITA BRENNER, JOHN CHAMBERLAIN, BERNARD C. CLAUSEN, LEWIS COREY, CARROLL R. DAUGHERTY, H. C. ENGELBRECHT, JAMES T. FARRELL, JOHN T. FLYNN, MARY FOX, RICHARD T. FRANKENSTEEN, CLINTON S. GOLDEN, LOUIS M. HACKER, MAURITZ A. HALLGREN, FRANK HANIGHEN, ABRAM L. HARRIS, FRANCIS HENSON, SIDNEY HOOK, QUINCY HOWE, SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE, WILLIAM POTTER LAGE, HARRY W. LAIDLER, FREDERICK J. LIBBY, DWIGHT MACDONALD, HOMER MARTIN, MARY MCCARTHY, ERNEST L. MEYER, A. J. MUSTE, LOUIS NELSON, GERALD P. NYE, PHILIP RAHV, JAMES RORTY, HAROLD RUTTENBERG, DAVID SAPOSS, MEYER SHAPIRO, ROSE STEIN, WILLIAM T. STONE, NORMAN THOMAS, LIONEL TRILLING, EDMUND WILSON, BERTRAM D. WOLFE, MOLLY YARD, CHARLES S. ZIMMERMAN, N. A. ZONARICH.

[We agree that the issues dealt with in the letter above are among the most vital that the American people face today. But we believe that it is both false and dangerous to assume that the United States can escape war by taking steps, such as invoking the Neutrality Act, without regard to their practical effect on the world as a whole. Is it not possible that the aid and comfort given to aggressors by the unneutral features of the act would serve to bring war much nearer?

There is nothing "ambiguous" in The Nation's support of collective security. We have consistently maintained that if the drift toward war is to be checked, collective economic restraints are essential. We do not admit for a moment that this policy must be backed up by military sanctions, or that it involves a serious risk of war. It is one thing to say, as many do, that military cooperation between the democracies might stave off a world conflict under the present circumstances; and quite another to say, as we have said repeatedly, that in the long run peace can only be assured by the development of a non-violent technique for the enforcement of law. It is precisely this which the isolationists, including many of the signers of this letter, have opposed on many occasions.

In order to keep the record straight, we should like to add that the Standard Oil tankers sunk with the Panay did carry both American and Chinese refugees, and that the quotation on extraterritoriality was simply a statement of what appeared to be the facts in the situation. There was not, even by implication, a suggestion that the United States should go to war to protect its imperialist interests.

Nor was there an implicit defense of extraterritoriality. For years The Nation has advocated the surrender of American extraterritorial rights and special privileges in China. We have not retreated from this position. But there is an important distinction between restoring full sovereignty to China and urging the American government to retreat from its traditional position in the East merely because it is challenged by Japan. Surrender of American special privileges in China at the present moment would be of no service to China, but would merely demonstrate to the Japanese militarists and other would-be aggressors the efficacy of war as an instrument of national policy.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Persecution and the Press

Dear Sirs: The case of Marcus Graham contains a clear threat to the freedom of the press, since his arrest and the resumption of deportation proceedings against him, on an order dated more than eighteen years ago, are indirect attempts to stifle the publication Man, of which he is editor.

A philosophic anarchist, Graham was first arrested in 1919 and ordered deported to Canada. But on his refusal to give the details of his birth on the ground that the proceeding was illegal, Canada refused to accept him. In 1921 he was rearrested and imprisoned by the Labor Department for six months. In 1930 the Labor Department again arrested him on the trumped-up charge of having crossed the United States border to Mexico without a permit.

Then followed official harassment of the monthly publication Man. Subscribers were visited by immigration inspectors and threatened with prosecution unless they canceled their subscriptions. In October, 1937, when Graham was again rearrested, immigration inspectors searched his home without a warrant.

Now the Labor Department is planning to send Graham to jail unless he discloses information which he has consistently refused to give for over eighteen years. As a preliminary to this imprisonment, the department has secured an order from the United States District Court requiring Graham to submit this information. He has refused to do so. A charge of criminal contempt has already been filed against him.

The Southern California Branch of the American Civil Liberties Union has organized a Marcus Graham Freedom of the Press Committee. The A. C. L. U. has furnished counsel to Graham and is sponsoring a civil suit for damages against the immigration officers. All believers in freedom should communicate immediately with James L. Houghteling, Commissioner of Immigration, Washington, D. C., urging a halt to this long campaign of persecution.

CLINTON J. TAFT, Director,
Southern California Branch, A. C. L. U.

Los Angeles, Cal., January 3

Democracy Begins at Home

Dear Sirs: Your proposals regarding the role that America should play in foreign affairs seem to me most unrealistic. To expect that the nations of the world would participate in any sort of "collective security" with all the attendant risks, responsibilities, and sacrifices, out of a desire to establish international law, order, and justice is naive and foolish. The chief motive operating behind the desire for collective coercion is not universal altruism but each nation's economic self-interest.

Our country does not have to cooperate indiscriminately with other nations in order to stop by force the spread of fascism, since that disease develops from internal irritations, not by contagion. And before we set about exporting our imagined surplus of democracy we should produce enough to satisfy the demand for it at home.

LESLIE CHRISMER

Ridley Park, Pa., January 17

Education by Night

Dear Sirs: A survey of conditions in the evening sessions of New York City's municipal colleges has just been completed by a joint committee of the Brooklyn College Evening Session Association and the New York College Teachers' Union (Local 537, A.F.T.). The survey reveals distressing exploitation of teachers and students in the evening sessions.

Nearly 24,000 students, 87 per cent of whom are matriculated for a degree, are taking their college work in the evening, for the most part because they are holding jobs, or looking for them, in the daytime. These worker-students are crammed into large classes, find it difficult, if not impossible, to use the library—since library rules are designed for day students—get no free textbooks, no regular gymnasium courses, and are generally treated as college stepchildren.

Evening-session students are taught by a staff as well qualified on the average as day-session teachers, but forced to teach under circumstances in which their efficiency cannot be at a maximum. Some of the evening-session staff are day-session teachers who after finishing a day's stint tack on extra hours in the evening at half-pay. More than half of the evening-session staff are employed by the colleges in the evening session only, but because of low salary schedules they are forced to seek other employment to supplement their incomes. Evening-session teachers are paid at one-half the day-session rate. Further, evening-session teachers are paid on an hourly basis, a vestige of the days, thirty years ago, when the evening session was an extension division with unpredictable courses and irregularly attending students. This hourly system of pay excludes teachers from tenure rights and from the teachers' retirement system; it penalizes them for illness and holidays. Evening-session teachers are not promoted, and their salary increments are haphazard and rare. The average annual salary in the day session of Brooklyn College is $3,754.54; in the evening session, for approximately a half-day teaching schedule, it is $720.

A meeting of all evening-session teachers has been called by several teacher organizations for Saturday afternoon, January 22, at the Twenty-third Street branch of the City College, to discuss a program of action for the correction of these abuses.

EDWIN B. BURGUM
President, New York
College Teachers' Union

New York, January 12

CONTRIBUTORS

M. E. RAVAGE, The Nation's Paris correspondent, is at present visiting the United States.

HAROLD WARD is a former contributing editor of the Living Age.

GEORGE LAMBERT is a national organizer of the Socialist Party assigned to Texas.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE is a regular contributor to The Nation and other periodicals.

GEROLD FRANK, formerly on the staff of the Cleveland News, is now with the New York Journal-American.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is the editor of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany."

GEORGE GENZMER is a member of the English faculty of Bard College.

LOUIS M. HACKER, lecturer in economics at Columbia University, is the author of "The United States: A Graphic History."

PAUL ROSENFELD is the author of "By Way of Art."

GAETANO SALVEMINI, formerly professor of modern history at the University of Florence, is now teaching at Harvard. He is the author of "The Fascist Dictatorship in Italy" and of "Under the Axe of Fascism."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription--Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ JANUARY 29, 1938 NUMBER 5

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 113

EDITORIALS:
- THE FOURTH PHASE 116
- POLICIES ON JAPAN 117
- FINANCIAL HORSE-TRADING 118

JACKSON VERSUS RICHBERG By Marquis Childs 119

SPIKING JAPAN'S GUNS by T. A. Bisson 120

LAUGHTER IN MADRID by Langston Hughes 123

MY CLASH WITH LaGUARDIA by Langdon Post 125

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 127

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
- THE PLEASURES OF LITERATURE By Edmund Wilson 128
- FALLOW LAND by Eunice Clark 129
- REVOLUTION IN WONDERLAND by Louise Bogan 129
- THE "INSIDE" OF THE CHINA WAR By Maxwell S. Stewart 130
- EPIC OF THE POCKET-BOOK by Maxwell Geismar 130
- AT VERSAILLES by Oswald Garrison Villard 131
- POET IN CAUCASIA by R. M. MacGregor 132
- "THE CRABBED LINE" by Ben Belitt 133
- MILITARISM AND SOCIETY by Hans Kohn 134
- SHORTER NOTICES 135
- FILMS: WHAT PICTURES MEAN By Mark Van Doren 136
- DRAMA: "THE LIVING NEWSPAPER" By Joseph Wood Krutch 137

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

FOREIGN MINISTER HIROTA COULD SCARCELY have been more frank in stating the ultimate aims of the Japanese militarists than he was last week in his speech before the Diet. Defining Chinese cooperation with Japan as meaning that "China must take Japan's side against Russia," Hirota also indicated that Japan would no longer be satisfied with separating North China from the rest of the country but would demand for the whole of China a puppet government which would be subservient to Japanese policy. At the same time Finance Minister Kaya, reporting on plans to raise vast amounts of money, partly by increased taxes but primarily through bond issues, admitted that Japan was a long way from achieving its objectives. He indicated that special measures would be necessary to limit the expected rise in living costs. On the military front it is openly admitted that the change in Chinese tactics has brought increased difficulties to the invaders. Within the past week Chinese detachments carried the battle to the Pootung area on the outskirts of Shanghai and threatened to recapture Hangchow and Wuhu. Attempts by the Japanese to land troops on the island of Hainan, south of Canton, were beaten off with heavy losses. The main Japanese offensive at Shantung appears to have made little headway. Further difficulties have been reported by the Japanese detachments in Shansi and Suiyuan. As the area of the struggle broadens, the effectiveness of the Japanese attack notably diminishes, arousing hope that in the long run Japan may find the cost of subjugating China beyond its resources.

*

THE TVA HAS COME OUT OF ITS BATTLES stronger than ever. It has, in the past few weeks, been the center of three major developments. The most dramatic was the decision of the three-judge Federal District Court that the TVA operations are constitutional. In its general reasoning the opinion follows the lines of Chief Justice Hughes's opinion in the Ashwander case two years ago. But it carries the logic one step farther and sanctions TVA competition with privately owned utilities in the sale of power. The resounding government victory is undoubtedly one of the reasons why Wendell L. Willkie is worried. One of the most skilful jobs Mr. Roosevelt has done in his press conferences was his point-by-point dissection of a memorandum submitted by Willkie setting down terms for a reconciliation of the government with the utilities. The terms included the permanent freezing of the top-holding-company structure, a definite limitation of the area of government competition, and a government commitment that reproduction cost would be guaranteed as a valuation base for the years up to 1932. None of these terms, of course, were possible. Their significance lies in their revelation of the whole attitude and temper of Mr. Willkie and his group. Our opinion of that attitude is in no degree changed by Mr. Willkie's subsequent offer to sell the utility system to the government. We disagree with Mr. Villard's opinion of this offer, stated on his page in this issue. Mr. Lilienthal's answer to Mr. Willkie, which had the President's support, is hard-headed and fair. To buy the system as a whole would be a clear way to saddle on the public the burden of the various write-ups in value that have occurred in the colorful history of the companies. Mr. Willkie's suggestion about procedure (incidentally it is difficult to think of the Supreme Court appointing a member of the commission) does not change the basis of negotiations. The only valid basis can be the physical and operating value of the companies. Moreover, there is no reason for contemplating federal ownership of the utilities now. There may have been twenty years ago, but since then the TVA and the movement for municipal power plants have indicated a better method. That is the yardstick and the acquisition by municipalities of particular power plants where duplication is threatened.

*

BENJAMIN STOLBERG IS NOT IN THE PAY OF Girdler or Hague or Henry Ford. He is honestly concerned about the working class and its major effort to create militant, effective organizations for collective bargaining. He believes in the C. I. O. These things we know to be true because Mr. Stolberg was for many years a contributor to The Nation, and we published several articles by him on vigilantism and labor as recently as last August. For that reason we particularly regret the appearance of his series of articles in the Scripps-Howard newspapers on factionalism in the C. I. O. We do not at this point wish to go into the question of Mr. Stolberg's facts concerning the efforts of the Communist Party to control as far as it can the unions in which its members are active. What disturbs us is the method employed by Mr. Stolberg. He has focused on one phase of the C. I. O.'s development as if it were the whole story of labor's swift rise toward power. He has mistaken a tide-rip for the incoming tide. No tributes to the growth of the C. I. O., no pleasant pen-portraits of some of its leaders can alter the distorted effect of the series. It is not that Mr. Stolberg loves labor less but that he hates the Communists more; and the product of his hate will be of better use to the gentlemen named in the first sentence of this paragraph than to John L. Lewis or Homer Martin. Happily the C. I. O. shows every sign of being able to survive its friends as well as its enemies.

IN SUCCEEDING HIMSELF CHAUTEMPS HAS not given France either a new or a lasting government. His return to office amounts to little more than the usual consent of a retiring minister to carry on the business of the state till his successor can be found. The absence of the Socialists from the council of ministers and the exchange of Tweedledee Marchandeau for Tweedledum Bonnet, have altered nothing unless it is for the worse. All the profound divisions, all the grave problems—financial, social, political, and diplomatic—which originally precipitated the crisis remain and cannot but go on aggravating themselves. Big business, against whose domination and against whose flirtations with totalitarianism the Popular Front was formed, has triumphed in compassing the break-up of that coalition; and nothing can be more doubtful than Chautemps's skill and will to cope with the powerful foes of social reform whom a united left has failed to bring to terms.

*

AMERICAN REPORTING OF THE FRENCH crisis leaves much to be desired. The inaccuracies, distortions, and downright misrepresentations of P. J. Philip, Paris correspondent for the New York Times, are particularly shocking. Space forbids our citing Mr. Philip at delectable length, but we cannot forgo a few instances. To believe him, M. Bonnet—"that courageous young man"—is a political party all by himself; it was Bonnet and not Blum who, at the risk of being abandoned by the Communists, had secured the tripartite monetary alignment; Bonnet's failure to form a Cabinet was due solely to the wicked Marxists and not at all to the opposition to him within his own party or to his second, tacit, devaluation of the franc; Flandin and Reynaud belong to the "central" Left Republican Party instead of being the leaders of the Democratic Alliance; Blum laid himself open to charges of treason for the crime of attempting to enlarge the Popular Front by drawing the center groups into the majority; and Louis Marin, political partner of the fascist Doriot, is a "stern defender of republican liberty in the widest sense."

*

THE CONVICTION OF SIXTEEN OIL COMPANIES by the federal grand jury at Madison is welcome if only to show that legal processes are not wholly futile in the fight against monopoly action and business price-fixing. We say this even though we are skeptical of anti-trust enforcement as the principal method for the regulation of business. There can be little doubt that the oil companies had a strong defense. They had been taught by Mr. Ickes's oil administration in the NRA days to fight the hot-oil companies and stabilize prices. They learned their lesson all too well, and after the Supreme Court invalidated oil control they continued price-fixing in their own interest. The jury's verdict cuts across the legal technicalities and expresses the attitude of twelve farmers and small business men toward the big monopolies. It is a good verdict, even if the path of control in the oil industry still remains to be explored. As for the general outlook for monopoly control, it is growing clear that the Administration program will have hard going. We have on the statute books a model law for the treatment of public-utility holding companies. The Treasury is likely to sponsor legislation aimed at holding companies in the banking field, where the concentration of power is as bad as in the utilities. And similar legislation, sponsored by Mr. Eastman, will be introduced by Senator Wheeler with respect to railroad holding companies. The government's position is sound, and a lively fight is to be expected.

*

OCTAVIAN GOGA, RUMANIA'S NEW PREMIER, has demonstrated that he yields to no one when it comes to effective anti-Semitism or flagrant disregard for legal formalities. One of his first acts in preparation for the elections called for March 2 has been to issue a decree compelling all Jews to establish their citizenship. Under this decree the 500,000 Jews living in provinces acquired from Austria-Hungary will be required to submit documentary evidence showing that they had residence and paid taxes prior to 1918. Those failing to satisfy the local magistrate with official proofs, in many cases almost impossible to obtain within the time limit, if at all, will be struck from the rolls and held liable to ejection from the country. Somewhat more ingenious was the announcement that the traditional party emblems would be discarded at the election in favor of a system by which the parties will be designated by a number of dots. The Goga party will be represented by one dot—similar to the traditional symbol of Maniu's National Peasant Party—while other parties will be confusingly identified by rows of dots numbering as high as twenty-eight. Should Goga be successful in obtaining support of 40 per cent of the electorate through such trickery, combined with wholesale intimidation, more sweeping anti-Semitic measures will assuredly follow. But it is not at all certain that he will even approach this figure. All the opposition parties, including Codreanu's fascist Iron Guard and the reactionary Liberal Party, have joined in an electoral pact to fight against terrorism and corruption in the forthcoming election—and these parties together polled over 90 per cent of the vote last December.

*

IN SPAIN'S REBEL TERRITORY, WHERE SO many biased witnesses have found "law and order" on the surface, the first big setback to the rebel arms might be expected to have had little or no effect. Yet in reality the disaffection behind the lines caused by the defeat at Teruel was so great that the Generalissimo felt forced to throw in his whole army to retake a small town which has much less strategic importance for him than for the Loyalists. Franco's Nazi staff officers, we learn, counseled against the violent rebel counter-offensive at Teruel on the grounds that it would interfere with the projected attacks on Guadalajara and Almeria and in addition seriously deplete the insurgents' reserves of men and equipment. But Franco swept aside these military considerations because be believed that the low morale behind his lines could not stand a defeat. Even if Teruel falls to the rebels, the price paid can hardly be worth the military gain, and the play for morale is so obvious as to defeat its purpose. For the trouble runs deep. Acts of sabotage multiply in rebel territory. Even Mr. Carney is forced to describe them in the New York Times. Moreover, the number of desertions to the government lines and to Gibraltar have increased. It is interesting to note that Queipo de Llano, the broadcasting drunken general of Seville, announced the capture of Teruel by the Loyalists while Franco's radio at Salamanca suppressed the news. And to make matters perfect for Franco, Queipo has now taken to broadcasting barbed insinuations about his Generalissimo's Italian allies.

*

RECENT UTTERANCES FROM THE VATICAN condemning anti-Christian aspects of the Hitler regime should fool no one into regarding the Holy See as a foe of fascism. The heiling pagans may be in bad odor for their Wotan-worshiping and priest-baiting but the cordiality between the Vatican and Mussolini grows more sugary by the month. Relations between these two resolved themselves into a mutual-admiration ceremony last week when Mussolini received a group of 60 bishops and archbishops and 2,000 priests who had distinguished themselves in the national campaign to attain self-sufficiency in the wheat crop. "The clergy of the fatherland's autarchic front is at the disposition of Il Duce," said Abbe Menossi on behalf of the assembled priests. And the more poetic Archbishop Nogara of Udine exclaimed: "Duce, you have won so many battles, may the Lord assist you and enable you to win all those you undertake with your energy and knowledge, for the grandeur, prosperity, and glory of Christian Italy and of Rome, center of Christianity and Imperial Capital." For his part Mussolini thanked the men of God for their collaboration in the struggle against the "Abyssinian hordes" and the "highly civilized hordes of sanctionism." Vatican circles, while careful to disavow any direct connection with the affair, unofficially praised it as "opportune and satisfactory," and the Pope himself received the same delegation two days later. "Hordes of democracy" please note.

*

JAMES H. R. CROMWELL FLEW ALL THE WAY from Honolulu to lay a plan in the House Ways and Means Committee. His plan is simple and has two parts. First you repeal the income tax and then you substitute a sales tax—on everything, including food, clothing, and medicine. Some quick-figuring committeemen estimated that on a federal basis it would mean a sales tax of 18 per cent on everything, and that if Mr. Cromwell's theory were extended to states and municipalities, the levy would be increased to 72 per cent, but Mr. Cromwell was not daunted. On the contrary, he said it would increase labor's bargaining power and would not put an undue burden on the poor. Presumably his plan would send so much money pouring into industry that workers would soon be able to demand such high salaries that they would shortly be riding around in sixteen cylinder Millenniums and spending their vacations with Mr. Cromwell and Doris Duke in Honolulu. Mr. Cromwell failed to say what Mrs. Automobile Worker Smith and Mrs. Steel Roller Poletti would be using to pay the 72 or even the 18 per cent sales tax on the family's bread between times. But perhaps that dilemma would produce a shortage of workers through starvation that would raise to even greater heights the bargaining power of those who were left. "It sounds," remarked Mr. Doughton of the House Ways and Means Committee, "like you are trying to bring the millennium. But I can tell you right now that it won't work." After Mr. Cromwell's dramatic appearance, the committee presumably went back to work. Which suggests that a sales tax of 100 per cent on sales talks by millionaire saviors might save a lot of wear and tear on Congressional committees.

The Fourth Phase

THE solemn filing of business leaders through the White House portals is in itself neither sinister nor encouraging. If Franklin D. Roosevelt wants to dress himself up in the starched collar and schoolboy tie of Herbert Hoover and receive the instruction of the Old Masters of finance, he has the right to do so. Our fear is that he will not greatly be the gainer in wisdom. But it is much better that he should get his advice directly from the sort of advisory council that is now being mooted than that business should fill the entire press with its clamor in order to get itself heard

It is less likely, however, that Mr. Roosevelt is panting for advice than that he is moved by considerations of political discretion. He is anxious to give the appearance of having taken every possible step and consulted everyone in his attempts to cope with the depression. For his eye is at the present moment mainly upon Congress. The filibuster has, in a curious way, served his purposes, for it has given him a chance to mark time and find his bearings. His primary concern at present is not with a legislative program but with morale. His alternate bows to left and right are meant chiefly to keep an organized opposition from developing within his party. It is significant that the President's whole policy of blowing hot and cold—of attacking holding companies, monopolies, and absentee ownership in the abstract while extending an olive branch to business men in the concrete—is one well-calculated to appeal to men of Mr. Garner's stamp, who will have the decisive voice on party cohesion.

The New Deal is entering on a critical period which may determine whether what it has accomplished thus far is to be consolidated or dissolved. Mr. Roosevelt confronts the fourth phase of his administration. The first was the period of emergency legislation—of "action and action now"—including not only the measures taken to meet the 1933 panic but also such measures of uncritical immediacy as the NRA. The second was the laying down of the permanent program, the long-run New Deal, with the Labor Relations Act, the SEC, the farm program, and the TVA as its principal elements. The third was the phase of political adventure and counter-attack, including the President's court plan, the Black episode, and the concerted drive on the principal New Deal agencies. The business setback rounded out this period and accomplished what the President's mistakes and the big battalions of the opposition had been unable to accomplish—it definitely stopped the farther advance of the New Deal.

The fourth phase will in all likelihood extend over the remaining three years of Mr. Roosevelt's term. It presents the problem of fashioning a policy which will at once halt a depression, heal a party breach, win an election, and continue a social program. Obviously such a task has its contradictions, if not its impossibilities. And Mr. Roosevelt's moves of the past few months must be taken as maneuvers toward a solution of these multiple difficulties. Time may prove their wisdom, but thus far they give us mainly the impression of a psychologist's mouse trapped in a maze.

The comments which the President jotted down as the members of Secretary Roper's Business Advisory Council read their statement to him, and which were published in a sort of antiphonal form along with their statement, do not constitute a program. They may perhaps be described as indicating a mood of restrained compromise on both sides. The President has discovered that his anti-monopoly campaign, regardless of whether it is economically valid, was doomed politically from the start. No capitalist regime can move against the very essence of capitalism without endangering the sources of its own support. Even the members of the advisory council who had previously been friendly to the President are reported to have been in revolt because of the Jackson and Ickes speeches, and ready for mass resignation. Nor does it take much acumen to see that some of Mr. Roosevelt's own supporters are themselves industrialists who enjoy incomes and power from monopolies. A real drive to break the power of the holding companies and the undemocratic control that the big banking interests have over industry can only be undertaken by an Administration that is ready to burn the bridges that link it with capitalist power. And the President, faced by a depression, a revolt, and an election, decided to let the bridges stand for the event of retreat.

His present strategy seems to revolve around new forms for exercising control over business while granting it a voice in that control. The basic question is of course how much of a voice that will mean. The general idea of an advisory group that will have a role in the shaping of economic policy is a promising one. The great danger is that it may become what the NRA was—another trap for cartelizing industry, strengthening monopoly, and penalizing the consumer. But it need not be that. A policy-shaping group that was truly representative of all the interests involved in industry—labor, the consumer, the investor, management, and technology, as well as the financial groups—might well develop into a useful instrument. But its real purpose should not be to determine government policy—ultimately the Executive and Congress cannot absolve themselves of that responsibility—but to coordinate business policies. If it addressed itself to that purpose it could become the nucleus of an economic planning body. In the end America will find that it cannot escape the necessity of reaching its economic decisions nationally instead of leaving them to the hazards of corporate power or of piecemeal governmental action. That will, we hope, be the direction of the Administration's fourth phase.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Policies on Japan

IN THE six months that have passed since the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese conflict the outlines of the Administration's policy have become fairly apparent. It is essentially the traditional policy of a capitalist country which finds its interests menaced by a rival power. The Administration has attempted as far as possible to protect its interests in China, but has retreated on occasion rather than run the risk of becoming embroiled in war. In the Brussels conference it flirted with the possibility of international cooperation, but refused to assume the leadership that was necessary to make such collaboration a success. With the failure of the Brussels conference it has fallen back on an old-fashioned imperialist policy based on naval preparedness.

In some quarters this policy has been represented as a middle-of-the-road path between the program advocated by a vociferous minority of isolationists and the somewhat less vocal demands of the advocates of collective security, the assumption being that the middle course is probably the safest. This is essentially a false picture of the situation. The present program is in no sense a compromise between isolationism and collective security. It is a distinct policy, based on certain assumptions and representing a definite philosophy, and is probably the most dangerous of any course which the United States could pursue.

Faced by the reality of Japanese expansion in China, the isolationists would avoid a conflict by giving way to Japan. They would repatriate all American citizens in the war zone, withdraw our military and naval forces, curtail economic relations with both belligerents by invoking the Neutrality Act, and ease world tension by economic concessions to the aggressor nations. The weakness of this policy lies in its complete lack of realism. Our stakes in the Far East may not be great as compared with our national wealth, but the holders of these stakes—among them are such companies as the National City Bank, the International Telephone and Telegraph Company, and the Socony-Vacuum Oil Company—are far too powerful to permit withdrawal. Moreover, given the temper of the present leaders of Japan, concessions by the United States would certainly be interpreted as a sign of weakness and would lead to an intensification of Japanese aggression, with increased danger of war to this country. American withdrawal would also destroy any possibility of cooperation among the powers, since such action can only be obtained on the basis of existing rights and treaties. Abandonment of these treaties under duress would place this country in a position where it must accept at least partial responsibility for the disintegration of international law.

It is doubtful, however, whether the program advocated by the extreme isolationists is as immediately dangerous as that being followed by the Administration. Unable to withdraw and unwilling to cooperate in collective measures, it is attempting to play a lone hand in opposing Japanese expansion in China. It is compelled to rely largely on guesswork in its day-to-day actions to decide how far it can go without involving the country in an unwanted war. And in order to strengthen its hand, it naturally seeks a navy and air force second to none.

While it is fantastic to suggest that Japan, with a million soldiers bogged down in China, would voluntarily declare war against the United States, wars do not always develop logically. In any case the United States is running a far greater risk acting alone than if it were acting in concert with the other great powers. But the most alarming aspect of the Administration's program is to be found in its reliance on military preparedness. If history has demonstrated anything, it is that a country which prepares for offensive war ultimately engages in such a war. It bespeaks a reliance on armed force as an instrument of national policy which precludes the possibility of developing an alternative technique for dealing with international problems. As a concession to nationalist sentiment, it tends to make joint action all the more difficult.

It cannot be denied that collective action involves necessary compromises with the ideal. Radical isolationists have made much of the fact that British and French hands are not much cleaner than those of the Japanese, and suggest that cooperation to check Japan would merely support one imperialism against another. This is equivalent to saying that there is no difference between peaceful economic penetration and the holocaust perpetrated by Japan in China. Undoubtedly there are dangers in becoming involved in the struggle between imperialisms, as there are in any effort to enforce law. But the dangers of joint action are infinitely less than those inherent in the Administration's unilateral policy, and in the present crisis are almost wholly imaginary.

It is only fair to ask whether any practical possibility of collective action in support of international law exists at the present moment. Admittedly the possibility is slight. On the basis of past experience, each of the powers is certain that it would not be whole-heartedly supported by the others. The greatest skepticism exists with regard to the United States, since it was the refusal of this country to cooperate that was chiefly responsible for the failure of the League in 1931 and again in 1935. But at the same time it is becoming increasingly obvious that Japan must not be allowed to triumph. Inaction and unilateral action have proved equally unsatisfactory. Collective action is all that remains.

The proposal for international embargos against Japan submitted by Sir Walter Citrine, general secretary of the British Trade Union Congress, to the American Federation of Labor is an indication that the demand for collective action is far from dead among the mass of people. With the meeting of the League Council on January 26 pressure will once more be exerted by the British Labor Party and other anti-war groups for sanctions against Japan. This move will fail unless some definite assurance is forthcoming from the United States that this country will cooperate. But it is safe to say that if the United States, which with the British Empire controls more than half of Japan's trade, were willing to join in imposing embargos on Japan, the League powers would gladly come along. If this seems like a counsel of perfection, it is because the average American has not yet grasped the fact that Japan, because of its high degree of economic vulnerability, can be stopped in relatively short order by collective economic pressure, whether applied by governments or by individual consumers. Nor is it realized that if Japan can be stopped, the danger of a fascist-provoked world war will be materially lessened.

Financial Horse-Trading

THE announcement that Mexico has increased its tariff on a long list of imports from the United States has created serious concern among persons who advocate low tariffs for all countries except the United States. Frank L. Kluckhohn, Mexican correspondent for the New York Times, implies that the move is the result of growing Nazi influence south of the Rio Grande. That the move will be injurious to American exporters without necessarily aiding the Mexican economy goes almost without saying, but it is hardly realistic to see a German plot in Mexico's rather pathetic efforts to free itself from the financial domination of American capital. The fact that the United States normally supplies 63 per cent of Mexico's imports is perhaps the best indication of the extent of that control.

This subordination was clearly in evidence on the occasion of the recent visit of Finance Minister Eduardo Suárez to Washington and New York, the results of which have been to guarantee the stability of the Mexican peso and the continued purchase of Mexican silver by the American Treasury Department. Mr. Suárez, unlike many of his less fortunate predecessors, went home with a pact superficially, at least, more favorable to his country than has usually been the case in these periodic consultations with the financial overlords.

Was this happy denouement a new triumph of the good-neighbor policy over old-fashioned imperialist bullying? Such is the impression assiduously being fostered in official circles in both countries. But a closer examination of the deal, which must be made in the light of the realities of American economic domination of Mexico, reveals certain flaws in the arrangement. Approximately 75 per cent of the country's silver mines are owned by American companies, and if this country ceased to take their product, American interests would probably suffer more harm than those of Mexico.

The other half of the pact has an equally hard-headed purpose. The stability of the peso with relation to the dollar, to which it has been pegged since 1934, is vital to the United States. Foreign companies in Mexico engaged in the extraction and exportation of raw materials are naturally interested in a cheap peso, for they pay wages and other operating expenses in Mexican currency and sell their products in dollars. But this is only one aspect of the imperialist picture. American exporters, whose trade with Mexico, particularly in machinery and other capital goods, has been steadily increasing since the Mexican revival of the past few years, want a dear peso in order to maintain their present favorable position as well as to compete with the expanding German penetration of the Mexican market.

The experience of the past few years has shown that the existing exchange rate of 3.60 pesos to the dollar represents a rough equilibrium between these conflicting interests. However, the recent decline in the American price level was tending to drive the peso down in relation to the dollar, and had this process been allowed to continue, a new rate of 4 or perhaps even 4.50 pesos to the dollar, would certainly have been established, with ill effects on the American export trade as well as on the Mexican standard of living. The latter point is important as it must inevitably have produced a new wave of strikes which would have hampered the production of minerals and other raw materials vital to the armaments race.

In these circumstances it proved ordinary business common sense to protect the peso against fluctuation. There is reason to believe that the rate can be held at a fixed point with relative ease owing to its independence of the ordinary influences in the balance of trade between the two countries. Mexico's permanently "favorable" balance, which ought theoretically to produce a high exchange rate, is largely fictitious. Although Mexican imports average only about 65 per cent of its exports, the apparent balance is in reality exported from the country annually in the form of the profits of the foreign monopoly enterprises which control Mexico's oil, mining, and other industries. This condition is partially compensated by the dollars left in Mexico by American tourists, but the volume of the tourist business is insufficient to exert a marked influence on the value of the peso. Thus by keeping the peso pegged permanently to the dollar the United States gains an advantage over other countries.

It is clear that in the temporary emergency, and from a strictly capitalist point of view, Mexico has had certain advantages despite an inherently weak position. For the moment the most important question is whether the Mexican government has been adroit enough fully to exploit this momentarily privileged position or whether Finance Minister Suárez was obliged to make excessive concessions in the preliminary horse-trading.

Jackson versus Richberg

BY MARQUIS CHILDS

Washington, January 24

THE nomination of Robert H. Jackson as Solicitor General may touch off a quarrel that has been brewing here for a long time. This dispute, which has sharply divided lefts and rights within the Administration, has as its focus the Department of Justice. But it involves more or less directly future policies for the next two years and perhaps a great deal more than that. Mr. Jackson, who is Assistant Attorney General in charge of the anti-trust division, went a long way in his anti-monopoly speeches a month ago. It is inconceivable, of course, that he should have made such important utterances without the approval of the White House. But beyond doubt the initiative was his. He believes ardently in the objectives of the New Deal, and all through the fall he watched with something like despair while the gains of recent years crumbled away.

But at the same time that Mr. Jackson was inveighing against monopoly control of business Mr. Roosevelt was listening to another philosophy. From subtle persuaders he was hearing that business could not be revived under the threat of anti-trust prosecution; that only through some plan of industrial self-regulation could the present ominous trend be reversed. Foremost among these persuaders was Donald R. Richberg. As a private practitioner of the law in Washington, the former head of the NRA has attracted an imposing list of clients, including some of the largest corporations in the country. The line of reasoning that Mr. Richberg has taken with the President is resourceful. The whole nature of industry has completely changed in the past twenty years, he says. It is ridiculous to think that you can apply the anti-trust laws of another era to business today. To do so will only result in hopeless confusion and a deepening of the depression. Very cautiously, insisting that it has nothing to do with the old NRA, he approaches the general outline of a plan for self-regulation. Under such a plan industrialists would be able, with the blessing of an administrative commission to be set up outside the Department of Justice or the Federal Trade Commission, to allocate production and otherwise get around the anti-trust laws. They would be subject merely to civil and not to criminal anti-trust prosecution. This is the general idea that has been under discussion with business leaders and others at the White House.

In all this, of course, there is nothing surprising. What is surprising is that Mr. Roosevelt's Attorney General, Homer S. Cummings, is more or less in sympathy with the Richberg proposal. He is definitely not in sympathy with the opinions expressed by his assistant, Mr. Jackson. In fact, to callers he has made no secret of his annoyance and pain over Mr. Jackson's recent speeches. This difference between Mr. Cummings and the head of his anti-trust division is made even more interesting by an illuminating bit of background that involves all the principals. A month ago, while the anti-trust division was seeking a criminal indictment in federal court in Milwaukee against the big motor corporations and the companies that do their financing, the Department of Justice initiated in Washington an effort to obtain a consent decree in the case. This so angered Federal Judge Geiger that he proceeded to dismiss the grand jury, whereupon Attorney General Cummings in a letter to the House Judiciary Committee requested an investigation of Geiger's court.

While he has said nothing publicly, it is reported in Washington that Mr. Jackson was opposed to the attempt to obtain a consent decree at the same time that the case was being held before a grand jury. It happens that Mr. Richberg was counsel for two of the finance companies and two of the motor corporations, Ford and Chrysler, named in the suit. He makes no secret of his indignation at the effort to obtain criminal indictments against his clients. It is, he says, an example of what happens when business tries to plan. The motor companies were trying to reduce carrying charges and eliminate the loan sharks, and along comes the federal government with a big stick to tell them they're crooks. In his discussions with the President and the industrialists whom he has brought to the White House, Mr. Richberg has in all probability used this case as an example, for he feels very strongly about it.

Among the President's more leftish advisers there is consternation at the ease with which Mr. Richberg goes and comes at the White House. They say that he takes his clients in and out of the President's study and argues the case there. Beneath their resentment of Mr. Richberg is a very real concern that he may have persuaded Mr. Roosevelt to adopt the idea of industrial self-regulation. At his press conference last Friday the President talked about the ultimate necessity for business and labor to sit down and plan; no legislation would be required for this cooperative endeavor. It was very vague, but behind the generalizations one could discern faintly the shadow of Mr. Richberg's plan.

More than this immediate issue is likely to be involved in Mr. Jackson's confirmation. While conservative Democrats such as Senator Bailey of North Carolina are prepared to make a field day over Jackson's name, others in the Senate will take the opportunity to assail the present Attorney General's conduct of the Department of Justice. One of these is Senator Borah of Idaho, long-time foe of monopoly. The senior Senator from Idaho was incensed over the department's handling of the case against the motor finance companies. But his indignation does not stop there. Along with almost everyone else in Washington he has heard the reports of the laxness with which important matters are treated in the Department of Justice. These reports chiefly concern the way in which political lawyers have access to the Attorney General and the frequency with which they appear as representatives of large corporations having business with the department. The conspicuous example is J. Bruce Kremer, former Democratic national committeeman from Montana. One of the favorite topics of Washington speculation is the extent of Mr. Kremer's law practice.

When the President was in the West last fall, he stopped in Idaho to have a long talk with the first citizen of that state. The subject of their conversation, it is scarcely necessary to add, was monopoly and what to do about it. Concluding their talk, the President declared himself in complete agreement with the Senator from Idaho. For several months Mr. Borah has waited for some tangible move to be made in the drive against monopoly control and concentration. Now his patience has come to an end. He wants action, and if it is not forthcoming he will make a noise. One of the difficulties, of course, is that there has been no agreement on a program. The task of breaking down monopoly concentration appears at this stage so formidable that it is difficult for the New Dealers to see any approach. The decision of the jury at Madison, Wisconsin, finding the oil companies guilty of monopoly price-fixing was encouraging, particularly since the anti-trust division had been none too optimistic about the outcome of this suit. Nevertheless, it remains true that anti-monopolists in the Administration have not come to an agreement on any attack. And, by contrast, Mr. Richberg is perfectly sure of what must be done.

Those in the Administration who are most apprehensive that the President will approve some plan which will allow business to circumvent the anti-trust laws were opposed to Mr. Jackson leaving his present place at the head of the anti-trust division. It was Mr. Jackson's chief, Mr. Cummings, who recommended that he be rewarded for his labors by elevation to the post of Solicitor General, left vacant when Stanley Reed was named to the Supreme Court. What it amounts to is another move up on the political escalator, with the New York governorship on the next landing, and after that perhaps the Presidency.

If all goes smoothly and the threatened quarrel in the Senate fails to materialize or dwindles into a mild flurry of oratory, then all will be quiet in the Department of Justice. The left wingers have their own candidate to succeed Mr. Jackson, but they have no real hope that he will be chosen. While he will nominally remain in the department, Mr. Jackson will be so absorbed with his duties as Solicitor General that he will have little time to give to anti-trust policies. The prospect for the moment, therefore, is not a cheerful one for those who want Mr. Roosevelt to go after monopoly concentration. It is a fairly safe bet, however, that if the facts about the Department of Justice do not come out at this time, they will come out at a later date, and they will look no better for having aged.

Spiking Japan's Guns

BY T. A. BISSON

ACROSS the field of Japanese conquest in North China falls the shadow of the Eighth Route Army. This force is commanded by leaders whose names became a legendary byword in the Chinese countryside during their ten years of warfare with the Nanking government. The healing of the split between these bitter opponents in the late spring of 1937 symbolized China's determination to present a united front to the invader. It was the climax of a rapid sweep toward political unification. Within a single year the Kwangtung armies, the able leaders of Kwangsi province, the northeastern troops of General Chang Hsueh-liang, and the motley forces of Szechuan province had successively accepted the centralized military control of the Nanking authorities. For the first time since the establishment of the Chinese Republic in 1911, national unity was emerging from the mists of unreality into the realm of fact. It came none too soon. The last details of the Kuomintang-Communist rapprochement were still being worked out when Japan's war machine launched the most determined and ruthless of its long series of unjustifiable aggressions in China.

Before Japan's full forces had been landed in North China, the Eighth Route Army had become an integral part of the Chinese national forces and had established complete liaison with the central military authorities at Nanking. Its divisions of seasoned regulars, roughly 100,000 strong, had been transferred to the mountainous regions of northern Shansi, the strategic center of North China. All observers, both Chinese and foreign, testify that the stiffest resistance encountered by the Japanese expeditionary forces in the five northern provinces was in the area lying between Tatung and Taiyuan in northern Shansi. This statement is not intended to belittle the morale or fighting ability of the other Chinese armies which participated in the North China campaign. The odds against these troops, especially when they operated in the open plain, were too great to be overcome.

For the Japanese push south of Peiping and Tientsin in Hopei province, which began on September 10, the invaders mobilized some 300,000 troops and lavishly supplied them with mechanical equipment, including more than 100 bombing and pursuit planes. A month was spent in preparations for the drive. In early September, while traveling from Tientsin to Peiping, I watched Japanese munition and food trains being unloaded at the intermediate stations and their stocks added to the mountainous piles of crates, boxes, bags, and baskets of all kinds stacked along the platforms. Against the weight of such an offensive, backed by methodical preparation for every eventuality, even the best Chinese force would have been at a hopeless disadvantage. As it was, the Chinese commanders on this front made no effort to overcome their mechanical inferiority by resort to mobile warfare or attacks on the Japanese lines of communication. The intrenched armies, lacking adequate artillery and without a single war plane, waited almost fatalistically for the attack. When it came, the center of the Chinese front collapsed and both wings were rolled up. Blasted from their prepared positions and mercilessly bombed during their retreat, the fleeing troops were never able to consolidate their secondary defense lines. By mid-October the Japanese army had moved past Paotingfu and occupied Shihchiachuang, junction of a railway line running west into Shansi province from the Peiping-Hankow Railway. The occupation of this strategic junction point later proved of inestimable value to the hard-pressed Japanese forces in northern Shansi.

PUBL LIBRAR
Burlingame, Cal

In this province the scheduled plan of Japanese operations was rudely upset by the desperate resistance of the Eighth Route Army. The details of the campaign, which was covered by none of the foreign correspondents, were virtually unreported during October, in which month some of the severest engagements were fought along the passes through the mountain barrier. Not until December did the correspondents in Peiping begin to piece together, from reports of missionaries and information gathered by the foreign military attachés, the full story of these operations.

Japanese forces entering the northern provinces from Manchuria had gained control of Kalgan, capital of Chahar, in August, after two weeks of severe fighting at Nankow Pass. Advancing southwest along the Peiping-Suiyuan Railway, they had then entered Shansi and occupied the important city of Tatung. By the middle of September they had left the railway and taken Huaijen, some fifty miles farther south. The mountain passes along the Great Wall in northern Shansi were before them.

Here the Japanese troops were split into three or four columns which attempted to force their way southward through the passes, of which Pinghsiangkuan, Juyuehkou, and Yenmenkuan were the most important. Sections of the Eighth Route Army had taken a position in all these passes. Early in October the former Communist forces isolated a full division of Japanese troops in a narrow defile at Pinghsiangkuan, the easternmost pass, and cut them to pieces. At about the same time, however, another invading column broke through at Juyuehkou and debouched into more open country at Fanchih and Taichow. Large Japanese reinforcements also increased the pressure at Pinghsiangkuan and finally forced the pass, whereupon a considerable portion of the Eighth Army fell back to Wutai and the Hsinkou range, covering the approach to Taiyuan. During these operations the Eighth Army leaders refused to be drawn into a positional battle in which they might have been destroyed by the bombing planes and superior artillery of the Japanese. The Japanese force which first broke through at Juyuehkou totaled about 50,000 troops; it was surrounded by overwhelmingly larger Chinese armies to the south of Taichow and for a time was in desperate straits. Even with the reinforcements which came to its support, bringing the combined Japanese forces to 100,000 or 150,000, it was unable to break the Chinese resistance which developed along the Hsinkou range. From the middle of October to the end of the first week in November the Japanese troops which had penetrated the northern passes were held up north of Taiyuan. Sections of the Eighth Route Army, still operating in the passes, completely disrupted the supply lines of the invaders and made it impossible for all except large and heavily mechanized detachments to advance south from Tatung.

But the occupation of Shihchiachuang by the main Japanese forces in mid-October provided the high command with a new line of advance into Shansi along the Chengtai Railway to Taiyuan. By the end of the first week in November a force detached from the army operating on this line was approaching the outskirts of Taiyuan. Thus taken from the rear, the Chinese defense along the Hsinkou range was compelled to fall back, and Japanese troops entered Taiyuan on November 9.

Weighing the results of the campaign, the Japanese army command could find little cause for self-congratulation. The task of conquering northern Shansi, originally intrusted to several relatively small Japanese columns, had eventually required an army of between 200,000 and 300,000 men. After the fall of Taiyuan a good portion of this force was required to hold the gains already achieved. There was no question of occupying more territory. At the beginning of December the city of Fenchow, distant only about eighty miles from Taiyuan on a good motor highway, was still held by Chinese troops. The Eighth Route Army ranged across the Japanese line of communications from Tatung to Taiyuan, rendering it useless as a supply line.

General Chu Teh, commander-in-chief of the Eighth Route Army, on the basis of these first clashes with Japan's war machine, formed certain preliminary judgments which reveal his coolly calculating temper. The Japanese, he remarked in an interview with a newspaper correspondent, had superior arms and used them well; they could act according to their plans and keep their plans secret; they did not surrender their guns but fought until killed, mainly because they feared death if taken captive; they could retreat and bring in reinforcements more quickly than the Chinese. On the other hand, the war spirit among the rank and file was low; the Japanese soldiers did not like to build defense works; they feared hand-to-hand battles; and their intelligence service worked slowly. He pointed out that most of the Japanese killed had fallen in hand-to-hand combat; hand grenades accounted for the second largest number. At Yenmenkuan on October 18 the Eighth Army had attacked the Japanese air field; using hand grenades it had destroyed twenty-one Japanese planes, leaving only three on the field before it retreated.

The severe losses inflicted on the Japanese army during this campaign, no less than the protracted character of the campaign and the number of troops required for the capture of Taiyuan, demonstrated the efficacy of the guerrilla warfare advocated by the Chinese Communist leaders. The formal conclusion of the campaign has left the Japanese command with a military problem scarcely less serious than the one it faced at the outset of its operations. Its chief opponent, the Eighth Route Army, by avoiding positional battles, has emerged virtually intact to continue the struggle. The Eighth Army's war base in the mountains of northern Shansi is the most important strategic area in the whole of North China. As long as the Chinese forces led by Chu Teh and his associates can operate in this region, the consolidation and pacification of Japan's conquests in the northern provinces will be a long-drawn-out and inconclusive affair, engaging the efforts of large and expensive armies of occupation. From northern Shansi the Eighth Route Army can send raiding detachments into the provinces of Suiyuan, Chahar, and Hopei to harry all the main Japanese lines of communication in these provinces. As already noted, the Japanese command has thus far been unable to establish a regular supply line from Tatung to Taiyuan. Recent dispatches indicate that serious guerrilla attacks have developed along the Chengtai Railway, running from Shihchiachuang to Taiyuan through the Niangtsekuan passes. In the middle of January a severe Japanese reverse at the hands of the Eighth Route Army was reported a few miles south of Taiyuan.

Of basic importance is the fact that the population of this whole area has been opened to the organizational efforts of the Eighth Army, which for the past ten years has been demonstrating the extraordinary military potentialities of the Chinese masses when properly led. Paradoxically, the Japanese invasion, which claims to be saving China from bolshevism, has enabled the Communist leaders to exercise their talents for making effective soldiers of workers and peasants in a larger area than they had ever dreamed of. Japanese excesses in the countryside, reported in Peiping by a succession of eyewitnesses, may be counted upon to win for the Eighth Army sympathy and support. Many observers felt that the Kuomintang-Communist agreement of last spring, which restricted the red forces to the comparatively poor Shensi-Kansu-Ninghsia districts, would eventually bring about the decline and disintegration of the Chinese Communist movement. Japan's invasion of North China has completely altered the situation. The Eighth Army has now a large and fertile field in which to foster its program and policies.

The extent to which its efforts have already achieved success is indicated by the testimony of missionaries and other foreign observers from the interior of Hopei province. North Shansi, by virtue of its geographical position, dominates the greater part of the Hopei plain south of Peiping. The mountain ranges extending from Shansi into western Hopei offer excellent cover for military forces entering this region, especially if they possess the confidence of the Chinese peasants. At the beginning of the war the Eighth Army leaders sent upward of 10,000 regulars into this area. This force later split up into numerous bands which, accompanied by experienced organizers, scattered across western Hopei with the object of establishing friendly contacts with the villagers. These units have been reorganizing remnants of defeated Chinese troops, collecting all available arms and ammunition, and organizing new peasant guerrilla forces. A recent estimate by Agnes Smedley places the total of new guerrilla detachments thus organized in Shansi, Hopei, and Suiyuan at 100,000. At present these detachments are poorly armed, but past experience suggests that the

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Eighth Army leaders may rapidly overcome this deficiency with captured Japanese equipment. Chu Teh declared in the interview referred to above that in many units only fifteen or twenty out of a hundred men possessed rifles, the rest being armed with hand grenades. On the leadership and morale of guerrilla troops depends much of their effectiveness. Chu Teh claimed that with all the hand-to-hand fighting of the Eighth Route Army the Japanese had not captured a man.

Eighth Army units in Hopei province are fighting as well as organizing. In Peiping during the last two weeks of November we heard of from sixteen to twenty attacks on Japanese detachments along the Peiping-Hankow Railway from Peiping to the Honan border. Only heavily armed Japanese detachments, usually escorted by airplanes, dared to venture into the interior of Hopei. Actual Japanese military control embraced but a narrow strip of approximately five miles on either side of the railway, with somewhat larger areas around the more important cities, such as Paotingfu. East of the Peiping-Hankow Railway the countryside was still controlled by remnants of the Chinese divisions which had been swept aside in the big September push. In this area at the beginning of December the Japanese command was still unable to utilize the highway from Tientsin to Paotingfu as a regular supply line. Current reports show raiding activities have extended to the outskirts of Peiping and Tientsin.

The facts thus briefly outlined do not mean that the Japanese military position in North China is untenable, or that Japan's armed forces are likely to be driven out of the northern provinces in the near future. They do mean that the Japanese command is faced with a military problem of large dimensions, which will continue to require an expensive army of occupation for many years to come. The "pacification" of North China, certainly of any considerable section of the interior, will not be accomplished unless the Eighth Route Army is completely annihilated. Failing this, from fifteen to twenty divisions of Japanese troops will be required to maintain control of the lines of railway communication in the northern provinces. And the problem may become steadily more serious if the Eighth Army is able to complete its organization of the peasants in the areas off the railway lines. The present guerrilla operations, it is important to note, are being carried on during the winter months, when the grain has been cut and cover is meager—a season when the armed Manchurian volunteers are normally driven into the most inaccessible areas of the northeastern provinces. The campaign, in other words, has got off to an early start. Consisting of an initial force of 100,000 troops seasoned by a decade of mobile warfare under the most difficult circumstances, and led by experienced commanders, the Eighth Army will almost certainly carry on a wasting conflict which will try Japanese nerves to the utmost. The Communist leaders are convinced that China, because of its semi-colonial status and backward technique, cannot defeat Japan by the orthodox methods of modern warfare. Chu Teh made this point to me, during an interview last June, in these succinct sentences: "China must depend on its peasant and worker strength if it is to fight Japan victoriously. For China this war must be a totalitarian war. Even all of our four hundred millions are not quite enough."

Laughter in Madrid

BY LANGSTON HUGHES

Madrid, December 15

THE thing about living in Madrid these days is that you never know when a shell is going to fall. Or where. Any time is firing time for Franco. Imagine yourself sitting calmly in the front room of your third-floor apartment carefully polishing your eyeglasses when all of a sudden, without the least warning, a shell decides to come through the wall—paying no attention to the open window—and explodes like a thunderclap beneath the sofa. If you are sitting on the sofa, you are out of luck. If you are at the other side of the room and good at dodging shrapnel you may not be killed. Maybe nobody will even be injured in your apartment. Perhaps the shell will simply go on through the floor and kill somebody else in apartment 27, downstairs. (People across the hall have been killed.)

Who next? Where? When? Today all the shells may fall in the Puerta del Sol. Tomorrow Franco's big guns on the hills outside Madrid may decide to change their range-finders and bombard the city fan-wise, sending quince-y-medios from one side of the town to the other. No matter in what section of the city you live, a shell may land in the kitchen of the sixth-floor apartment (whose inhabitants you've often passed on the stairs), penetrate several floors, and make its way to the street via your front room on the third floor.

That explains why practically nobody in Madrid bothers to move when the big guns are heard. If you move, you may as likely as not move into the wrong place. A few days ago four shells went through the walls of the Hotel Florida, making twenty that have fallen there. The entrance to the hotel is well protected with sandbags, but they couldn't sandbag nine stories. All this the desk clerk carefully explains to guests who wish to register. But most of the other hotels have been severely bombed, too. And one has to stay somewhere.

The Hotel Alfonso a few blocks away has several large holes through each of its four walls but is still receiving guests. One of the halls on an upper floor leads straight out into space—door and balcony have been shot away. In one of the unused bedrooms you can look slantingly down three floors into the street through the holes made by a shell that struck the roof and plowed its way down, then out by a side wall into the road. Walking up to your room, you pass a point where the marble stairs are splintered and the wall pitted by scraps of iron; here two people were killed. Yet the Hotel Alfonso maintains its staff, and those of its rooms that still have walls and windows are occupied by paying guests.

The now world-famous Telefonica, Madrid's riddled skyscraper in the center of the city, is still standing, proud but ragged, its telephone girls at work inside. The Madrid Post Office has no window-panes left whatsoever, but the mail still goes out. Around the Cibeles Fountain in front of the Post Office the street cars still pass, although the fountain itself with its lovely goddess is now concealed by a specially built housing of bricks and sandbags, so that the good-natured Madrileños have nicknamed it "Beauty Under Covers," laughing at their own wit.

Yes, people still laugh in Madrid. In this astonishing city of bravery and death, where the houses run right up to the trenches and some of the street-car lines stop only at the barricades, people still laugh, children play in the streets, and men buy comic papers as well as war news. The shell holes of the night before are often filled in by dawn, so efficient is the wrecking service and so valiantly do the Madrileños struggle to patch up their city.

A million people living on the front lines of a nation at war! The citizens of Madrid—what are they like? Not long ago a small shell fell in the study of a bearded professor of ancient languages. Frantically his wife and daughter came running to see if anything had happened to him. They found him standing in the center of the floor, holding the shell and shaking his head quizzically. "This little thing," he said, "this inanimate object, can't do us much damage. It's the philosophy that lies behind it, wife, the philosophy that lies behind it."

In the Arguelles quarter to the north, nearest to the rebel lines—the neighborhood that has suffered most from bombardments and air raids—many of the taller apartment houses, conspicuous targets that they are, have been abandoned. But in the smaller houses of one and two stories people still live and go about their tasks. The Cuban poet, Alejo Carpentier, told me that one morning after a heavy shelling he passed a house of which part of the front wall was lying in the yard. A shell had passed through the roof, torn away part of the wall, carried with it the top of the family piano, and buried itself in the garden. Nevertheless, there at the piano sat the young daughter of the house, very clean and starched, her hair brushed and braided, her face shining. Diligently she was beating out a little waltz from a music book in front of her. The fact that the top of the piano had been shot away in the night did not seem to affect the chords. When passers-by asked about it, calling through the shell hole, the child said, "Yes, an obús came right through here last night. I'm going to help clean up the yard after a while, but I have to practice my lessons now. My music teacher'll be here at eleven."

The will to live and laugh in Madrid is the thing that constantly amazes a stranger. At the house where I am staying, sometimes a meal consists largely of bread and of soup made with bread. Everybody tightens his belt and grins, and somebody is sure to repeat good-naturedly an old Spanish saying, "Bread with bread—food for fools!" Then we all laugh.

One of Franco's ways of getting back at Madrid is to broadcast daily from his radio stations at Burgos and Seville the luncheon and dinner menus of the big hotels, the fine food that the Fascists are eating and the excellent wines they drink. (Rioja and the best of wine areas are in Fascist hands.) But Madrid has ways of getting even with the Fascists, too. Mola, a lover of cafes, said at the very beginning of the war that he would soon be drinking coffee in Madrid. He was mistaken. Then he said he would enter Madrid by the first of November. He didn't. Then he swore he would enter the city on the eighth of December. He didn't. But on the evening of the eighth some wag remembered, and the crowds passing that night in Madrid's darkened Puerta del Sol saw by moonlight in the very center of the square a coffee table, carefully set, the coffee poured, and neatly pinned to the white cloth a large sign reading "For Mola."

Bread and coffee are scarce in Madrid, and so are cigarettes. The only cigarettes offered for sale more or less regularly are small, hard, and very bad. They are so bad that though they cost thirty centimos before the war they bring only twenty now despite their comparative scarcity. The soldiers call them "recruit-killers," jocularly asserting that they are as dangerous to the new men in the army as are bombs and bullets.

Bad cigarettes, poor wine, little bread, no soap, no sugar! Madrid, dressed in bravery and laughter; knowing death and the sound of guns by day and night, but resolved to live, not die!

The moving-picture theaters are crowded. Opening late in the afternoon and compelled to close at nine, they give only one or two showings a day. One evening an audience was following with great interest an American film. Suddenly an obús fell in the street outside. There was a tremendous detonation, but nobody moved from his seat. The film went on. Soon another fell, nearer and louder than before, shaking the whole building. The manager went out into the lobby and looked up and down the Gran Via. Overhead he heard the whine of shells. He went inside and mounted the stage to say that, in view of the shelling, he thought it best to stop the picture. Before he had got the words out of his mouth he was greeted with such a hissing and booing and stamping of feet and calls for the show to go on that he shrugged his shoulders in resignation and signaled the operator to continue. The house was darkened. The magic of Hollywood resumed its spell. While Franco's shells whistled dangerously over the theater, the film went its make-believe way to a thrilling denouement. The picture was called "Terror in Chicago."

My Clash with LaGuardia

BY LANGDON POST

PUBLIC housing has become a reality. It has emerged from the realm of debate, oratory, surveys, and statistics. The federal government will now enter into annual subsidy agreements with local housing authorities and in three years will have lent 500 million dollars; this sum may even be increased by Congress before the three-year period expires. In other words, slum clearance and the building of low-rent housing accommodations are now on their way.

The baldness of this statement gives no measure of the importance or the implications of the change. Heretofore the crusaders, the so-called long-haired reformers, social workers, and idealists, have usurped the field of public housing. Now, we are told, we must turn it over to the practical men, for they are the men who built this great nation. This may be so, but I for one believe the dreamers did it—yes, even the star gazers. I do not wish to impugn the ability or the integrity of the practical man, but if he is the man who built our cities in the past, then I look with some trepidation on his entrance into the field of public housing, for any student of the growth of cities in this country will agree that it represents the ultimate in economic stupidity, social blindness, and human greed.

I wonder if this demand for the entrance of the practical man into the field is not possibly the beginning of the exploitation of the 500 million dollars waiting in Washington to be spent. Until the present there has been no money in public housing and little political preferment to be gained by espousing it. Now the picture is different, for a large housing program benefits not only the slum dwellers who are to be the tenants but all of business; and I will say for the average American business man, if he sometimes shows a lack of intelligence and foresight, his faculty for seizing an opportunity is developed to a high degree. And not only is money to be made in public housing today, but also great political advantage is to be gained, for it will be without question one of the greatest social movements of the next two generations.

This means that the degree of independence of the local housing authorities which are going to be responsible for spending this money—the United States government merely acts as banker—must be determined at once. The issue was raised recently in New York City in a controversy between Mayor LaGuardia and myself as chairman of the Housing Authority, and I wish to set forth as dispassionately as possible the two points of view out of which the controversy grew.

So-called "authorities" have been created by government in the past for the purpose of borrowing money and constructing and operating large public properties without pledging the public credit. Until now their use has been confined to very restricted activities—the building and operating of vehicular tunnels, bridges, sewers, drainage systems, and the like. With the creation of housing authorities, however, this new instrument of government enters upon activities which affect vitally the lives of many millions of persons. Housing is not just a matter for the engineer, the architect, and the accountant; it demands of those at its head the highest degree of political acumen and integrity. Housing is in politics.

I wish to give Mayor LaGuardia's point of view as fairly and as accurately as possible, as I have learned it from several talks with him on this most important matter. The Mayor fully realizes the implications and dangers inherent in an "authority" in this new field. He already has a number of local authorities to deal with—the Triborough Bridge, the Henry Hudson Bridge, the East River Tunnel, and the New York City Housing Authority. As mayor of the city he naturally feels that the responsibility for all governmental activities rests on his shoulders. He feels that if these various authorities, particularly the Housing Authority, have too great a degree of independence, he will be placed in the position of having a responsibility without the power to discharge it. There is, it must be admitted, some justification for this view.

However, let us look at the other side of the picture. So long as authorities were restricted to a very limited field the question of their independence did not arise. But when the problem of housing thousands of people is to be put in the hands of an authority, it becomes immediately apparent that the degree of its independence is of paramount importance and that any legislation creating such a body must contain more than merely machinery for borrowing money without pledging public credit.

I was among those who helped draft the New York State legislation creating housing authorities. During the two months we worked at it the most important subject of controversy was not the independence of the authorities, for that was never questioned, but the degree of independence. It must be remembered that we had been living for many years under the rule of Tammany Hall, and no one believed for a minute that the authority should be purely a city department subject to the termination of administrations and the will of the mayor. Some advocated giving as little control to the local government as possible—by allowing the mayor to appoint only part of the members, by requiring that appointment of all members should be subject to the approval of the State Housing Board, or by bringing all the activities of authorities under state jurisdiction. These more radical attempts to insure the independence of local authorities were defeated, but the bill as passed expressed the intent and spirit of those who sponsored it—namely, that the local housing authorities should have the greatest degree of independence consonant with the spirit of home rule and the need for municipal cooperation. The mayor was given the right to appoint all the members, but the terms of office were so staggered that, after the first appointments were made, the membership could never be completely changed in any one administration. It was only through an accident of circumstances—resignations and failure to fill vacancies—that Mayor LaGuardia found himself recently in a position to overturn the membership and thus change the policies of the New York City Housing Authority. The members were to serve without pay, and after the appointment of the first chairman by the mayor the authority was to elect its own chairman. These are sufficient examples of the intent and spirit of the law. The laws in other states were all drawn with the same purpose. In fact, in many states independence of the chief executive of the city is even more completely assured. In Pennsylvania and Ohio, for instance, the mayor is given the power of appointment of only some of the members of the authority; in Illinois the State Housing Board must approve the mayor's appointments.

It is clear then that the independence of local authorities was fundamental in the original conception. Sufficient justification for this view is to be found in the bitter experience of corrupt and devious municipal politics. I am sure that if Mayor LaGuardia thought the old Tammany methods of governing the city of New York were likely to return, he also would like to see an independent authority. But there are other reasons which have nothing to do with graft and corruption and which are equally important.

First, private capital must eventually be induced to consider public housing a field for investment. There is absolutely no reason why it should not and there is every reason why it should. Once the public-housing movement is established, and completed developments have been put in operation, I am convinced that it will open a field for investment that will equal if not surpass other investment fields of a public or semi-public character, such as railroads, public utilities, shipping, and the like. But will private capital invest in the bonds of local authorities which are subject to the domination of any particular local administration? Private capital demands first of all to be assured of the stability and continuity of the agency in which it is to invest. One of the reasons that private capital hesitates at this time is the fear that public housing will be subjected to all the uncertainties of politics. It must be remembered that the city's credit is not pledged as security for Housing Authority bonds.

Second, the independence of the authority is vital if the people living in the slums, from whom tenants will be selected, are to place confidence in it. The last four years have proved conclusively to me that the majority of people living in the slums still think it is necessary to have "political pull" in order to get into a development. For this reason many of them do not even take the trouble to apply. The New York City Housing Authority has made every effort to prove its impartiality in choosing tenants, but has not yet achieved its objective completely. Another problem is that of the relationship between tenant and management—in government housing a very delicate and highly explosive thing. There has not yet been sufficient public housing in this country to enable any definite conclusions to be drawn, but I am convinced from my experience in the New York Housing Authority that the success of tenant relationship depends almost entirely upon the degree of confidence which the tenants place in the authority. If the tenants once begin to think that decisions and policies of the authority can be changed or reversed by means of pressure brought to bear on outside officials, particularly the mayor, the authority will completely lose its grip and management will become impossible.

Third, in the selection of sites lie vast possibilities of graft and corruption. One only has to go through the files in the New York City Housing Authority to see the amount of influence that has been used by various persons, groups, and interests to have projects located in certain sections of the city. The local authority must have a program to which it strictly adheres if it is to attain its true objectives of large-scale slum clearance and low-rent housing. Pressure from whatever source must be resolutely resisted. If members are subject to immediate control and removal, this becomes almost impossible.

Other arguments exist for the independence of housing authorities, but these are basic and upon them rests the reason for the unanimity on this point of every housing law in the country. Mayor LaGuardia, in taking advantage of a series of circumstances which placed him in a position to overthrow the entire policy of the New York City Housing Authority and in publicly stating that if the members did not do as he told them he would get a new board, certainly violated the intent of the law. If he wishes to question the wisdom of this intent, that is his right as a human being; if he wishes to attempt to change it on the statute books, that is a right given him by the laws of a democratic country; but if he wishes to change it by indirection or nullify it by direct action, that is a right which should be denied him. This may well become an important issue in the future. It must be decided in the democratic manner.

In making my defense of the independence of housing authorities I do not wish to leave the impression that I believe they should sit on Olympian heights, protected and isolated from public opinion or political thought. That would be absurd, for without the cooperation, sympathy, and help of the local administration a housing authority would find it difficult, if not impossible, to carry on its work. These two agencies of government must feel mutual respect and share a determination to accomplish their common objectives.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

AT THE risk of being charged with having sold out to the power companies, I wish to state my approval of Wendell Willkie's final stand in the conflict which has arisen between the government and the Commonwealth and Southern system, of which Mr. Willkie is the head. His offer to sell the corporation to the government at a just price to be fixed by a committee of three—one to be appointed by the President, one by the Supreme Court, and one by the company—seems to me eminently fair and wise. It certainly did not call for Mr. Lilienthal's response that the TVA would not pay for watered stock or "write-ups"; when Mr. Willkie offered to put the fate of the stockholders in the hands of a committee on which the government had two out of three representatives, he plainly showed his readiness to accept its decision as to what constitutes a fair valuation.

It also seems to me that Mr. Willkie's argument that his company could not go on if it were deprived of the large cities in which it operates by the creation of municipal plants is unanswerable. One of the highest officials in the Administration assured me a year ago that he considered the problem of how to deal justly with the power companies insoluble, for if the cities bought out the Commonwealth and Southern plants, the company could certainly not continue to operate its power lines or to light the small towns, villages, and farms which it often supplies with current at a loss or with little or no profit. This official saw no solution because he had not considered that the government might purchase the Commonwealth and Southern properties. Now the Administration must face the issue.

Personally I feel that the capital in the Commonwealth and Southern should not be ruthlessly destroyed; that the company should not be robbed of its city units and then have to junk the remainder of its properties; that there should be decent and just consideration of the 200,000 innocent investors whose money is in the enterprise. That does not mean that I wish the government to pay for watered stock and unfair write-ups. Of course not. It is quite probable that the stockholders will lose some of their investment if there is watered stock; they will have to pay then, as so many others have paid before them, for the misdeeds or the errors of judgment of the company managers to whom they intrusted their money. But it is surely vital that in dealing with the Commonwealth and Southern the government should set a standard of absolute probity and justice, whatever sins may be laid at Mr. Willkie's door, if only because this purchase of the Commonwealth and Southern system will be the forerunner of many similar acquisitions by the government.

Hard on top of Mr. Willkie's offer to sell out to the TVA comes the demand of the Governor of Pennsylvania that the federal government acquire the hard-coal industry in his state. This, too, is an event of extraordinary significance. Together, they prove the breakdown of the attempted regulation of the coal industry and of the electric utilities. All during my editorship of The Nation, from 1918 to 1934, I held that economic evolution and the impending collapse of the basic industries under private ownership and unlimited competition must inevitably result in government ownership. The situation of the coal industry of Pennsylvania is no different from that of West Virginia, Colorado, and other states. For years labor has been underpaid and penalized by long periods of no work, while at the same time investors have not been able to get a fair return on their investment. Conditions have been chaotic; even the attempted regulation under federal control offered little hope of improvement. So it has been absolutely certain that the day would come when all concerned would ask the government to take over.

Today the railroads are within sight of the same decision. They cannot go on as they have been going; they cannot continue to finance themselves; the evil results of Wall Street banker control and management are clear and undeniable. Senator Wheeler has been doing yeoman's work in bringing out the facts through the hearings of the Senate committee which has been investigating the railroad situation. The waste and extravagance, the huge profits made by bankers, especially in the reorganizations, and the absence of any attempt to reduce capital structures are all there. The railroads see only one way out—higher freight rates. But higher rates choke industry and are immediately another obstacle to the return of prosperity. Meanwhile the equipment is rapidly deteriorating and cannot be replaced. The answer is the purchase by the government of all the lines, with the resultant tremendous savings due to consolidations, joint terminals and purchases, the ending of needless competition. The government should not operate the roads directly through a Washington bureau; there should be a single operating company, as in the case of the government's Mississippi Barge Company, directed by a board comprising representatives of the government, the traveling public, the shippers, and the employees. Finally, I would point out that the oil industry is now so completely regulated by state and federal authorities that the next step there will be government ownership. It is badly needed to conserve this precious national resource, now somewhat controlled and regulated by the states and the federal government.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE PLEASURES OF LITERATURE

BY A BOOKLOVER

WITH how sure an expectation of solace, amid the turmoil and perplexities of our time, I turn, when the fires of evening are lit, to my silent companions of the library! Here the din of the city dies away; here the feverish antagonisms of men reveal themselves sub specie aeternitatis. Here may I be rapt as by a magic carpet to those miraculous isles of Greece—"lily on lily, that o'erlace the sea"—to journey with the returning Ulysses among the terrors, the perils, the enchantments of Homer's golden day; or I may bid imagination run riot with Shakespeare and his carnival fellows of the spacious days of great Elizabeth, assuming the motley of their bawdy humors, the purple of their splendid passions, the mourning of their fantastic revenges; or I may prowl with Dickens or Balzac among the mysteries of the dark modern cities or lurch with George Borrow along the hedgerows; or I may revel in the thousand and one tales, more enthralling than the "Arabian Nights," of Voragine's "Golden Legend," Vasari's "Lives of the Painters," or Havelock Ellis's "Psychology of Sex."

What a sovereign remedy is a book for the distempers both of the mind and of the body! How it protects us against sordidness and boredom! Shall I ever forget the exquisite delights of my first perusal of Congreve's plays, as I rode back and forth on the elevated, the subway, or the electric car, during my period of apprenticeship as a reporter on one of our great metropolitan dailies—an exercise which, I like to believe, had the effect of guaranteeing my style against the contagion of newspaper writing? Or the ecstasy of my discovery at college, and at almost the same moment, of Dante, the greatest poet, and Plato, the greatest proseman, of all time?—how, cycling alone in the Princeton lanes, leafy and fragrant with May, I would declaim the ringing tercets of the former!—how, to the flutter of the pages of the lexicon, the paragraphs of the "Phaedo" or the "Symposium" would commence to grow incandescent with a radiance which seemed steadily to glow more brightly, till the radiance of morning herself made luminous the Jersey murk!

With what relish—nay, what appetite of one famished!—I consumed the only book I read at Plattsburg, Anatole France's "Thaïs"—the enjoyment of which and of the bottles of cold milk we used to drink after our parching summer marches and of my conversations with Charles R. Walker, then at the peak of his early brilliance, is my only agreeable memory of an experience which convinced me definitely that, though I might perhaps do something with literature, I should never be a success as a soldier. How Michelet's "History of France" peopled the hills and the fields of Lorraine with the armies of Charles the Bold as I plodded among them in khaki—and made them seem so eroded and worn out, so tempered and yet so blighted, by that history of traditional quarrels which was still going on at the time and in which I found myself reluctantly involved that I felt powerfully the advantages of America, where we were not worried by history so much. And I carried the thick octavos of Renan all the way to German Trier after the Armistice, considerably encumbering my pack and seriously hampering my movements, but maintaining uninterrupted my access to an admirable spirit, international, critical, and humane, at a time when the qualities he represented were by no means in evidence either among his countrymen or in the nation which he more or less regarded as his intellectual fatherland.

And how much I enjoyed a few evenings ago reading "Le Neveu de Rameau" in bed, and how I expect to enjoy this evening reading the articles in the Encyclopaedia Britannica on Zionism, Hölderlin, and Peter the Great, which will enable me to fall asleep the wiser!

Indispensable books! Alternative worlds, where all discords are finally resolved, if not by philosophy, then by art—how should we live in this other world without you? Mary Colum is right when she says that one of the most terrible wounds which have been dealt the human spirit by dictatorship is its constriction of the dream life of humanity. For how can the edifices of statesmanship flourish where the constructions of art are forbidden?

At least that is the way I am getting to feel as I read the current discussions of literature in the more serious-minded reviews. They are driving me right back into the arms of Charles Lamb, John Addington Symonds, and Walter Pater: old duffers whom addiction to literature had rendered a little goofy but who did promote the appreciation of books.

In my youth we used to read James Huneker, who, chaotic and careless though he was, got you steamed up to read authors worth reading. Later on we read T. S. Eliot, who, though as sober as Huneker was boisterous, still stimulated the appetite for poetry and made the poets seem full of exciting surprises.

But Eliot's criticism was completely non-historical. He seemed to behold the literature of the ages abstracted from time and space and spread before him in one great exhibit, of which he conducted a comparative appraisal. This was of course an intellectual triumph, and his criticism had its enormous value; but it was a feat which could only be performed at the cost of detaching books from all the other affairs of human life; and the author of this complaint at that time used to urge the practitioners of literature to interest themselves in the development of society and in the larger events of the world—as most great literature, after all, had done. Even the non-moral and non-doctrinal Shakespeare, whose detachment seems so bafflingly consummate, presents issues—as Orson Welles's "Julius Caesar" has recently emphasized—of which, if you had read only Eliot on Shakespeare, you would have been given no intimation.

The depression did compel the writers to pay attention to the "social significance" of poems, novels, and plays; and in time this became an obsession. Today one is confronted by the spectacle of a philosophico-social criticism of a character purely analytical, which almost invariably comes to negative conclusions, and a politico-social criticism which, without making even the attempt of the other to ascertain the significance of the writer in the bigger historical frame, limits itself to giving him a high grade or a low grade corresponding to the degree of his readiness to subscribe to the slogans of some political faction.

The young, usually subject to exaggerated enthusiasms, are today not enthusiastic at all—not enthusiastic, that is, about books: they merely approve when the book suits their politics. But, seriously, I think it is a pity that they do not learn to read for pleasure. They may presently find that an acquaintance with the great works of art and thought is their only real insurance against the increasing barbarism of the time.

Back to the eager appetites of the Renaissance! Back to the "best that has been thought and felt in the world!" Back to John Keats first looking into Chapman's Homer! Back to Karl Marx reading Aeschylus through every year!

EDMUND WILSON
(Not Christopher Morley)

Fallow Land

BY EUNICE CLARK

Fallow land, how low the crows fly!

A lady of the house remembers amour;
The phlox survives, but hay runs thin where there
Birnam Wood crosses the pasture bars.

There shall be murder tonight in Pittsburgh!
But here are rainsore roofs, here tools unsoldered,
Vines over the windows, and bitterly
The rust assaulting and impertinent birds.

Choice fruit and eggs we used to send;
(the graveyard needs repair, the tombstones topple)
What are they eating now, the city people?
Kneel down, lady of the house, and pray.
Close over, forest. Fallow land, avenge
Her memories,
low-flying crows.

Revolution in Wonderland

THE WILD GOOSE CHASE. By Rex Warner. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

POEMS. By Rex Warner. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THE writer who undertakes to express his ideas in the form of an allegory has chosen a difficult vehicle for them. The allegory is closely related to the parable, and the parable's purpose is to make a set of ideas more plain by exposing them through an unexpected set of images. Through this displacement reality must be rendered more, not less, clearly: it should not be distorted by the shift. Fantasy (the literary form) must be firmly based on the fact, and it must develop logically within itself. The joy given to the reader by "Gulliver" arises from things happening credibly in strange situations. "Yes, it would be like that!" is the response given, quite as much to the good sense and practical suggestions as to the imagination displayed by Swift.

It would be kind to call "The Wild Goose Chase" an extravaganza on revolutionary themes. Mr. Warner admires Kafka, and he has adapted a good deal of Kafkian detail and diffused Kafkian tone throughout his book. He also has read Swift. He fails where his masters succeed because, unlike them, he has no control over either his material or his emotions. He is not an artist gauging the first, or a mature human being with insight into the second. The two have collided on a level of his nature where extreme confusion holds, and the results are lamentable.

One element in Kafka's work which has not been thoroughly elucidated, and which bears on Mr. Warner's, is that in portions of Kafka's writing (notably in "The Trial") he deals with the material of his own obsessions. The atmosphere of "The Trial" is one which normal people come upon in bad dreams—which obsessed people project out upon reality. But Kafka, in "The Trial," deals with persecution delusion in so masterly a manner that he raises it into beauty and makes it a part of human experience. He attacks the problem with all the weapons of realistic approach. The horror and strangeness are thoroughly rendered, but the subconscious mechanisms are never allowed to throw up fantasy uncriticized. The development of the subconscious fantasy is continually being put through a checking process. Kafka is manipulating his nature and not being manipulated by it. Mr. Warner, on the other hand, with the best intentions in the world, gets nowhere because his subconscious nature, which he apparently knows nothing about, is manipulating him from the start.

Three brothers set out to find the wild goose ("freedom, naturalness"). One is ambitious. Another is an aesthete and a scholar. The third is "an ordinary young man." Their destination is an unknown country beyond a mysterious frontier. The peasants of this land are ground under by an insanely irresponsible and grotesquely heartless government whose seat is a fantastic modern city. The ambitious man and the scholar, both of whom are presented as perfect fools, accept the inhuman conditions put upon them by the government and are degraded by them. Not so the ordinary young man. He espouses the cause of the peasantry and enters the city determined to appeal to the king and change matters. No good comes of this plan. He then realizes that he cannot act alone, as a single adventurer. He returns to the countryside and works up a revolution which, although opposed by the police, spies, fiendish clergymen, and dreadful mechanical contraptions, finally, in a very bloody manner, succeeds. George—for that is the ordinary young man's name—then determines to create a new world according to the best Marxian formulas. The roof flies off the most horrid of the old institutions, and the wild geese are seen flying overhead.

The details thrown into this basic plan—and they are many—are so arbitrary, so futile, and so clumsy that they not only impede the story but often throw it violently off its track. If it suits the author's momentary convenience to erase someone from the plot or to change his or her nature overnight, the disappearance or the change is at once effected. Love affairs are dragged in by the heels, to point up George. Dreamlike events happen for reasons that remain obscure. Why Mr. Warner should have chosen, in the first place, to come out for revolutionary methods in terms of nightmare, it is difficult to discover. Through his poorly selected symbols the new world is made to seem as hideous as the old. All is translated into a phantasmagoria that the mind and emotions instinctively reject.

George, it may be mentioned in passing, at the beginning of the book shows resentment toward a male in authority by giving him a blow in the face. At the close of the book, having killed the king in a subterranean cave, beside an underground lake, George makes love to the king's mistress. Psychologists, who along with other scientists are deplored by Mr. Warner, could have a field day explaining George.

Mr. Warner's book of verse, "Poems," is better than his book of prose. Although rather smugly hortatory, and deriving from C. Day Lewis and Hopkins, it has moments of simplicity and beauty. It is curious that the author of "The Wild Goose Chase" should concern himself with poetry at all, since in his imaginary world poets are either idiots or frauds. But he has. LOUISE BOGAN

The "Inside" of the China War

FIRST ACT IN CHINA. By James M. Bertram. The Viking Press. $3.

ALTHOUGH it deals with a restricted theme, the capture and release of Chiang Kai-shek in December, 1936, this book stands without peer as an introduction to the new China which is today bravely resisting the onslaught of Japanese arms. Most persons, even in China, either found the kidnapping of the Generalissimo inexplicable or falsely attributed it to the Chinese Communists. James Bertram, a young New Zealander fresh from Oxford, where he took top honors as a Rhodes Scholar, had the good fortune to be the only journalist to reach Sian immediately after Chiang's capture. Unlike most foreign journalists in China, he was not too proud to talk with all sorts of people, including Communists and Tungpei revolutionaries. As a result he has come forward with one of the great journalistic beats of recent times—a story of epoch-making importance which contradicts in many essentials the preconceptions of the whole newspaper-reading public.

For purposes of this review I shall skip the adventurous tale of the vicissitudes Bertram experienced in reaching Sian. It is sufficient to say that he went in with a man who turned out to be one of the leaders of the revolutionary faction responsible for the Generalissimo's detention. He found that the Communists, isolated some hundred miles west of Sian, were not even aware of the coup until some hours after it occurred. Nor does the kidnapping appear to have been premeditated. Chiang had gone to Sian for the purpose of persuading the Young Marshal and his followers to resume their campaign against the "Communist bandits." In so doing he had completely miscalculated the growth of anti-Japanese sentiment among the former Manchurian troops, for whom a continuation of civil strife was tantamount to treason. Having failed in persuasion, Chiang resorted to strong-arm tactics. Orders were given to transfer the Manchurian troops to the south, and to bring in troops loyal to Chiang's wishes.

Late on the evening of December 11 the Young Marshal called an emergency meeting at which it was decided to forestall this order dispersing the Manchurian troops by arresting Chiang Kai-shek. Despite some resistance by Chiang's bodyguard, the coup was carried out with unexpected ease. But Chiang himself escaped; and it was not until some hours later that he was found, barefooted and in his nightclothes, hiding in a cleft between a jutting shelf of rock and a mountain. Although there were groups within the Manchurian ranks that urged immediate execution of the commander-in-chief, the Young Marshal and the Communists, who were called in, insisted that he should be ultimately released as the one man who could lead China in a war against Japan. The pro-Japanese clique in Nanking, led by Ho Ying-chin, the War Minister, did all they could to prevent his release by threatening to bomb Sian and send an expeditionary force to crush the "rebellion."

Actually the release seems to have been arranged when it became evident that Chiang was deeply influenced by his talks with the rebel leaders, and that nothing further was to be gained by holding him. Both he and Madame Chiang agreed to give favorable consideration to the Young Marshal's eight-point program for the establishment of a common front against Japan. From a purely practical point of view Chiang may have decided that it would be less trouble to come to an agreement with the Communists than to continue expensive and unpopular campaigns against them.

The book contains far more than a sketch of the Sian incident. In relating the story of his own adventures, his contacts with the Tungpei revolutionaries, with Agnes Smedley, and a few liberal missionaries, Mr. Bertram manages to give a vivid picture of the essential developments in Chinese history during the last fifteen years. He tells of the brave days of 1927 when the workers seized Shanghai from the reactionary war lords, only to be slaughtered by Chiang Kai-shek; of the killing of Chang Tso-lin by the Japanese in 1928; of the founding and growth of the Chinese Soviets, culminating the famous "long march" from Kiangsi to Shensi and Kansu; and of the student uprisings in the fall of 1935. He understands both the revolutionary zeal of the youth of China and the utter lack of principle of the older magistrates and war lords, and he has succeeded as have few writers before him in making the history of this far-distant land come alive. No one who is even casually interested in developments in the Far East will want to miss this book; and anyone,regardless of his interests, will find it fascinating reading. MAXWELL S. STEWART

Epic of the Pocket-Book

FOREVER ULYSSES. By C. P. Rodocanachi. Translated by Patrick Leigh-Fermor. The Viking Press. $2.50.

AFTER all these contemporary adventure sagas in which our virile journalists, doctors, and playwrights cover such unusual quantities of geography, it would be nice perhaps to open a novel about one man sitting in one room, meeting nobody important, going no place unusual and, having nothing to do, doing nothing. Yet belonging as it does in the ranks of these extraordinary odysseys of a sedentary age, "Forever Ulysses" is a distinctive and, I think, valuable chronicle.

Our modern Ulysses starts as a Cephalonian bootblack, learns his lessons in an Egyptian bordello, is captured by the savage African dervishes and held, for his financial genius, as the royal prisoner of their Mahdi. Escaping at last with the aid of Kitchener, Ulysses skips to Venezuela. In a really brilliant display of higher finance he assists Castro to repay his American debt with great gain to everybody but the Americans, and ends his days as the mysterious, omnipotent, and sanctified director of an international munitions combine. " 'Of many men he knew the towns and read the minds'—and profited by them all."

The question is, however, did he? The ten terrible years that Ulysses spends under the whip of the African Mahdi, his life a "dream of riches and a nightmare of heads severed from their trunks"—are these not symbolic of the entire span of his life? In the perpetual throes of this dream and this nightmare Ulysses has no need for friends, family, or feelings. Even sex is less important to the modern hero than his 6 per cent. And is there much difference, after all, between the brutal Mahdi, this "fundamentally evil, fanatical, double-dealing, and ruthless barbarian," and the Ulysses who becomes the debonair financier of international arms? The Mahdi serves up his victims' heads for dinner while Ulysses allows them to remain on the battlefields and in the streets of bombed towns.

The distinction is merely one of proximity, and Mr. Rodocanachi is too subtle a commentator not to know it. For there are fine analyses in his book of the ethics of the oppressed, the Greek spirit, the sponge-divers of Hydra, imperialism, politics, the noble savage, and of such smaller things as reading the morning newspaper. Mr. Rodocanachi is skeptical, witty, sometimes a little glib or heavily ironic, but usually quite discerning. And while he is ostensibly defending in "Forever Ulysses" the extreme modern form of what Lytton Strachey called "the energy of self-assertiveness," he has managed to present a diverting and effective case against it.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

At Versailles

AT THE PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE. By James T. Shotwell. The Macmillan Company. $4.

PROFESSOR SHOTWELL played an important role among the advisers of the American delegation at the Paris Peace Conference, notably in the drafting of the labor clauses of the now wrecked treaty, for his share in which laboring men the world over owe him a lasting debt of gratitude. His diary of his activities at the conference, filled out by notes made at the time and by comments written eighteen years later, is therefore a valuable contribution to the history of what took place in Paris in the name of peace. It is all the more so because Professor Shotwell stands up in considerable degree for the peacemakers and feels that a "myth" has been created in which the Peace Conference figures "as a sinister thing, sowing dragons' teeth, vindictively, subtly, while high-minded idealists looked on confused and frustrated." He thinks that the time is now approaching when this myth can be examined "with something more nearly approaching fair-mindedness." Hence he makes his contribution. His day-by-day report of happenings at Paris as he observed them aids his case by making clear how extraordinarily

"The first really good biography of China's Chiang."—Time Magazine

Strong Man of China

THE STORY OF CHIANG KAI-SHEK

By ROBERT H. BERKOV

THIS, the first complete and impartial biography of China's mysterious Strong-Man, marshalls facts which few, even in China, know, and explains the paradoxes in Chinese politics, personalities, and policies, and tells the romantic story of Chiang Kai-shek's rise from poverty to dictatorship. Robert Berkov is Manager of the Shanghai Bureau of the United Press. Illustrated $3.00

Mr. Witt among the Rebels

By RAMON J. SENDER

RAMON SENDER, one of Spain's greatest writers, presents the problem of the reluctant revolutionist, against the background of the Spanish rebellion of 1873. The staid and fussy Mr. Witt, living snugly in a pure Victorian atmosphere, worrying over the obstinacy of Spanish bookbinders, is suddenly catapulted into the revolt. His beautiful and impulsive wife further complicates matters by supporting the rebels. This is a wittily ironic picture of a 'do-nothing' liberal, and the inevitable consequences of his policy. $2.50

By the author of "Counter-Attack in Spain"

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

involved and difficult the peacemaking was for the best-intentioned treaty-makers.

His thesis is that the peace treaties have been charged "with much for which they were not to blame." The war itself was "responsible for much that was attributed to the treaties, and pre-war Europe was responsible for the issues of the war." That may be true, but it certainly does not relieve the chief actors in the struggle of their responsibility for the outcome—unless we are to regard them as merely creatures of fate swept along irresistibly by the currents created by the war. This we cannot concede, however, because we know that Mr. Wilson himself, for example, molded two of the worst features of the Versailles treaty against the protests of Lloyd George. Professor Shotwell admits that Lincoln would have done otherwise in Paris than Woodrow Wilson did, and that "the supreme attribute of statesmanship, magnanimity, was lacking in Paris." He even criticizes Mr. Wilson to the extent of pointing out how strange it was that he "should have been so rigid in his ethical outlook as to fail to see how far some of the items in the treaties were from any generous or even fair construction of the Fourteen Points." He thinks that Mr. Wilson always fell back upon a belief that the new order would rectify the wrongs of the old—and, doubtless, of the treaty; but that he failed to see that rectification could not be postponed "without weakening and ultimately endangering the very existence of the League."

On the other hand, he declares that to place the whole responsibility upon Wilson is to ignore the fact that Clemenceau, Lloyd George, and many others were joint authors of the treaty, and that some of the gravest mistakes "were committed by others in succeeding years." He also flies to the defense of the President by denouncing Maynard Keynes's characterization of him as "a brilliantly written but utterly irresponsible diatribe against President Wilson." This is the more remarkable because Professor Shotwell nowhere refers to Harold Nicholson's even more devastating picture of Wilson in his "Peacemaking, 1919" save to apologize for his volume's resemblance to that book. But solid and valuable as Professor Shotwell's contribution to history is, it cannot be compared with the brilliance and independence of Mr. Nicholson's writing. That is in part because a printed diary can never have the life and movement of a fresh narrative, in part because this author has a heavier style, perhaps a certain sense of responsibility to defend wherever it is possible.

Finally, Professor Shotwell concedes that "the Peace Conference failed to meet the expectation of the liberal and progressive thinkers in almost every country," which is certainly as mild and polite and gentlemanly a characterization of the shameful betrayal of the aspirations of the embattled peoples of the world as one could ask, but hardly phrases the facts. Professor Shotwell thinks that the challenge of today is to "repair the bulwarks of peace" and "strengthen or, if need be, rebuild the League of Nations" so "that somewhere in the world the forces of peace may be mobilized against the oldest instrument of politics—war." All of which is sound enough. But Professor Shotwell fails to see that it is necessary to do more than revitalize the corpse of the League; it is now a question whether headway can be made against war until capitalism as we know it is reformed or abolished. Those who, like Professor Shotwell, really believed in 1917 that war could be ended by war and a new society of nations built on the bodies of ten million dead, and have not yet wholly seen the light, have many more disillusionments before them.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Poet in Caucasia

PROMETHEUS AND THE BOLSHEVIKS. By John Lehmann. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.75.

THE flood of books about Russia, representing every shade and tint of opinion, continues to pour out, though other parts of the world—Abyssinia, Spain, China—compete with it in the news. The flood will continue, no doubt, and even increase in volume, as long as Russia remains soviet and the rest of the world something else. This example by John Lehmann, mainly a travel book about the Caucasus, is somewhat on the "delightful, dear Bolshevik" side. Most of us like garden paths but don't care to have them sprayed with the milk chocolate of Beverley Nichols; and many of us like our Soviet Union neater, with perhaps some of its acid, its occasional cruelty, but with all its full-bloodedness, its energy, vitality, and youth. This way, to my mind, it even makes better propaganda since it creates no false ideas that foreshadow disillusionment.

John Lehmann is one of the Eton-bred school of Communists. He is not as bad as one I once met who exclaimed that he thought Russia "splendid, because it was all like a great public school." But he is a bit inclined to dilate lovingly on the fascinating faces of youngsters, and he is at his worst when he is being sentimental about Stalin's childhood, which, to his imagination, seems to have been enchanting and cute. His book is a travel book, and like all travel books written by travelers, rather than for travelers by people who know the country better, it is superficial. Of Hevsuria, the only part of the Caucasus besides Tiflis where I have lived, he writes a good deal that is foolish—though he admits that he hasn't been there and is taking the opinions of people who haven't been there either.

But John Lehmann is also a poet and a good poet at that, and it is for this reason that his book has value. Although his chapters on the Georgian theater and art are interesting, it is poetry, and the life and opportunities of the writer, that really excites him. And because he knows what he is talking about, he provides a good and stimulating introduction to Georgian poetry, both its classics, from Rustavelli down, and its modern poetry, which under the Soviet regime is having a renascence. He himself has put into verse translations of some of the new poems; and whether it is John Lehmann or the modern Georgian poets or both, they are excellent, full of vigor and a beautiful, warm lyricism. One could almost wish that he had devoted the whole book to the subject of poetry.

And because he is a good poet, there are certain passages, the description of a station platform in Moscow before the train pulls out, of a part of the Abhazian coast, of an afternoon on the beach at Yalta, that are vivid, colorful, and rich. They are the personal impressions of a poet, and perhaps the book would be better had he remained personal and not tried to be objective. His humor is too dainty and his propaganda puny. Of this last there is good solid substance, but it comes from the mouths of two Georgians, a writer and a producer, men who knew where they sat and were well grounded in what was going on around them, which, seemingly, John Lehmann isn't. There is one chapter of good travel writing, about a German village in the Caucasus, and two chapters of fairly well-collated background. Otherwise his are the notes of any Intourist tourist.

R. M. MACGREGOR

PUBLIC LIBRARY

"The Crabbed Line"

SELECTED POEMS. By Allen Tate. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

IN HIS brief preface Allen Tate, who has been "frequently asked how I can violate the original experience which must have informed some poem, by revising it later at a time when my experience must be different," has the demure rejoinder that "as a poet, I have never had any experience." Such a judgment is less than disconcerting, and might be amended with the further explanation that his place as an artist is, by this right, with his old Confederate who announces that "it is a privilege to be dead." Mr. Tate, however, prefers to explain that "as a poet my concern is the experience that I hope the reader will have in reading the poem." He does not go on to reveal precisely how the feat is to be accomplished, for "the experience," which has never existed, would in some way have to be apprehended and relished by an imagined reader. One surmises, therefore, that these poems issue immaculately from nothing more than the will to create, and that they operate imaginatively in whatever vacuum remains after the element of individual experience has been divorced from the creative process.

A rereading of these poems amply confirms this impression. Even Mr. Tate would agree that where experiential factors are absent, and will and imagination furnish the keystones to the poetic edifice, the materials which fall to hand are the materials of rhetoric. Readers of his "Reactionary Essays" will recall, in this connection, the epigram of Yeats which is there made so much of, denoting rhetoric as "will trying to do the work of imagination." The words to be considered in Mr. Tate's case are "rhetoric," "will," and "work." They are important words, whether one will or no, not because they happen to be the stock in trade of a confirmed rhetorician, but because they have furnished him with a few admirable poems like Mr. Pope, Pastoral, and Causerie.

Among the vices which cannot be charged to this poet, certainly, are indolence and want of conscience. Many of the poems here reprinted, like the Ode to the Confederate Dead—upon which the odor of embalming fluids is still heavy—have been tirelessly revised over a period of six and ten years; others have been "completely renovated." It is nevertheless a fact that Mr. Tate has "worked" with rhetoric and will only, and has evolved not an "experience" but a façade. In the quest for emotional experiences (for his reader, let it be noted) it has been his practice to contrive a furor poeticus out of rhetoric and cold sweat, out of favorite words like "rage," "barbarous," and "furious with blood," or, as in one egregious instance, by loading six lines with an arpeggio of invective like "bastard" into "bawd" into "strumpet" into "plain bitch." Even his large effects of astringency and intellectuality are as often as not the result of synthetic associations ("blind, important cab," "the important picnic of a fool," "expensive hill," "touseled eyes," "foreign hair," and the like), where the "strange" word arrests not by its plangency but by its opacity.

It is possible that excellent poetry of a sort may be compounded of will and rhetoric alone, especially when, as with Tate, an intellect of distinction supplies the mortar. "Intellect is a mansion," but Mr. Tate's deficiencies are touched by the intellect only at a point, just as they are touched by his lack of humor at a point. His fondness for the poetic furniture of Eliot—his eagles, trapped old men, broken houses, scuttling crabs—has often been pointed out, and for all his painstaking revision it persists to the present volume. What has been less carefully noted is the astonishing poverty of

Who Said:-

"The Japanese will kill fewer Chinese in the next twenty years than the Chinese war lords have killed in the past twenty."

"I don't believe a big city like New York is a desirable institution."

"The occupational disease of 'unconstitutionalitis' is still prevalent among lawyers."

"I am sure that no American farmer would exchange places with the Russian farmer."

"History has no patience with moralists carrying concealed weapons."

If you don't know when, where, why and by whom these statements were made you are missing something of importance to all Americans concerned with today's problems. Specifically, what you are missing is the Bulletin of America's Town Meeting of the Air. This unique magazine, published every Monday, contains the complete proceedings of the one hour weekly program of "America's Town Meeting of the Air" (broadcast every Thursday evening from 9:30 to 10:30 E.S.T. over the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting Company).

Here you will find speeches by leaders in all fields (Nathaniel Peffer, Raymond Gram Swing, Norman Thomas, Charlotte Carr, Lewis B. Schwellenbach, Robert H. Jackson, Wendell L. Willkie, etc.) on all sides of public problems. Also, a helpful bibliography is included in each issue. And—most interesting of all—here are the questions asked by the audience, and answered on the spot by the speakers.

Thus there is available in convenient, permanent, and low-priced form the minutes of all the Town Meetings. You can at any time look at the record and see what has been said on such topics as: war and peace; regulation of hours and wages; socialized medical care; cooperation between government and business, etc.

But you can only do this by subscribing now to the Bulletin of America's Town Meeting of the Air. The price is only $2.00 for 22 issues. Use the coupon below and the issues already published will be sent you at once. The others will follow weekly.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS, Box B 877
2960 Broadway, New York City

Gentlemen: I enclose $2.00 for my subscription to the 1937-38 Bulletin of America's Town Meeting of the Air.

Name ....
Address ....
....

his images, the spuriousness of his language, in which words are mere counters in a tableau, the absence of sparkle and excitement in the processes of his intellection. It is hardly enough to maintain with Mr. Tate that "we speak the crabbed line," unless by crabbedness one understands a "knotty" thinking which is whorled about the juice and fiber of an idea. There are valid grounds for questioning, moreover, whether even so haunting a metaphor as that propounded in the last verse and a half of The Subway is worth the commonplace twelve and a half which precede it. For every striking line in these poems there are too many perfunctory recitatives like "Time begins to elucidate her bones," too many metaphors like that which describes words as "clear like a young harlot's false, pellucid pap," too many sterile periphrases like "breath, expunger of the mortal streak of nature" and "stone—peaked margin of antiquity's delay." The "work" of the imagination entails, certainly, the triumph of the creative will over this sort of cold mutton, but there are further benefits, equally as needful, which come as gifts from the motions of the imagination at "play." These, however, are possible only to the "poet as seer who experiences life in behalf of the population," or fancies he does so. And this is a picture with which Mr. Tate, who must make a virtue of necessity, unfortunately has "no sympathy at all."

BEN BELITT

Militarism and Society

THE HISTORY OF MILITARISM. ROMANCE AND REALITY OF A PROFESSION. By Alfred Vagts. W. W. Norton and Company. $4.75.

DR. VAGTS is well known to historians for his voluminous treatise on the diplomatic relations between Germany and the United States from 1890 to 1906, a remarkable book which impressed the reader not only by a stupendous mastery of the material but also by an unusually deep penetration into the interdependence of diplomacy and economic and intellectual currents. His new book has similar qualities. Although it lacks to a certain extent clarity of arrangement and is overburdened with a richness of material, always interesting, mostly pertinent, but rendering less clear the general outline of thought, the book should be highly recommended to the general reader, not only on account of its intrinsic value, but because it is the first history of militarism in its social and political setting. There would be no one better equipped than Dr. Vagts to write such a history. To him military history seems as familiar as economic and political history. Although a German, he has as intimate a knowledge of American as of German history, and he is entirely free of any pro-German bias. As far as there is any bias in the book, it is a slight anti-French bias which the author has in common with many modern American historians and political writers.

Dr. Vagts in the beginning of his book rightly points out that militarism is not identical with military efficiency. It connotes "a domination of the military man over the civilian, an emphasis on military considerations, spirit, ideals, and scales of value, in the life of states." This militarism, which ranks military institutions and ways above the ways of civilian life, has existed most clearly in Prussia and in Japan, in countries where the middle classes have not risen to power as they have in the United States, in France, or in Great Britain. The danger of militarism exists everywhere, and each country has its military men to whom war, as to Hindenburg, is as "refreshing as a mineral-water bath." But in other countries where the successful social revolution of the middle classes had established democracy firmly, civilian authority maintained, although sometimes only after bitter struggle, its control over the military men and the military mind even in war time; in Germany and in Japan, where the feudal mind has remained victorious up to now, the military took precedence over the civilian in spite of occasional liberal remonstrance even in peace time. How Germany came to represent militarism as she did is told by Dr. Vagts in three excellent chapters which are among the best of his book and may claim classic rank on account of their brilliant and cogent penetration of the social and political factors involved.

In the first of the three chapters he shows that the famous Prussian reformers after 1806 were anything but protagonists of the rising classes. The nationalism of the Prussians was not an autonomous, spontaneous popular growth from below as in France during the French Revolution; it was induced by artificial pressure from without and from above. "What the advice of these reformers involved was not a revolution, but a counter-revolution by reform." The reforms helped to maintain the power of the nobility and of the bureaucracy in Prussia, "whose egotism has rarely been surpassed outside Prussia." The second chapter deals with the dramatic story of the fight between militarism and liberalism in Prussia from 1850 to 1866 (pp. 198-221), which finally resulted in a situation of which the author says: "Nowhere in Western Europe was the army so completely isolated from political interference, while guaranteeing the political power of the class from which the dominating officer type sprang. Nowhere was the army more solidly organized and the public mind more effectively militarized." The third chapter deals with the World War and with one of the most illuminating moments, the shifting of responsibility for the war and its defeat.

The German ruling class had proved a failure in the World War, but the German army under the leadership of Hindenburg was greeted at the return from the lost war as "heroes unbeaten in the field." Here is the origin of the stab-in-the-back legend, of the new lease of life granted to the Prussian officers and their class, of the accession to power of Hindenburg, whom Dr. Vagts calls "the high priest of Prussia's army Moloch." The German generals "in their common flight from responsibility, which they had proudly claimed as long as victory seemed to smile upon them, were powerfully assisted by the behavior of the Allies. The latter not only desisted from carrying the war into the Reich, thus demonstrating to the German people that they were the victors; they also refrained from demanding that the German army through its leaders sue for the armistice, and take the blame as other capitulating generals had been forced in other wars. Never did beaten generals escape with so much honor as in post-war Germany." Erzberger and the German Republic had to sue for peace and to bear the brunt of a lost war which was not of their making and which they did not lose.

Militarism and the military mind are everywhere an ever-pressing danger to civilian government, as not a few British and French generals, the Dreyfus affair, and the Ulster revolt prove. But in France the President of the Chamber replied to a rightist deputy who claimed the supremacy of the army: "Nothing is above the laws of the country, and nothing is more factious than putting the military force above the laws." After France's defeat and civil war in 1871, as in Germany after 1918, a marshal of the old imperial army became President of the republic. Both tried to protect and shield reactionary generals. But Marshal MacMahon was forced to resign by Parliament, and what followed was the victory of liberal intellectuals in the Dreyfus affair. Marshal Hindenburg was not ousted by the German Parliament but praised and glorified, and what followed was the defeat of liberal intellectuals by Hitler.

The reading of Dr. Vagts's excellent book will help us to understand better the military mind and the dangers of militarism. In a democracy military matters should not be left to "experts" alone, democracy has to be educated to study and to understand them as an important preparation for the maintenance of civilian power in government, even in war time. Fascist countries preach an uncritical worship of discipline, leadership, and heroism. Democracies should train to an informed and intelligent discussion of military aims and efficiency. Past experiences, of which Dr. Vagts quotes many examples, show that the military mind is not always the most efficient mind, that blind discipline is in no way better than individual initiative, and that "there is every reason to suppose, as the French Front Populaire insists, that democracy is preferable from the sheer technical point of view."

HANS KOHN

Shorter Notices

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE: THE MAN IN HIS TIME. By John Bakeless. William Morrow and Company. $3.75.

Mr. Bakeless's learned yet lively volume might well be taken as a model by specialists who wish to write for the general public. Enormous labor has obviously gone into its making, for the author has thoroughly mastered all the known documents and added some interesting if minor discoveries of his own. Yet thanks to a lively style and to great skill in the selection of illustrative material, his book can hardly fail to interest even those who start with a complete ignorance of the subject. The method is, to be sure, one which requires a more thorough familiarity with a historical and literary background than most biographers have, but it proves that vividness and narrative interest can be achieved without recourse to "novelization" or any other vulgar journalistic device. Marlowe has always been the most interesting of Shakespeare's contemporaries, and recent scholarship has succeeded in uncovering documents which not only illuminate his career but make it possible to know his character and personality rather better than we know the character and personality of Shakespeare himself. To Mr. Bakeless's book the specialist will hardly be able to raise any objection more serious than that it reminds him of some things with which he is already familiar. The general reader will find it not only the best account of Marlowe's life and work but also a more enlightening introduction to the Elizabethan literary background than any other recent book.

THE SAILOR'S HOLIDAY. By Eric Linklater. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

"The Sailor's Holiday" is a gently delirious bit of fooling calculated for connoisseurs in the fine art of literary bubble-blowing. Its hero is Henry Tippus, a simple sailor gifted or cursed with an unquenchable tendency to invent the most elaborately credible tales concerning his imagined experiences on land and sea. He begins them spontaneously, with the most naive and happy motives, only to be utterly intoxicated by the plausibility of his own inventions. His innocent

IS HE DRIVING ITALY BACK TO SERFDOM?

Read what Fascism has done for, and to, the rural population of Italy.

THE PLOUGH AND THE SWORD

Labor, Land, and Property in Fascist Italy

By CARL T. SCHMIDT

You have read Mussolini's claim that Fascist policy "has enabled the Italian agricultural population to take a remarkable step forward." Now READ THE FACTS! This timely, detailed account of the actual results of Fascism's rural program presents a picture startlingly different from the official one; a picture of starvation creeping steadily up on peasants and farmers while their land is gradually taken away and absentee landlords grow fatter. Read The Plough and The Sword for the first factual, uncensored, critical analysis of Italy's most vital problem. $2.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

The WAR in SPAIN

•

by Louis Fischer

For Single Copy send only

5c

to cover postage and wrapping (Prices stated below)

Practically a gift to Nation readers

Limited quantity left to be disposed of at cost

More than 15,000 copies of "The War in Spain" were sold in advance of publication. Written by a correspondent well known to Nation readers, it presents the social and economic background of the war, an account of the fighting, an analysis of the probable outcome, and an explanation of the international significance of the struggle. The Nation has 3,000 copies of the edition left which it wishes to see come into the hands of interested readers. It therefore offers the remaining supply singly or in small quantities at less than cost: 50 copies at 4 cents each; 100 copies at 3 cents each; 500 copies or more at 2½ cents each. Send remittances to THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Order at once to insure receiving the number you want.

BANQUET

THIRD ANNUAL COMMON SENSE
BANQUET

Speakers:
- H. JERRY VOORHIS
- THURMAN W. ARNOLD
- HENRY A. WALLACE

Topic—KEEPING AMERICA OUT OF WAR
Time—Saturday Evening, February 5th at 7 o'clock
Place—The Aldine Club, 200 Fifth Avenue, New York

Reservations Paid in Advance $2 Tickets at the Door $2.50
Write—COMMON SENSE, 315 Fourth Ave., New York
Phone—STuyvesant 9-0516

DEBATE

DEBATE
"What Policy Shall the United States Adopt towards Japan's Invasion of China?"

PROF. JOHN L. CHILDS VS. GEORGE SOULE
Teachers College — Editor "New Republic"
"Collective Action" — "Neutrality"
Chairman: DR. CORLISS LAMONT

THURS.
Feb. 3
8:30 P.M.
Admission 40c

HOTEL CENTER
108 W. 43rd St., N. Y.
Auspices: AMERICAN FRIENDS OF THE SOVIET UNION
Tickets at Bookshop, 50 E. 13th Street, or call or write A. F. S. U., 60 E. 12th St.—ALgonquin 4-2378

LECTURES

LECTURES FOR MODERNS

PHILOSOPHY AND SOCIAL CHANGE
Mondays at 8:30 . . . . . . DR. MORDECAI GROSSMAN
PSYCHOLOGY OF PERSONALITY
Mondays at 8:30 . . . . DR. SANDOR LORAND
LABOR ECONOMICS
Tuesdays at 7:00 . . . . DR. EMANUEL STEIN
CONTEMPORARY MUSIC
Tuesdays at 8:30 . . . . ADELE T. KATZ
PSYCHOLOGY AND ADJUSTMENT
Wednesdays at 7:00 . . . . . . DR. GEORGE B. VETTER APPRECIATION OF LITERATURE
Wednesdays at 8:30 . . . . ELIAS L. TARTAK
FOLK DANCING
Thursdays at 8:30 . . . . JOHN O'BRIEN

Fee, $4.50 for Course of 13 Weeks

American Labor in Politics. Wednesdays at 7:00. David I. Ashe, Prof. Henry S. Commager, B. Charney Vladeck, Louis Waldman, Dr. Louis Hendin, Samuel Shore, Luigi Antonini, Dr. Edouard C. Lindeman.

Labor Parties and Their Achievements. Wednesdays at 8:30. Algernon Lee, Dr. Harold Barger, Dr. William A. Rudlin, Dr. S. A. Anderson, Prof. J. Bartlet Brebner, Prof. Carter Goodrich.

Scholarships in these courses to members of the American Labor Party.

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 EAST 15th STREET : ALgonquin 4-3094 : NEW YORK CITY

genius simply catapults him from one escapade into another. All things start normally for Henry, but once he begins to talk, so rich is his fancy and so glib his tongue that only the most insane consequences can ensue. The merest of them involves his imprisonment for the sake of a dachshund, the most momentous his engineering of the elopement of the injured Isobel, bed and all, by block and tackle, through her boudoir window, and the most touching his never-to-be-consummated love for the adipose daughter of an elusive hermit. Mr. Linklater writes with perfectly incongruous elegance and a complete mastery of the twin arts of aimlessness and irrelevance. The result is a series of amusing, blithely irrational episodes which meet prosaic reality head-on with a barrage of custard pies.

I WAS A SHARE-CROPPER. By Harry Harrison Kroll. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.75.

With the awakening of the American people to the seriousness of the share-cropper's plight, more books on this subject are to be expected. Mr. Kroll, who lifted himself out of the life of his people by his own bootstraps, looks back with wistful sympathy at those who could not escape with him. There is a rugged gentleness about the writing which somehow seems characteristic of cotton folk. In spite of his own success, Mr. Kroll has the fatalism that accepts poverty as one of the inevitable facts of life. In a sense it is unfortunate that the author ceased to be a share-cropper long before the outbreak of the revolt in King Cotton's realm which has given books like his a ready audience. Having found his personal solution in the success he has achieved, he does not bother with the economics of the world he has left behind. When he returns for a brief visit to his mother's cabin to give her two hundred dollars, he can only think hopelessly of his sister's share-cropper husband: "If luck went against him, he and Birdy would be dependent in their old age after a lifetime of sweat and poverty. He was a share-cropper." Despite the tenderness with which this autobiography is written, it has for its theme that ugly thought—"The poor you have always with you."

FILMS

What Pictures Mean

THE current "March of Time" gives itself over entirely to one subject: "Inside Nazi Germany, 1938." The film is advertised by its makers as uncensored, so that anybody who goes to see it—and it is said that twenty-five million will see it—may expect to look upon the land of the swastika with camera eyes, noting as much as there is time for while the lens sweeps candidly among sixty-two million people. Such an expectation is of course naive. The cameras of the "March of Time" have not roved at random; there has been careful and subtle selection; and the impression left by the film will probably be definite. But what will the impression be?

It is strange that such a question should arise. Pictures ought to mean just what they say, and since they speak an unambiguous language it should be easy to know what they say. And I must confess that until I was walking out from a preview of these pictures I considered their statement to be as plain as a sausage. To me they had announced simply and clearly that nothing could be more dreadful than the thing that had happened to the German people. Not that I had seen a "suffering" people. Far from it. For all the world as if the film had been censored after all, or as if Goebbels himself had directed it, the spectacle was of a healthy and willing people pitching into a series of national enterprises—athletic, industrial, conservationist, military. They did not act as if they knew what had happened to them: as if they knew that they had lost their liberty. Or if they did know it they seemed on the whole to be content. The young men, stripped to the waist, who were doing compulsory labor in a national drive against soil erosion looked as good-natured and as well-fed as any similar number of CCC boys; the housewife who saluted and said "Heil Hitler" as she handed to a Nazi in uniform the money she had saved from yesterday's one-course meal did not appear haunted by the ritual; and the worker with his evening paper wore no lines of worry on his face because the government had denied him the right to strike and had decided just what his paper should tell him about it. That was the dreadful thing, I thought: worse even than the evidences of a great war machine and the photographs of Nazis parading with banners here at home. For there are other war machines, and the American Nazis were obviously silly; they would never be taken seriously. What might be taken seriously—and the conversation I overheard as I walked out put this in my head for the first time—was the appearance almost everywhere of efficiency and well-being. "Many Americans will wonder," said a famous man within my hearing, "why those means couldn't be employed over here—of course to a different end. But the means would be dangerous, and I am afraid they will be thought attractive enough to try."

Such Americans, it must be said, either will have failed to hear the commentator who accompanies the film with an unremitting verbal attack upon Nazism or will have dismissed his irony as irrelevant. But it may well be that the pictures will speak louder than the words to many ears, and that the irony will be missed. What then will the pictures mean? Or the whole of the performance, pictures versus words? It is strangely difficult to say. I can hope that everyone will feel as I felt. But I must admit that documents are double-edged, and that pictures can mean as many things as there are thoughts to make them mean.

MARK VAN DOREN

DRAMA

The "Living Newspaper"

"ONE THIRD OF A NATION" (Adelphi Theater) is the latest edition of the Federal Theater's "Living Newspaper." It deals in vivid, informing fashion with the problem of slum housing in New York City, and it is certainly one of the best of the series. To open and close the performance there is a brief scene of a fire in a three-story tenement which is a real triumph of imaginative realism and would probably cause a furor if it had been created by Reinhardt. But the major part of the evening is devoted to frank journalism of a new, ingenious, and extremely effective kind.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents the
ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
production of JEAN GIRADOUX'S comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:40
Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40. 300 Seats at $1.10

THE CRADLE WILL ROCK
Sam H. Grisman presents
A MERCURY THEATRE PRODUCTION
by MARC BLITZSTEIN
WINDSOR THEATRE 48th St. East of Broadway. BRy 9-0178
Evenings, 8:40. Matinee Wednesday & Saturday 2:45.
SEATS, 50c to $2 (plus tax) All Performances

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY PARTY
Sunday, Feb. 13, at 8:30
BELASCO THEA., 44 St. E. of B'way
LILLIAN HELLMAN
Author of "The Children's Hour," Screen Adaptation "Dead End." Recently returned from Spain.
CAPT. HANS AMLIE
Former Commanding Officer, "Lincoln-Washington Battalion."
MILLY BENNETT
Former Chief of Press Bureau, Loyalist Ministry of State.
Watch THE NATION for MORE SURPRISE SPEAKERS!
Tickets: 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50
at all Workers' Bookshops and all Agencies
Ausp.: FRIENDS OF LINCOLN BRIGADE
125 W. 45th St., N.Y.C. LOngacre 3-6215

FAREWELL DINNER
to the great German writer and gallant defender of Madrid
LUDWIG RENN
(Baron Veith von Golzenau) will be tendered on the occasion of his departure
FEBRUARY 3RD, 7:30 P. M., CLARIDGE HOTEL, 160 W. 44TH ST.
Chairman: Henry Pratt Fairchild; Speakers: Oswald Garrison Villard, Arthur Garfield Hays, Paul J. Kern and Wm. J. Schieffelin

FREE Correspondence Course in
Fundamental Economics and Social Philosophy
Write for descriptive booklet N
HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
Chartered by University of State of New York
JOHN DEWEY, Honorary President
211 West 79th St., New York City

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL
Offers Exciting Evening Courses in:—Art, Current Events, Economics, Law, Literature, Music, Philosophy, Photography, Psychology, Public Speaking, the Theatre
$10 per term (15 lectures)—Term begins February 7
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON SCHOOL
300 West 88th Street SChuyler [illegible]
Write or call for descriptive bulletin

The "Your Winter Home" Vendome
MADISON AVE. AT THIRD ST. LAKEWOOD, N.J.
Private Baths — Private Sun Porches — Southern Exposure. All sport facilities. Intelligent supervision of diets. Moderate rates.
M. SCHWARTZ, R.N. Phone Lakewood 555

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Columnists

A Series of Columns on Some Molders of Public Opinion

by Margaret Marshall

EVERY day hundreds of syndicated columns of gossip, personalities, politics, finance, "uplift," "inside dope," and advice to the lovelorn whirl over a thousand newspaper presses and into the American home.

BEGINNING in an early issue of The Nation, Margaret Marshall will columnize the columnists. She will contribute some notes on the development of an industry that has changed the face of journalism. In particular she will analyze the relatively new phenomenon of the political columnist, who often is better known and more influential than the editor whose paper he adorns.

TODAY the political columnist is operating in a rising market. By what circumstance have Dorothy Thompson, Westbrook Pegler, Walter Lippmann, General Hugh Johnson, and the rest become Molders of Public Opinion in the greatest country on earth? How much opinion do they mold?

IN TERMS of their own output Miss Marshall will examine the qualities and preoccupations of these demi-gods (and/or goddesses) who have taken charge of America's thinking. Also she will conduct brief excursions into the never-never land of popular aspiration and desire where the O. O. McIntyres and the Dale Carnegies reap not as they sow.

*

Such articles as these maintain the tradition of a weekly long celebrated for its shrewdly pointed criticism. Moral: Subscribe to The Nation now!

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5 ☐ two years for $8 ☐ three years for $11 ☐ I inclose my check OR ☐ I will remit upon receipt of bill.

Name____________________

Address____________________

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50¢

1-29-38

Many of the devices used have been made more or less familiar by various avant-garde experiments; there are, for example, the off-stage voice, the interpolated moving-picture film, the "plant" in the audience, and the tendency to move on different levels of abstraction in dramatizing the various scenes. But for a reason which I shall presently come to, none of them seems to me to have ever justified itself so completely as it has in the "Living Newspaper." Each of them serves here a genuine purpose, and that fact removes from all the curse of preciosity.

"One Third of a Nation" is frankly journalism and not Art. The distinction is not made invidiously, and neither is it based upon anything esoteric or academic. It implies merely something which is perfectly obvious—namely, that the purpose of the performance is to convey certain bits of specific, documented information and to enforce certain simple definite convictions; that it is, in a word, not a piece of fiction but a "feature article," whose primary concern is the effective presentation of fact. To say that is of course to say that the substance of the piece should be reviewed by an economist rather than by a dramatic critic, who as a layman can say no more than that the exposition carries intellectual conviction. But it does leave the critic the right to deal with the method of presentation, and it tempts me to say roundly that what we have here is the most successful effort to use the stage for the purpose of propaganda that I have seen in some fifteen years devoted in part to pretty consistent grumbling against sometimes infantile and sometimes all too precious attempts to use for simply didactic ends an art form which was evolved for other purposes.

"One Third of a Nation" is as good as it is partly because Arthur Arent, the author, Philip Barber, the producer, and the others concerned in the production are obviously men of talent. But perhaps even more credit belongs to whoever it was who realized that the proper way to go about doing what they wanted to do was to do just that without trying to do anything else. Indeed, unless one has seen first a play like, let us say, John Howard Lawson's "Marching Song," it is impossible to realize just how much is accomplished by the simple expedient of presenting information and a few concrete illustrations of what that information means instead of trying to slip the information and the argument with which one is really concerned between the lines of a conventional play in which one is not interested at all. It has long been my conviction that to talk of "fictionalizing" biography, or history, or economics, or politics is to talk nonsense. Nothing can be "fictionalized," because a subject is either fiction to begin with or it never will be. But that does not mean that biography and politics and all the rest are not interesting in themselves or that they cannot be presented vividly through exposition which includes concrete illustrations. The "Living Newspaper" does just that. It is interesting in itself, and it may teach others to present effectively what they have to say. Personally I am hardly less pleased to realize that it may also help prevent a good many bad plays from being written.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ORSON WELLES, whose productions of "Julius Caesar" and "Shoemaker's Holiday" are the sensation of the season, will write of his approach to the theater in an early issue of THE NATION.

Letters to the Editors

The Old Red Menace

Dear Sirs: In his illuminating article, Los Angeles Grows Up, in your issue of January 8, Oliver Carlson puts the cart before the horse in one case. He gives the impression that because Communists are in C. I. O. unions, the red scare is being whipped up. But the red scare is the time-honored—and now pretty much time-bedraggled—weapon of the open-shoppers. In the accounts of the dynamiting of the Los Angeles Times back in 1910—when no American Communist Party had been thought of—astonishingly similar red-scare language was used, and one commentator, C. K. McClatchey of the Sacramento Bee, wrote of Lincoln Steffens, who was trying to help settle the case out of court, "He goes to the bat for every dripping murderer."

The abuse of Edward Vandeleur and other Old Guard officials, as well as of the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Industrial Association, is heaped on any labor leader who does not "sell out," who won't "make deals" behind closed doors. It is well known on the West Coast that Harry Bridges refused a huge bribe during the longshoremen's strike. This abuse and the epithet "red" are the rewards of any labor leader today who continues, even through success, to lead labor. They are becoming the trademarks of incorruptibility. The experience of West Coast labor struggles has made that clear to countless rank-and-file trade unionists. Membership in the Communist Party is not the reason labor leaders are hated. In California democracy itself is a "red menace."

ELLA WINTER

Carmel, Cal., January 17

Nebraska's Unicameral

Dear Sirs: Oswald Garrison Villard, in your issue of December 4, finds it "extremely gratifying" that a proposal for a one-chamber state legislature is to be brought before the New York State constitutional convention which meets this year. I believe that it behooves other states to await the outcome of Nebraska's experiment before copying it. I voted for the Unicameral and was enthusiastic in support of it, but I cannot say that it is much of an improvement. We have only 43 members. I have always believed that our Unicameral should have 100 members to provide the electorate with proper representation. Moreover, 43 members is such a small number that it is easy for lobbyists to cultivate an intimate acquaintance with each of them.

It is a matter of record that our Unicameral passed more laws—many of them objectionable—than any previous legislature, and that it made the biggest appropriations ever made. The appropriations are defended as having been necessary, which I regard as only partly true, as many fat jobs were created. According to the Omaha World-Herald of October 3 last, which is friendly to Governor Cochran, 370 new jobs were created at an expense of about $35,000 a month to the taxpayers. Many of those jobs were on the state highway patrol, which was established by the Unicameral after it had been voted down in a statewide referendum four years ago. The optometrists also got in their work on the Unicameral, and in order to obtain a driver's license you must pass an eyesight test.

Bear in mind that our state has about one-tenth the population of New York, and adding $35,000 a month to our tax roll is equivalent to adding $350,000 a month to yours. Can you afford it? My advice to Samuel Seabury and all of the rest of you is to wait and see how our experiment turns out.

CLARENCE RECKMEYER

Fremont, Nebraska, January 20

They Signed with Reservations

Dear Sirs: In the company of others we signed the letter protesting against The Nation's present policy on the war issue which you printed in your last number. We agreed with the fundamental purpose of that letter, but we had no hand in the drafting of it, and we disagreed with it in certain matters of secondary detail. The chief of our disagreements is with the sentence which reads: "The Neutrality Act is a piece of democratic legislation expressing the will of the American people to keep out of war."

We consider the Neutrality Act a piece of deceptive and tricky legislation which, at the same time that it gives expression to the will of the American people to keep out of war, distorts and perverts that will. Under it the Spanish government has been denied the right to purchase materials of war in the United States, while Italy, also party to the Spanish war, has not been so denied. The Ethiopian case was similar. The so-called Neutrality Act, in our judgment, has been so drawn and so applied that it has served, is serving, and may in the future serve to defeat the ends which are implied in its title.

CHARLES S. ZIMMERMAN
BERTRAM D. WOLFE

Brooklyn, January 20

Conclusive Figures

Dear Sirs: Those who argue that to invoke the Neutrality Act would neither hurt China nor help Japan ignore the reports of the National Munitions Control Board. And yet the figures are conclusive. Since the start of the Far Eastern war China has purchased from the United States more than five times the amount of munitions that Japan has purchased, or $6,718,933 worth as compared to $1,552,583. During November China bought $1,702,370 worth of munitions, which is more than Japan has bought since July. The Neutrality Act would of course prevent such purchases, although it would allow Japan to continue buying steel, iron, cotton, and phosphates to convert into munitions.

EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS

Chicago, January 20

Intuitive or Scientific?

Dear Sirs: Please let me express my sincere thanks to Mr. Vivas for his civilized review of my "Attitudes Toward History" in The Nation of December 25. I think that, within the limits of space at his command, he very accurately represented both my interests and my encumbrances.

But I should like to say a few words about the passage in which Mr. Vivas writes: "Burke's approach to symbolism is not susceptible of verification, and depends for its convincing force on his ability to make the reader perceive immediately the author's intuitions. This is to say that the method is essentially a-scientific if not unscientific."

It is my contention, through "Permanence and Change" and "Attitudes Toward History," and a third book on which I am now engaged, that we have mistakenly labeled as "scientific" those works which attempt to borrow the perspectives of biology, mechanics, or physics and transplant them to the analysis of social phenomena. I contend that social relations can be adequately interpreted not by physicalist or naturalistic terms but only by terms that treat experience as an "art," hence drawing upon the vocabularies of rhetoric, dramatic criticism, etc., ("men as poets, or at least as poetasters"—which I take to be more relevant than the "scientific" perspectives upon human life got from the description of machines or billiard balls or salivating dogs).

Usually, those "scientists" who selected naturalistic metaphors in which to interpret men earned themselves the honored name of scientist without ever having taken the trouble to offer any description or critique of their basic interpretative structure. In my own case, I explicitly describe the nature of perspective in general, explicitly make my choice of perspective, explicitly give my reasons for choosing it, and through three books explicitly give examples of its application, its scope, and relevancy. Yet all this is but "intuitive," whereas the boys who don't bother to make explicit the processes of interpretation they implicitly use are "scientific"?

My point is, in sum, this: I take social relations to be essentially dramatic in nature. I thus take a discussion of them to be very much like dramatic criticism, and as such, requiring neither more nor less of the "intuitive," and neither more nor less of the "scientific," than one customarily and necessarily gets in dramatic criticism. (I was happy, for instance, to be able at one point to cite an "intuition" by Joseph Wood Krutch in support of one of my own "intuitions.") I willingly agree that many of my speculations will require greater precision. In particular, I must attempt supporting them or modifying them when I find them unsupportable in their present form, in the light of explicit objections. But in attempting a first rounding-out of my perspective, I cannot foresee what all these objections on the part of critics will be.

To me, "scientific" procedure is simply this: The writer thinks he has gone from A to B; the critic shows that the writer has actually made a jump from A to E; the writer must then attempt to show that intermediate steps, B, C, and D, can be offered, as a rationalizing test. I doubt whether a distinction between the "intuitive" and the "scientific" will adequately locate this matter, since the new "scientific" steps, B-C-D, must themselves be "intuitively" selected. KENNETH BURKE

New York, January 4

Clairvoyance and Chance

Dear Sirs: In reviewing J. B. Rhine's "New Frontiers of the Mind," in The Nation of November 27, G. S. Anders states that he, the reviewer, appears to be conservative, his skepticism being based on instinct, while Dr. Rhine appeals to experience. That the skeptic in regard to parapsychic facts is not only conservative but invariably unscientific has been shown by Dr. Walter Prince in "The Enchanted Boundary." Dr. Prince demonstrated that parapsychic evidence is never fairly and squarely faced by the skeptic.

In the use of the E.S.P. (extra-sensory perception) cards, chance should give an average of 5 correct guesses. Obviously chance results vary, but Mr. Anders seems unaware that its possible range may be determined by actual experiment, and that such control experiments have been made, by the writer and others. Mr. Anders slyly remarks that some of Rhine's subjects strike a higher average than 5, "guessing 6 cards out of 25." He neglects to inform us that a typical subject has obtained such successive scores as 14, 16, 17, 21, 19, 19, 19, 13, 15, 16, 17, 23, giving an average of 17.4; and that the highest number chance has accounted for in the same number of trials, in the control experiments, is 6.4. He remarks that in "hundreds of thousands of experiments" 25 successive correct guesses were scored on 3 occasions. If he cares to risk disturbing his skepticism, he can make hundreds of thousands of control experiments—by simply playing one shuffled pack against another—and perhaps on 3 occasions his control pack may score as many as 6 consecutive correct "guesses." Mine has scored no higher than 5. Eileen Garrett, a professional medium accustomed to demonstrating at least telepathy or clairvoyance in purported "communications from the dead," is uninterested in tests with playing cards, yet she scored an average of 13.4 in 625 trials. Chance, in 500 trials, has scored in my control experiments no higher than 5.8.

Mr. Anders is apparently entirely unfamiliar with what has been done in parapsychic research in the last fifty-five years. He describes a type of test which he considers more severe than the Rhine card tests, one success in which would represent, to him, a tremendously powerful proof. And he seems unaware that exactly such tests have been made, with not merely one success but success after success, many times as much proof as he asks for. He will find such experiments described, for example, in Oliver's "The Extension of Consciousness" and Tischner's "Telepathy and Clairvoyance."

GEORGE R. WEAVER

Brooklyn, N. Y., January 5

CONTRIBUTORS

MARQUIS CHILDS, Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, is the author of "Sweden: The Middle Way."

T. A. BISSON, who returned from northern China a few weeks ago, is the Foreign Policy Association's Far Eastern expert.

LANGSTON HUGHES, the well-known poet, has just come back from Spain.

LANGDON POST recently resigned as chairman of the New York City Housing Authority.

EDMUND WILSON, formerly literary editor of the New Republic, is the author of "Travels in Two Democracies."

EUNICE CLARK will have some of her poems in the forthcoming Modern Library anthology of modern poetry.

LOUISE BOGAN, poetry critic of the New Yorker, has just published a book of verse, "The Sleeping Fury."

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.

R. M. MACGREGOR has been United Press correspondent covering the war in China. He lived for some time in Soviet Russia.

BEN BELITT, cowinner with Charlotte Wilder of the Shelley Poetry Award, teaches poetry at Bennington College.

HANS KOHN is professor of modern European history at Smith College. His latest book is "Force or Reason: Issues of the Twentieth Century."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 5, 1938 NUMBER 6

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 141

EDITORIALS:

THE WAGE-CUT FALLACY 144

DOES THE BOYCOTT HURT AMERICAN LABOR? 145

MASSACRE RIVER 146

F. D. R. UNDER TWO FLAGS By Paul Y. Anderson 147

FROM A GALLERY OF YOUNG TURKS By Georges Schreiber 148

CHICAGO DOESN'T CARE by Milton S. Mayer 149

WHY FRANCE HAS NO DICTATOR By M. E. Ravage 152

NEXT—THE RADIO NEWSPAPER By Ruth Brindze 154

AFRAID OF FORGERY? by Beatrice Schapper 155

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 157

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

CONQUEROR OF THE SEAS by Alan Villiers 158

FABIAN ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSION By Paul M. Sweezy 158

JEAN SIBELIUS by César Saerchinger 159

THE LIVELY ART by Muriel Rukeyser 160

LETTERS OF ROUSSEAU by Albert Guérard 160

SHORTER NOTICES 161

DRAMA: IN THE GRAND STYLE By Joseph Wood Krutch 162

MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 163

DANCE: THE CRITIC'S LEXICON By Lincoln Kirstein 164

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor Associate Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

*

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

MR. ROOSEVELT'S NAVAL PROGRAM CAN BE regarded only as a threat of offensive war against Japan. No naval authority has ever seriously maintained that our present fleet, with the ships now in process of construction, would not suffice to protect our coasts, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Panama Canal against an enemy or combination of enemies excluding Great Britain. And no sane man would suggest that Great Britain would participate in an attack on our shores. Moreover, the character of the recommendations clearly indicates that an offensive war is contemplated. Battleships and aircraft carriers are of value chiefly because they can operate at long distance from their bases. Only nine new submarines with a total tonnage of 13,658 are included in the program; nothing is allotted for coast defenses, and only an infinitesimal sum for increases in the army. It cannot be argued that the new appropriations are necessary in order to prepare for collective pressure against the fascist powers, since the existing navies of the democracies are more than adequate for that purpose. It may not have been an accident that the New York Times in playing up the President's naval message also played up, in bold headlines, the slap which a Japanese sentry conveniently administered to an American consul.

*

THE ANTI-LYNCHING BILL SEEMS DOOMED as far as the present session of Congress is concerned. We hope in a coming issue to analyze for the sake of future tactics the significance of the shameful episode which has again blocked efforts for federal action on lynching. Meanwhile, if the anti-lynching fight is moved off the Congressional stage, it will make room for other legislative battles in which a filibuster cannot be used to conceal the conflict of interests and the cross-purposes in Congress today. Some action on housing may be expected. But a bitter struggle looms over the government-reorganization proposal, and we may expect to hear all over again the charges that the President is deliberately moving toward fascism. A dog fight may also be expected on the proposed maritime legislation providing for a special maritime labor-relations board and for government training of sailors. Both provisions are dangerous and are bound to be opposed by the progressives. Action may be expected on the farm bill, but it will take months to iron out the difficulties over wage-hour legislation. Neither of the two proposed major investigations—that of the TVA or that of the NLRB—is likely to come through, but both proposals will be used as occasions for damaging the prestige of the agencies. The most significant legislation that will come before Congress, to our mind, is that dealing with the dissolution of holding companies in the banking field. When even Senator Carter Glass, whose conservatism has become a Congressional tradition, supports such a measure, the situation it seeks to remedy must be serious indeed. Glass's move may, of course, have been intended to head off more radical proposals. It is a good rule for Congressional progressives to fear Senator Glass, even when be comes bearing bank reforms.

*

NOW LITTLE BUSINESS IS HAVING ITS DAY. Even from a publicity standpoint, Mr. Roosevelt was wise to see the five hundred representatives of all the little fish that swim around in the ocean of business in mortal terror of the huge corporate leviathans. They may not clarify his thinking about the depression, but they will be a good antidote to the conferences he has been having with big business. More important, however, than the parade of the five hundred into the White House is the report that the Administration is planning financial aid to little business men. Representatives of the Treasury, the RFC, and the SEC have been conferring in Washington in an attempt to work out a scheme whereby small business men will be able to get loans needed for enlarged activity. At present they are at the mercy of the banks, which are reluctant to take depression risks. And the small business man, unlike the giant corporation, cannot go over the head of the banker to float securities in the market. The plan at present is to have government-guaranteed industrial debentures, much like the mortgage insurance proposed for housing. It is a good plan. A revival of activity in small business will do much to create reemployment; even more important, it will do something to counteract the big-business drive to convince the small business man that there is a community of interest between the two and against the government. Actually the irresponsible great corporations are as menacing to the small business man as they are to the worker, the consumer, and the investor. But only by concrete action to aid small business can the Administration hope to gain its support in the long drive that lies ahead for democracy in industry.

*

THE FATAL EFFECT OF THE NEUTRALITY ACT on efforts to establish international cooperation was never more clearly illustrated than in the refusal of the United States to join the League powers in a program of economic assistance to China. Washington's failure to accept the League proposal was particularly unfortunate in view of the fact that the major powers, led by France and the Soviet Union, had just succeeded in saving Article XVI and holding the League together in defiance of the fascist international. A program of economic aid to China, as originally proposed by the League Council, would have been invaluable not only in restoring popular faith in the League but in laying the foundation stones of a new peace program. Assistance to the victim of aggression basically holds far more promise than sanctions as a principle of international law. It is positive in character, thoroughly humanitarian in its appeal, and is in harmony with the prevailing economic interests. Yet the fact remains that the first worldwide effort to aid the victim of indefensible aggression has been checked by the United States, largely because of our mistaken neutrality legislation. The situation can be remedied only if the peace forces of the country immediately get behind the O'Connell resolution to amend the act so as to permit a distinction between aggressor and victim.

*

ON THE ECONOMIC FRONT JAPAN HAS BEEN meeting increasingly serious reverses. According to the most recent report of the Federal Reserve Board, sales of silk and velvet piece goods in the New York area were 13.2 per cent lower in December, 1937, than in the corresponding month of the previous year. Ribbons, umbrellas, parasols, and silk neckwear and scarfs also declined in sales. These decreases, it should be noted, contrasted with an increase in the sale of cotton wash goods. Statistics furnished by the Commodity Exchange show that the imports of raw silk from Japan for the season through January 15, 1938, were approximately 55,000 bales less than for the same period in 1937. Japan's purchases of cotton from both the United States and India—essential for its vast textile industry—have been reduced almost to zero in order to permit its factories to concentrate on more immediate war supplies. A rapid extension of the boycott movement, with an emphasis on silk stockings, might bring about a breakdown of the Japanese war machine much sooner than anyone anticipated a few months ago.

*

THE MOUNTING TERROR OF THE AIR RAIDS on Loyalist cities reached a new climax in last week's bombing of Barcelona. Hundreds of civilians were killed, among them 158 children in a child-refuge home. The area attacked was one of workers' dwellings and apartment houses; it did not include even semi-military objectives. Like previous raids, this one was wanton, senseless, purposeless. Even a mind that has come to understand the cheapness of human life in modern warfare stands aghast at it. Herbert L. Matthews, in a New York Times dispatch more eloquent in its restraint than the most flaming indictment, described the latest type of delayed fuse bomb that the raiders used—heavier, more effective, deadlier than anything thus far devised, capable of driving an entire seven-story apartment into the ground with the loss of every life in it. If this is Franco's answer to the Loyalist victories at Teruel, it is a grimly illogical one. He should have learned from previous attempts that such terror, designed to destroy behind-the-lines morale, only increases Loyalist cohesion. The letter signed by twenty-six American Senators and thirty-four

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Representatives, conveying greetings to the new Spanish Cortes "as members of one democratically elected parliament to another," was drawn up before the latest and most horrible air raid, yet it may stand as the answer of American democracy to all the instances of rebel inhumanity. What is significant is that the signers numbered conservatives and progressives alike. We call upon the Catholic clergy of America, especially those who have supported Franco, to protest against the cold ferocity of these air raids, which can have as little relation to any religious creed as they have to military objectives.

*

WHAT FIVE YEARS OF HITLER HAVE DONE to German finances may be seen in recent official German reports. Although the Reich has a national income of only 68.5 billion marks—a little less in marks than the national income of the United States in dollars—its long-term national debt has increased more than 8 billion marks in two years. The outstanding short-term indebtedness has also risen and now totals between 20 and 24 billion marks. Taxes aggregate some 18 billion marks annually, or 28.6 per cent of the national income. In comparison, federal taxation in the United States—concerning which we have heard such violent protests in recent years—takes only about 8 per cent of America's national income. Despite the fantastic height of German taxation, governmental revenues fall short by some 5 billion marks of meeting costs. Thus fully one-third of Germany's productive national income is required for armament and other government expenditures. Put more bluntly, the Third Reich has solved its unemployment problem by herding the jobless into munition factories, but it has not found a way of paying them without placing an intolerable burden on these who are in productive employment.

*

TO M. VAN ZEELAND'S CREDIT IT MUST BE said that the program which he outlined for the solution of the world's economic ills is technically unassailable. There can be little question that the world would be more prosperous and more peaceful if it could, by some miracle, be induced to accept his recommendations. But originality can scarcely be claimed for the program. Essentially it is identical with the recommendations adopted by the World Economic Conference in 1927 and reaffirmed by the preparatory commission for the London Economic Conference in 1933. It is a program which all governments, except possibly the totalitarian states, will accept in principle, but which no government is prepared wholly to support in practice. Some countries, such as the United States, might accept two or three of the four main points, while other countries would doubtless accept other items in the program. But the world economic order which M. van Zeeland and Mr. Hull desire cannot be achieved piecemeal. The leading countries must be willing to put into operation at one stroke its four essential prerequisites—namely, a reduction in tariffs, stabilization of currencies, revival of international lending, and elimination of industrial quotas. In 1927 there seemed to be a reasonable expectation that this could be achieved, but the whole course of events since that date points to the futility of attempting to remake the world of today in accordance with a nineteenth-century pattern.

*

THE FAILURE OF THE COMPETITIVE SYSTEM has been openly admitted by the fruit and vegetable canners of California. As a substitute they have set up a tight little trust for the control of prices and production. Faced with an unusually large crop of peaches and the influx of many newcomers encouraged by the profits made last year, the established companies have adopted a pact under which the Canners' Industrial Board will fix prices and quotas. A rigid price schedule has already been established for "cling" peaches; the stocks of the canners have been pooled and each one allotted a definite sales quota. Any company which sells more than its share will be forced to buy proportionately from the stock of its erstwhile competitors. A few companies, including Calpack and Libby, have not signed the agreement, but according to the American Institute of Food Distribution, "other packers [are] confident that they will operate in close harmony with the group plans." For the other California-canned fruits and vegetables the price-control plan went into operation on January 1, and its effect will be noted by consumers only when next season's pack is on the retailer's shelves. Even in the days of the NRA, when an industry was permitted to fix minimum prices, consumers and producers were represented at the hearings, and the government at least made the gesture of exercising ultimate control. With all the trust-busting going on, the California plan should not go unnoticed.

*

POINTING TO THE ALARMING EXTENT OF unemployment in the learned professions, President Conant of Harvard last week called for curtailment in university enrolment—a proposal rendered no less ominous by his appeal for wider scholarship funds to cushion the impact of such action. It is easy, of course, to share Dr. Conant's pessimism, founded upon the tragedy of professionals in Europe as well as upon the growing frustration which university graduates experience here. But there are sinister tones in his judgment that American higher learning has reached its zenith and that the time has come for planned contraction. No one denies that it is wasteful and degrading to train scholars and professionals for posts which they will not be able to find. And it is equally plain that just such a desolate prospect drove thousands of hopeless students into the fascist movements of Europe. But this scarcely justifies American educators in advocating the solution of the fascist nations—curtailment of educational facilities. The fate of American university graduates must be integrated with a program of expansion throughout American society; our "surplus" of graduates is a measure of the chaos in our economy rather than a sign that their services are not needed. Dr. Conant's recognition of the problem is courageous; his solution is as dangerous as it is evasive.

The Wage-Cut Fallacy

WHAT happened in Washington last week at the President's press conference on wage cuts throws light on one of those dilemmas which characterize the American economy. Mr. Roosevelt, in answer to a question which he had obviously anticipated, came out forcefully against any wage policy on the part of the corporations which would seek to cut production costs by cutting wages. We believe his stand is sound as well as courageous. We are of this opinion despite the consternation of those who dress up their anti-labor views in the garments of "sound economics."

The industrialists have invariably sought to ease the impact of depression on profits by taking it out on wages. They have for this the support of orthodox economic theory, which has always reflected and rationalized the desires of business. The "sound" economists have argued that business can only operate on a margin of profits; that when a depression hits the country, demand and prices tend to fall; that prices become too low in relation to production costs—or, seen the other way around, production costs are too high in relation to prices; that business cannot cut the fixed costs, such as overhead and interest on bonded indebtedness; and accordingly it must cut the only other large element in production cost—namely, labor costs. Of course, it hurts the business men and their spokesmen, the economists, to have to come to such a conclusion. They are as sorry about it as are the workers on whom the burden of the cuts must fall. But rigorous economic logic forces them against their wishes to this cruel conclusion.

We are not persuaded by these crocodile tears. And, what is more, we are not impressed by the logic. We are as unimpressed by it when it comes from Harold G. Moulton and the Brookings Institution, dressed up as research, as we are when we find it put forward by the earlier apologists of laissez faire capitalism in the more naked form of abstract deduction. And our reason is that we don't care for the cart-and-horse logic that it involves. In talking of depressions and ways out of them, the horse is the capacity of the consumers to buy products. The cart that is being pulled out of the slough of economic despond is the cart of industrial production. To argue that wages, and therefore purchasing capacity, must be cut now is to argue that when the economic cart gets stuck deep in the mud of depression, the way to pull it out is through a little starvation or blood-letting for the horse. Mr. Roosevelt is entirely sound in taking his stand, as did Mr. Hoover in the early days of the depression, on wage maintenance. For the problem that we are faced with is a dual one: the demand for consumers' goods must be maintained, and the demand for capital goods must be increased. If the first is reduced, the second will fall even faster than it has fallen in the past few months. The maintenance of pay rolls accomplishes at least one thing. It can put a floor under the demand for consumers' goods, so that it will not fall farther and carry with it the general prosperity. As for the demand for capital goods, wage cuts would stimulate that only if the resulting profits were reinvested. But there is no assurance amid the prevailing business gloom that such would be the case.

But here we must enter several warnings. The maintenance of wage rates will not in itself bring recovery. This is where the Roosevelt policy parts company with the Hoover policy, and it must continue to make the separation even wider. Mr. Hoover was content to ask for maintenance of wages and production through personal pleading with big business. Mr. Roosevelt has gone farther—although not far enough—with public expenditures for relief and public works, and with attempts to reduce the capacity of business to do harm by its irresponsible decisions, through setting up machinery of control. But both conceptions suffer from being static. Nothing will be gained by maintaining wage rates if employment continues to fall, as it did under Hoover, and total pay rolls keep being reduced. It is unlikely that labor income can be increased, despite the Brookings argument, by the reduction of wage rates. The only clear case for such an argument is the building-trades industry. But labor income cannot be insured merely by maintaining wage rates. More is necessary.

At the risk of repeating our previous editorial statements, we must insist that there can be no hope either for wages or profits unless business and government adjust their ideas to an expanding economy rather than a static or contracting economy. Given a static economy, both sides are caught in a trap. Labor is right when it says that the steel industry, for example, cannot solve its difficulties by cutting labor costs. First, it thereby reduces purchasing power. Second, in the earlier stages of steel production, raw-material costs are ten times the labor costs. But industry also has a case when it points out that it is caught between the nether millstone of fixed bonded indebtedness and the upper millstone of fixed labor costs. If either of the two has to be cut, it would be more humane to cut interest on bonds—and it would make more sense. But neither has to be cut if drastic steps are taken to increase production. Those steps involve, as we have pointed out before, increasing production in all basic industries under some form of government planning. In the process of this simultaneous increase of production, the reemployment will be created that is necessary for purchasing the products thus placed on the market.

We do not know whether this country has the administrative energy or the political wisdom to seek such a solution. But we do know that patent medicines will not be enough. And the remedy by wage cuts is a patent medicine. It has often been tried, and it has always failed. It is not difficult to see in the present movement for wage cuts an attempt to saddle the blame for the present depression on trade-union organization and the resulting wage gains, and thereby to smash the C. I. O. The powerful economic groups in America are acting true to form as a ruling class. Their present temper is disquietingly reminiscent of that of the French ruling class of 1789, which sought to salvage its own power by condemning the underlying population to even greater poverty and insecurity than they had endured before. Such a course can be expected to have dangerous consequences.

Does the Boycott Hurt American Labor?

THE NATION has received the following letter from the Educational Director of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers, a C. I. O. affiliate:

> In view of your activity in so strenuously advocating the boycott of silk hosiery I should like to call to your attention the stand taken against such a boycott by the executive board of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers. The board went on record unanimously as supporting the American Federation of Labor and Committee for Industrial Organization resolutions to boycott Japanese manufactured goods but not Japanese raw materials manufactured in this country.
>
> This stand was taken because the union felt that a boycott on Japanese silk as reflected in a boycott of silk hosiery would do much more harm to the American hosiery workers than it could possibly do good to the Chinese people in their fight against Japanese aggression. May I call to your attention the statement by the president of our union, Emil Rieve, in this regard:
>
> "The proponents of a Japanese boycott in the excess of their zeal and thoughtlessness have concentrated their particular energies in invoking a boycott against silk hosiery, undergarments, and clothing, in which the stake in wages received by American workers is far in excess of the value of raw silk imported from Japan, and which at the same time will affect seriously the Chinese production of raw silk, the country they are attempting to assist. In their zeal also, they have purchased without discrimination available supplies of lisle hosiery regardless of source. Germany, whose government and governmental policies are as bad as if not worse than Japan, has supplied some of this goods. Spain can also supply some of the similar merchandise, and there is no method available to guarantee such goods as coming from Loyalist Spain. The substitution of goods made under Nazi terrorism and Fascist dictatorship for raw materials produced under Japanese imperialism is certainly no sensible procedure."
>
> The average pair of silk stockings selling at 85 cents contains Japanese silk to the value of about 10 cents. Thus in order to do 10 cents' worth of harm to Japan we are hurting American industry about 75 cents' worth. But it is claimed that hosiery workers can just as easily make full-fashioned hosiery from lisle or rayon. If this were true, there would not be an opposition to the boycott; unfortunately it is not. Lisle hosiery cannot be made on approximately 40 per cent of the machinery in the industry. This includes the fine-gauge knitting machines which make sheer stockings. As a result, the boycott will not only hurt hosiery workers but will hurt the union which they have built and which will be admitted generally to be one of the progressive unions.
>
> An additional effect of the boycott has been to encourage the use of non-union stockings. This is particularly true of the stockings made from Bemberg. While the yarn from which these stockings are made may be made under union conditions, yet so far as we are able to find out, there is no union mill knitting stockings of Bemberg.
>
> May I emphasize the fact that the hosiery union is emphatically in favor of a boycott of Japanese manufactured goods. We feel that the exemption from silk of a Japanese boycott will not so greatly help Japan in its struggle as to justify the dislocation it [the boycott] would cause in American industry and to our union. Raw silk is about 15 per cent of Japanese exports, and in boycotting Japan we would also inevitably hit somewhat at China, which supplies some 10 per cent of the world's supply of silk and about 4 per cent of the American supply.
>
> LAWRENCE ROGIN

We are pleased to give space to this letter because it reflects the views of those who have been most active in opposition to the silk boycott. While we do not believe hardships suffered in this country should dissuade anyone from refusing to aid Japanese aggression, we are wholly sympathetic with the union's demand that it should not alone bear the brunt of an action that concerns the whole country. It is therefore important to point out the groundlessness of the union's fears as well as to cast light on the dubious methods being employed by the allies of Japan in this country.

Let us look at the facts: (1) The boycott will not "affect seriously the Chinese production of raw silk." In 1936 only 4 per cent of America's $102,000,000 worth of silk imports came from China; at the present time, owing to the Japanese occupation of Chinese ports, virtually no Chinese silk is available. (2) Germany's total exports of cotton and lisle hosiery to this country in 1937 were just one-third of 1 per cent of the domestic production. In recent months it has been less, owing to a sharp rise in the output of American factories. (3) We have a letter before us from the Spanish consul general informing us categorically that all Spanish hosiery in this country comes from Loyalist territory.

(4) Granting that the average cost of silk in each pair of silk stockings is not much more than 10 cents, the fact remains that nearly $50,000,000 worth of Japanese silk is used annually in hosiery alone. At present nearly 75 per cent of the Japanese silk imported into this country goes into hosiery, and the bulk of the remainder into underwear. (5) As to omitting silk from the list of boycotted articles, our imports of silk from Japan in 1931-36 were more than ten times as large as the combined imports of cotton cloth, crabmeat, chinaware, tea, dolls and toys, and earthenware—the six items of imports from Japan next in volume.

(6) With regard to employment and wages in the hosiery industry, it will be noted that the letter admits that 60 per cent of the machinery can be used for lisle. The lisle nets require extra labor. As to the remainder of the machines we should like to quote from an authoritative study just completed by Eugene Staley, associate professor of international economic relations at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy:

> With some delay and some technical difficulties the knitting machines might be diverted from silk to rayon. An official of the National Association of Hosiery Manufacturers writes that "we are prepared to furnish the American public with whatever they desire in the line of hosiery. . . . Our equipment can turn out hosiery of other commodities, but . . . these commodities would be different from silk."
>
> While there might be some dislocations here and there in the silk and hosiery manufacturing, any unemployment would not be great in volume or very lasting. On the other hand, to replace the raw silk usually imported from Japan by rayon or cotton substitutes produced in America, there would have to be substantial increases in output, and hence in employment.

(7) Under the circumstances, it would seem particularly important that the hosiery workers' union bring pressure on the employers to adjust their machines to silk substitutes lest non-union shops obtain the bulk of the new business. Unfortunately this has not been done, and for reasons which on the surface at least are scarcely indications of the "progressive" nature of the union leadership. The News Record, a trade paper, reported on December 21 that "the full-fashioned industry is coming to the conclusion that only a definite statement by the American Federation of Hosiery Workers can counteract possible damaging inroads into the business in the first quarter of 1938." The New York Times on January 25 reported the formation of a Silk Industry Joint Council to fight the boycott. The joint council included Mr. Rieve, William H. Gosch, president of the National Association of Hosiery Manufacturers, and Paolino Gerli, president of the International Silk Guild.

Less than three months have passed since the Rayon and Synthetic Yarn Producers' Committee asked the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the International Silk Guild as an alleged Japanese propaganda agency. The New York Times of November 13 carried this charge in detail, stating that "the officers and directors of the Silk Guild have available for propaganda work the sum of $725,000." Erwin Feldman, counsel for the National Association of House Dress Manufacturers, is quoted as declaring that "one thing has been learned—a certain silk guild went to Japan and got $500,000 and with that, among other things, hired speakers who asked women to demand fiber identification. Eighty per cent of the women's clubs which have sent in protests were visited by speakers paid by the government of Japan."

It must be added that these charges were denied by the International Silk Guild, and that the Federal Trade Commission declared that it had "no authority to institute an inquiry" unless it appeared that there had been a violation of law. Nevertheless, it is distressing, to say the least, to find the president of a "progressive" trade union serving on the same council with such a group. Perhaps the union cannot be held responsible for the actions of its president, but we trust that it will repudiate Mr. Rieve's unfortunate stand on the boycott.

Massacre River

THE Republic of Haiti (Dictator, Sténio Vincent) has accepted $750,000 from the Dominican Republic (Dictator, General Trujillo) as indemnity for the killing of 10,000 humble Haitians along the Haitian-Dominican border. (The name of the stream that runs along the border is Massacre River.) The 10,000 were hacked, stabbed, and shot to death—with dull-edged machetes, daggers, machine-guns, and the brand of rifle carried by the soldiers of the Dominican army. A few were trussed up and drowned. The victims were Haitian workers, their wives and children. Thousands of them moved from overpopulated Haiti to the Dominican Republic when the war boom in sugar created a great demand for labor. Since then jobs have dwindled, and anti-Haitian feeling has been officially encouraged in the Dominican Republic. The killings took place in a desolate, inaccessible region where thousands of dead could be buried or burned, out of sight of civilization. Survivors left for dead crept out to Haitian villages to tell a tale of horror that was substantiated by their wounds and by Haitian refugees who had escaped the same fate at the hands of the Dominicans under orders from Trujillo City.

The story is one of the most gruesome ever told. Yet Vincent as well as Trujillo tried at first to minimize it. Both governments tried to suppress or tone down news of the "incident," and in a joint communiqué on October 15 reaffirmed the cordial relations of the two dictators. But feeling continued to run high, and in November the Haitian government asked the United States, Cuba, and Mexico to aid in mediation. The Dominicans at first refused to participate, but later yielded.

According to the agreement, which was signed in Washington, presumably with the blessing of the United States, the Dominican government stipulates that it does not recognize the responsibility of the state but agrees to abide by the findings of the Dominican tribunals which are conducting an investigation, and to give the results full publicity. It is not difficult to imagine what kind of report Trujillo's tribunals will deliver to Trujillo's government.

It has been painfully obvious from the beginning that those officially involved are not primarily concerned with the 10,000 murders, which were quickly transformed into "a controversy which has unfortunately arisen." Washington's main concern has been to prevent war between the two countries, and that is understandable. But what of its announced determination to prevent the growth of fascism in the Western Hemisphere? Race as well as class feeling played a part in the events of Massacre River, and fascist influence is strong in Trujillo City. A thorough official investigation by the mediators and a report that identified and indicted the murderers of the 10,000 would have had an excellent effect on the little Hitlers of Central and South America. Instead Trujillo is now in a position to whitewash a major crime —with the concurrence of all "good neighbors."

F. D. R. Under Two Flags

BY PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 31

TO SAY the Administration hasn't the slightest notion whether it is coming or going might be stretching it. Chances are it still thinks it is going, but doesn't know where. It is not pleasant thus to concur in a censure which seems to be on the tongue of nearly every fathead and porch climber at large, but the truth must be recognized regardless of the company in which it is found. The most discernible quality of the Administration today is its lack of direction. Roosevelt needs a domestic policy. He has listened to his warring counselors long enough. He cannot continue to fight under two flags. At the moment his uncertainty is most painfully apparent, perhaps, in connection with government activity in the power field and the regulation of industry in general. In one instance it is illustrated by his attitude toward the struggle between the TVA and Wendell Willkie's Commonwealth and Southern system; in the other, by his position between the irreconcilable philosophies of Robert Jackson and Donald Richberg. Sooner or later the President has got to decide how much government ownership he favors, and whether he wants the anti-trust laws enforced or discarded for some form of "voluntary self-regulation." It's simple, if not easy.

In the matter of power there is substantial evidence that the President knows his own mind, but hesitates to speak it for fear of the possible effect on business. In the end he may elect to damn the torpedoes and go ahead, but he isn't gathering any headway. Indications are that he favors the program of Senator Norris, which, to put it roughly, is to have the government generate, transmit, and sell electricity wherever such a course would serve the essential purposes of flood control, navigation, soil conservation, and other public ends to which private companies cannot, by their very nature, give a passing thought. Yet he persists in repeating that only about 15 per cent of the private power industry is in actual or potential competition with the TVA, thus conveying an impression that competition on a much greater scale is not contemplated. Having recently accompanied the President on his visits to Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and Fort Peck, and listened to his speeches at each, I cannot, I am glad to say, be impressed by any such hints. I am convinced that he contemplates government competition on a very wide scale—or did before the recession sneaked up on him. He shouldn't let it divert him. This is no time to be pulling a Hoover. Willkie's grandstand play of offering to sell out to the government should not deceive even the bleacherites. Willkie is enough of a lawyer to know there isn't a chance in a million the Supreme Court would appoint one of a commission of three to fix the price.

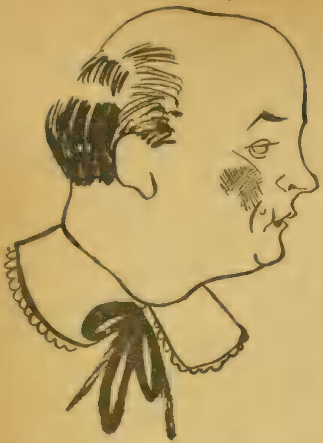
That Donald Richberg continues to play around with the quaint idea of self-regulation by big business is evidence of his optimism and perseverance, or something. Unlike some, I do not ascribe it to his old immersion in the NRA. One of the most effective persuaders who ever hypnotized a bankers' convention, he is a conciliator by nature, and since Henry Ford and General Motors replaced labor unions in his clientele he finds the quality more useful than ever. That is not to disparage his ability or his good intentions, for both of which I have a high respect. Nevertheless, his faith in the intelligence and civic spirit of men of the type of Tom Girdler, Eugene Grace, and James Rand has grown immeasurably since the days when he was fighting Sam Insull in Chicago. Perhaps he has been unduly influenced by "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs."

Richberg's views undoubtedly carry weight at the White House, as they should, but how much they would carry in Congress on this issue is the more important question. The NRA is still an unpleasant memory there. Senator Borah had lunch at the White House last week. Asked later what he thought of the prospects for a loosening of the anti-trust laws to permit industrial self-regulation, the Senator emulated Little Audrey. He just laffed and laffed.

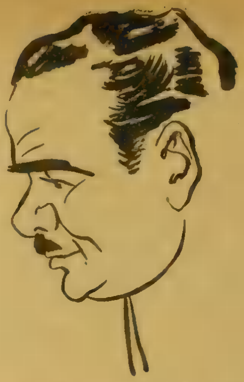
How big business and its journalistic spokesmen feel over the prospects may be divined from the howls of lamentation which greeted the conviction of sixteen oil companies and thirty company officials in the conspiracy trial at Madison, Wisconsin. The indolence and lack of precision of armchair correspondents and commentators are no excuse for the gross inaccuracies about this case which have flooded the papers. A large part of the public probably believes these officials were prosecuted and convicted for having patriotically done what the government had asked them to do. This is because most of the published comment simply stated as facts what the defense had contended during the trial—and what the government refuted and the jury disbelieved. I pass over what may have been written by Dorothy Thompson or Boake Carter since I seldom read either. Let us consider, instead, the observations of the impeccable Arthur Krock in the impeccable New York Times. On January 27 he stated: "For proceeding to stabilize price conditions in the demoralized crude-petroleum fields under the powerful pressure of one branch of the Roosevelt Administration, thirty oil-company managers now stand as convicted criminals, a result of prosecution by another branch." As the chief basis for this remarkable declaration he averred that "the jury was not permitted to take into consideration" a certain letter from Secretary Ickes,

From a Gallery of Young Turks

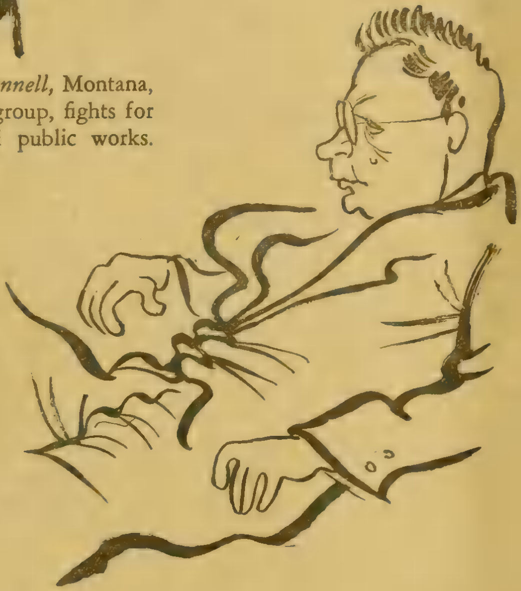
BY GEORGES SCHREIBER



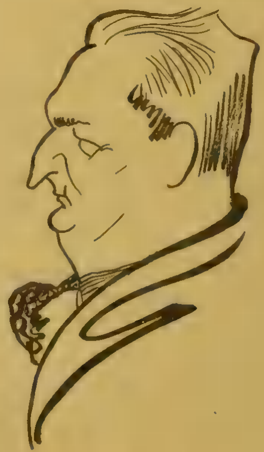
Jerry J. O'Connell, Montana, baby of the group, fights for more federal public works.



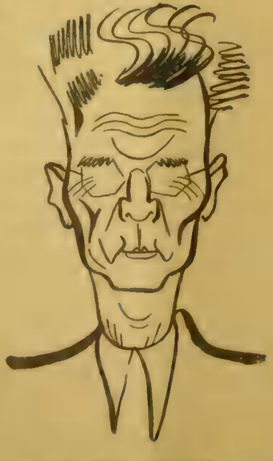
John T. Bernard, Minnesota, battled alone against embargo on Spain because "Neutrality It Is Not!"



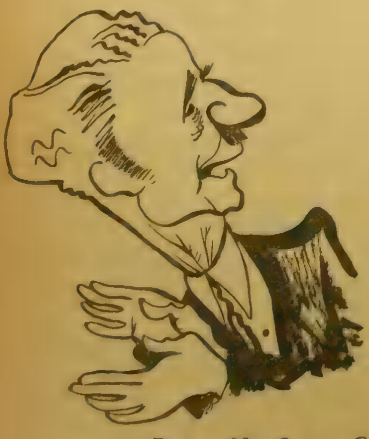
Maury Maverick, Texas, informal leader of the Turks, orates for anti-lynch laws in a Southern drawl.



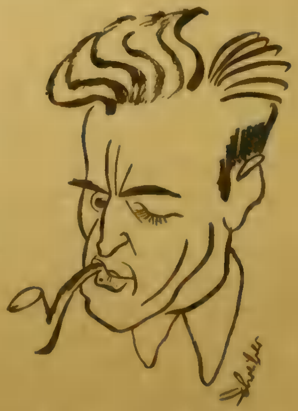
John M. Coffee, Washington, would subsidize art through a federal Fine Arts Bureau.



Henry G. Teigan, Minnesota, battles for wage-hour legislation and real aid to the farmer.



Byron N. Scott, California, would outdo Wagner in giving America cheap public housing.



H. Jerry Voorhis, California, whose Industrial Expansion bill is a standing challenge to scarcity.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

administrator of the NRA petroleum code, to Charles Arnott, one of the defendants. The facts are: Although the letter showed on its face that it did not and could not refer to the crude-oil "buying program" which constituted the heart of the conspiracy, it was introduced in evidence by the prosecution itself. The original "buying program" was publicly terminated by Secretary Ickes in November, 1935. Subsequently another such program was undertaken in the face of a warning by Ickes. Activities under it were carried out secretly, and the defense made every attempt to conceal them from the jury. To one who was present at the trial it seemed clear that the law was violated both before and after termination of the code. It was clear enough for the jury. In the case yet to be tried evidence of guilty knowledge on the part of the defendants is considered much stronger. For men engaged on a patriotic mission, they certainly spared no pains to cover their tracks.

Events in Washington, where the United Mine Workers are in convention, and in Miami, where the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor is enjoying the sun, seem to demonstrate that peace in labor's civil war is no nearer. John Lewis again has stated the terms on which the C. I. O. would enter the A. F. of L., and again they have been rejected. To explain this impasse solely as the product of wilful stubbornness or personal vanity or ambition on either side is a shallow exercise. The conflict is fundamental. If the C. I. O. unions are allowed to enter the A. F. of L. intact they are certain to dominate the full organization soon if not immediately. They either have the necessary numbers or would have them in a short time. On the other hand, for Lewis to accept terms which would mean dissolution of the huge new industrial unions and the arbitrary distribution of their members among the two-and-seventy jarring craft unions would be a horrible betrayal—and Dave Dubinsky knows it. A vast majority of these people would promptly cease to be union members, because it is a demonstrated fact that mass-production industries cannot be organized on craft lines. In view of what has been said about Lewis's "obduracy," his "unreasonableness," and his "unwillingness to see any side except his own," I should like to record what he said to me recently concerning the attitude of the rank-and-file craft unionists.

"These men," he said, "have built up their unions. Through them they have gained a position of advantage in comparison with other workers, and a certain measure of security. In trying to preserve those unions they feel they are fighting for home and fireside, and you can't blame them much. Now, the C. I. O. would not wish to disturb them in the enjoyment of those advantages, but we can't guarantee them against the action of some future national convention. We can't give a bond for posterity. Unless they can bring themselves to yield to the historical logic and the obvious necessities of the situation—a situation created by the development of mass-production industry and technique—it is difficult to see how the conflict can be reconciled. Obviously we cannot abandon the very principle for which we elected to fight." Pollyanna editors and labor politicians please note.

Chicago Doesn't Care

BY MILTON S. MAYER

Chicago, January 25

"WELL," said Richard Croker, "what are you going to do about it?" The people of New York did something about Croker, but what Croker had defied them to do was something about it. Croker, under the name of "Murphy" or "Olvany" or another, came back. And he'll come back again, if not next time then the time after. Nothing that produces Crokers has been changed.

Every American city but one has done something about Croker at least once—even Boston. The one that has done nothing is Chicago. Charles E. Merriam, who ought to know, says that Chicago has never had reform. Chicago produced Capone and Insull and gave them the City Hall to play in. Capone and Insull put Chicago on the map. It wasn't Chicago's fault that hard times came and removed them both when the United States discovered how much they had got away with in unpaid taxes.

Back in the '90's, when Chicagoans were as naive as New Yorkers are today, they dangled nooses in front of the aldermen and did something about the "boodlers"; but nothing about the boodle. Those were the days, too, when the attorney for the First National Bank defended the Haymarket anarchists; but the publisher of the News convinced the prosecutor, and the prosecutor convinced the judge, that men who talked anarchy were guilty whoever threw the bomb. Today Chicago is sophisticated. It knows that it can't do anything about "it"; so it doesn't bother to do anything about "them." Chicago won't stand for Ed Kelly any longer because Ed is clumsy. A man who dismantles the schools right in front of the school children makes a city look foolish. And a sophisticated city doesn't want to look foolish.

Chicago won't get reform, because it doesn't want it. There isn't a citizens' organization in town. The City Club wonders why the average cost of black top surfacing on WPA projects is $2.36 a square yard in Chicago and $1 in Detroit, but the City Club is "non-political"; so it just wonders. The Civic Federation and the Committee on Public Expenditures "are supported by practically all the large taxpayers and business interests," according to the Illinois Company, which specializes in municipal bonds. They stand firmly for non-political reduction of taxes—not sales taxes but property taxes. They object to big budgets. So did the New York business men's committee which found that city's books in order six months before the Tweed ring smashed. Chicago doesn't care. Out goes one New Deal Ed Kelly, in the mayoralty election next year, and in comes another New Deal Ed Kelly, a smoother cut from the same cloth, consecrated to the same ideals. The White Knight slated to be Chicago's next mayor is State's Attorney Thomas J. Courtney. Ed Kelly's crowd call him Honest Tom.

The New Deal Democrats split in the 1936 primaries, when the "organization" tried to dump Governor Horner, because he sponsored a permanent registration law, and Courtney, because he was getting too big to handle. Horner, Courtney, and the teamsters' union bosses are the "reform" organization. Kelly, the building-trades bosses, and an ever-dwindling number of ward committeemen are the "regular" organization. The fight is a fight for power, nothing else. Reform is not an issue between these two sets of patriots who kept each other's hands in the city's pocket for twenty years. The New Deal is not an issue between New Dealer Courtney and New Dealer Kelly, for Courtney is owned by Colonel Frank Knox, who calls the New Deal fascism, and Kelly is owned by Colonel McCormick, who calls the New Deal communism. There is only one issue between these groups, and Chicago knows it and doesn't care.

The country still talks about the South Chicago massacre. Chicago has forgotten it. To be sure, a mob of what the Tribune called "assistant Communists"—including the president of the Chicago Church Federation —held some kind of protest meeting and defended the mob of what the News called "rioters." But the Chicago papers, except for the Times, didn't fall for the old Communist gag of protest meetings. There was some squawking about a suppressed newsreel, but the Chicago papers didn't fall for the old Communist gag of "freedom of the press"; Mayor Kelly suppressed the newsreel because one riot was enough, and Mayor Kelly was right.

Anyway, didn't a coroner's jury, selected at random and composed entirely of unemployed legionnaires, require only fifty-six seconds, after an inquest which lasted ten days, to decide that the rioters, including a baby eating a popsicle, were trying to break into Tom Girdler's defenseless factory and murder the workers? And wasn't this proved by Mr. Courtney's assistant when he asked Dr. Jacques, who testified that seven of the dead men had been shot in the back, "Was your name ever Jacobson?" even though Jacques—whose father, also a physician, was also born Jacques—denied it? Of course, there were a few pieces that didn't quite match. It was funny that a mob "armed with revolvers," as the Tribune said, and bent on breaking into a factory and murdering the workers didn't shoot a single policeman, even though, as the Tribune said, "the mob began firing on the bluecoats." Then there was that talk about Tom Girdler's having donated the clubs and the gas used by the police. (But if that had been true it would have been in the Chicago papers.) And there was the Tribune's streamer story about the "plot," in which "one of the wounded rioters" in a confession "carefully guarded by the police" told how the rioters had been drilled for two days "in twenty-four platoons of twenty-four men each." Mayor Kelly had already announced that "the riot was caused by outside mobs who came to Chicago for the purpose of making trouble." Courtney's assistants told the Tribune that the confession was "the most important of their evidence," and Courtney said, "My report will speak for itself."

Even Chicagoans who didn't care may have wondered, for a while, what became of the confession and the report. But those that wondered figured that, even though one side always gets killed, "both sides are probably wrong." So the best thing to do was forget it. Let New York and St. Louis and La Follette worry about it. Why shouldn't Chicago forget, when the A. F. of L. had turned its back on the dead and the C. I. O. had turned its back on the living? John Fitzpatrick, who directed the 1919 steel strike and once committed the Chicago Federation of Labor to industrial unionism, decided that the ten men dead for steel and industrial unionism were "of no concern to the Chicago Federation of Labor because it was a C. I. O. strike."

A month ago the lawyers for the Mine Workers and the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee, representing the fifty-odd surviving "rioters" indicted for unlawful assembly, reached an agreement with Courtney's assistants whereby the men and women who tried to break into a steel plant and murder the workers pleaded guilty and were fined $1. A trial would have shaken America—and Chicago besides. It would certainly have wrecked Kelly and probably Courtney—possibly Henry Horner, too, who conferred with the heads of the struck plants and said nothing. Chicago labor would have known where it stood, and the Labor Party wouldn't be a paper organization in Illinois today, nor would Labor's Non-Partisan League have to choose between Louis XIV and Louis XV in its search for friends to reward.

The reform movement in Chicago consists of serious groups of little thinkers sitting around and telling each other how New York did it. All the movement lacks is leaders, followers, money, forums, an organization, and a press. With the Democrats split and the Republicans and the Communists off the ballot, a minority candidate on a reform ticket might win. The city has never been riper for it. But Harold Ickes is the only Chicagoan with sufficient prestige to tackle the job, and Ickes can't convince himself that he ought to leave the Cabinet and fly to ills he wots not of. If Roosevelt wanted to reform Chicago (which he doesn't), the Horner-Courtney machine could be forced to accept Ickes as a candidate. This wouldn't dispose of Courtney, who would probably have to be thrown a senatorship, but it would get him out of town. The Beacon, Chicago's latest literary-reform venture, says that Ickes will run neither for senator this year nor for mayor next, and the Beacon is close to Ickes. In the end the reform talkers will string along with Courtney. An examination of Courtney's record would explode the newspaper myth of the driving, fearless prosecutor; but Chicago doesn't examine records. Courtney is supposed to have reduced crime, but in the "Uniform Crime Reports" Chicago occupies the same position it held in 1931—that of the most lawless city in the nation.

The Tribune will tell you who really reduced crime in Chicago: "Thanks to the spirit which Mayor Kelly has instilled in the force, the police are doing a better job of crime prevention and detection than this city has known in a generation." But even the Tribune joins the Association of Commerce and the ladies' clubs in extolling Courtney, for in Courtney they have a man who is hell on people who violate the laws against stealing bread, sleeping under bridges, or begging in the streets. Leaving prosecuting to his assistants, Courtney summons the reporters and issues a public warning to criminals to watch out. He warns all classes of criminals and prosecutes some. He prosecutes no election frauds. He prosecutes no tax or receivership cases. The Board of Tax Appeals reduced the 1933 valuation of the Tribune's capital stock from $4,023,619 to $1,447,006; Fortune placed the 1933 value of the Tribune's capital stock at $53,600,000.

But Chicago doesn't care. Still on Courtney's long list of unsolved murders are those of two state representatives, both of them gambling operators. He lost his only two cases against public officials showing shortages—Sweitzer and Zintak. After the Sweitzer comedy the News, which now calls Tom Dewey "the Courtney of New York," said: "Two things need to be demonstrated in Cook County, first, that political office-holders are subject to the law; second, that the state's attorney's office is no respecter of political persons when violation of the law is the issue." His three "drives" against racketeers resulted in a case apiece against contractors, streetcar-accident fakers, and ambulance chasers, and all three cases were lost.

Like Kelly, Courtney is a friend of organized labor. A few months ago Mike Galvin, whose teamsters' union Courtney had "outlawed" with the assistance of a three-time convict named "Lefty" Lynch, was murdered in gangsterless Chicago. A $1,000 check made out to—and indorsed by—Courtney was found in Galvin's safe-deposit box. Courtney said he had received the check from the Motor Truck Operators' Association "for a legal fee for services as attorney for the association in 1930 when it achieved repeal of the public-cart license." The public-cart license was repealed by the Illinois legislature, and Courtney was a state senator from 1926 to 1932. In addition to his salary as a state senator and fees from associations whose legislative interests he advanced, Courtney drew pay from the people of Chicago for serving in all three of the following capacities from August, 1927, to December, 1928: assistant attorney (one of 404) for Ed Kelly's Sanitary District at $6,000 a year; secretary of the Chicago City Council Building and Zoning Committee at $4,000 a year; sergeant-at-arms of the City Council at $1,500 a year. But a man has to make a living. And Chicago doesn't care.

Of all the things Chicago doesn't care about, gambling is the most prosperous. Several months ago—after four years as state's attorney—Courtney discovered that the citizens of Cook County were betting on horse races. The Tribune announced, without criticizing the law-enforcement agencies, that "the revived Capone mob" was doing a $2,000,000-a-day handbook business. The state's attorney called in the reporters and announced that he was going to clean up gambling not only in Cook County but in Mayor Kelly's Chicago. Honest Tom's war on gambling consisted of the regular well-photographed raids. Gambling is as wide open as ever. The big syndicators are still riding high, but Courtney has called them some terrible names. The implications of this invasion of the local police area by the state's attorney's police are profound. With the "reform" organization cleaning up gambling, a Democratic ward committeeman with a constituent in the gambling business would be silly to turn to his old friends in the "regular" organization to find out how about it. The grapevine carries word of steady desertions of ward leaders from Kelly to Courtney and Horner.

With the city's budget exceeding current tax and license revenue, Kelly recently had his city council legalize handbooks in bald evasion of Illinois law. Horner, who calls for a state income tax when he's a candidate and enacts a 3 per cent sales tax when he's governor, was horrified by Kelly's brazen method of squeezing the turnip. Kelly, who has never been accused of a sense of humor, explained: "We are not going to license handbooks. We hope to regulate brokers as agents of the legalized process of buying parts of a horse." It was no surprise when the fighting prosecutor joined the Governor in viewing with alarm this diversion of a part of the "take" to Mayor Kelly's bulging budget.

Why doesn't Chicago care? Because it's sophisticated? Not entirely. Even a sophisticate kicks when his watch is stolen. But a drunk doesn't care what time it is. Chicago is young and rich, as cities go. Its bonded debt is low. Dun and Bradstreet finds the "underlying situation" "fundamentally sound," although "large current cash difficulties have been accumulated because of conditions which are essentially administrative rather than fiscal."

Behind Chicago's what-the-hell's-the-use lies the systematic exploitation of a city still young and rich by those interests whose privileges the city supports. Of course the tax rate is second only to Boston's, and the tax delinquency is the highest in the country. But anything is better than a sales tax, and leading citizens can always go to Mayor Kelly's Board of Tax Appeals. Chicago's credit is weak; its bonds are currently bringing a higher yield than any comparable municipals except one-industry Detroit's. But judgment day is far off.

Chicago is young and rich. Look at it. There are 200,000 Negroes living in tenements meant to house 150,000, and getting restless. Construction is stagnant because you can't build a modern structure in Chicago without violating the sixty-year-old building code—and paying for the privilege. Wooden "L" trains demolish each other and street cars crawl; the aldermen have been "studying" the traction problem for thirty years. Chicago has the highest traffic-accident rate in the country and one "super-highway" with a speed limit of thirty-five miles per hour. The sales tax enables the poor to pay for their own relief; and the aldermen are "considering" the Tribune's proposal to finger-print the recipients. The school system spends a larger proportion of its budget on non-instructional items than the school administration of any other metropolis.

The News, with Courtney in its pocket and reform in its soul, blames it all on Kelly. The Tribune used to blame it all on Thompson. But the fact is, and will be, that Chicago doesn't even get Christmas baskets for its money. Courtney is handsomer than Kelly and Knox is brighter than McCormick, but a bright and handsome machine will not reverse the trend of a city that doesn't care. Some day Chicago will sober up and find its watch gone. Then it will get sore—at the politicians. It will demand to be saved—from the politicians. Well, the Nazis campaigned for clean government with the argument that the Mayor of Berlin got an overcoat wholesale.

Why France Has No Dictator

BY M. E. RAVAGE

THE fall of the Chautemps government on January 14 was in itself neither important nor surprising. Everyone in the least familiar with developments in France had been expecting it for months. But it was something of a shock to find that the Popular Front had suddenly gone the way of all flesh, that despite the solemn oaths and the dire warnings that held it together, it had broken down like the cartels before it. The dissolution of a parliamentary majority, however, should not be mistaken for the failure of a popular movement. The quarrels and ineptitudes of the leaders should not be confused with the will of a people, nor the political coalition in the Chambers with the cohesive masses in the country. The local (canton) elections of last October showed clearly where the nation's heart was. Though intrigue and discord even then threatened the solidarity of the parties, the rank and file kept the faith, often in spite of the candidates. It is a safe prediction that were the voters to be consulted today they would still return a comfortable left majority. This probability, along with one or two other reasons, makes it unlikely that President Lebrun will dissolve the present Chamber and appeal to the country.

The constancy of the French people is not to be wholly explained by ideology or their ingrained repugnance for dictatorship, nor yet by the tradition inherited from '89, which in France so often makes even a well-to-do landowner or business man vote "left" on Election Day. The wage-earners, no doubt, are influenced by these things. But the middle classes have been profoundly disillusioned by eighteen months of strikes, financial instability, social turmoil, rising prices, and diplomatic weakness. They would make substantial sacrifices for a "strong" and lasting government. And yet they remain faithful to the Popular Front. Workers, peasants, shopkeepers, civil servants, even small capitalists would again stand together and vote left—and primarily out of patriotism. Their solidarity, they are convinced, is a condition of French security. They have not forgotten that Laval nearly succeeded in ruining the British alliance and isolating France. The left may be weak and inefficient and ridden by politicians. But the right is all these and blind into the bargain. The left lacks unity. But the right is chaos. And since it is precisely discord and disorder that the foreign foe desires for France, there is no choice for Frenchmen who love their country but to stand by the People's Front.

Signs that all was not harmonious among the "parties of order" have abounded for two years. Just before the elections of 1936 an attempt to organize a National Front in opposition to the Popular Front ended in riot and broken heads. If one read the rightist press one got the impression that the numerous factions devoted to the "reconciliation" of the French people were incompatible. The royalists were contemptuous of Colonel de la Rocque and accused him of misleading the Croix de Feu. Stranger still, the royalists mistrusted and made insinuations against the royal princes. André Tardieu noisily banged the door of the Chamber of Deputies, wrote a book to explain why, and retired to the Riviera to sulk. Jacques Doriot, having quit the Communist Party, plastered the walls and fences of France with attacks on the Soviets, provoked riots in St. Denis and Marseilles, but made little headway toward a dictatorship. Each little group charged the others with responsibility for the merciless rout of the nationalists at the polls. A renewed effort for union merely brought an alliance between Doriot and the Louis Marin faction. La Rocque, for whom the bait was intended, did not bite. Then in the summer of 1937 the tempo suddenly quickened.

What followed is, in part at least, known to the American newspaper reader, but the tale is worth repeating for the light it throws on the processes by which spontaneous nationalistic movements for the regeneration of mankind are launched, and on the obstacles which they encounter in countries with a civilized tradition like France. This is roughly the outline of the story.

The wealthy Duke Pozzo di Borgo, at present languishing in a Paris prison as a Cagoulard but for a number of years the principal angel of the Croix de Feu, began appearing as a contributor of literary wares in the weekly journal Choc, edited by a Colonel Guillaume. The paper, reputedly inspired by the Dominicans and avowedly clerical in aim, had for months been attacking the leader of the Croix de Feu. At the same time the royalist Action Française was charging the unhappy La Rocque with all the crimes in the calendar, and insinuations of varying degrees of virulence were appearing throughout the nationalist press, notably in Doriot's lately acquired Liberté and—to the general astonishment—in Léon Bailby's Jour, hitherto the staunchest supporter of La Rocque and his organization. The climax was reached early last summer. In July Choc featured an interview by Pozzo with André Tardieu in which the ex-Premier revealed that throughout his term as head of the Cabinet he had subsidized the Croix de Feu with the taxpayers' money, by regular allowances from the government's slush fund (fonds secrets). The effect of this bombshell may be imagined. All eyes now turned to the Petit Journal, which had passed under the editorship of La Rocque. But the Colonel kept silent, neither confirming nor denying the charge. Shortly afterward Guillaume, the editor of Choc, was attacked and nearly killed in the garden of his country estate by two men subsequently caught and identified as members of La Rocque's French Social Party.

After several weeks of rumination the Colonel decided at last to take notice of the Tardieu accusation. At the congress of his party at Lyons he told his followers that his ex-friend Pozzo di Borgo had forfeited the respect of honest men by circulating calumnies against his former chief. This was the very opportunity the Duke had been waiting for in order to force La Rocque into the open. Immediately he filed suit in the Lyons courts for libel. On the witness stand Tardieu made a barbecue of the pitiable La Rocque. He repeated what he had told Pozzo in the interview, embroidering it with delectable details and correcting one or two minor slips. Later he amplified the story further in the Paris courts, to which La Rocque had been reckless enough to summon in his turn some fourteen newspaper publishers and reporters—running all the way from Léon Daudet of the Action Française to Lucien Sampaix of l'Humanité and including Léon Bailby and Colonel Guillaume—on the charge of having libeled him by printing the Tardieu interview.

Tardieu's story in brief was as follows: For nearly six years (between July, 1926 and May, 1932), during which period he was, with two brief interruptions, a member of the government (Minister of Agriculture and of the Interior and twice Premier), he had kept up regular relations with Colonel de la Rocque. The chief of the Croix de Feu had been recommended to him originally by a high personage in the army. On his third visit the Colonel asked the Minister for money. He was, he said, expanding his organization and would appreciate financial assistance from the national government—that is to say, from the parliamentary republic he aimed to destroy. Tardieu was "happy to have a force of order to oppose to the Communists"—the classic pretext. In eighteen months La Rocque came some twenty-five or twenty-six times, not to the Ministry of the Interior, as Choc had erroneously reported, but to the Minister's residence on the Avenue de Messine, and each time asked for and obtained a sum of money. On an average the payments came to 20,000 francs a month. Tardieu continued for three months to dispense the secret funds. After that he passed on the "customer" to his successor. The new Premier, Pierre Laval, being a native of Auvergne, "did not have the same ideas" as his predecessor about squandering the public moneys and cut the allowance in half. But when Tardieu came back to the Premiership he agreed, at La Rocque's request, to pay up the arrears. Laval refused to appear on the witness stand, but Colonel Guillaume swore by his wife and children that in private conversation Laval had confirmed the Tardieu charges against La Rocque.

In return for these generosities what was expected of the fire-eating Colonel? Nothing specific, except to be on hand when his patrons, Tardieu or Laval, traveled, and with a brass-lunged applause brigade of his followers to drown out the hostile cries of the opposition. Oddly enough, Laval for 10,000 francs a month got better results than Tardieu for 20,000. On Laval's return from America, for instance, (November 2, 1931) he was met at the station by a brigade commanded by the Colonel in person and (says Tardieu, who was there) given the greatest ovation of his life. It was on Laval's orders, too, that La Rocque broke up an international peace congress at the Trocadéro, presided over by Herriot and attended by foreign ambassadors and other distinguished delegates from abroad. But on the whole Tardieu had no cause to complain. La Rocque, he said on the witness stand, "was a good and faithful servant." Paul Gérin, in the weekly Vendredi, has gone to the pains of running down the newspaper accounts of these incidents, and in each instance Tardieu's statements appear to be confirmed.

Notwithstanding, many French nationalists are perplexed about where the truth lies. The Colonel, it is alleged, is an inveterate liar, but Tardieu's past is likewise far from lily-white. There is, to begin with, the dubious procedure of a minister revealing the use made of the government's secret funds. It is unprecedented. There are, moreover, the allegedly scandalous affairs of the Homs-Bagdad Railway and the N'goko Sangha mining enterprise, in which the young Tardieu is supposed to have been involved.

On the witness stand the editor of the daily Epoque, Henri de Kerillis, one of the few old supporters of La Rocque to stand by him in his hour of trouble, accused Tardieu to his face of having lied to him on previous occasions and boldly questioned his veracity now. De Kerillis, explained the "Tardieusards," could not very conveniently take sides against the Colonel, since his Chamber seat depends on the good-will of the Croix de Feu. The truth seems to be less simple. Kerillis, it appears, was elected in Neuilly, a reactionary suburban stronghold, by the for once united nationalists. Now that they have split between La Rocque and Tardieu, he is worried over 1940, when he comes up for reelection. Whatever the reasons for Kerillis's loyalty, La Rocque seems to have a particular talent for losing friends and making enemies. He forfeited the good-will of Bailby and the right press as a whole when he entered into competition with them by acquiring the Petit Journal. And by continually putting off the day of reckoning with the republic he drove his more impatient followers into the arms of the Cagoule, which seemed to mean business.

The famous Comité Secret d'Action Révolutionnaire did not share the Colonel's scruples about obtaining arms from the foes of France and endangering its security by following in Franco's footsteps. The Communists and Socialists stopped an incipient revolution in the spring of 1936 by persuading the workers that the breakdown of authority in France would bring not liberation but Hitler. The Cagoulards drew their recruits from the lunatic fringe of the Croix de Feu and members of kindred "nationalist" organizations who in private conversation proclaimed, "Better Hitler than the Popular Front!" La Rocque, it is only fair to say, would not believe these maniacs were serious, just as he refused to believe that Tardieu would betray him. Events have now convinced him. Disgruntled because the Colonel had failed to bring about a coup d'état in November, 1934, when the Radical Socialists with Herriot at their head pulled the props from under Doumergue, Tardieu vowed the destruction of the Croix de Feu which he had so lavishly nurtured with the republic's money.

The royalists sensed danger when the Colonel's brother entered the service of "the Princes" and got the Young Pretender, the so-called Comte de Paris, to publish in Paris a journal of his own, the Courrier Royal. Last summer open war broke out between the royalists and the royal family—a situation which only a comic genius could have invented. Matters came to such a pass that the Duc de Guise publicly accused the Action Française of "exploiting instead of serving the royal cause." After being excommunicated by the Catholic church some years ago, the royalist leaders Maurras and Daudet have rounded out their farcical careers by being repudiated by the pretender to the throne!

In all this battle Jacques Doriot has played scarcely any part—for a good reason. He is having trouble enough holding his own followers in line. The left weekly Flèche has for a number of weeks been publishing the letters of ex-leaders of the Doriotiste P. P. F. who have discovered that their chief, while pretending to be anti-capitalist and anti-Communist, was in reality anti-left but on the best of terms with the financial oligarchy.

Small wonder that the Völkischer Beobachter, surely an eminent authority, recently declared that "until further notice the French nationalists have ceased to count." The only question is whether the credit for fascism's failure in France is to be given to the Popular Front or to the aspiring Führers themselves.

Next—The Radio Newspaper

BY RUTH BRINDZE

THERE is no longer anything speculative about printing newspapers in the home by radio. Merely by adding a facsimile attachment you can convert an ordinary radio into a printing-press capable of picking news and pictures from the air and setting them down in black and white. Orders are already pouring into the factory and within the next few months these facsimile machines, potentially the most socially significant invention since the development of the printing-press, will be operating in homes throughout the country.

Several machines which have been developed to a point where they can now be placed in service are described in the current report of the Federal Communications Commission. The Radio Corporation of America, which controls many of the fundamental radio patents, of course, has one. But the Finch machine, the invention of a former engineer of the Communications Commission, so far dominates the field. In appearance these machines are deceptively simple. To broadcast printed material, the type and pictures must be converted into electrical impulses. In the Finch transmitting machine this is accomplished by means of a tiny bulb, or "scanning light," which moves across the page reflecting back to a photo-electric cell the light and dark values of each line. The electric cell, in turn, converts these light and dark qualities into the electrical impulses which can be transmitted by the radio station through its regular broadcasting equipment. The facsimile receiving set, a neat little box approximately the size of a table radio, picks up these signals and by means of a stylus moving across a roll of carbon-backed paper reconverts them into the light and dark lines which form letters and pictures. It is printing without ink and without type. No one makes any pretense that the machines have been fully perfected. But they work more efficiently than did the first radio receiving sets of the early 1920's, and their full technical development will not take long. The Finch machines now produce only a three-column paper, but they can easily be made to print a tabloid of five columns. The present rate of printing is also comparatively slow, only one linear inch a minute, but this also can be speeded up.

The technical problems are far simpler than the social and economic ones, for if the development of facsimile broadcasting continues, as there is every reason to believe that it will, city folks as well as those who live on the farms can be supplied with newspapers and other reading material by radio. The Radio Corporation's facsimile receiver is already equipped with a blade for cutting the printed rolls of paper into convenient page sizes. With the addition of a simple binding device, books and magazines may be produced by the little radio printing machine. The possibilities are unlimited. As events take place, as history is made, the facsimile machines will produce directly in the home a contemporaneous printed record. No newspapers will be able to compete. Facsimile will be faster, more convenient, cheaper. At the trivial cost of the rolls of paper and the electric current, the audience will be supplied with more printed matter than it can read. Every day's paper may be as bulky as the Sunday Times; magazines and books will achieve a circulation of a hundred million.

Even now, before large-scale production has been begun, it is estimated that a facsimile receiving machine can be profitably sold for less than forty dollars. Eventually, Finch prophesies, a visual recording device will be included in the same cabinet with the apparatus for receiving oral broadcasts. And everyone will have one, for perhaps the only way of getting a newspaper and other printed matter will be by radio. Television has not yet been perfected; the audience must await the solution of technical problems before movies can be produced in the home. But facsimile is ready today.

Both Finch and the Federal Communications Commission are fully awake to the potentialities of the machine but avoid a discussion of the broader problems by suggesting a limited use. Radio newspapers, Finch says, will supplement, not supplant, the press as we have it today. Facsimile will lead to the development of a new style of writing; reports will be terse, in bulletin form, and for further details the audience will still have to buy a newspaper. The publishers comforted themselves with this theory several years ago when radio began to compete with the press in the distribution of news, but soon had to abandon it, and they have undoubtedly learned from past experience that the way to overcome competition is to operate the facsimile machines themselves. Of course the ultimate control of facsimile will remain with the public, just as the power to regulate oral broadcasting has been left in its hands. If you don't like the program, you flip the switch; and if the editorial selection of Station Y and Z is as distasteful as that of Station X, you can shut off the machine entirely. For the reader who is hard to please there will always be the books printed before inventive genius developed printing by radio.

The present policy of the Federal Communications Commission on facsimile broadcasting is one of cautious planlessness. Licenses are being issued for experimental purposes and on a temporary basis. This relieves the commission of the necessity of determining immediately who shall control the machines so that their operation will be "in the public interest." But temporary privileges have a way of achieving permanency in the radio world. Eight licenses have already been issued—to Stations WGN, Chicago; WSM, Nashville; KSD, St. Louis; WOR, Newark; WHO, Des Moines; WGH, Newport News; KFBK, Sacramento; and KMJ, Fresno; and a raft of other applications have been filed. Stations which have been willing to spend a modest fortune on facsimile experiments will have a strong argument for being permitted to continue visual broadcasting when the service proves successful.

Facsimile offers interesting possibilities of profit to the radio stations. It can be transmitted on the regular wave lengths and by means of existing broadcasting equipment. Moreover, instead of remaining idle for six or more hours out of every twenty-four, the machines can be kept busy transmitting printed news and paid advertising. The licenses so far issued permit the stations to use their wave lengths for visual service only between midnight and six in the morning, but eventually visual as well as oral broadcasts may be permitted at any hour.

To obtain a temporary license, a station must agree to place facsimile receiving sets in fifty or more homes within the area it serves. The method of selecting this trial audience is not specified, but if the unnamed guinea pigs like the service, their favorable reaction will be accepted as an expression of public approval, and facsimile broadcasting will be made available to all.

The commission declares in its report that it is chiefly interested in discovering what the public reaction will be and whether the cost of maintaining this new service will be prohibitive. But there are a number of other questions that must be answered. Should the control of facsimile be granted to the present operators of radio stations, giving them a monopoly of the printed as well as of the spoken word? Should facsimile be viewed merely as an adjunct of the press and the grants be made only to publishers? Will the constitutional guaranty of a free press be destroyed when facsimile newspapers are published by licensees of the government? Unless satisfactory answers are found to these and related problems facsimile machines may become new Frankenstein monsters in the homes of the people.

Afraid of Forgery?

BY BEATRICE SCHAPPER

AMERICANS pay out millions of dollars annually for devices which will protect them against check-raising and forgery. Fearful that their bank account may be wiped out at one stroke and ignorant of the law which protects them, otherwise shrewd business men fall easy prey to the knowing salesmen of check-writing machines, safety papers, and forgery insurance policies.

The actual amount spent on these various safeguards against loss by forgery cannot be determined. Strangely enough no figures on the amount of forgery insurance written can be obtained, though the totals for other kinds of insurance are easily procurable. Nor is the value of the output of the safety-paper manufacturers known. But government reports show that check-writer companies turned out, in round numbers, 1,800,000 machines in 1927, 2,350,000 in 1929, and 1,300,000 in 1931.

No user of a check-writing machine and safety paper is absolutely protected, for a clever forger can sponge out the colors—saving the signature—iron out the perforations, retint the paper, and finally write in his own amount. But since only experts possess the necessary technical equipment and skill, the introduction of these devices has made check-raising nearly a lost art. However, three ways of forging checks still remain: forging the signature, forging the indorsement, and counterfeiting the whole check. This margin of non-protection by machines and safety paper is recognized and capitalized by the surety and insurance companies. It is even admitted by the check-writer manufacturers, for the two leading firms offer free with the purchase of every machine an insurance policy good for two years. This is a clean give-away of the hollowness of their claims—the companies feel obliged to safeguard the safeguard!

The policy insures the purchaser of the check-writer and the bank upon which the check may be drawn against loss if there should be a forgery of the amount, number, date, or payee's name, not against forgery of the drawer's signature or against a forged indorsement. A policy is issued at a cost of twenty-five to fifty cents to the check-writer manufacturer, who in turn places bonds to indemnify the insurance company against liability under the policy. The individual accustomed to paying high rates for similar insurance may conclude from this arrangement that the risk of loss for the average depositor is really small. Besides, nearly all raised or altered checks are honored first by a bank other than that upon which they are drawn. If the latter then honors the forged check, the law permits recovery from the bank which cashed the check. This is true in all cases of forgery except when a depositor's signature has been counterfeited, and is one reason for the risk paucity.

The insurance company underwrites the risk at a net rate under one dollar per thousand dollars of insurance; in other words, the company wagers a thousand dollars to one it will not meet loss under the policy. How can this low rate be reconciled with advertising statements that forged and altered check losses reach $300,000,000 annually—a sum second only to the national loss from fire?

Almost every concern in the country carries forgery insurance. So dreaded is the specter of the forger that one company whose bank deposits never have gone and are never likely to go higher than $50,000 pays annually for $250,000 of forgery coverage. The star salesman of an insurance company in one of our largest cities rated in one year $18,000 in commissions on this type of insurance alone. Yet as far as the depositor himself is concerned, forgery insurance is almost entirely unnecessary; he is already adequately protected by law. The person who takes out a policy against forgery is really insuring not himself but his bank.

The negotiable-instruments law, which since 1924 has been in force in every state of the Union, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and the Philippines, makes the bank responsible for the loss which it causes the depositor through cashing a forged check. Not a single leading authority disputes this interpretation of the law; case after case decided in the courts substantiates it. It is true that a forgery must be proved by the drawer of a check before he can recover from a bank, but it must likewise be proved before he can recover from an insurance company. Does anyone harbor the belief that insurance companies are more willing than banks to part with their money?

Should one be the victim of a forgery so skilful that nobody can detect it, one is out of luck to be sure. But the technique of detection today has been made nearly perfect by the use of photography, the color screen, chemical tests, micrometry, and the microscope. Once the alteration is proved, the bank is responsible whether or not it used all ordinary care in honoring the check, for the law places that risk on the bank and not on the depositor. As a matter of fact, a bank managed by reputable men will not require impossible proofs of forgery or deny its legal responsibility, although many bank officials will hesitate to acknowledge clearly their own obligation under the law when asked for information. After all, when the depositors' expenditures for protective devices help the banks, why should the banks discourage them?

Forged signatures and indorsements need be the cause of little worry to drawers of checks, but they are matters of serious concern to those who cash or in some other way honor checks. To banks this risk may be well worth insuring against. Since 1922, therefore, several insurance companies have issued a bond to thousands of banks and trust companies. This bond, called a Bankers' Blanket Forgery and Alteration Bond, indemnifies the insured bank for all losses sustained through forged commercial paper. Since in a big year America uses $700,000,000,000 worth of checks, banks very properly insure themselves against loss on such a huge sum.

Although the bank is responsible for losses incurred through forged checks, the rights of a depositor may be sacrificed through negligence or delay. The time within which a depositor must examine his returned check vouchers and report forgery is fixed by law in some states; in others it is required simply to be a reasonable time; in still others it is fixed by agreement between the bank and the individual depositor. A depositor should find out which arrangement affects him. Moreover, the writer of checks may protect himself by observing certain simple precautions. He should be careful not to leave unfilled space on the payee line or on the amount line, and should write the amount in words as close to the left-hand margin as possible. Anyone who cashes a check for a stranger should follow the rules developed by the police department of the city of Tacoma, reputed a "tough town" for hot-check specialists. These are: (1) insist that the home address appear on the check and verify by the city directory; (2) ask to see driver's license, check signature, and bank book; (3) ask name of wife or husband, where employed, names of neighbors, and verify the information in suspicious cases.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE President's latest proposals for increasing the army and navy take us much farther along the road to genuine militarism and in many respects give no additional assurance that the country will be better defended, for the simple fact remains that we are arming without definite plan and without anything like adequate coordination of army and navy. The proposed addition of a force of 75,000 reserves to the regular army will be an important adjunct to our powerful military machine. With few exceptions all military men are propagandists for greater and greater forces and expenditures. The heads of no army or navy are ever satisfied; they are always asking for more. An increase of 2,000 regular army officers will make our army more than ever over-officered in proportion to the number of enlisted men; hence there will be an immediate demand in the next Congress that the number of enlisted men be raised so that there will be troops for these officers to command. Of the 12,777 officers we now have, many are necessarily on detached duty, some of which is valuable and necessary, some of which is not, like the training of high-school boys in the rudiments of military drill. The excuse is that we must have an extra supply of regular officers to command the millions of men we shall raise when war comes again.

It is needless to point out that it is extraordinarily difficult to reduce an army. (It was done in the reorganization of 1870 after the Civil War, when the occupation of the Southern states was growing less important.) Once you have a number of officers they feel that they have a life interest in their jobs and that it is unjust to turn them adrift, perhaps in middle age, when they have been trained for one career and nothing else. Thus the proposed addition to the number of regular officers will in all probability be a permanent charge and make more and more difficult the reduction of the federal budget. Of course the new ships to be built for the navy will also call for more men and more officers. The total force is, or soon will be, three times that of the navy under the administration of Theodore Roosevelt, who was considered a very considerable navalist.

Now if there were a genuine national emergency it would be possible to understand Mr. Roosevelt's action. Since that emergency does not exist, the President cannot complain if he is charged with being motivated by other reasons than the purely military. The dictators abroad have found that increasing their military and naval forces is an easy way to reduce unemployment; it is another way to spend federal money in the expectation of priming the pump again. Like almost all Mr. Roosevelt's actions this one has not been thought through, nor is it in accord with a definite, far-reaching national program. As John T. Flynn and other economists have pointed out, a prosperity purchased by armament expenditure is illusive and dangerous; when the program is completed and the work stops the economic results are bound to be serious.

Certainly, as I have stated on this page before, there is nothing in the Japanese situation to call for this move unless the purpose is to make that situation worse by inflaming it. The news of it will undoubtedly stimulate the Japanese militarists to extra efforts to increase their forces, just as our sending three cruisers to Singapore has been accepted by the government-controlled Japanese press as a deliberate threat to Japan, as has the concentration of British ships at Singapore and Hongkong. Those who are engineering this national policy of rattling the saber appear really to believe that threats of this kind are the only thing that the Japanese militarists will listen to or be moved by. Behind Japan, however, are the dictator states in Europe. I have been shocked in talking with men in high position in Washington to find that some of them actually think that sooner or later we shall have to fight Hitler and Mussolini. If we are to stage another great crusade in Europe to save the world for democracy, the moves just made will obviously not be sufficient for an enterprise which will inevitably bring this country to the verge of bankruptcy and put an end to its republican institutions.

Nothing puzzles me more than the attitude of those who say that we must save the democracies of England and France—and Russia, since Russia is bound to fight with France under the existing treaties. What a joke that will be: American troops fighting not as at Archangel in 1918 to destroy Russian communism but to defend it, and especially the bloody brand of one Joseph Stalin! And what if in the next year or two France should go either communist or fascist, of which there is a chance? Again, I am dumfounded by the mentality of statesmen who contemplate another war abroad for democracy. They admit the vicious circle of armaments and more armaments, bound in the long run to decrease the standard of living for the workers and creating a dominating military machine. They even admit that if we go into war we may come out of it fascist or communist, and still they insist that we must arm in the present "emergency." They even concede what I have so often pointed out—that, according to Franklin Roosevelt and many military and naval officers, we cannot attack Japan nor Japan attack us. Yet they are for more preparedness, a bigger army, a bigger navy, all of which is a complete confession of the bankruptcy of their statesmanship.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Conqueror of the Seas

CONQUEROR OF THE SEAS. THE STORY OF MAGELLAN. By Stefan Zweig. The Viking Press. $3.50.

I AM glad that Stefan Zweig took that cruise to South America. The boredom of the passenger liner that took him to the River Plate set him to thinking of the great voyagers of the past, of the navigators who opened up that sea route, and his train of thought led naturally to the greatest mariner of all that early band—Ferdinand Magellan.

Realizing with a sense almost of shame that the magnificence of Magellan's feat had hitherto quite escaped him, that he knew little or nothing of this great first circumnavigation, Mr. Zweig became interested. His interest has given us a splendid protrayal of a heroic deed, a moving study of the indefatigable, coldly determined seaman who in spite of all obstacles—poor vessels, mutiny, the hazards of the ocean, starvation—first transported himself around the whole globe. True, Magellan did not complete the actual circumnavigation of which the passage of Magellan Straits was such a historic landmark; but he had been before to the East Indies on many eastbound voyages. When he came to the East Indies from the west, and his slave Enrique recognized with joy the language of his fellow-natives, the deed was done. The world had been rounded. After that, the way was clear. But it was ironical that the way never could be through the straits that Magellan found; tragic that, having gone so far to the south'ard to find that strait, he had not gone a little farther to find the easier, even kinder, route around the Horn. Magellan Straits, with their fierce, unpredictable sets, their sudden blacking-out of visibility with rain squalls, their dangerous "williwaw" squalls rushing from the surrounding frozen hills, their lack of anchorages, their tortuous, dangerous length, remain to this day so great a navigational hazard that even many high-powered steamers avoid that route, though it is well charted and lighted now and there is a port halfway, and it is shorter by far than the way around the Horn.

This brings me to my only minor contention with Mr. Zweig—that we learn from him too little of the actual sailing of the vessels, too little of the life on board. The transit of the strait, perilous triumph as it was, is dismissed with a few paragraphs. The ships arrive and pass through—a fleet of them (though one mutinied, and sneaked homeward to the east by night). A fleet of them! What a feat was this! No other sail-driven fleet successfully passed that way in four centuries afterward; no other man ever made such a voyage as Magellan climaxed there. We ought to have had more of that, more of the sailing, for not only the men had to be driven there. It was heroic work also to drive the ships. Yet no one will quarrel with Mr. Zweig because his grasp of nautical affairs is not as sure-founded as his grip of the affairs of men; this latter is the more important. Though his maritime nomenclature is sometimes curious—whatever on earth were those naos, "broad-beamed cutters with a draft ranging from eighty to one hundred tons"?—his feeling for the problems of a seaman upon a hazardous voyage is true enough.

The picture that emerges from these quiet, well-written pages is an unforgettable, deeply moving portrait of one of the greatest sailors the world has known. Conqueror of the seas? That he was not, and no one has been. Yet Ferdinand Magellan, safe in his Olympian retreat, may smile now in his bushy, bloody beard, smile to recall that the successful accomplishment of his voyage brought neither plaudits in his own land nor reward in his adopted one; smile grimly at the thought that even a partially adequate picture of what he tried to do, and did, had to await the passing of an exile briefly across a little of his tracks, four centuries afterward.

ALAN VILLIERS

Fabian Analysis and Conclusion

SOCIALISM VERSUS CAPITALISM. By A. C. Pigou. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

IF ACADEMIC economists were asked to name the outstanding representative of their profession, it is a fair guess that Professor A. C. Pigou, of Cambridge, would carry off the honors. He is a direct descendant in the English classical tradition of Adam Smith, David Ricardo, John Stuart Mill, and Alfred Marshall. His "Economics of Welfare" ranks with the half-dozen greatest works of bourgeois economics. Anything he has to say on the issue of "Socialism Versus Capitalism" is evidently important.

It would be a great mistake, however, to assume that the significance of this work is due to the reputation of its author. Professor Pigou has written a book characterized by intellectual honesty, courage, and logical clarity. No future discussion of the economic merits of the rival systems of society can afford to neglect his cogently marshaled arguments; and fortunately, since the book is addressed to the general reader, no such discussion need neglect them.

In passing judgment on the book it is necessary to remember that Professor Pigou operates within the narrow framework of orthodox economics, a framework which on principle excludes the consideration of the effects of economic forces on the social and political complexion of society. Professor Pigou's work, like that of his predecessors and contemporaries in the orthodox tradition, is essentially static and taxonomic. This approach, I think, is an unfortunate one, and yet when carried out honestly it has a curious result.

Capitalism is presented in a very favorable light considering the plain facts about inequality, unemployment, monopolistic restriction, and so forth, none of which does Professor Pigou attempt to gloss over. This is possible because the connections between capitalism as an economic system and the ugliest phenomena of the modern world, imperialist conflict and class brutality, are regarded as no concern of the economist. Yet in spite of this favorable presentation of the case for capitalism, Professor Pigou inevitably finds that socialism, regarded merely from the point of view of economic technique, is superior on nearly every count examined. For whatever may be said of war and class oppression, there can be no doubt that inequality, unemployment, monopolistic restriction, and cyclical fluctuations are endemic to the capitalist system. And there can be just as little doubt that these things are no part of the logic of socialism.

Professor Pigou does not bother specifically to refute the

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame

Mises school of anti-socialism, according to which it is a priori impossible to plan rationally the economic life of the community as a whole. Possibly this is because the job has been done so often and so thoroughly in the technical literature that he regarded it as unnecessary to go over the ground again. This must be accounted unfortunate in view of two recent events: the publication of Mises's magnum opus in English (under the title "Socialism"), and Walter Lippmann's belated discovery of this latter-day champion of vulgar Manchesterism. Since Lippmann rests his case against socialism largely on Mises, it would be valuable to have a specific exposé of the latter from so authoritative a pen as that of Professor Pigou. Still Chapters VII and VIII are so plainly an implicit refutation of the whole Mises doctrine that Lippmann can ignore them only at the expense of branding himself as an open propagandist for the status quo.

Not the least interesting part of "Socialism Versus Capitalism" is the concluding chapter, in which Professor Pigou makes what he calls "a confession of faith." His reasons for doing so should be read and pondered over by those "impartial" intellectuals who pride themselves on their refusal to espouse any program of social change.

> The fact that we are without the data and the instruments of thought necessary for assured judgment [he says] does not entitle us to sit back with folded hands. For to sit so is itself to take a decision; to make the great refusal, to declare ourselves in advance opponents of any change . . . we must use these imperfect data as best we may, and take the plunge, and judge. There is no other way.

Professor Pigou declares in effect for gradual socialization —a Fabian among Fabians. If capitalism were really what he supposes it to be, his advice could be whole-heartedly accepted. As it is, the events of the past twenty-five years must be regarded as grave confirmation of the counter arguments, which are as old as the doctrine of gradualism itself. Even for the Fabians, however, Professor Pigou has wise counsel, and underneath his calm language is veiled a stinging rebuke. "Gradualness," he says with conspicuous emphasis, "implies action, and is not a polite name for standing still."

PAUL M. SWEEZY

Jean Sibelius

JEAN SIBELIUS: HIS LIFE AND PERSONALITY. By Karl Ekman. With a Foreword by Ernest Newman. Translated by Edward Birse. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

SIBELIUS, A CLOSE-UP. By Bengt de Törne. With Musical Illustrations. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $1.75.

FORTY million Englishmen, including Ernest Newman, probably can't be wrong, and the English-speaking world is therefore coming to accept Sibelius as one of the immortals while he is still alive. Americans have not, like some English critics, placed him beside Beethoven and above everyone else, but an American radio audience, questioned on the subject of favorite composers, has chosen him as an easy first among all contemporaries.

If one accepts that judgment, an authorized biography of the great man is not only in order but overdue, and by that token Karl Ekman's book on "the greatest contemporary composer" (to quote the jacket) must be welcome. Mr. Ekman accepts the unconditional superlative throughout the book. He makes no attempt to justify this judgment by critical analysis but merely underlines it by such passages as the following, describing the symphonic poem "Kullervo," now almost forgotten, when it was first performed in 1892: "The voice of genius spoke so mightily, so overpoweringly, throughout the whole work, from the first bar to the last, that there was nothing for the dumfounded hearers to do but rejoice and admire."

On the other hand Mr. Ekman spares us the usual phrases about Sibelius as the somber and mystical genius inspired by the stark majesty of northern forests and the bleak melancholy of the Finnish plains and lakes. We learn, on the contrary, that from the first his music was "born of the sunshine cult of the northern summer," are reminded of the "radiant apotheosis of the fifth symphony," and told that his "Apollonian worship of light sheds its golden glory" over the seventh.

The most valuable part of this book, however, is not its somewhat fulsome praise but its details of the life of one who must be admired for his profound integrity as an artist, his adherence to the highest principles, and his productive energy. Although his master, Wegelius, was an ardent Wagnerian and tried to infect the pupil with his admiration, Sibelius's early aversion to the Bayreuth master was never completely overcome. He was "inspired" in his youth by Grieg and Tschaikowsky—a significant admission—and later came to admire both Dvorak and Bruckner, whose B-major symphony moved him to tears at the age of forty-six.

Of Richard Strauss Sibelius speaks with evident admiration, although he ventures no real judgment on his works. "Strauss," he says, "was extraordinarily amiable to me. . . . In later years, too, I was able to convince myself that he regarded my art with an impartiality and loyalty that I was bound to appreciate very highly." It may be amusing to interject here a remark that Strauss made to the present reviewer some fifteen years later. It was in a restaurant in Paris, and the orchestra struck up a familiar piece. "What's that?" Strauss asked, turning to me, and being told that it was Sibelius's "Valse Triste," he chuckled, "You don't say! I didn't know he could write a tune as good as that!"

Strauss, in fact, knows very little about his contemporaries and generally avoids listening to their music, being completely preoccupied with his own. Sibelius appears to be much more receptive, for Mr. Ekman quotes him as saying, in 1911: "I listened to as much music as I could, both old and new. I have always been interested in contemporary and younger composers as much as anything, in order to get a clear view about myself." With one or two exceptions Sibelius's quoted utterances in this book are those of a very modest man who, one suspects, would be the last to accept without qualification the extravagant claims frequently made for his art.

This view is confirmed by Bengt de Törne in his "Close-up," a book of much smaller proportions written by a pupil and disciple. Like Ekman, De Törne has no doubt of the overwhelming greatness of Sibelius, whose work he calls the "meridian of contemporary music." But while Ekman is content to be "telling us," De Törne supports his opinion by reason and argument. His conviction that Sibelius is the Beethoven of our time is based on an interesting aesthetic classification of the really great symphonists—those who profess the "epic" attitude—into three categories, culminating in the type which combines the epic element of the classics with the "intensity of temperament and fantasy" of romanticists like Schubert, Berlioz, and Tschaikowsky. This type, he says, is represented by Beethoven and Sibelius. It is an argument which will interest even those who are not Sibelius partisans, and so will Mr. De Törne's perspicacious comparisons of Sibelius with Tschaikowsky and other composers, all based on well-reasoned aesthetic considerations.

The first part of Mr. De Törne's little book is virtually a lesson in orchestration à la Sibelius, illustrated by musical examples which will appeal to the musician as well as the intelligent amateur. Even though neither he nor Mr. Ekman has solved the Sibelius problem for the perplexed listener, they have given the music-lover engaging and interesting portraits of an eminent artist and a noble personality.

CÉSAR SAERCHINGER

The Lively Art

FOOTNOTES TO THE FILM. Edited by Charles Davy. Oxford University Press. $4.50.

CHARLES DAVY, film critic for the London Mercury, has brought together in this book a number of lively and pertinent articles on European and American movies, grouped under four heads: (1) Studio Work—How a Film Is Made, (2) Screen Material—Help from Other Arts, (3) Film Industry Problems, and (4) Films and the Public.

The book starts well with Alfred Hitchcock, who explains his methods and some of the climaxes in his films, and analyzes his first talkie, "Blackmail." His resourcefulness, color, directness come through his article. You know he is talking straight when he insists on short scenes that lock into each other, when he shies away from long dramatic periods in which the camera loses grip, when he says, "I want to put my film together on the screen, not simply to photograph something that has been put together already in the form of a long piece of stage acting." This is not fan talk; it has been backed by his work, and answers such movies as "Night Must Fall," lifted whole from the stage. Hitchcock praises over-running of sound, a device he uses brilliantly (there was the bobby's hand, lifted to knock, in "The Man Who Knew Too Much," which fell with the sound of the shot that killed him). He is reinforced later by Maurice Jaubert's attack on annotation in screen music, now fashionable in Hollywood, which goes so far as to permit a glug to accompany beer-drinking, cutely—"a roguish little arpeggio."

Robert Donat writes brightly about film acting, meeting with anger the usual questions and the tradition of the "face-pulling" school, and sailing into some general notions of audience reaction in the theater. The most technical piece here is one by Basil Wright, who is lucid and enthusiastic about camera possibilities.

Graham Greene opens the second section, saying that no public wants to be soothed by its amusements but excited; arguing, thus, that any subject can be presented, any treatment given, once the audience is aroused. He quotes as applicable to the movies Ford Madox Ford's definition of poetry as "not the power melodiously to arrange words but the power to suggest human values." The articles that follow are on comedy and cartoon, and a geographical piece on settings, etc., by Betjeman, who lists commercial values in the following order: kisses and other displays of concupiscence; stars; story or type of film; speed of action, slow for simple audience, fast and American for sophisticated West End houses; music; dialogue; dresses; scenery.

Paul Nash, writing of color films, does not bother with predictions (unnecessary, with Hollywood preparing for color as in 1929 it prepared for sound), but points out how the audience giggled because the pancakes in "Ramona" were "so natural," and how contradictory the statements of color experts (Mrs. Kalmus, Ralph Brinton, and Ray Rennahan) have been. After exuberant pages on Disney he ends with an explanation of the animated cartoons of Len Lye, whose brilliant palette is composed of the raw actual colors of the celluloid of the three-color process.

The section on the industry is honest about British trade problems. Alexander Korda and Basil Dean write about the future with empire-building inflections, but Maurice Kann faces the question squarely, speaking about the single flurry "Henry VIII" caused. John Grierson talks about documentaries, realism, British retrenchment, the line of Russian movies, and the sidestepping equation, No Controversy=No Reality, in the book's best chapter.

Elizabeth Bowen's "layman" piece on audiences asks for glamor, amusement, fantasy, comedy, "films about foreign countries," and goes on:

> I want no more American tragedies, Russian comedies, or crepitating Teutonic analysis. I should like still more dramatic use of landscape and architecture. I like almost any French film—perhaps I have been lucky. I have rather dreaded beforehand, as one dreads drastic experience, any Russian film I have seen; have later wished, while it lasted, to protract every moment, and finally found it, when it was over, more powerful than a memory—besides everything else, there had been so much more fun than one foresaw.

"Footnotes to the Film," centering on the British field, has enough outside material and provocative discussion to be worth while to any reader who takes time off from going to the movies to read books about them. Some of the bright discussion glosses over large gaps, but most of it is deliberate and suggestive; all of it is good reading, throwing out bits of technical information and solid treatment. The construction of the book makes it fall short of being a thorough covering of any one side. But here is a good anthology, with handsome illustrations, an index, notes, and a conclusion by Mr. Davy, Are Films Worth While?

MURIEL RUKEYSER

Letters of Rousseau

CITIZEN OF GENEVA: SELECTIONS FROM THE LETTERS OF JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU. By Charles William Hendel. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

THREE years ago a monumental edition of Rousseau's letters was completed in France. These twenty volumes are of course indispensable to the student of Rousseau, but it cannot be said that they have materially altered our conception of the man, his art, or his message. They have not established Rousseau as a supreme epistolary writer like Voltaire. His range of interests is far more limited, his mind far more primitive. But he appears in a much more favorable light in his familiar letters than in his stilted formal works; more favorable even than in the "Confessions," in which a disagreeable mania is manifest. We may hate Rousseauism—a dangerous creed of which Rousseau was the victim rather than the originator. We may pity the man Rousseau—a weakling suddenly engaged in a fight contra mundum, persecuted for maintaining the criminal paradox that man is good. But his correspondence enables us to understand an element too often neglected—his personal fascination. Rousseau would not have been a prophet if he had not been a charmer.

That is why the most significant letters are probably those he wrote to titled friends, like Marshal de Luxembourg. They are perfect—free from the smirking graces, the insistent pervasive flattery, which at times make Voltaire's cleverness almost nauseating. There are set pieces in the collection: a fine series of letters to Dom Deschamps, on Morality vs. Metaphysics, and the letters to Malesherbes in 1762, which are a formal and very competent apologia. The average reader, more interested in personal details than in the battle of ideas, will be glad to know that when Rousseau fled Paris and sought refuge at Iverdun, he had to think of "a spinet and some books to be returned, and M. Mathas and the butcher and my barber to be paid."

BURLINGAME

On the whole, we must take Rousseau at his word: "I have never aspired to become a philosopher; I never pretended to be one; I never was one, nor am I one, nor do I want to be one. . . . I am . . . simply a good man who tries not to do ill to anyone, who is fond of honest folk. . . ." "Good man" here is a mistranslation; it should rather be a simple fellow, a plain man. For Rousseau simplicity and goodness are identical; but simplicity rather than goodness is the key word. Rousseau slashes through the delicate fabric of civilization in his quest for fundamentals. Voltaire never lost sight of fundamentals, even when he amused himself by the way with luxuries, gossip, subtle intrigues, and complicated financial maneuvers. Dictators are all Rousseauists; they hate sophistication and hack their way back to primitive values. I am willing to exclaim, "O sancta simplicitas!" like dying John Huss; but the words express pity and even contempt rather than admiration.

The English reading public needed a selection from the enormous mass of Rousseau's letters. The editor's task has been performed adequately but not supremely well. The long biographical introduction (126 pages) is of no intrinsic value, and is meant merely as a guiding thread to the letters; it would have been more useful if it had been split into periods and distributed throughout the book. Rousseau's style loses all glow, sparkle, and naturalness in Professor Hendel's English. At times the real meaning of the French idiom is lost: the translator uses "actually" when the sense demands "at present," and "a good character" when "good-natured" is obviously meant. Rousseau is an artist, and it would take an artist rather than a "moral philosopher" to do him justice. But in spite of minor blemishes the work is competent and the subject matter fascinating. We should by this time be weary of damning Rousseau after Irving Babbitt; for a change, let us get acquainted with him.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Shorter Notices

THE WOODEN SPOON. By Wyn Griffith. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

The wooden spoon, literally the spoon which the author, in accordance with Welsh custom, carved for the early sweetheart he never married, is the symbol for all those unconscious deep longings which govern our lives. Written in the first person, this book is a sincere and painstaking attempt to bring to light the emotional motifs which we are hardly aware of when we experience them. Obviously autobiographical, it uses the device of speaking through the lips of an old man who has returned to his native Welsh village and his memories, to recreate a few scenes of his youth. He recalls the day when, accompanied by his father, he walked away from the humble three-room cottage of his parents to take his first job as a farm hand on an outlying farm, with the pride of new manhood drowning out the wrench of separation; he recaptures the mood of his first evening of courtship, with its mixture of excitement and dread, and finally the laughter which eases all strain. Occasionally too nostalgic in tone, these memories are saved from sentimentality by the author's approach to his material, which is unusual for its directness and simplicity. And the careful selection of only those experiences which have undergone a long, slow "settling" process in the author's own mind gives his writing the calm assurance and the detached perspective which make these episodes, slight as they are, ring true.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN IN VICTORIAN FICTION. By E. M. Delafield. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

"Women," said a character in one of Charlotte Yonge's novels, "purify the atmosphere wherever they go." But, her friend reminded her, they lose this antiseptic power unless they "shield their bloom from the slightest breath of contamination," and carefully avoid the "hardening and roughening process" of contact with life's vulgar realities. Which may explain why the air is so bad today. In any case, E. M. Delafield's anthology presents an amusing picture of the papas, mammas, daughters, and governesses who breathed the purified atmosphere of Victorian fiction—chiefly the fiction of Miss Yonge, Elizabeth Sewell, and Elizabeth Wetherell. Amusing, yes, and to a certain extent illuminating, but unfortunately rather one-sided, because the selections are taken almost entirely from women novelists, and from the second-rate women novelists at that. Why not give us a few glimpses of Victorian ladies and gentlemen as seen by Mrs. Gaskell and the Brontë sisters, to say nothing of Dickens and Thackeray, Trollope and Reade? The answer is plain: Miss Delafield wants to show Victorian smugness at its bizarre extreme, the smugness of those readers who regarded Martin Tupper as a literary and moral prophet. She does a good job of piecing together one aspect of the Victorian scene, and her excerpts from novels are accompanied by a dozen well-chosen contemporary illustrations depicting family groups and coy maidens and bearded lovers with their hands on their hearts. Yet it's well to remember that the same literature which produced the sadistically pious Fairchild family produced Becky Sharp. Do you know Mr. Fairchild? When he found his three little children quarreling he bundled them off to the nearest gibbet, where a criminal's rotting corpse hung in chains, and there he harangued them for five pages. He could have finished, but the children broke down.

COMPLAINT AND REFORM IN ENGLAND. By W. H. Dunham and Stanley Pargellis. Oxford University Press. $4.

This is a new kind of source book for those interested in English history. Here is a delightful harvest of utterances by all sorts and conditions of men, through which the discerning reader will be able to piece together a picture of what men felt and thought from the fifteenth to the eighteenth century in England. The editors, both of whom are in the History Department at Yale, have done an excellent job of arrangement and editing, and have prepared each selection with a compressed, informative, unstilted introductory note. There is little in these writings that is unknown to scholars, from the anonymous "Libel of English Policy" (1436) that opens it to William Cowper's "Impartial History of Parties" (1714) that closes it; but it is extremely useful to have had them brought together. One can quarrel only with the editors' claim that these selections voice the mind of the common man in Renaissance England. That will probably never be known. The quest of the generic and the rooted in social life, as distinguished from the official and the esoteric, is a good quest. But one must not think to have found it when one has got at the pamphlet literature of a period such as this, and reprinted what the Hakluyts, Sprats, Aschams, Pagetts, Winstanleys, and Simon Fiskes have to say. It would be better to see in these selections mainly the mind of the middle-class intellectuals, none of them of the first rank like Hobbes or Locke, yet reflecting the first-raters; none of them of the underlying population, yet reflecting, or perhaps refracting, their aspirations as well. The editors have kept their eye on our own age as well as on the English Renaissance, and have shown that first-rate scholarship need not be dry-as-dust erudition.

FIRST PERSON PLURAL. By Angna Enters. Stackpole Sons. $4.

Angna Enters's book is as hard to characterize in a single word as are her stage "compositions," which, as she herself says, are "never just dance, or mime, or just 'psychological' or historical, or just abstractions." The book is not an autobiography, not a diary, not a manifesto, not a treatise on the arts, not a travel account, but something of all of these, and—well, it's just "First Person Plural," the rambling but never dull expression of an artistic personality with as many facets as a housefly's eye. Miss Enters not only dances, paints, draws, composes music, designs costumes, and when necessary serves as her own manager, but if she suddenly feels a yen to learn Spanish, or cloth-dyeing, or fifteenth-century music, why, she just goes right ahead and does it, mentioning it so casually that you almost wonder why you couldn't do it too. That must be the reason why the book holds you, because it is not particularly well written, and the ideas, while they are sensible, are seldom startling; but the author has packed her life so full of experience that she doesn't give you a chance to be bored. Her own enthusiasm, which embraces blues singers and Beethoven with equal fervor provided the art is good in is own kind, carries over to you, and helps to explain how she manages to hold her audiences in the theater with wordless compositions which attempt to "crystallize certain universal impulses in human behavior, . . . to illuminate a point in time"—which sounds much more abstract and much less entertaining than the compositions really are. The illustrations in "First Person Plural" consist, of course, of drawings by the author and photographs of her in her theatrical works.

DRAMA

In the Grand Style

"SHADOW AND SUBSTANCE" (John Golden Theater) is a very serious play by Paul Vincent Carroll. Like most Irish dramatists who have written since the renaissance of their country, the author states his general theme in terms of local problems, and at home the play was doubtless considered primarily a contribution to the endless debate upon the inexhaustible subject, "What is wrong (and right) with Ireland?" I suspect, however, that Mr. Carroll's method of writing owes rather less to the folk dramatists from Lady Gregory to O'Casey than it does to more conventional technicians, and it is certain that in the result "folk quality" is sacrificed to the suavely skilful development of effective theatrical situations. The considerable success in America to which the play seems obviously destined will be attributable chiefly, I think, to three things: a general theme of some genuine interest; a striking virtuoso's performance by Sir Cedric Hardwicke; and, most important of all perhaps, the fact that "Shadow and Substance" is a well-made play—both literally and in the somewhat derogatory sense in which that term came long ago to be used.

The entire action takes place in the study of Canon Skerritt's house in County Louth and is concerned with the various relations of three exalted spirits to the vulgar crowd of ignorant peasants and hardly less primitive priests among whom they live. The rebel schoolmaster and the proud canon are deadly enemies because neither understands that each has been corrupted as the result of a frustrated love for something finer than their companions can feel; that the canon has become a hard-hearted and regal ecclesiastic dreaming of the great days of the renaissance and the schoolmaster the unpopular author of a scandalous anti-clerical novel because both want something better than the football-playing materialism of the parish priest. The two are united in their admiration for the canon's mystical, loving-spirited housemaid, and when the latter is killed in a riot over the schoolmaster's book they are brought to the beginning of some kind of understanding.

Now this summary of the plot can hardly suggest the fact that the play is genuinely absorbing. It probably will, however, suggest one of the reasons why it is, on the other hand, not as profound or as important as some will believe it. The parallelogram of forces is almost too neatly diagrammed, and the almost geometrical demonstration leads to a Q. E. D. almost too triumphantly pat to be very convincing as the solution of a human problem. Because of this, the characters are developed in terms more crisply theatrical than ultimately convincing and leave one with the feeling that the spiritual problems have been alluded to rather than actually presented.

The canon, moreover, runs away with the play. Logically he ought to be no more than one of three, but he very nearly crowds the schoolmaster off the stage and dominates the scene by virtue of his theatrical effectiveness. Sir Cedric plays him to the hilt, and the part is one which any character actor would gladly cross seven seas to get, for the canon is in the grand style of the hero-villain. Regal and self-possessed, he silences opposition with a gesture and disposes of the human race with an epigram. He is in the tradition of Richelieu, even in that of Richard III ("so much for Bolingbroke"), and if we remember at the end that we have no evidence beyond a brief declaration from the maid for the spiritual conflict supposed to rage behind the commanding mask, we have at least been treated to a rousing performance. Sir Cedric knows how to wear his soutane with a difference. To say all this is not, I hope, to depreciate the play any more than I intend. It is skilful and interesting far beyond the ordinary. But it is also far more of the theater and far less of the soul than many will be inclined to think it.

Ever since "Springtime for Henry" I have acknowledged a debt of gratitude to Benn Levy, its author, but Mr. Levy has not added to that debt by collaborating on a farce "suggested by" one of the novels of the late Thorne Smith. For all I know, there may be an outrageously funny play in the story of the solemn biologist and his flighty wife who unwillingly change bodies without changing personalities, but if so, then that play is yet to be composed, for "If I Were You" (Mansfield Theater) is clumsily written and haltingly paced. Constance Cummings and the rest work hard; they are even funny at moments; but there is no cumulative effect and no success in any effort to make the preposterous premise more credible as one goes along. Incidentally there is no reason why even the author of a pseudo-scientific farce should not have some vague idea of the meaning of the technical terms he uses. Gastroenterostomy is not a disease, and the phrase "alkalize the filtrate" is not so esoteric that it would appropriately call forth from a surgeon the apologetic remark, "I have forgotten my chemistry." JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

THERE is a pianist whom you should hear whenever an opportunity presents itself. His name is Webster Aitken; he is an American in his late twenties; and what is remarkable about him is not so much his rich endowment of technique and musical feeling as his integration of these resources, and behind this the inner integration of experience and emotion. This—astonishing in one so young—manifests itself both in his choice of music to play and in the way he plays it, and lifts him in both respects out of the group of gifted young American pianists to a place among a handful of living artists. His young contemporaries play the usual sequence, with unimportant variations, of Bach-d'Albert, Beethoven's "Appassionata," Schumann's "Carnaval," Chopin, Liszt, Rachmaninov, and Strauss-Schultz-Evler; and they use these things for a dazzling display of their gifts—each for itself and in its own direction. The inner integration and concentration I have referred to causes Aitken's mind to be attracted by such gigantic musical matters as Beethoven's "Diabelli" Variations or the "Goldberg" Variations of Bach; he plays one of these works in public because of what it means to him and out of a desire to communicate this to other people; and the resources he brings to his task are evident only in the coherence and power of the work as he plays it, the unobstrusive adequacy with which its every formidable technical requirement is satisfied.

In short, Aitken's recitals are among the very few public concerts that are what a public concert should be; and it appears that there is no place for them in the musical life of America today. The demand which the commercial managers must satisfy—after first having created it—is for the dazzling display of virtuosity and temperament in Liszt, Rachmaninov, Strauss-Schultz-Evler, and perhaps Beethoven's "Appassionata"; a pianist who concerns himself with things like the "Diabelli" and "Goldberg" Variations is, to use managerial terms, not salable; and so the few crumbs of opportunities left after the Horowitzes and Iturbis have finished go to their young American imitators. It is they, not Aitken, who have played all about, made appearances with important orchestras, and received the attention, such as it is, of the important newspaper critics, such as they are.

At the moment Aitken is playing all the sonatas of Schubert and some of the four-hand works in a series of four recitals at the New School for Social Research (I believe the series is to be repeated at the Arts Club in Chicago). For this music he has a marvelously right feeling; what must be added—for readers who have had as few opportunities to hear the works as I have had—is that they fully repay the beautiful performances he gives them. They are not without

SEE how a big city works to solve its problems of social welfare

READ

A SOCIAL STUDY OF PITTSBURGH
COMMUNITY PROBLEMS AND SOCIAL SERVICES OF ALLEGHENY COUNTY

By PHILIP KLEIN and Collaborators

NO ONE interested or active in social welfare can afford to be without this eye-opening and helpful volume. It is the largest and probably the most important survey of a city's social service problems ever made in the United States. The book not only covers every phase of social service work in detail but devotes substantial space to an interpretation of the social and economic life of the community.

958
PAGES
$4.75

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

Tense, dramatic — a novel you won't put down nor forget

Dream of Freedom

By E. C. PHILTINE

A brilliant psychological novel of the baffled love of a sensitive New York physician for the wife of one of his patients. The author shows an uncanny ability at dissecting basic human relations and makes grippingly real the curious emotional difficulties of the two leading characters. Donald Gordon, after a reading of the manuscript, says of the book: "The author has done, beautifully, exactly what she set out to do. The entire thing is psychologically sound, and the style is meticulously exact. In its way it has points of comparison with 'Of Human Bondage'." $2.50

D. APPLETON-CENTURY COMPANY
35 West 32nd Street • New York

THE NATION
in the CLASSROOM

is today of outstanding value as text and discussion material because of the timeliness and pertinence of its articles, the accuracy of its facts and forecasts, and its high standing as literature.

Of all the magazines published in America it is probably the most sensitive to the meaning and trends of its times, and the most frank and direct in its approach to national and world problems.

25c a month

per student is the cost of the magazine for classroom use, on bulk orders for ten or more copies to a single address; or

3 months	$ .75
4 months	1.00
6 months	1.50
8 months	2.00

Instructor's Copy Free

The Nation 20 Vesey St. New York

For my class of .... students in (subject).................. send The Nation for the next .... weeks at the special classroom rate of ...... per student. $........ enclosed.

Name ....

School ....

Address ....

weaknesses; but Tovey, in his extraordinary essay in "The Heritage of Music," points out that the weaknesses of Schubert's large works "are relaxations of their powers," and goes on to say:

> Neither Shakespeare nor Schubert will ever be understood by any critic or artist who regards their weaknesses and inequalities as proof that they are artists of less than the highest rank. . . . Even if the artist produces no single work without flaws, yet the highest qualities attained in important parts of a great work are as indestructible by weaknesses elsewhere as if the weaknesses were the results of physical ruin.

And in another place he concludes that Schubert must be regarded, "on the strength of his important works, as a definitely sublime composer. It does not matter when, where, and how he lapses therefrom: the quality is there, and nothing in its neighborhood can make it ridiculous."

This sublimity is present in the great B flat sonata; and this is only one of several marvelous works that Aitken is to play in the two remaining recitals of his series.

B. H. HAGGIN

DANCE

The Critic's Lexicon

WHEN John Martin addressed the sell-out audience at the Evening of Modern Dance recently given under the auspices of Dance International 1900-1937, he assured us that what we were about to see was not theatrical, its décor was not really décor, its costumes were only clothes for motion, its music was just aural scenery. The modern concert dance was placed on a level superior to that of a mere stage framed by a proscenium, and by his inference became not a diverting spectacle but an autobiographical rite celebrating the individual impulses of the dancers. In a review of the New York première of Hanya Holm's "Trend," Mr. Martin praised Arch Lauterer's massive setting as having "no smack of décor." Last summer Mr. Martin was alarmed by certain "decadent" overtones he felt in Anna Sokolow's anti-fascist dances; last year he suspected Martha Graham of a "neo-classic" tendency, and this year he finds her perilously "surrealist."

The technique of dance criticism lies chiefly in a critic's vocabulary, which often has to be borrowed from other fields. In architecture one can talk in terms of structure, materials, and function, calling Vermont or Indiana limestone, lolly columns, t-beams, or grain elevators by their specific names. Similarly in paint and music. The theater uses architecture, poetry, and music, and for this reason its critical language, while more amplified, is also more vague. The dance critic borrows the idiom of a critic of the fine arts and literature, but even with this combined ammunition he does not find his task easy, primarily because he refers to an event forever past before anyone reads of it, an event largely interesting only to those who saw it. To give an analysis of performance, a factual description of what happened, in a broad enough frame to be more than a news report calls for a very developed technique, a very precise vocabulary.

I wish to consider the vocabulary of John Martin, the well-known critic on the New York Times. By his energy and his love for the dance he has almost single-handed created a place for the dance critic in New York and hence in America. Hardly any other criticism in the field represents the expression of a conviction based on things seen and personal preference rather than on second-hand reading. I assume Mr. Martin opposes "health" to "degeneracy," "degeneracy" to "decadence," "neo-classicism" to "classicism," "classicism" to "romanticism," "naturalism" to "realism," "realism" to "surrealism," and "aristocracy" to "democracy" in his private system of values, and that he can tell you just what he means as well as the next man. But lurking in his categories there has become more apparent a certain alignment of chapter-heads which takes on a censorious attitude, an arrangement of terms which is less in the critical structure of an Aristotle than in the puritanical strictures of an Augustine. We find on one side "decadent," "neo-classic," "surrealist," "theatrical," "aristocratic." Under the "theatrical" head we find "décor," "ballet," "ballet audience," "ballet impresario." On the other side we find "impulse," "inspiration," the "heroic type," "integration," "inevitable," "logical," "democratic." There is no hard and fast adherence to these balancing lists. For example, Mr. Martin found "Trend" less closely related to "concert" dancing than to "theater" (that is, tragedy). I mean, in short, that this anti-theatrical bias which I have long sorrowfully observed in Mr. Martin has now shifted its attack from the ballet to include even Mr. Martin's protege, the "modern" dance.

As long ago as 1933 Mr. Martin, in his "Modern Dance," complained that the dance had meant in the past the ballet, and the ballet had meant only the ballet d'action. Yet Mr. Martin should know the ballet d'action was a term in common employ only as long as Noverre's immediate influence was alive, although the pas d'action is something else. There is all the difference in the world between Noverre's ballet d'action, circa 1780, Vigano's choreodrame, circa 1820, Manzotti's azione coreografica, circa 1810, and Fokine's chorégraphie, circa 1910. He also said (p. 4) there weren't half a dozen artists who could employ the classic dance properly, although he has since mentioned Massine, Danilova, Spessivitza, Markova, Semenova, and Haakon, who were all dancing at the time. He stated (p. 38) that in the old ballets the floor plan was the only consideration, when he probably meant that most of our exact information about steps danced are in engravings of floor patterns. He forgets that ballets were clothed by such artists as Berain and Bouquet, composed by Lully and Rameau, but it is true that the combination of the dance and décor does "smack of" the theater. He says (p. 107) that music developed and dancing stood still for "hundreds of years," although he grudgingly admitted earlier that great dancers enlarged their idiom. No use to mention Blasis, Perrot, St. Leon, Stepanov, Ivanov, Petipa, Taglioni, Elssler, or the recent Russians—names of first historical importance to a decade if one had the energy to cite them. In Mr. Martin's two books historical facts intended for a condemnatory résumé were selected and arranged to present a case which rivals the style of the Reich's Kulturkammer.

In 1936 his anti-theatrical bias has firmly developed. On page 56 of "America Dancing" we find the poisonous infiltration of alien theatrical dancers managing "pretty thoroughly to supplant the simpler English style of theater dancing." The French, Italian, and Russian dancing masters effected their invasion. He continues, "It is interesting to note each of these influences was occasioned not by any demand from the American field but by political conditions in the homeland." Which is the same as to suggest that the pure Indians felt a deep logical impulse to invite the Puritans over to give ex-

THE THEATRE GUILD presents the
ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
production of JEAN GIRADOUX'S comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:40
Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40. 300 Seats at $1.10

"One of the best musical shows of the year . . . witty, fresh." Atkinson, Times.
"PINS AND NEEDLES"
NEW YORK'S HIT MUSICAL REVUE
LABOR STAGE 39th St. & 6th Av. BR 9-1163
Eves. 8:40
Mats. Wed.
& Sat. 2:40
PRICES:
Evenings
55c to $2.75
Matinee
55c to $2.20

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY PARTY
Sunday, Feb. 13, at 8:30
BELASCO THEA., 44 St. E. of B'way
LILLIAN HELLMAN
Author of "The Children's Hour," Screen Adaptation "Dead End." Recently returned from Spain.
CAPT. HANS AMLIE
Former Commanding Officer, "Lincoln-Washington Battalion."
MILLY BENNETT
Former Chief of Press Bureau, Loyalist Ministry of State.
Tickets: 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50
at all Workers' Bookshops and all Agencies
Ausp.: FRIENDS OF LINCOLN BRIGADE
125 W. 45th St., N.Y.C. LOngacre 3-6215
Watch
THE NATION
for
MORE
SURPRISE
FEATURES!
●

MASS MEETING
TO SUPPORT THE C.I.O. DRIVE FOR TRADE UNION RIGHTS IN HUDSON COUNTY
MECCA TEMPLE, 133 West 55th Street
Friday, February 11th at 8 P. M.
Chairman: Carl Randau, President, N. Y. Newspaper Guild
SPEAKERS:
Wm. P. Carney, C. I. O. Regional Director of New Jersey
Al Barken, T. W. O. C. Sub-Regional Director of New Jersey
Michael Quill, Sec., Transport Workers Union, N.Y. Councilman
Alan Heywood, C. I. O. Regional Director of New York
Harry Wendrich, Pres., Printers, Pressmen and Assist. Union
Tickets on Sale at all Workers Bookshops: 83c, 55c, 35c
(Proceeds to C. I. O. drive in New Jersey)
Sponsored and Arranged by National Committee for People's Rights

RED 4th Printing, $3. RANDOM HOUSE
This book will tell you EVERYTHING you want STAR OVER to know about what's happening in CHINA
By EDGAR SNOW CHINA

SCHOOL

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL
Offers Exciting Evening Courses in:—Art, Current Events, Economics, Law, Literature, Music, Philosophy, Photography, Psychology, Public Speaking, the Theatre
$10 per term (15 lectures)—Term begins February 7
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON SCHOOL
[illegible] West [illegible]th Street SChuyler 4-3232
Write or call for descriptive bulletin

RESORTS

The Vendome
"Your Winter Home"
MADISON AVE. AT THIRD ST. LAKEWOOD, N.J.
Private Baths — Private Sun Porches — Southern Exposure. All sport facilities. Intelligent supervision of diets. Moderate rates.
M. SCHWARTZ, R.N. Phone Lakewood [illegible]

Come for your Winter Vacation
Get to know THE MODERN FLAGLER
ALL WINTER SPORTS
Ski Trails . . . Congenial young folks
Gymnasium, Dancing, Entertainment
Excellent food (dietary observance)
Write for booklet and rates
THE FLAGLER
FALLSBURG, N.Y.
TEL. FALLSBURG 200

NOW you may order

BOOKS

from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C.O.D.

Please address your orders to

The Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 20 Vesey St. • New York

hibitions of Playford's country dances. There were theatrical dancers in Williamsburg as early as there were plays, and nearly every well-known international dancer since the Revolution has appeared in America, playing to the same kind of audiences which made theatrical dancing in Europe a continuous popular form. In an article in the 1937-38 winter number of the North American Review, Mr. Martin allows the fact that the Basil ballet grossed a million dollars on its transcontinental tour, which in his context is to say that this enterprise has (strictly) commercial implications. Yet in another paragraph we come up against a perfect example of the critic's lexicon in question (p. 239):

> This is what is sometimes called the classic view as opposed to the romantic, the aristocratic as opposed to the democratic. On its basis kings and courtiers have maintained ballets for their diversion, and today wealthy men of this opinion, whose tastes do not run to the outdoor life, keep companies of dancers instead of polo ponies.

Here we have in full flower a categorical jeremiad based on the writer's parti pris and the coloring of a qualitative distinction by personal ethic. There are few ballet companies "kept" today, unless government subsidies for the Vic-Wells, the Paris and Bordeaux Operas, the Scala, the Vienna Staats-Oper, the Bolshoi and Marinsky Theaters can be considered bureaucratic whims. Ballet companies in this country to a surprising degree pay their way, keeping many dancers under long-term contract, and traveling more, for example, than modern concert-dance groups. That crack about dancers as an alternative to polo ponies is of the same order of pettishness that makes Mr. Martin fill ballet audiences with the "usual silver-haired dowagers with their bald-pated escorts" (p. 249). There aren't enough of these to give a big company forty weeks of work, worse luck. People who like ballet today are in cross-section people who like theater. This, Mr. Martin, even after the recent Center Theater performance, the Basil tours, and the present high commercial value of dance attractions, will not see.

I submit that Mr. Martin is and has been consciously naive and temperamentally prejudiced about theatrical dancing. To hate the ballet is his privilege, but since dancing is done, even today, in theaters and is in the minds of audiences a theatrical form, I feel that he must find some new terms to cover it. He is the chief critical name in this country, the most-respected by provincial managers, and his word has gone far in influencing students of the dance. At the present time, theatrical values in the dance, whether in classic or developed ballet or in the modern dance, are the dominant values, and increasingly so by every indication. Mr. Martin is upholding the banner of an imaginary anti-theatrical purity, which, if it were analyzed, could be broken down into a dance form that has already outworn its sojourn in the categories of the "interpretative," the "expressionist," and the "absolute."

Many critics at a certain age in their imaginative careers start to defend their initial and past enthusiasms with a conservative barrage which employs an avant-garde idiom to blackjack the future. This is the technique of "Redder Than the Rose," and it causes Mr. Martin to boost the retardative production of the "Coq d'Or" as the best of contemporary ballet dancing. One is reminded again and again of the Republican Party, with all its unadulterated, ideal, monolithic politics, when one hears the word "purity" bandied about. There is no more pure dance than there is pure Americanism. Even I would not want to see Mr. Martin as the Dorothy Thompson of the dance.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Letters to the Editors

Wishful Thinking in 1840

Dear Sirs: In searching through the files of the Knickerbocker Magazine the other day I came across this editorial daydream, which I pass on to you, somewhat ruefully, with a speculation on how many more generations will be reading the same sort of thing. It is dated November, 1840.

> "Pride, pomp, and circumstance," will soon cease to be elements of glorious war. Perkins's steam-gun, which is capable of throwing 158 balls in a minute with unexampled force, which may be made of every size and used with equal facility on land and water, is an invention which will soon divest battle of its poetry. Hence we hold . . . that war will soon cease to be attractive, and its "day" go by. . . . The joy of battle will be gone. There will be little of the romance with which the trade of human butchery is strangely invested if battalions are to be blown to fragments by the opening of a steam-valve; and if in place of glittering warriors and plumed troops and music, feathers, and gold lace, the fate of nations is to be decided by a few swarthy firemen in red flannel shirts, sweating with blackened brows over the hot and greasy engine, shooting cannon balls by the cartload from hissing pipes, and poking the fire to keep up the necessary heat, instead of having recourse to pealing trumpets and rattling drums to blow the sparks of military ardor into a flame. This will be reducing war to its essentials; it will be getting rid of all its fascinating deceptions at once; it will be such an application of the labor-saving principle to the business of thinning population and of making widows and orphans that neither nations nor individuals will lightly go in search of such a ghastly honor.

One thing is certain—"Perkins's steam-gun" was a game of mah-jong compared to dichloro-ethyl sulphide. But the game still seems to be played.

PARKER LESLEY

Princeton, N. J., January 27

The Press and the Boycott

Dear Sirs: An interesting commentary on the "freedom of the press" we have been hearing so much about lately is furnished by the newspaper silence on the Japanese-boycott mass-meeting held recently in the Pittsburgh Carnegie Hall.

Though they were furnished with reams of copy and with photographs of the principal speaker, Representative John M. Coffee, the papers completely suppressed all news of the meeting. The mystery was cleared up when investigation disclosed that Gimbels, McCreery's, Kaufmann's, and the Rosenbaum department stores—which provide the bulk of the newspapers' advertising—are loaded with Japanese goods. The "sentinels of American liberties" here naturally shrank from offending such profitable clients.

GEO. A. COLEMAN

Pittsburgh, Pa., January 26

A Question of Terminology

Dear Sirs: I have been very much interested in the articles and letters of Norman Thomas, Raymond Leslie Buell, Reinhold Niebuhr, and others who have written on the thorny problem of collective action as against "isolationism." I have been sympathetic with your editorial policy of trying to develop the weapon of economic collective action and to keep such action distinct from military collective action. And I sympathize with Mr. Villard's nausea over the naval race. But I should like to raise several questions.

With regard to an international embargo on raw materials, the moment seems to be passed when such action could be effective. To avoid political consequences like the resentment which unified Italy, sanctions must have been previously agreed to by all the nations and must be immediately and impersonally applied. Unfortunate precedents of non-application have removed that possibility. Furthermore, the fate of the Brussels conference and of the President's "quarantine" feeler shows how slight are the chances of collective action today in the face of the realities of American public opinion and of British and French preoccupation with immediate interests.

With the exception of backing the Hull foreign-trade program, what is left to us to do in the field of practical politics? Are those of us who have long wanted international cooperation now obliged either to advocate a big-navy policy to enable this country to play its part in the game of power politics or to tack with the prevailing wind of American opinion and support an active neutrality? Considering the difficulties of developing national economic self-containment, and of maintaining neutral sentiment, is there any chance of our keeping out of the balance-of-power scrap? Would it not be wiser, then, to play the game openly from the outset, when we could set our own terms with Great Britain, et al., rather than wait to be dragged into a situation in the making of which we have had no voice?

And if we should cooperate with Great Britain, France, and Soviet Russia to face immediate issues in concert, would it not be more honest to stop calling it "collective action" and admit it as a power bloc? Thus we save our terminology for an honest use later when there may be another chance to build again on that foundation.

MILDRED E. LESTER

Barrington, R. I., January 25

Profits Must Be Restricted

Dear Sirs: In his article No Time for Economy in The Nation of December 11 Keith Hutchison shows evident familiarity with John Maynard Keynes's recent book, "The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money." Why did he not go a step farther and give Mr. Keynes's full teaching? Establishment and maintenance of a constant level of full employment is the sole means by which we can escape economic disintegration. And full employment can be attained only if the government will create new enterprises and put the unemployed to work at productive work. The alternative is war, dictatorship, and eventually slave conditions for the workers. Since it is actually impossible under a system of laissez faire to create and use new factories and machinery at a rate equal to that at which savings would accumulate in a condition of full employment, we have to choose between keeping down employment and restricting profits. There is where the rub comes: when full employment has been attained, profits will have to be drastically reduced until they are proportionate with growth of population, so that surplus capital will not be greater than the need for new capital equipment. Does the Roosevelt Administration have the courage to face the facts?

The writer of the editorial, Bounty for Aggressors, in the same issue likewise falls short of a realistic definition of the will to peace. So long as we tolerate chronic unemployment of from one-tenth to one-fifth of our employable population, we are impotent in dealing with fascist nations. The divisions on policy in the democratic countries are fundamental because a powerful part of the population in each nation is unwilling that the returns to absentee owners should be diminished. Many members of peace organizations, and even the editorial writers who attempt to guide them, seem to prefer a totalitarian ideology to the personal adjustment necessary for the achievement of democratic unity. BARCLAY W. BRADLEY

Pasadena, Cal., January 15

Is This Neutrality?

Dear Sirs: While you are being brought to book by forty-five liberals for your attitude toward war, permit me to register one vote for the proposition that you are showing plain horse sense on the Neutrality Act. If ever a law started to do one thing and did the opposite, that is what the Neutrality Act does. The prohibition of export of "arms, ammunition, and implements of war," ready to use, is absolute. The ban on exports of things which can be turned into implements of war affects only American vessels and requires all American title to be relinquished before shipment is made. In simple words, it is the cash and carry plan. Germany, Italy, and Japan have the carrying capacity and can—for some time—get the cash. China hasn't and can't. Write your own Q. E. D.

In the first ten months of 1937 exports to Japan of iron and steel scrap increased 87 per cent, of wire rods 119 per cent, of tin and terne plate 134 per cent, of steel sheets 1,672 per cent, over the same period of 1936. And the Neutrality Act wouldn't put a straw in the way of keeping up that trade.

Peace is like liberty; there are times when we have to fight for it.

GEORGE L. KNAPP

Washington, January 24

Terror in Haiti

Dear Sirs: Sténio Vincent, the President of Haiti, instead of trying to foster unity among his people, who are still angry because of the murder of their 10,000 brothers in the Dominican Republic, is creating even more confusion and dissension.

News has reached us that the Haitian government has taken advantage of the present situation on the island and ordered the wholesale arrest of prominent Haitians suspected of being in opposition to the regime. Thirty-seven have been arrested already, including such men as Seymour Pradel, a former candidate for the presidency of Haiti; P. Thoby, a prominent attorney; Dr. Ricot; Paulius Sanon, former minister at Washington; Dr. J. Adam; Alphonse Henriquez, the nationalist leader active in opposing American occupation; Max Hudicour, journalist; Constant Vieux, the writer; Salabat; ex-Senator Placid David; Justin Sam, the young Haitian author; the attorney Marc Bauduy; Victor Cauvin, president of the Law School; and Louis Mevs, president of the Taxi Workers' Union. Pierre Paul, representative of Haiti at the Montevideo conference in 1933, ex-General E. Thezan, and others had been arrested previously. The lives of all these men are in the greatest danger.

Americans who love freedom and justice should send protests to Elie Lescot, now minister of Haiti at Washington, to Charles Vincent, Haitian consul in New York City, and directly to President Sténio Vincent.

S. JUSTE ZAMOR

New York, January 27

Make the CCC Civilian

Dear Sirs: The creation of the Civilian Conservation Corps was a splendid achievement of President Roosevelt's, but his recent actions have shattered the morale of the workers in the organization. During the past year the CCC has been dealt one blow after another. First Congress in June guaranteed its existence for only three years and refused to put its civilian supervisors under the civil service. Then came the President's economy program, which involved scrapping educational programs and reducing camps. Lastly have come the unsavory disclosures of misappropriation of funds by an employee of the Department of the Interior.

Reorganization rumors are rife within the camps. From one plan being discussed it is evident that wistful army men have not given up their hopes of gaining full control of the CCC. Reduction of the number of camps and increase of their size—500 boys or more to a camp—has been proposed. Work projects, apparently, are to be found to fit the camps rather than camps modeled to fit the work program. The only way to make valid the name, Civilian Conservation Corps, is to place the organization under the complete control of those departments which now control its work activities. To do so at the present time would prove to the military clique that the American people recognize and do not want the evils of regimentation.

BERNARD HARKNESS

Baraboo, Wis., January 26

CONTRIBUTORS

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a well-known Washington newspaper correspondent.

MILTON S. MAYER, free-lance journalist of Chicago, is a member of the advisory board of the Beacon, Chicago's liberal magazine. He is writing a book on patriotism and pre-fascism in America.

M. E. RAVAGE, The Nation's Paris correspondent, is at present in the United States.

RUTH BRINDZE is the author of "Not to Be Broadcast. The Truth About the Radio."

BEATRICE SCHAPPER is a free-lance writer.

ALAN VILLIERS is the author of "The Cruise of the Conrad."

PAUL M. SWEEZY is instructor in economics at Harvard University and consulting economist to the National Resources Committee.

CÉSAR SAERCHINGER, coauthor of "The Art of Music," contributes articles on music and broadcasting to various magazines and newspapers.

MURIEL RUKEYSER has just published a new volume of verse, "U. S. 1."

ALBERT GUÉRARD, author of "Literature and Society," is professor of comparative and general literature in Stanford University.

B. H. HAGGIN is the author of "A Book of the Symphony" and record critic of The Nation.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN, the author of "Dance," is the director of the Ballet Caravan.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

BURL[illegible]

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 12, 1938 NUMBER 7

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 169

EDITORIALS:

- PURGE IN THE REICH 172
- LITTLE BUSINESS REVOLTS 173
- WIDENING THE BOYCOTT 173

MR. MADDEN AND MR. BURKE By Paul Y. Anderson 175

SHADOW OVER CANADA by E. S. McLeod 176

LABOR GOVERNMENTS AND SABOTAGE By Ernest Davies 179

COMPOSERS IN REVOLT by Minna Lederman 181

MORMON "SECURITY" by Martha Emery 182

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 184

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

- INNOVATION AND COLLECTIVE TALENT By Harry Levin 185
- THE DREAM by Louise Bogan 187
- WONDERFUL WOMAN by Mark Van Doren 187
- URUGUAY'S PROGRESSIVE EPOCH By Nathaniel Weyl 188
- THE TOTALITARIAN TIDE by Abram L. Harris 188
- DRAMA: THE CASE OF ERSKINE CALDWELL By Joseph Wood Krutch 190
- ART: GEORGES SCHREIBER'S WORK By Paul Rosenfeld 190
- RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 192
- FILMS: ARTIST OF ANXIETY by Mark Van Doren 193

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

*

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

THERE IS LITTLE DOUBT THAT JAPAN IS planning the construction of battleships larger than the 35,000 tons allowed under the London Naval Treaty of 1930, if it has not already started to build them. The sharp request for information on this point, amounting to an ultimatum, from the United States, Great Britain, and France would therefore superficially seem destined only to irritate the Japanese. Actually this joint action of the powers has two purposes. It serves notice that the three democracies intend scrupulously to observe the forms of international law—in itself no mean purpose in a world increasingly given to lawlessness—and that they include Japan in the company of those countries whose word is not to be taken seriously. The real importance of the request, however, lies not in these moral considerations but in its intention as a threat to the Japanese. In effect it gives Tokyo a chance to reconsider before plunging the world into the most reckless naval race of all history. As a warning it has some virtue, but it has the inherent weakness of the threat technique in international relations. It either works immediately or proves as lethal to the threatener as to the threatened. Should Japan accept the challenge, American taxpayers would have the dubious satisfaction of spending millions of dollars on battleships to give them a slight advantage in a war which those very battleships would make inevitable.

*

"BLACK AGAINST THE SUPREME COURT" IS apparently the theme of a new drama being enacted in Washington. Justice Black, whom many liberals expected to turn bourbon when he was safely on the court, has startled even his supporters by the uncompromising quality of his recent dissents. Those dissents—bold, sharp, and very much to the left—are likely to make Supreme Court history. For Justice Black has challenged several of the basic principles on which the court has for half a century protected capitalist interests. One is the personality of a corporation under the Fourteenth Amendment. The amendment provides that no state "shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Clearly, it was ratified in 1868 to guard Negro rights in the South, and it was so construed until the San Mateo case in 1885, when the court accepted Roscoe Conkling's argument that the Congressional committee which framed the amendment meant to include corporations under its guaranties. Conkling may well have spoken the truth about his own intentions and those of several of his colleagues. And the court's eagerness to accept his interpretation is proof of the zeal with which it has historically made its decisions jibe with the needs of corporate power. But Justice Black is on very solid ground when he points out, in his dissent in the case involving a California tax on a Connecticut life-insurance company's premiums, that the people were told that the amendment was to protect Negroes and were never told that it was meant to remove corporations from the regulation of state governments. Justice Black's daring in challenging a rule a half-century old is so great as to shock even his liberal colleagues. But the truth is on his side. He is like the child in Andersen's fairy tale who cried out that the king was naked.

* * *

THE PRESSURE BROUGHT TO BEAR ON THE United States Congressmen who joined in congratulating the Spanish Cortes to withdraw their names is one more instance of the blindly reactionary course the Catholics are following in America. Only a few of the legislators responded, but there can be no doubt that the pressure from the Catholic hierarchy and from Catholic organizations was enormous. The episode makes one wonder how much longer the hierarchy can continue on this course without fatally weakening its hold on its followers. For doubts concerning General Franco are evidently creeping into some Catholic minds. The February 4 issue of the Catholic Commonweal poses these problems: "Can Franco transform the legacy of the past in Spain? Can he restore civic virtue and civic liberty, through which can come those disciplined liberties that alone can create a truly Christian social order?" Even more surprising than the question is what follows: "The answer at the moment is almost definitely in the negative." Apparently Franco's continued bombing of women and children in the dense centers of cities is getting under the Catholics' skin. Or perhaps they are beginning to suspect that the rebels may not win and that in the end the church will have to reach an understanding with a democratic Spanish government. If the fascist leader cannot "transform the legacy of the past in Spain," the Commonweal might go on to inquire, why does Spain need him? And the answer, to judge by his failure to win, is simply: It doesn't.

* * *

DESPERATE OVER THEIR FAILURE TO RETAKE Teruel, the Spanish insurgents have launched a campaign of unprecedented terrorism at sea and in the air. And in both cases they seem seriously to have overreached themselves. The sinking of two British ships off Barcelona appears to have destroyed, almost overnight, all that the Franco propagandists have achieved diplomatically in six months. For the first time since the beginning of the war Britain and France have taken immediate steps to protect their rights without regard to the possibly hostile reaction of the fascist powers. The massacre of civilians in Barcelona has similarly proved to be a boomerang. Prompted by Loyalist threats of retaliation and under pressure of public sentiment, London and Paris have made at least a start toward inducing the rebels to cease their attacks on the civilian populations of non-fortified areas. Whether Franco's fascist allies will back him in his campaign of desperation depends a good deal on the attitude of the new German military and diplomatic regime.

* * *

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT IS NOW AWAKE TO the existence of a railroad problem. Chairman Splawn of the Interstate Commerce Commission has announced a conference to be held this week or next at which representatives of railroad management, labor, and security holders will meet with the President and other government officials. The recent bankruptcy of the Erie and the growing difficulties of the Illinois Central and the Baltimore and Ohio have underlined the gravity of the railroad problem. After a two-year study of railroad financial practices, Senator Wheeler and his committee have established the fact that ample dirty work was done in the way of financial manipulation. They are ready for legislation, including a measure for meeting the holding-company evil. The pertinent section of the bankruptcy statute can easily be redrawn. But these are primarily changes for lawyers. The public that ships its goods and goes on journeys will be more interested in the committee's consolidation programs. For only drastic financial readjustments (what Senator Wheeler calls the "wringer" process) and rational consolidation of the railway systems can promise savings enough to protect the roads from tumbledown poverty. Bonded indebtedness will have to be written down so that the roads will not have to carry an impossible burden of fixed charges. Opposition may be expected; yet in the long run it will be better both for bondholders and for workers if the railroads are put back on their feet. A new and growing group in the brotherhoods, led by George Harrison, sees this, and will probably go along with a good consolidation plan. As for government ownership, we should oppose it at present. Why should the government want to take over a herd of white elephants?

* * *

COMMUNISTS IN THE RANKS OF AMERICAN trade unions have become front-page news again. Reopened by David Dubinsky and given considerable currency in Roy Howard's papers by Benjamin Stolberg, the issue was played up prominently when the United Mine Workers voted to readopt their standing provision that no Communist could be a member, and when Homer Martin and several of his aides in a New York interview launched an attack upon Communists. The feeling against Communists has been part of traditional trade unionism in America, largely because American labor has not been interested in ideologies, and because the unions have always sought to avoid the question of a social program. Today another element appears in the attack—that of the competing Marxist ideologists who are anti-Stalinist. The accusation made by both groups is that the Communists seek to control unions only in order to further their political program and the Soviet foreign policy and that that program is not synonymous with the best interests of American trade unionism. The charge can only be substantiated or disproved by objective investigation; the evidence adduced thus far leaves us skeptical. The lull in the organizational campaign caused by the depression is allowing all sorts of factional disputes to capture the stage, but whatever the exact share of blame to be apportioned among groups in each union, we feel that the anti-Communist campaign is dangerous. There is no reason why Communists should be exempted from the eternal vigilance that trade unions must always exercise against factional struggles for control. But once you begin attacking Communists as such, your next step—as in the case of Martin's charges against Heywood Broun—is to attack progressives for "following the line." The step after that, as the British experience has shown, is to attack all progressives. And beyond that looms a reactionary trade-union movement.

*

ARTHUR KROCK, WHO REPORTS WASHINGTON for the New York Times, has wired us, "In view of Paul Anderson's references to me in your February 5 issue I hope you can reprint in your next issue my column in the New York Times of February 4." While space prevents our reprinting it, we refer our readers to Mr. Krock's column. He had warmly defended the oil men in the Madison anti-trust suit on the ground that they did only what Mr. Ickes had previously encouraged them to do under the NRA. He failed to include the fact that government counsel had themselves introduced the letters concerning the NRA into evidence, and Mr. Anderson and Attorney General Cummings were quick to catch him up on this serious omission. But they in turn failed to deal with his contention that in its charge the court asked the jury not to consider the letters as evidence. Mr. Krock's argument is that he was really attacking the government's "shocking abuse of power and breach of faith" in not following a promise made in 1916 by Attorney General Gregory, who said that if business men broke the trust laws in good faith, they would be prosecuted in civil, but not in criminal, action. Mr. Krock calls the government "unbelievably unfair," and attributes its action to "a long low market in spiritual values." We have no desire to set ourselves up as experts on fluctuations in spiritual values. But Attorney General Cummings points out that he asked for a grand jury only after the oil men had sabotaged every government effort to get at the facts. This casts considerable doubt on their "good faith." While concentrating his fire on the government, Mr. Krock does manage to get in an attack on the court, and this troubles us. Usually, as befits a New York Times correspondent, he has cared a good deal about the judicial process. Is the situation changed when what is involved is not the Supreme Court of the United States but a district judge in Wisconsin and a jury of "small merchants and farmers"?

*

GREAT BRITAIN HAS RELAXED RESTRICTIONS on foreign investments which have been in effect since the 1931 financial crisis. In doing so it follows one of the proposals of the Van Zeeland report, which in general has had a rather cool reception in London. Though no doubt this move has political as well as economic implications, it is not likely to lead to any resumption of loans to Germany and Italy. Some London bankers regard fascism with a benevolent eye, but even friendship cannot blind them to the risks of underwriting an autarchic state. Moreover, since the Treasury still claims the right of veto, it would have to be prepared to defend such investments in Parliament. The probable beneficiaries of the decision are some of the smaller powers, to whom it is a hint of Britain's ability to render financial assistance provided they don't wander too near the Rome-Berlin axis. In this connection, it is interesting to note that there is already discussion of the possibility of loans to Turkey, a country with opportunities for profitable investment and a potential ally against Italy. On the economic side the resumption of foreign lending indicates a decline in internal openings for investment as the housing boom slows down and the industrial plant needed for rearmament nears completion. An additional factor is the sharp rise in Britain's adverse trade balance. A revival in overseas investment is expected to stimulate exports while increasing the vital flow of income from abroad.

*

OUR WIDE-EYED EDITOR — THERE'S ONE IN every office—is awfully curious about the mysterious illness that reached the proportions of an epidemic in the highest circles of the German army last week. Its effect is to cause the victim to be resigned (in a democracy you resign, in a dictatorship you are resigned), and it often results in a purge. Führer Hitler, who is also head letter-writer of the Third Reich, wrote to Marshal von Blomberg:

> You have often asked me to relieve you of your duties, which placed a heavy burden on your health. Now after the fifth year of the re-creation of our nation and army, I will grant your repeated request.

To General von Fritsch he wrote:

> For reasons of health you have found yourself forced to ask me to relieve you of your duties. As your recent visit in the south has not had the hoped-for effect, I have decided to grant your request.

Baron von Neurath apparently is just a hypochondriac, because to him the complete letter-writer said:

> On the occasion of the completion of the first half decade of National Socialist government you have requested me to allow you to retire. I am not able to grant this request . . . even in view of your recent sixty-fifth birthday.

This opens up alluring prospects. We have composed letters to a selected group which we shall try to persuade Mr. Roosevelt to sign. They read as follows:

> Dear Mr. Roper: I am sorry to hear of your illness, but it leaves me no alternative but to accept your resignation.
>
> Dear Mr. Hoover (Edgar): I cannot express my sorrow at the news of your illness. Please do not slam the door.
>
> Dear Mr. Hague: I regret that you have found it necessary on account of illness to resign from the National Democratic Committee. Please believe me when I say that I am extremely sorry for the state you are in.

Meanwhile it has just been revealed that at the height of the Supreme Court fight Chief Justice Hughes slipped the following note under F. D. R.'s door:

> You make me sick. But I'm damned if I'll resign.

Purge in the Reich

ADOLF HITLER'S latest purge answers once and for all that much-discussed question: Who controls the Reichswehr? Only now after assuming full authority over all the military forces of Germany has the Chancellor truly achieved the authoritarian ideal on which the Third Reich was founded. Today there is no important branch of the government which is not under the absolute and undisputed control and authority of the Führer. The menace of a possible monarchist revolt by the old army generals is gone forever, and with it that other ghost—a military dictatorship as a transition from National Socialism to a more democratic regime—has been laid to rest.

There was much more behind this military upheaval than meets the eye. The replacement of Baron von Neurath by Joachim von Ribbentrop is of even greater importance from the point of view of the international political situation than the removal of General von Fritsch, erstwhile commander-in-chief of the army, though the two changes have their inner connection. By this time everyone knows that von Fritsch had to go, not because, as the official spokesman of the regular army, he demanded the resignation of Field Marshal von Blomberg on account of the latter's "misalliance" with his former secretary, but because he opposed the adventurous foreign policies of the Nazi Party.

It is true that the army chiefs used von Blomberg's marriage as a pretext to rid themselves of a man who had always been regarded as Hitler's "political commissar." Von Fritsch and his associates have not forgotten that Hitler owes his control of the Reich in large measure to shrewd trickery. They know that the senile Hindenburg was practically forced to elevate Hitler to the highest political office by von Papen and his next-door neighbor von Januschau-Oldenburg out of fear that General von Schleicher would make good his threat to uncover the Osthilfe scandal. Hindenburg had made one condition—that Hitler would name a non-Nazi War Minister, thus leaving the regular army free from political interference. Adolf Hitler, the great promiser, agreed readily, and von Blomberg, who was not a member of the National Socialist Party, received the appointment. What old Hindenburg did not know, however, was that the new Minister of War had been a Nazi sympathizer for years and was an intimate friend of the Reverend Herr Müller who shortly after Hitler's accession to power became Reichsbishop of Germany by grace of the Führer.

The hatred of von Blomberg which the General Staff of the Reichswehr nursed for more than four years is the more ironic since the Marshal was as reluctant as many of them to support the foreign policies of the Third Reich. He backed up von Fritsch and his colleagues when they refused to send German soldiers in large numbers to aid General Franco. He remonstrated with Hitler and Göring concerning active support of Mussolini's rape of Ethiopia. Count von Reventlow, editor of the Reichswart, declared not long ago that the friends of the Russian General Tukhachevski, who was executed for high treason in Moscow, were to be found not only in high places of the Reichswehr but also "in other responsible places indirectly connected with military affairs of the Reich." In short, Hitler was probably not too sorry to see the last of his protege.

For the army heads, on the other hand, their coup in ousting Blomberg turned out to be a boomerang, since it gave Hitler a chance to dismiss von Neurath from the Foreign Office. His successor, von Ribbentrop, is said to be the only high official, besides Hitler's alter ego Rudolf Hess, who addresses the Chancellor with the cordial du. Röhm, chief victim of the blood purge of June 30, 1934, enjoyed the same intimacy. It is fairly well known that von Ribbentrop was sent to London in the main to acquaint himself with the Foreign Office and its workings and not, as has often been intimated, to bring about a better relationship with Great Britain. He is nobody's fool, and if he acted the bull in the china shop, it was because he had other aims than to get into the good graces of official London. As a matter of fact, the studied stupidity and impudence of his unforgettable Hitler salute at Buckingham Palace and his organization of the German Nazi forces in England through the legation staff made a protracted stay at St. James's impossible.

What does his appointment mean for the world? Probably trouble. Hermann Göring's Essener Nationalzeitung made this significant comment on the withdrawal of von Papen as ambassador to Austria: "At this moment the Vienna post is once again of greatest importance to the Reich." In other words, the period of peaceful penetration of Austria seems to be over. We may look forward to a new era of militant aggressiveness. The retirement of von Hassel, heretofore ambassador to Italy and reputed to be not too friendly toward the "anti-Communist" Rome-Berlin-Tokyo axis, also betokens a more militant policy on the part of the fascist allies. The telegram sent to Hitler by Mussolini and his Foreign Minister Count Ciano, and Hitler's cordial reply, admit of no other explanation. The world may soon see concerted moves by the three powers in Spain, China, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Danzig, and other danger spots.

Little Business Revolts

AMERICAN politics is never so picturesque as when it is comic, and never so comic as when an exuberance of American energies applied to our political problems results in bedlam. That is what happened in Washington last week in the conference of little-business representatives called to advise President Roosevelt on the problems of the depression. It is doubtful whether Mr. Roosevelt or Uncle Danny Roper or anyone else in the Administration actually believed that several thousand small business men assembled in Washington would, by pooling their wisdom, be able to advance any new solutions. But neither did they count on the tumult that his invitation was to generate.

While the occasion had its aspects of high comedy, it was not wholly funny. The little business man has for so long been the goat of big business and has for so long been on the receiving end of the tough breaks of our economic system as a whole that any attempt to alleviate his plight is a matter of great moment for American life. The record of the Administration with respect to little business has been a curiously checkered one. Mr. Roosevelt's election in 1932 was largely due to the revolt of little business against Mr. Hoover's blundering policies. But the NRA bore heavily on the small business man: it was the big fellows who controlled the code authorities, the big fellows who benefited from the suspension of the anti-trust laws, the big fellows who gained from price-fixing and who intrenched their monopolistic position. Nevertheless, the rest of Mr. Roosevelt's program, notably the SEC, was intended to help the small business man and the investor even more than it was intended to help labor. In fact, if the Administration may be said to represent the interests and ideology of any one class of the population, that class is the middle class of which the small business man, the retailer, the wholesaler, the investor, the professional groups are the archetypes.

In the light of this fact, the anti-Administration temper of the resolutions adopted by the gathering at Washington is deeply significant. It will not do to brush the whole matter aside by saying that the delegates were taken in tow by high-pressure advisers from the ranks of big business. For only a group of men already well disposed toward the reactionary outlook could have been so easily sold a bill of goods by the reactionaries. The big thing that stands out as one examines the resolutions and the reports of the meetings is their confusion. The men who gathered in Washington represent what is probably the most confused group in the country. They are the prime newspaper fodder of America. They are riddled by every editorial broadside, by the hand grenades of every columnist, by the incessant machine-gunning of the radio. And they have reason for being so vulnerable. Their economic position has been undercut both by the depression and by the attempts to deal with it. They are caught between monopoly pressure and government control. They feel the burden of taxes and of higher wage rates. They look about in bewilderment for some explanation of their plight, and the only one they find handy is the melodrama in which the Administration is a band of devils presided over by Lucifer himself.

What is so disheartening about the whole affair is that the little business men have forgotten so much and learned so little during the whole decade of the depression. They still feel, when they think of the national picture as a whole, that their interests lie with big business, even though each of them knows that in his everyday economic life big business is his great enemy. They still think in compartments, as most of the rest of us do; but in their case the walls between the compartments cry to be broken down. And we must not forget that, despite the towering place that the giant corporation occupies in our life, the greater part of the nation's economic activity is still carried on by the little fellow. Sixty per cent of the nation's business is done by unincorporated business men or by corporations with assets of less than a million.

The Administration is faced with nothing less than a potential revolt of little business. This is a revolt far more serious than the revolt of the Southern bourbons or of the big city Tammanies. Its immediate results will be enormous pressure on the Administration's labor legislation and on its taxation structure. The reactionary groups in Congress will be heartened by the meeting of the small business men, and will press on with their campaign against the New Deal. What the Administration must do is twofold. It must seek immediate measures to remedy the economic position of the small business man—not through changes in labor or tax legislation, but through strengthening of their position with respect to monopolies and through easing of credit for them. Second, it must conduct a vigorous campaign of education to show the small business man that his real economic interests lie not with big business but with the economic welfare of the common man. For within the profit economy, the interests of the monopolies lie in maximizing profits by restricting production and cornering the market. But the interests of small business can lie only in an increased national production and an expanded general purchasing power.

Widening the Boycott

THE unprecedented success of the worldwide boycott of Japanese goods raises the question of whether a technique has not been discovered which can be effectively used to check the world drift toward chaos. Although the boycott has not yet stopped Japan in China, there is every indication that the Japanese drive has lost at least part of its force. For this China's stubborn defense is primarily responsible, but there can be no doubt that as its raw-material reserves are depleted Japan finds it harder to maintain its army at full efficiency. The difficulty is bound to increase as Japan's purchasing power is reduced by the boycott. American imports from Japan in December, for example, were nearly one-third less than in the corresponding month of the previous year. While figures are lacking in other countries, the boycott is known to be particularly effective in India, Japan's second largest market.

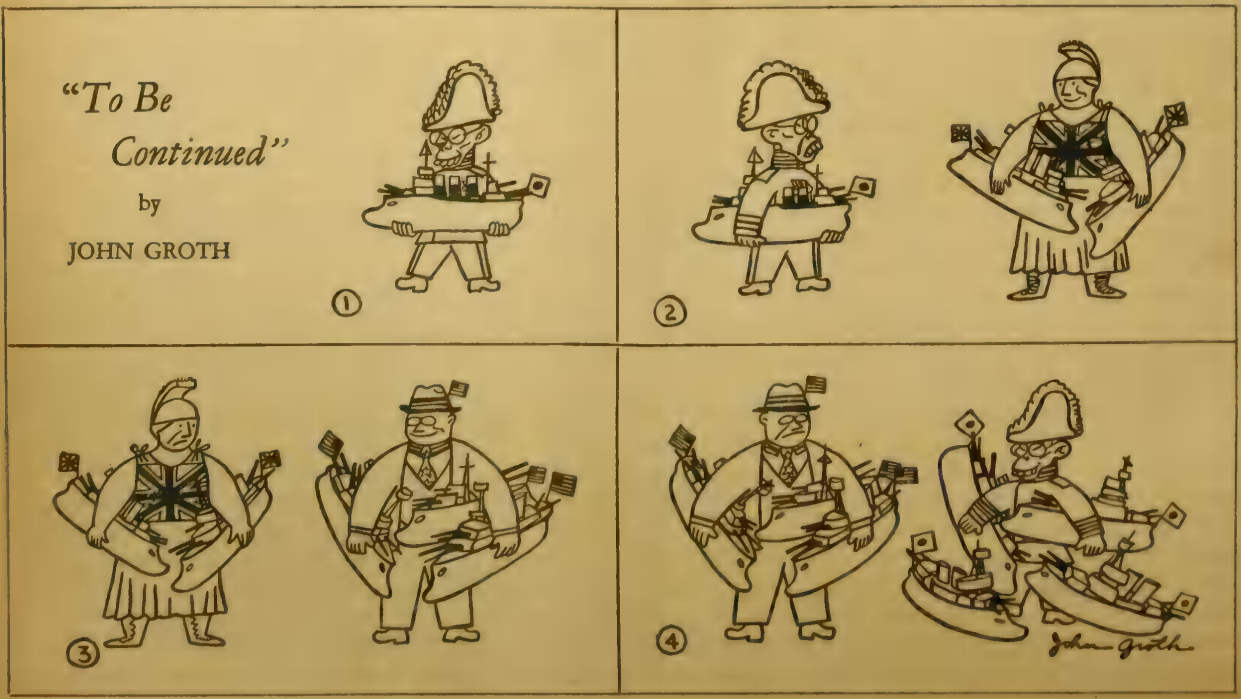
It may reasonably be asked at this point whether strict application of the boycott principle does not necessitate its extension to those powers which are engaged in aggression in Spain comparable to Japan's in China. The aggressors are leagued together; they abet one another; and all are equally dangerous to world peace. The occupation of Manchuria in 1931 in defiance of the United States, Great Britain, and the League of Nations encouraged Hitler to break Germany's international pledges. When Mussolini saw that the Führer had successfully defied the powers, he knew that he could safely undertake the crushing of Ethiopia. His success in turn led to the Italian-German invasion of Spain. And the supineness of the great democratic states in the face of the fascist menace in Spain was a sign to Tokyo that it could swallow still more of China.

Having got away with it individually, these three aggressor states combined in the unholy alliance "against the Comintern." They are allies; their strength is in large measure pooled. Japan recently signed a trade pact with Italy by which it acquired special privileges in Ethiopia. Rome has withdrawn the Italian mission which for years trained China's air force, giving "Italy's friendship for Japan" as the reason, and has publicly demanded colonies for Germany. Italy and Germany are working hand in hand against France in North Africa, and Mussolini has come out as anti-Zionist in order to plague the British in Palestine. At the recent Brussels conference the Japanese case was presented by Italy's delegate. And Germany has been trying to "mediate" its ally's attack on China.

A "Boycott the Aggressor" campaign would provide a course in international politics for the whole nation. It would educate the electorate to its responsibility for furthering the cause of world peace. It would teach the war-mongers and the isolationist pacifists that the choice is not between submission to the aggressor and war. The issue transcends the question of China or Spain or Ethiopia. What is at stake is the maintenance of law.

It is true that a boycott against Germany and Italy presents difficulties which do not exist in the case of Japan. Neither of the European aggressors is as vulnerable as the Island Empire. There is no one commodity like silk which can be singled out for attention. But both Germany and Italy are in a precarious financial situation, and both are dependent, to a large extent, on war materials from abroad. Germany's gold reserve is down to 1 per cent of the circulation of its paper currency. When Italy was recently called upon to pay $500,000 interest on bonds held in this country, it had to borrow the funds to meet its obligation at 40 per cent interest. The war industries and war adventures of these powers would undoubtedly be weakened if they were denied the foreign exchange upon which they have become dependent. A boycott is not spectacular, but it is relentless.

The question of the efficacy of a boycott cannot be separated from that of the opposition within the fascist dictatorships. In Germany important illegal groups as well as the Reichswehr are antagonistic to foreign military adventures. In Japan and Italy thousands of dissidents have recently been arrested. Any weakening of the national economies of aggressor states strengthens these anti-war tendencies and increases the influence which they indirectly exercise on national policy. A refusal to support aggressors with American dollars would be the best present we could make to anti-fascists abroad, as well as the surest protection against a world war.



"To Be Continued"

by

JOHN GROTH

Mr. Madden and Mr. Burke

BY PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 7

A TERMITE's life is not a glorious one, and last week was full of disappointment for those seeking to undermine the Wagner Act. The Supreme Court, still flushed and tremulous as a maid at morn over its new vision, unanimously held that a Federal District Court has no power to enjoin the administrative processes of the Labor Relations Board. That twenty such injunctions have been issued is eloquent of two things, namely, the vast scope and organized character of the attack on the law, and the low estate of judicial discretion in the district courts. On the latter manifestation Justice Brandeis commented sharply in delivering the court's opinion. The luckless brethren below have an excuse—for what it is worth. They may point out that a committee consisting of fifty-eight of the most highly perfumed lawyers ever assembled under the Liberty League tent concurred in holding the act unconstitutional. But that, alas, happened before the Supreme Court encountered a light somewhere along the road that leads to Damascus or Waterloo. The moral seems to be that free legal advice is not always cheap.

Mention of cheapness leads us unerringly to the latest ill-starred attack on the Labor Board—that launched by Senator Edward Raymond Burke of Nebraska. During the fight over the Supreme Court plan the Senator attracted the attention of the press gallery sufficiently to have the sobriquet "Throttlebottom Burke" bestowed on him, but in recent months his publicity has languished, and he set out to remedy the situation. (By many of his colleagues the Senator is regarded as being his own, if nobody else's, candidate for President.) Even Burke is familiar with the weakness of certain newspaper publishers. Accordingly, he loosed a series of blasts at the board, charging it with, among other crimes and misdemeanors, violating "the freedom of the press." He demanded an investigation and insisted that it be conducted by the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which he is a member.

The denouement took place when Board Chairman Madden appeared before the committee and proceeded to deal with the Burke charges seriatim. Before he concluded, enough material had been removed from the Senator's shirt to stuff a dozen heavy-duty Throttlebottom mattresses. I shall not dwell on the painful scene, but a few high-lights will illuminate it. Burke had charged the board and its staff with being "thoroughly incompetent." Madden showed by the record that of ninety-six injunction suits filed against the board, ninety-six have been decided in its favor; that in nearly all of the 162 cases decided by the board, the employer had contested its jurisdiction, but in no single case had the Circuit Court of Appeals held that the board exceeded its jurisdiction; and that this record was made despite the enormous difficulties of administering a new law in the complex field of labor relations. Burke charged the board with favoring the C. I. O. over the A. F. of L. Madden showed that in twenty cases where the two were in conflict before the board, the A. F. of L. won fourteen decisions and the C. I. O. six. Burke had accused the board of intimidating local public officials, mentioning the mayors of Lumberton, North Carolina, and Johnstown, Pennsylvania. Madden cited the record of evidence that Lumberton's mayor led a mob to threaten a union organizer, and asked why the Johnstown mayor, a former bootlegger, had not sought to answer testimony to the effect that during the steel strike he received $30,000 in cash from an official of the Bethlehem Steel Company.

The cases in which the "freedom of the press" was alleged to have been menaced again were those of the Daily Press, of St. Mary's, Pennsylvania, and Mill and Factory. In both instances reprints from those publications of articles attacking the unions were circulated among workers. The board simply sought evidence to show whether the employers had caused the articles to be printed and circulated in violation of the law. Madden couldn't understand why an editor who possessed such evidence should not be under the same obligation as any other citizen to appear and produce it, and neither can I. For years it has been obvious to most adults that editors and publishers who continue to invoke "freedom of the press" to cloak special privileges and immunities for themselves are doing more than anyone else to discredit and destroy legitimate freedom of the press.

Needless to say, poor Burke's little flier went into a tailspin, and at the latest sitting he was urging that the inquiry be transferred to the Committee on Education and Labor, although he had previously opposed that very move. This prompted the other Nebraska Senator, Norris, to remark on the predicament of a lawyer "who seeks a change of venue when he sees he is losing his case." One question remains to be cleared up. Was it by sheer coincidence that Burke's list of charges bore such a striking resemblance in phraseology to those recently made public by an employers' organization?

The President has now been privileged to look into the minds of the "little business men" whom he so fondly believed to be on his side, and it may be hoped that he has been properly instructed and edified. A cynic might have told him beforehand that the only difference between "big" and "little" business is one of size, but the cynic would have been wrong. The truth is that where matters of government policy are concerned the Sloans and Lamonts are ardent New Dealers compared with their "little" brothers. What Tom Girdler says privately about the Wagner Act was accurately reflected in the resolutions of the alley manufacturers and village merchants. For the "little fellow" halfway measures will not do. He wants lower taxes and a balanced budget. He wants the help put in its place. He wants Ickes and Jackson muzzled or, preferably, court-martialed. He wants the income tax extended to the very poor on the theory, perhaps, that quick death is a boon to the starving. If the meeting of "little men" succeeded in anything it was in demonstrating why they are little. They are actuated by the same profit motive which actuates their more successful competitors, but they do not pursue their ends so shrewdly. If Roosevelt still needed to learn that his strength lies in the support of the great majority who have no business except their jobs, this lesson should teach him.

Slightly more than a year has passed since the President's court plan was submitted to Congress, and it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the year has been wasted in a continuous filibuster. The Senate fight on the plan was a filibuster which consumed nearly all of last session. Virtually nothing was accomplished during the special session, and the present session to date has been wrecked by the filibuster against the anti-lynching bill. This failure to function is akin to that which led to the overthrow of democratic governments in Europe, yet the very people who are quickest to yell "dictatorship" at the Administration are the same ones who find much to praise in the conduct of a Congress which has been an example of ineptitude and futility. What they are doing is to aggravate the very danger they profess to fear. By hamstringing Roosevelt's efforts to achieve such domestic reforms as governmental reorganization and wages-and-hours legislation they supply him with new reasons for adopting an aggressive foreign policy—a course in which he requires little encouragement. All of which is thoroughly characteristic of the complicated stupidity of the opposition. When they wake up to find themselves waving flags and calling on the rest of us to "stand by the President" they won't even stop to wonder how they got that way.

Shadow Over Canada

BY E. S. McLEOD

Ottawa, Ontario, February 1

"I MAKE bold to say on Canada's behalf that there is no country in the world where there is a more complete acceptance of the democratic principles of government or in which they are more thoroughly exemplified." So spoke John W. Dafoe, the C. P. Scott of Canadian journalism, in the course of his Julius Beer Foundation lectures at Columbia in 1934. If made today such a statement would be glaringly false. Canadian democracy and the civil liberties upon which it must be founded to survive are under bitter and open attack. In three of the nine provinces the minatory shadow of fascism is spreading across the land.

In Alberta Premier Aberhart, showing that temperamental sympathy with dictatorial methods which is so common among social-credit enthusiasts, has enacted legislation giving the government life-and-death powers over all newspapers. This attack upon the liberty of the press has met with legal obstacles and will not become effective unless and until it is approved by the courts. Such approval is most improbable, and in any case Aberhart and his fantastic following are likely to be relieved of office before any serious damage can be done. But the support that his repressive actions have received is a most ominous development—three years ago public opinion would have swept from office any administration suspected of concocting such plans.

In eastern Canada the situation is more serious. In Ontario, the largest and economically the most important of the Canadian provinces, Premier Mitchell Hepburn has just been placed in office for a second term. As all readers of the New York Herald Tribune and the Hearst press will recall, "Mitch" was the Horatius who held the bridge and thus saved Canada from John L. Lewis, Homer Martin, and their "Communist" hordes at the time of the General Motors strike in Oshawa. His raucous threats against these "foreign agitators" and his loudly expressed scorn of President Roosevelt's temporizing attitude toward the C. I. O. brought Hepburn enthusiastic acclaim from the Rand-Girdler-Weir type of American. In his October election campaign, moreover, they won him a wide measure of support from the more timorous, gullible, and ignorant voters.

Hepburn is well on his way to becoming a Canadian Huey Long—as the Bible-shouting radiorating Aberhart might be likened to Father Coughlin. Although subject to bouts of illness, Hepburn is young, ambitious, and not hampered by education or by highly developed sensibilities. While loudly professing sympathy for labor—in the best fascist tradition—he has made it quite clear that he has no intention of allowing freedom of association to Ontario workers. He is already playing with the idea of licensing unions, and just before the election he unceremoniously fired the only two members of his Cabinet who were known to be sincere and practicing liberals. When one of them, ex-Attorney General Roebuck, was reelected with the second largest majority in the province, Hepburn refused to admit him to the party caucus.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Having solidified his position in Ontario, Hepburn is now flirting with the church-ridden politicians of Quebec with a view to strengthening his coming bid for national power, for without the support of Quebec his chances of invading the seats of the mighty at Ottawa are very slight. Unfortunately it looks as if the deal with Quebec might be successfully arranged. For Quebec has gone far along the road to fascism, and needing help in the national field, will find in Hepburn's Ontario the most congenial ally. Fascism in Quebec is based on race, economics, and religion, and the greatest of these is religion. Under the direct leadership and inspiration of a branch of the Roman Catholic church that can be compared for obscurantist policy only with the hierarchies of the more primitive states of Latin America, the politicians of Quebec are directing a campaign against "communism" which is destroying every liberty for which French Canadian as well as British Canadian patriots have worked, fought, and died. The events of 1837 appear to have been completely forgotten in Quebec.

The situation in the French province can only be understood if certain fundamental facts are clearly recognized: (1) The population is 80 per cent French and Roman Catholic, and the standard of living is very much lower than in any other province. (2) The educational system is entirely antiquated by all modern standards and is chiefly designed to keep the people ignorant of those ideas that might conceivably weaken their faith in the rule of the church. (3) The most powerful individual in Quebec is Cardinal Villeneuve, the head of the Roman Catholic church, a sectarian bigot of the most reactionary type. The power of the Cardinal is publicly advertised by the fact that he has a "throne" in the Legislative Assembly in the city of Quebec, where he sits on an equality with the lieutenant governor, the political head of the state. (4) Almost all the big industrial and financial institutions of the province are controlled by English Canadians, with the result that the half-educated French Canadian country lawyers, doctors, teachers, and small business men can claim with some justice that they and their fellows are being exploited for the benefit of the English. In general, big business has retained its political control by subsidizing corruption. (5) French Canadian nationalism has been growing rather than decreasing in recent years. The idea of an ultimately independent French state on the banks of the St. Lawrence has by no means been relinquished. This nationalist movement is encouraged by carefully cultivated complaints against English-speaking Canada founded on conflicts in the realms of language, culture, religion, and economics. (6) Even among French Canadians there is some opposition to the ultramontane policies of the church and state, but it is meager and cowed. Some critics find consolation in the belief that the extreme conservatism of the present rulers may hasten revolt against the theocratic regime.

When the corrupt Liberal government of Quebec was overthrown in 1935, a new party known as the Union Nationale took office. This party had campaigned on a platform guaranteed to build up in the province and city of Quebec a social and political organism in which the Roman Catholic religion, the small business man, and the French race would be in complete and absolute control. The party leader, Maurice Duplessis, ranged the province from one end to the other denouncing the Liberals for their subservience to Ottawa and to the "fat trustards" of St. James Street (the Wall Street of Canada). The Union Nationale Party was earnestly supported by most of the leaders of the church, who hoped M. Duplessis would be a more useful tool than his more experienced predecessor, M. Taschereau, had been.

Having won the election, M. Duplessis, under the skilful handling of the financial potentates, soon removed the "trust-busting" planks from his platform. His hobnobbing with his erstwhile enemies became so notorious that he finally issued orders forbidding the publication of press photographs showing him in amicable colloquy with certain representatives of the "interests." In order to distract attention from this change of front and at the same time to please the church, the new government began a tremendous campaign against "communism." This soon became a great success. The "Communists" in Canada, among whom Cardinal Villeneuve and his friends include everyone to the left of—to use an American analogy—the Roman Catholic Justice Pierce Butler, are predominantly English-speaking, Protestant, and somewhat better off economically than the French Canadians. Thus the attacks upon the Communists have won enthusiastic general approval and almost unanimous press support in Quebec because they unite racial, economic, and religious prejudices in a single campaign. In the excitement of this crusade of hate the iniquities of big business have been forgotten. The church, of course, has no objection to monopoly capitalism and can be trusted to make its own deals with the "trustards."

The most definite legislative step so far taken to implement the anti-Communist program is the enactment of the "padlock law." Premier Duplessis admitted in the legislature that this law was "suggested" to him by Cardinal Villeneuve. Under its terms the Attorney General can, without judicial authority, order the padlocking of the houses or offices used by "Communists." Neither the act itself nor the authorities have ever defined "communist" or "communism." Nevertheless, the law has already been enforced in some fifty cases, and the government has declared that it will be applied more widely still in the near future.

One of the first of the civil liberties to go down in this campaign was freedom of speech. A year ago the Spanish delegation which toured America was prohibited from speaking in Montreal, and the students of the Catholic University of Montreal demonstrated in appreciation of the ban. In October, 1937, a Communist deputy from Paris, Alfred Costes, visited Canada and was booked to speak in Montreal. A deputation of 200 University of Montreal students called at the office of Mayor Raynault and threatened to cause a riot at the meeting if it were held. This gave the Mayor the pretext he sought to ban the meeting, as "it might lead to disorder." He admitted quite frankly that he was delighted to have this "legal pretext," and it has been openly charged that he instigated the students to make the threat. He also announced that he would continue to ban all such meetings, and he praised the students for their threat of illegal action.

When protests were made by the Civil Liberties Union (predominantly English-speaking of course) and others, Cardinal Villeneuve rushed to the support of the Mayor. Having denounced all supporters of such "equivocal novelties and liberatarian systems," he continued:

> Freedom of speech, I am for it, but let it be among decent people, not among imbeciles and brigands. . . . Would you let sufferers from contagious diseases poison the air you breathe? . . . That is why I approve the resistance which has just been made in the metropolis to Communist meetings. . . . I praise the youth which aligns itself to protect social order. . . . I encourage all public men who in this respect do their duty. . . . If it is argued that this is contrary to law I reply that before law there is the law of nature. . . . Well, to defend ourselves against subversive doctrines, against spiritual poisoning, against the overthrow of the foundations of civilization, against the dynamite which would blow up our religious, family, and social traditions, if that is not the law, let that law be made. . . . Under pretext of respecting a morbid democracy, people wave at us the specter of an illusory fascism, and meanwhile the enemies gain a foothold and make a mockery of our judicial scruples.

When the head of the religious organization to which 90 per cent of French Canadians belong, and to which they owe and usually pay instant and unquestioning obedience, not only condones but encourages the illegal use of force to suppress civil liberties, the future of democratic government can hardly be considered secure.

Complaints against the government's tyrannical acts have been completely unavailing. The authorities state quite frankly that they intend to violate the rights of freedom of speech, of assembly, of the press (the newspaper Clarté was "padlocked") just as often as necessary to stop subversive propaganda. Premier Duplessis, moreover, has complained bitterly because the federal government at Ottawa has so far refused to cooperate "even when invited" to join the crusade by "the highest civic and religious authorities." Apparently the Dominion government is not yet ready to take its orders direct from the Catholic church.

In the industrial world a drive is on to bring the workers of Quebec into the anemic Catholic unions. Going even farther than "Mitch" Hepburn, Duplessis has in practice banned C. I. O. unions in the province. He made it very clear that such unions would not be recognized as "bona fide" within the meaning of the Act Respecting Workmen's Wages, under which collective-labor agreements may be juridically extended. Not being so recognized, C. I. O. unions cannot claim any rights or privileges extended to labor organizations under Quebec statutes. Duplessis has also declared that his government will not permit closed shops. The Catholic unions were organized under church auspices, have a priest as chaplain to every local, and do nothing without church guidance. In other words, they are almost completely useless as labor organizations, though good agencies for the dissemination of clerical instructions.

As might be expected in such an atmosphere, active and recognized fascist groups have been organized in the cities of Montreal and Quebec. One organization claims 80,000 members, and some hundreds of its more enthusiastic recruits are reputed to be drilling regularly on the banks of the St. Lawrence. So far these groups have received little direct official assistance, but in the present temper of the people and government that may come sooner than most persons expect. Here again the attitude of the church is of vital importance. What this attitude is has been clearly expressed in the columns of l'Action Catholique, the mouthpiece of the Quebec hierarchy:

> At every moment we hear noisy denunciations of fascism and of different systems which use popular force to bring order and progress to society. We admit, for our part, being passably indifferent between democracy and fascism, provided that our society takes hold of itself and sees the peril which menaces our civilization; provided, in other words, that an end is made to this inconsistency of Christians who denounce communism and who, nevertheless, fight it much more weakly than any other Christian political adversary [italics mine].

The natural and logical steps for the shamefully exploited workers of Quebec to take would be to join the radical labor movement of the rest of Canada. So far very few have shown themselves ready to do this. The religio-nationalist propaganda of their rulers has been successful in keeping them isolated, and the glowing words on social justice of the Encyclicals of Popes Leo XIII and Pius XI have offered them hope. Almost completely uneducated (there is no universal compulsory education in the province of Quebec) and unaware of the objectives and achievements of labor elsewhere, the workers of Quebec cannot be expected to distinguish the false hope from the true. A small nucleus of intelligent radicals does exist, but its membership is as yet too restricted and too timid to be effective.

The real danger of fascism on a national scale in Canada will come with the next depression, which is being confidently predicted for 1939-41. By that time reaction in Quebec and Ontario may be expected to be well established and organized. Negotiations between Hepburn and Duplessis will probably have produced a working agreement, and Mackenzie King will be leaving the national stage. Now Mr. King has many shortcomings. Too much of his energy since he entered public life has been devoted to holding his ear to the ground. As a procrastinator he is unique, supreme. But he is a liberal. The Gladstone-Laurier tradition is his finest inheritance. There is not the least doubt that he is personally revolted by what is happening in Quebec and Ontario, and both provincial governments have complained bitterly that Ottawa has not supported them in suppressing "subversive" influences. But Mr. King is too much of a politician and too handicapped by his habits and temperament to make any overt effort to stop the spread of fascist doctrines in the provinces. It would be political suicide for him to disallow the anti-democratic legislation of Quebec as he has not hesitated to disallow certain social-credit bills in Alberta. So long as he is in office, however, Mackenzie King will not allow the "corporatism" of the Encyclicals with its medieval accompaniments to invade Parliament Hill, and the Dominion authorities will have no direct hand in destroying civil liberties.

If, as is possible, Mr. King retires before the next election, a crisis will have been reached in Canadian affairs. He will take with him or be preceded into retirement by Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, among the last of the authentic "Laurier Liberals" of Quebec. The stage will then be set for the Hepburn-Duplessis drive for national power, and no one can say they will not get it. When that day comes Canadian refugees will have to organize a new underground railway into the United States. But perhaps it will have happened there as well!

Labor Governments and Sabotage

BY ERNEST DAVIES

London, January 15

EVENTS in Russia have accustomed us to sabotage. Emerging from its hiding-place in the dictionary, the word has made the front page in the newspapers. But whereas in Russia sabotage by persons in opposition to the government is condemned and is punishable by death, in America and Western Europe, though called by other names, it has succeeded in wringing concessions from the government and even in obtaining its capitulation. From the day Franklin Roosevelt was elected President of the United States, American capital has been guilty of sabotage; in France the sabotage of speculators and financiers brought about the downfall of Léon Blum. Wrecking of government plans and obstruction of reforms through non-cooperation or active opposition are the natural tactics of capitalists when they face any encroachment on their prerogatives.

If the capitalists employ these methods to oppose even a mild form of progressive government, they will certainly use every weapon at their disposal against a genuinely Socialist administration. Which raises the question: Will they be able to prevent a Labor government from carrying out its program? This is the problem which challenges the advanced political parties in Europe today, particularly the Labor Party in England.

The British Labor Party, being the official opposition in Parliament, looks forward to becoming again the responsible government. Since it is historically a Socialist party, its long-term policy is the supplanting of the capitalist system with a socialist economy. But because of the rise of fascism and the resultant eclipse of the Social Democratic parties in Central Europe, it recognizes that its immediate task is to assure the continuance of democracy in England, and in planning a program it has had to keep this object to the fore. The choice appeared to be between advocacy of socialism and a policy of reform. The former would invite active opposition from the capitalists; the latter would stave it off. As the quickest way to power, therefore, a policy of moderate reforms was adopted for the new short-term program at the 1937 conference of the party. An extremist program, it was argued, would give capitalists the opportunity of raising scares as they had done before, and would thus bar Labor's success at the polls; a reformist program would contain as much as any government could reasonably be expected to accomplish in its first term of office. The program is accordingly confined to the nationalization of the Bank of England and of the coal, transport, and power industries, a planned agriculture, and the provision of increased social services. Foreign policy is based on the revival of the League of Nations and loyalty to the collective-security system.

The Labor Party Executive, which was responsible for drawing up this program, believes that such moderate reforms could be carried out without stirring up the active opposition of capitalists. But the events of 1931, the maneuvers which brought about Blum's fall, and the recent attacks upon Roosevelt, all provide evidence to the contrary. Sabotage must be expected. The question is: Will a Labor government in England be strong enough to overcome it? There are two ways of dealing with sabotage, and the one chosen depends on whether the government is strong or weak, well or badly led. The weaker way is capitulation; the stronger is resistance. The former entails concessions and sacrifice of principles; the latter, attack and risk of defeat. If a Labor government adopts so moderate a program that control is left in the hands of the capitalists, defeat is almost certain.

The key to power in all capitalist countries is the banking system. On the amount of credit available depends the prosperity of the country, the level of wages, and the standard of living. At the heart of the credit system is the central bank. In Britain the privately owned Bank of England is the central bank. Its governor for many years has been Montagu Norman, a gentleman who played no small part in England's post-war financial policy and in the events which led to the downfall of the Labor government in 1931. The government took advice then from the Bank of England instead of the Bank of England going to the Treasury for commands. In 1931 world events favored capitalist maneuvering to turn out the Labor ministry. Undermining of foreign confidence was the line of attack; as foreign balances in London were exceptionally large, their quick withdrawal was certain to threaten the exchange rate of sterling. London's "hot money" was a real danger owing to the freezing of English loans abroad. Increased national expenditure, a rapidly growing budget deficit, an increasingly unfavorable trade balance, all could be used to make foreigners nervous. The Times ran a series of articles on England's plight by André Siegfried. A Committee on National Expenditure published a report calling for drastic economy. The press in its columns and the politician in his speeches exploited this to the full. The effect was immediate. Funds were withdrawn, sterling was threatened, and only temporary loans from abroad could save the gold standard. Such loans could only be negotiated for the government by the privately owned Bank of England. The capitalist had the Labor government where he wanted it. He could now dictate his terms, and he did. The Cabinet was told by the Bank of England that loans would be granted only if drastic economies were carried out. Needless to say, these economies included cuts in the social services and reduction of the dole. Capitulation meant betrayal of the workers who had put the Labor government in office.

Normally the alternative to accepting the capitalist terms would have been resignation, but in this case the capitalists were working for something more than a change of government. They were playing high for the destruction of the Labor movement. They demanded a "national" government to save the country, with Labor's leader, Ramsay MacDonald, at its head. It was believed that this step would so split the movement that it would be a long time before another Labor government would be possible. The maneuver succeeded, and only now is the Labor movement recovering from the shock of the betrayal.

The Labor Party remembers 1931 and now puts in the forefront of its program the nationalization of the Bank of England. It proposes to buy out the shareholders and run the bank as a public corporation governed by a board appointed by the government. This would not only prevent a repetition of 1931 but enable the government to institute that policy of expansion which it would need to finance its program. Rehabilitation of the distressed areas, slum clearance and rehousing, and public works will require considerable capital expenditure, and no Labor government will leave the bulk of such financing to private enterprise. Here the Labor government, bound over to moderate reforms, proposes to stop. It intends to exercise a certain measure of undefined control over the financial machine through the Bank of England, but fearful of scaring the electorate, it asks for no more. Is it enough? It is certainly enough to invite sabotage, but it is by no means enough to prevent sabotage being effective. And the capitalists' reaction is likely to be similar to that which brought about Blum's fall. Blum controlled France's central bank but not the other banking institutions. Speculators in exchange were still able to obtain all the credit they needed to lead an attack on the franc. As long as only the central bank is controlled and other financial institutions remain independent, capitalists will be in a position to sabotage.

In England the banking system is in the hands of five joint-stock banks, known as the "Big Five." Each has a nation-wide branch-banking business, and together they virtually monopolize the deposit banking of the country. Through these banks the credit policy of the central bank is made effective. At the Bank of England the joint-stock banks have their accounts. Their deposits there are the equivalent of the reserves of the member banks of the Federal Reserve system. The practice has been for the joint-stock banks to extend credit to the extent of ten times their deposits at the Bank of England. This tenfold ratio is not legally fixed, and there is no compulsion on the joint-stock banks to adhere to it; they do so partly as a matter of custom and partly because it works well in practice, the interests of the Bank of England and the joint-stock banks not yet having run counter to each other. When the Bank of England has followed an expansionist policy, the joint-stock banks have followed suit and vice versa. But imagine the situation that might arise if their interests were in opposition. The Bank of England following a policy of expansion might be faced with the joint-stock banks calling in loans and refusing additional credits just at the time when it was desirable that they should be granted. When the Bank of England increased credit, the joint-stock banks might decrease it. Here is a weapon of sabotage in the hands of the joint-stock banks which only complete control can eliminate.

Nor is this all. The English joint-stock banks, like American banks, hold a vast quantity of government securities. If they wished to embarrass the government they could start unloading these securities and depress their price. While the government could support its market for a time, the continued liquidation would ultimately send up the cost of government borrowing and undermine confidence. This would be most embarrassing to a Labor government obliged to borrow not only to finance its welfare schemes but to be able to take over the industries which it proposed to nationalize.

Moreover, a fall in government credit leads to a slump on the Stock Exchange. And a collapse in Stock Exchange prices not only makes the raising of capital difficult but dries up the new-issue market and prevents capital expansion. Further, a weakening of government credit, collapse of prices, and destruction of confidence would lead to the withdrawal of foreign funds from London. The withdrawal of these in 1931 played a part in bringing about the abandonment of the gold standard. Once this point was reached, export of capital on a large scale would be inevitable, and the pressure on the sterling rate of exchange and the effect on trade would be felt.

Defenders of the reformist policy advocate leaving the joint-stock banks unnationalized, asserting that there are ways of controlling them if they fail to cooperate. But measures of control instituted after sabotage had started would come too late, for any control of the exchanges, a ban on the export of capital, or similar action in defense of the currency would be a sign of weakness and add to the danger. To run the risk of non-cooperation on the part of the joint-stock banks is to invite the capitalists to destroy the Labor government in its early days. That there would be sabotage is certain from the constitution of the boards of directors of the joint-stock banks. On the boards of the Big Five are some 149 directors who serve on no fewer than 1,040 boards of other companies, including all the important industrialist undertakings of the country. The opposition of the members of these boards to a Labor government is assured by their education, their family ties (no fewer than thirty are peers of the realm and another thirty-two have titles), and their industrial interests.

If sabotage is inevitable, what hope is there of a Labor or Socialist government's succeeding? Such a government will be able to accomplish its ends only if it realizes at the start that the cooperation of capitalists cannot be expected. Immediately on obtaining power it must forestall a maneuvered panic by assuming complete control of the financial machine. It must nationalize the banking system as a whole and control foreign exchange. To prevent a strike either of capital or of the producers it must make it clear that any such sabotage would be answered by swift government action even to the extent of acquiring any industry concerned. Reform and compromise have destroyed Labor governments in England. They played their part in bringing the Weimar republic to an end, and in ousting the Socialist Blum from the premiership of France. A Socialist government must employ different tactics to succeed. It must take the power to sabotage out of the hands of the capitalists before it even starts to implement its program.

Composers in Revolt

BY MINNA LEDERMAN

THERE is a story going the rounds that Igor Stravinsky was recently asked by Radio City Music Hall to tack a happy ending on his ballet "Petrouchka." "Certainly," he cabled, "for $10,000." Now M. Stravinsky is no mercenary, but America has made him cynical. For in this country a "serious" composer—native or European—may conduct an orchestra, give lectures, write criticism, teach counterpoint, talk on the radio, or stage plays, and be well paid. But let him ask money for his music, and he will find it almost impossible to collect.

The law of course says otherwise. Copyright "protects" him on the sale and public performance of every piece, whether it is a little violin nocturne or a grand opera. The sale of published music, however, has been reduced to unimportance by records and radio, and when a composer demands performance royalties, he runs into difficulties. Arrayed against him in a united front are radio's program arrangers, all the soloists touring America from coast to coast, the women's clubs, the festival managers, and even the highly respected symphony societies. "Give us your music," they say, "for next to nothing, or nothing—or else." Which means there are plenty of works by men long dead that can be had free.

The composer who is thus challenged has been under a severe handicap. The writer of a song or dance hit will be able to collect royalties if he joins the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, which gives effective protection in the popular field. A playwright can count on a minimum percentage of box-office receipts if he is a member of the Dramatists' Guild. A European collects on any piece of music performed abroad if he belongs to his nation's protective society. But up to a few months ago this country had developed no all-inclusive union to guard the rights of "serious" composers.

Now at last, however, the victims are rising up to shape their own destinies. On December 19, 1937, a group of leading young Americans, among them Aaron Copland, Virgil Thomson, Douglas Moore, Roy Harris, and Roger Sessions, called a meeting of their colleagues at the Beethoven Club in New York, and proceeded to organize the American Composers' Alliance, whose first objective is "to regularize and collect all fees pertaining to the performance of copyrighted music." The importance of this move can hardly be overemphasized; for a parallel one must go back to the early steps taken by Victor Herbert and his associates in the formation of ASCAP. After the briefest survey of current practices in the matter of royalties, anyone will concede that action was long overdue.

The composers' demands are far from being exorbitant. Take "Petrouchka" again. The suite arranged from this ballet is one of the most popular in modern orchestral repertory. Performance rights, plus the rental of the score and about a hundred parts, come to only $75. That is the fee to first-rank orchestras; others can get the suite for $50, since royalties are scaled to capacity to pay. Yet in the course of a season this much-admired work will be presented only once or twice by two or three leading organizations; other orchestras are deterred by the price. But when the suite is played, the conductor will probably get between $500 and $2,000 for his "interpretation," the concert manager about $300, and the owner of the hall about $500. M. Stravinsky divides his $75 among the publisher, the agent, and himself.

And this figure of $75 is tops. It is the price of a few spectacular works by Stravinsky and Strauss. Sometimes for a "première" $150 is charged, but the same orchestra then pays only $50 each for the second and third performances. The more usual sum is between $35 and $25, tapering off to $10 or less. For Ravel's "Bolero," an international hit, sometimes only $5 has been paid. Radio royalties for a nation-wide broadcast are usually double the symphonic; even more is asked for a commercial program. Yet "Bolero," nearly done to death on the air, is known to have gone on for $10. As for the "small rights"—songs, violin and piano pieces, trios, and the like—no one even tries to collect on them.

Among Americans few composers have sufficient prestige or courage to demand $50 for the performance of a symphony. Not long ago a publisher asked the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York to pay $40 in royalties for the first presentation of a work by a young composer. "Royalties?" said a member of the management. "Why your Mr. X should be paying us that $40." In 1931, when its budget amounted to nearly a million dollars, the Philharmonic performed a work by Abram Chasins with Toscanini conducting, but couldn't afford to pay the composer a single penny.

But it is in the world of radio that economy reaches extravagant heights. On January 8, 1933, the Columbia Broadcasting System was to send the Philharmonic program on the air over a nation-wide hook-up. A feature was the première of a suite from Strauss's new ballet "Schlagobers." Just before the broadcast, however, it was decided not to pay the radio royalties Strauss demanded. So with the opening bars of the Strauss number the invisible audience was eased out of Carnegie Hall into the C. B. S. studios for a "fill-in" of light music, then wafted back to Carnegie for the rest of the program.

A more brilliant example of radio finesse is the experience of Stravinsky when on February 3, 1935, he conducted the General Motors hour over the network of the National Broadcasting Company. Now all the world knows that Stravinsky is in demand as a conductor because of his fame as a composer. He is most interesting when he is interpreting his own works; so naturally he included three of these in his program. But that would mean $500 in royalties! Quickly therefore radio's masterminds substituted one number by Tschaikowsky (free) and another by Glinka (also free), leaving only "Petrouchka," at $150. But for his single hour on the air Stravinsky as conductor received a fee of $1,750.

Let us look at Americans' royalties. For many years the N. B. C. Music Guild Series drew heavily—without paying—on works brought out by the non-profit-making Society for the Publication of American Music. Early in 1936 the society decided to ask a $25 royalty. At once came a protest from radio officials, which brought the price down to $10. Twenty works were listed at this price, but in 1936 not a single one of the twenty found a place on the Music Guild programs.

Perhaps one cannot yet expect radio to recognize the importance of creative artists. But what shall be said of such penny-pinching by the old, established orchestras? In the depression of 1932 symphonic societies in their appeals to the public for support promised severe economies. Prominently listed for the ax were—as you may have guessed—composers' royalties. To anyone familiar with the figures the idea of thus balancing the budget was intriguing. During the two previous seasons the Philharmonic, with annual appropriations at an all-time high of $900,000, had spent just $3,500 on performance and rental fees! The budgets of the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras were a little less and their royalty expenses perhaps a little more. An estimate of one-half of 1 per cent of the budget for royalties would be high for any organization in the country.

This was the figure the managers proceeded to reduce, and now the level is lower than it was ten years ago. As late as 1936 the Stadium Concerts in New York, with an appropriation of $180,000 for fifty-six programs, allotted only $600 to royalties. The Cleveland Orchestra advised guest conductors engaged for the Great Lakes Exposition that no money was available for performance rights.

The conductors themselves are sometimes caught between the lines of battle. Most of them want new works, but since the management bears down on "extras," they are happy to get them for nothing. The composers, however, have two notable champions—Koussevitzky, who is benevolent and encourages them to ask for fees, and Stokowski, who likes novelties and believes in paying for them.

We come finally to the operatic field. Here royalties are recognized, but they are hardly payment for value received. Famous works can be had for less than $500, except for a first night; $200 is a good sum for an American piece. Yet if a dramatist's minimum rate were applied against the receipts of a sold-out night at the Metropolitan, the royalty would be $1,200—a sum that couldn't be asked even for "Salome."

Some comprehensive system of taxing performance is obviously required for the entire field, and that is exactly what the ambitious new American Composers' Alliance has undertaken to work out. A technique of policing and collection may not be developed overnight, for the situation bristles with intricacies that demand the most careful adjustment; but there is always the example of ASCAP, pioneer in a much more complex field, where piracy once prevailed on a grand scale. The composer of "serious" music already has the law on his side. He needs only to secure its enforcement.

Mormon "Security"

BY MARTHA EMERY

NOT since the old polygamy days have the Latter Day Saints made the headlines as frequently as they have in the last eighteen months with their program to take 88,000 Mormons off the dole. Cries against federal spending have everywhere been vociferous and unending, but the only project organized solely to free Americans from the burden of government relief, and advertised as such, has been the Mormon Security Plan. "No man should ask for charity from the government," declared the Mormon president, who is reputed to have a finger in banking, insurance, real estate, mining, and industry and an ear cocked to a short-wave set tuned in to heaven. "I am sorry that some of our men would not work for $30 a month when they could get $35 by lying down and being lazy."

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Although it ridiculed federal work projects, the church attempted to solve the unemployment problem among Mormons by creating projects of its own. These varied from coal mining and sugar-beet raising to temple-clothing manufacture. Publicity agents found no difficulty in selling the story. Conservative magazines and newspapers in America not only publicized but glorified the undertaking. Yet in spite of twenty months of propaganda, the creation of 700 projects which run practically without administrative costs, and an expenditure of more than half a million dollars amassed from voluntary donations, there are today in Utah 32 per cent more workers on WPA projects than in the nation as a whole, 45 per cent more in the CCC, 50 per cent more in the NYA, 175 per cent more receiving student aid, and 60 per cent more in the PWA. Skeptics are asking, "What has the church been doing?"

The answer is a simple one. The church is getting an incredible amount of favorable publicity and at the same time, far from endangering its solid financial structure, is actually the gainer from the security plan. This success has resulted from three lines of action. First, the church limited the number eligible for relief by forbidding members to give up WPA jobs for church aid. In addition, it guaranteed work only to those "who have been faithful in the payment of fast offerings and tithing and in living unspotted from the sins of the world." Second, by invoking the rich and thickly sentimentalized tradition of its pioneers, the church drew from the cupboards, closets, and pocket-books of its 541,000 "stake" members over half a million dollars in addition to regular tithing, as well as 200,000 quarts of fruits and vegetables, 364,000 articles of clothing, 24,000 pounds of meat, and considerable quantities of flour, grain, sugar, lumber, potatoes, wool, hay, and coal. Third, it actually pared down its relief expenditures from the amount required in the worst depression years. In 1934 and 1936, before the Security Plan was launched, church relief sums dropped 31 per cent and 21 per cent, respectively, from the 1931 level. In the first year of the Security Plan, though there were extra donations and a much-vaunted tithing increase, relief expenditures were only $544,000, as compared with a $594,000 average for the former six years.

Only one significant increase was reported in all church expenditures. The building program was increased by $500,000. This would appear a useful work project until one learns that the wards, or parishes, were forced to raise an additional $513,000 in order to get the original grant, that union wages were for the most part denied to the skilled laborers, and that a considerable portion of the labor was donated by ward members who were assessed a specified amount of free labor as well as cash. And the total sum was $100,000 less than the church spent for building in 1930.

The voluntary labor and donations have come in large measure from the most pious Mormons, the poorer classes, who are already heavily taxed. Let us look at the situation of an average Mormon, say Nils Neilson, a convert emigrant from Sweden. For twenty years Nils has faithfully parted with $100 out of his $1,000 annual wage. He has also contributed freely to the maintenance of his chapel, and has paid a monthly "fast offering" and annual dues to auxiliary church organizations—never to a labor union, for the church frowns on them. He has paid genealogy experts to discover members of his lowly family tree so that he can perform rituals for their salvation in the temples. Every spare penny has gone to support his eldest son, who for three years will be preaching Mormonism abroad—in Czechoslovakia perhaps, or Tahiti.

Until lately Nils Neilson was content. The more he gave the more devout he grew. The church is a vested interest, attachment to which is fostered by its exactions. Nils's dividends have been the "countless blessings" which have flowed from the seat of the Most High. But three years ago he was laid off and became dependent on the WPA. Now the sermons on Sunday night make him uncomfortable with their derision of government relief, their pleadings for new contributions and payment of an "honest tithe."

Are the secure and wealthy Mormons likewise uncomfortable before the pulpit solicitations? Perhaps. But there has been little overt protest from any class to the new demand for increased offerings and free labor. To all appearances the Saints have accepted it without complaint, without understanding its social implications or that it was an ultra-conservative gesture of withdrawal into the old isolation which in the past was a major source of the church's strength. Nils, however, cannot be the only Mormon who is beginning to realize that his heavy contributions have materially lowered his capacity for saving and investing, and for tiding himself over unemployment. The fact that in 1935 there were proportionally 25 per cent more Mormons than Gentiles on relief in Salt Lake County is an indication of the serious depletion in personal resources resulting from the church's exactions from its members, for they cannot truthfully be said to be less thrifty or industrious than are their Gentile neighbors.

Without doubt the Mormon Security Plan won the support of the Saints because the Mormon gospel, to its believers, is the full plan of salvation, the only complete way of life. There have been minor squalls in some communities, such as the resentment aroused over the sugar-beet project, which seemed to be a deliberate church effort to break the farmers' strike against the price offered by the church-owned beet factory, but irritation has been soothed by the glowing press accounts which are read from the pulpits on Sunday night.

Now at last, however, the Mormon preachers, be they politicians or business men, have reason for worry. Federal relief is being curtailed. The heavy hand of economy is reaching toward the Great Basin. The Mormons have been preparing for the day of want. The day of want is upon them.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A VETERAN reader of The Nation has just asked me: "Do you really think that such men as President Roosevelt, Secretary Hull, and Norman Davis want war?" To this my reply is, "Of course not." They really feel that the United States is peace-minded and wants to keep out of war. But they belong to the school which says, "I am for peace, but—." In other words, they contemplate the contingency that Japan by its attacks upon our nationals and its insults to our honor may "compel" us to go to war. They emphatically believe, with Theodore Roosevelt, that "there are worse things than war." What is even more important is that this school of thought appears to believe that the only way to check the Japanese is by rattling the saber and threatening them and the other dictators abroad by increased armaments—we shall have the greatest navy on the globe if we give in to the navy people and build, as Mr. Roosevelt has just suggested in his appeal to Congress, a "two-ocean fleet."

The trouble with this policy is that it is the road to war; as I have so often pointed out, threatening the other fellow leads to immediate reprisals and an armament race which brings on war, precisely as the naval race between Germany and Great Britain was one of the causes of the World War. What was the reaction in Tokyo to the President's message asking for a larger army and navy? Here is what the Tokyo Asahi says about it, disputing President Roosevelt's assertion that the American program aims solely at self-defense:

> There is no reason for American expansion at this moment, when no country is challenging or preparing to challenge the United States. It is unthinkable that any American nationals, wherever they may live, are exposed to such danger as necessitates the enormous estimate of $800,000,000 for defense.

That is the simple truth. The Asahi adds that the Vinson bill embodying the Roosevelt program will obligate Japan "to enlarge her building program." The Nichi Nichi, another influential newspaper, declares that "Japan must take counter-measures." As these newspapers could not take such an attitude without government consent, we may accept these statements as showing the reaction of the highest Tokyo officials.

That is the way it always happens. We raise the ante and Japan responds, and then we go her one better, and the vicious circle continues until one day there is a spontaneous conflagation, and the good and kind men, like Franklin Roosevelt and Secretary Hull and Norman Davis, wonder how on earth it could have happened and feel so sad that thousands of American boys must be "liquidated" in early manhood because they, these good and kind men, could see no other way to save us than by piling up the munitions and armaments which made the explosion inevitable. Of course they don't want war, but they have learned nothing from our experience in 1914-17. They have forgotten how Woodrow Wilson headed preparedness parades carrying an American flag, and assured his countrymen that increasing our army and navy then would keep us out of war—the slogan on which he ran for reelection. Why, even Calvin Coolidge saw the truth when he said (October 6, 1925), "We know and everyone knows that these old [military] systems, antagonisms, and reliance on force have failed." And he was wise enough to add, "It is not our purpose in our intercourse with foreign powers to rely upon the strength of our fleets and our armies." It all reminds me of the cynical saying of my good friend Lincoln Steffens, who used to declare that the trouble with the world was that the good men were the bad men and the bad men the good men!

Next I must point out, in order to be wholly just to friends with whom I disagree with such reluctance, that they conscientiously feel that their policy alone will keep us at peace. A minor official with whom I talked in Washington not long ago admitted that increasing our navy might lead to war but insisted that if my policy and that of the peace movement were followed, we should inevitably drift into war. So there you have the direct conflict of policy and belief. The trouble is that the advocates of preparedness are still thinking in terms of the old-fashioned diplomacy which brought about the World War. They still talk about "national honor." If anybody should ask them why we should not withdraw our ships and sailors and troops from China, I suppose their answer would be that that would be an ignoble act.

Well, they might so interpret it, but I will bet fifty to one that the American people and the press of this country are overwhelmingly against our going to war with Japan, and perfectly willing to face the charge of being cowardly rather than to commit the crime of 1917 over again. They know that we should come out of the next war with far greater moral and material losses than we suffered the last time. One thing is certain: the armament boosters won't take me up on this bet, for they are absolutely opposed to creating any machinery which would enable the American people to register their will about sending their sons to die abroad. They want to reserve that power to themselves, and they dislike all of us who tell them the truth—that no small group of men, in office or out of office, is wise enough to have in its hands the power of life and death over American youth and over the American Republic.

BOOKS and the ARTS

INNOVATION AND COLLECTIVE TALENT

BY HARRY LEVIN

WHAT'S new, and just how new it is, the reviewer is the last person to find out. He is fairly safe, although sometimes wrong, in assuming that there is nothing new under the sun. Certainly he has small reason to expect new writing from new writers. Originality takes a long time to achieve and a longer time to detect. The most original of the hundred and thirty-odd contributors to these five collections of neoteric novelty[*] died in 1924. To any discovery there is an overwhelming proportion of wasted experiment. But literary experiment has a significance of its own, as an index to the vitality of older ways of writing and a weather-vane for the winds of doctrine. New faces, old expressions. New signatures, yet the handwriting looks familiar. New caravans, armored and mobilizing. New country—Spain.

Five years ago, when new writing was newer than it is today, some new English writers, who may be collectively designated as Stalky & Co., provided a splendid fanfare. Fanfares are what they have been providing ever since. So much of their time has been spent performing in public that they have never learned the distinction between being contemporary and being up-to-date. Their work does not actually participate; it casually alludes. They approach the past in terms of "1066 and All That," and their sense of the present is not much more profound. Life appears, not as integrated experience, but as precarious generalization. England, through their eyes, becomes a Lilliput, full of miniature railways and toy workhouses and cut-out power stations. Have they led their generation out of the Waste Land only to wander through a slightly industrialized Never-Never-Land?

The answer, when we appeal to the rank and file of their movement, is no. The two most recent volumes of "New Writing" waste no words on manifestos but get down to the grim business of documentation. These new writers are not seeking a short cut to the universal; all their energies are concentrated on gaining access to the particular. "I am a camera with its shutter open, quite passive, recording not thinking," writes Christopher Isherwood. "Some day all this will have to be developed, carefully printed, fixed." Even as observation, compared to E. M. Forster's notes on the Paris Exposition, there is much that is immature and undiscriminating. Contrasted with Ignazio Silone's crafty fable, "The Fox," there is no such thing as organization. The sole criterion is honesty, and the only pattern is that implied by the attitude of the author. This is best stated by a twenty-two-year-old poet, H. Mallalieu:

> He is aware of our own land, its downs,
> The rusty chalk of long-neglected quarries;
> His ear's familiar with the noise of towns,
> His brain absorbed by purely English worries.
> He has seen the star-shot lake
> And the startled heron take
> Its frightened wings above the sandy marsh.
> It is not the fabric but the flag which he denies.
> He knows our histories and our apathies and the harsh
> Fact that they are lies.

English men of letters have escaped from their genteel tradition before, but never by a technique of extroversion. The proletariat—always one of those products in which England leads the world—have figured as objects of literary charity or picturesque clods or cosmic pawns or highly competent satyrs, but seldom as human beings. The rich and the poor are two nations, as Disraeli perceived, and they speak different languages. It is something new for a public-school accent to assimilate the dialect of Derbyshire mines or Whitechapel sweatshops. In a suggestive sketch, The Power of Words, André Chamson describes the upsurge of his native langue d'oc against the pressure to "talk French." This renewed impetus toward the local and the vernacular implies a changing conception of culture, no longer a hothouse growth but rooted.

If all the world went native, there would be a confusion of tongues, a multiplication of regionalisms. Partikularismus, however, is hostile to nationalism and friendly to internationalism. These contributions, including the Urdu, are different sectors on the same line. John Sommerfield and Alfred Kantorowicz recount their adventures in Spain, while Rafael Alberti sings of America. There is a silly symphony by Jean Giono, "The Corn Dies," and a shrewder version of that theme by Ben Field. Since the editor, John Lehmann, has just published a travel book on the Caucasus, special interest attaches to his Soviet contributors. They are no Jove-defiers, but they are honest to the point of cynicism. The Road to Affluence, by Pantaleimon Tchikvadze, depicts a recalcitrant peasant who is sold the collective idea by the superiority of galoshes to bast shoes, and is left dreaming of automobiles. Morale, by Nikolai Tikhonov, is a tale of a military commander who fakes an attack to keep his detachment from disintegrating.

The prose in these volumes should be read, as Dr. Johnson read metaphysical poetry, because it contains useful information. The verse can be read for its own sake, although it too involves questions of idiom. Louis MacNeice's set of sapphics, June Thunder, is unique, both in its distinguished craftsmanship and its lack of social relevance. This proves nothing, of course, except that perfection is more easily attained within small compass. W. H. Auden, seeking a wider scope, invariably dilutes his effects—on the principle that vers de société becomes poetry when you spell it with a big S. His attempts in the rhythm of "Frankie and Johnny" or "Saint James Infirmary" are awkwardly condescending. Francis Cornford's lines on Kirov recall the metallic aptness of Landor, but they do not solve the problem of finding a mode of address for poetry which can be popular without being merely conventional. Stephen Spender, in two speeches from his new play, comes nearer. This time his kind of exhortation goes beyond Whitman to the late Elizabethans for a free blank verse that lends itself to grandiloquence and an imagery that exploits tradition while rejecting it. Vide Peter Blume's Eternal City:

---

[*] "New Writing, Spring 1937." Edited by John Lehmann. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

"New Writing, Fall 1937." Edited by John Lehmann. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

"New Letters in America." Edited by H[redacted] Gregory. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

"New Directions in Prose and Poetry, 1937." Edited by James Laughlin IV. New Directions. $2.50.

"The Writer in a Changing World." Edited by Henry Hart. Equinox Cooperative Press. $2.

Civilization which was sweet
With love and words, after earthquakes
Terrifies; architraves
Or flowering leaf of the Corinthian capital
Momently threaten; then fall
In marble waves on life. What was
The fastened mouth of the live past
Speaking in stone against the cloud, becomes
Our present death.

To turn to the recent American miscellanies is to enter a more sophisticated realm, where sincerity and pedestrian competence are less evident, but where successes and failures are more conspicuous. The slice of life has been our literary staple for so long that we are willing to watch new writers go to almost any lengths in their arrangement of materials. We are inoculated against the heavier ironies of circumstance, and an English contributor to Horace Gregory's volume, John Hampson, only bores us with his conscientious account of what goes on behind the stairs in a grand hotel. With William Phillips and Philip Rahv, we demand a higher imaginative level of writing. But their critique, Literature in a Political Decade, would be more helpful if it showed an awareness of literature beyond this decade or a little patience with the immediate problems of the writer.

The writers themselves are quite realistic in their efforts to transcend realism. Eleanor Clark, in Call Me Comrade, imparts a Katherine Mansfield touch to a New Masses theme. I. J. Kapstein, in The Man in the Jail Is Not Jesus, compresses a devastating range of implication into a guileless narrative. Elizabeth Bishop, in The Sea and Its Shore, does a neat job of engraving the Lord's Prayer on the head of a pin. The strict economy of these stories, the contrast between selection and accumulation, is underlined by James Agee's modernized scenario of "The Fall of the House of Usher," which—in spite of some memorable shots—gets blurred. Parable needs a sharp focus. At the other extreme it tries to signify too much by too little, and then it is sheer oracle. And why are Rimbaud and Kafka being asked to preside over our new writers, when the great tradition of American symbolism—Poe, Hawthorne, Melville, Emily Dickinson, Henry James, T. S. Eliot—is so available?

If the English seem less enterprising in the techniques of fiction, we have much to learn from them about the method of verse. Our major mode has been public speech, conceived in a spirit of promiscuous self-dedication, a collage of extrinsic images and undigested emotions. Many of the poems in this book include elements of fresh observation and genuine feeling, yet few function as organisms. Even Muriel Rukeyser's elaborate allegory, The Cruise, has a worked-up atmosphere and reads like an article in Fortune. Frederic Prokosch's Return from the Picnic makes one regret that there is no prize for the worst poem of the year. Richard Eberhart and Robert Fitzgerald stand out because of their sense of responsibility to their craft.

"New Directions" makes its appeal on archaeological and sentimental grounds. The wit of Cocteau's Mariés de la Tour Eiffel, in English, sans scenery, sans music, sans choreography, is all too imitable, and so—in the cold light of the morning after—are most of the old-fashioned non-Euclideans whom Laughlin has exhumed: Gertrude Stein and her coloratura stutter, E. E. Cummings and his archy-the-cockroach typewriter, William Carlos Williams and his ecstatic exercises, Gorham B. Munson and his pontifical bull. It is comforting to know that these venerable and well-loved figures now have a suitably rococo old actors' home, full of false perspectives and vistas that lead nowhere, where they may rehearse their favorite roles and live again their triumphs.

Literary self-consciousness does not necessarily involve a preoccupation with form. The task of Cummings and his generation was to take poetry apart, and the hope of the new generation is to put it together, but here are the same old disjecti membra poetae. Here, more demurely, are the stylized echoes of Francis Fergusson and the sleazy banalities of Merrill Moore. Here is an ambitious poem by John Wheelwright, with Jim Crow shrouded in classical dress. Here is the editor, a social-crediteer, insisting that poets can be as useful as monetary reformers. Language, he has discovered, is fraught with associations; so experimental writers, by verbal dissociation, are challenging the tyranny of words and averting disaster. Which is tantamount to the proposition that bartenders can be trusted to eradicate the curse of drunkenness.

Even here, in this hotbed of rive-gaucherie, the native's return seems an inescapable fact. Laughlin's own verse is pretty folksy, La Stein—now in her rocking-chair period—celebrates Dan'l Webster, and Lorine Niedecker is shyly articulate about the progressive movement in Wisconsin. Henry Miller, in his walks around Montmartre, remembers names, "everything American coming up in a rush," from American Can to the Banks of the Wabash. Montagu O'Reilly, billed as a Chicago financier, remains the only intransigent surrealist, and he achieves his most dazzling effect by introducing Lenin as a butler. William Saroyan's stories are feeble because his stream of consciousness is utterly uninteresting, but he can get fresh and thumb his nose convincingly. Delmore Schwartz's stories are the most arresting in the book. He writes well and contrives better, but where he really needs insight he tends to give way to exhibitionism.

Problems of writers are not the same as the Problem of the Writer—to judge from the record of the congress in New York last summer. There is no known correlation between the energy and volubility manifested on such occasions and what it takes to produce literature. Delegation is meaningless, since every writer has different criteria of professional skill and no writer is entitled to represent anyone except himself. The slogan of a cultural front raises the inevitable political question: front for what? Certain large issues can be, and were, satisfactorily dramatized by this ritual—the plight of literature in fascist countries, special problems of Latin America, the Negro. Two of the speakers, Newton Arvin and B. A. Botkin, out of a practical knowledge of literary history and folklore, were able to make acute comments on "the sort of native cultural consciousness without which . . . a true internationalism is impossible." Kenneth Burke did card tricks.

Henry Hart's argument against waste in America and Albert Rhys Williams's case for planning in Russia are more conclusively applied to publishing than to writing. The writer can afford to take nothing for granted; he must find out for himself. He must not kid himself into the notion that attending congresses and accepting slogans will bring him any nearer to reality. "A writer's problem does not change," Ernest Hemingway told the delegates. "He himself changes, but his problem remains the same. It is always how to write truly and having found what is true to project it in such a way that it becomes a part of the experience of the person who reads it." Oh, Mr. Hemingway, you make everything so simple!

The Dream

BY LOUISE BOGAN

O God, in the dream the terrible horse began
To paw at the air, and make for me with its blows.
Fear kept for thirty-five years poured through its mane,
And retribution equally old, or nearly, breathed through its nose.

Coward complete, I lay and wept on the ground,
When some strong creature appeared, and leapt for the rein.
Another woman, as I lay half in a swound,
Leapt in the air, and clutched at the leather and chain.

Give him, she said, something of yours as a charm.
Throw him, she said, some poor thing which you alone claim.
No, no, I wept. He hates me. He's out for harm,
And whether I yield or not, it is all the same.

But, like a lion in a legend, when I flung the glove
Pulled from my sweating, my cold right hand,
The terrible beast, that no one may understand,
Came to my side, and put down his head in love.

BOOKS

Wonderful Woman

THIS PROUD HEART. By Pearl S. Buck. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

MRS. BUCK'S first "American" novel bears, naturally enough, certain resemblances to her Chinese novels. The style is rapid and constant to the point of monotony, the story keeps always a significant end in view, the people are here for a purpose, and Mrs. Buck herself bothers with nothing except the very largest, the "universal," forms of human behavior. "The Good Earth" and the books which followed it benefited by all this, since they had generations to sweep through and a remote country to conquer; their manner was the best that could have been found, as indeed their popularity proved. But "This Proud Heart" had much to lose by the manner, and the loss has in fact been suffered. The famous style, employed upon a different range of subject matter, becomes what it never was before, breathy; and the concern with big themes teases Mrs. Buck into the first shallowness of her career.

Her heroine, Susan Gaylord, is clearly intended to seem a great woman and what is more a great artist, but the most that she becomes is a tiresomely wonderful woman and an incredibly "creative" worker in marble. I put quotation marks around creative because they belong there in this case, and because Mrs. Buck has sung the wonders of Susan's spirit at so incessantly high a pitch as to achieve what I hear as a misleading falsetto. Susan is the kind of person from whose center a tide of creative vitality flows out like electricity, thrilling and warming the arms, the hands, and issuing almost at once in perfect works. These works may be suppers, lace curtains, children, or—at the piano—Sibelius; in the higher reaches, however, they are marble figures done deftly in a matter of months (not years, as with Michangelo) and done scarcely at all with that sort of labor which makes the creative activity a dull one to watch—one, actually, not to be watched at all, since there is nothing to see. There are, of course, months (or years) of chipping, but Mrs. Buck hurries over those in her eagerness to convince us that Susan labored somewhat as God did on the sixth day. I find this blasphemous, with respect both to God and to art, and understand only too well the habit Susan had of overwhelming people—her two husbands, put here for the sole purpose of being overwhelmed, and a procession of other persons who have as little reality as Susan herself.

No novel by Mrs. Buck would be without value, and this one has its generous, its moving moments. But Susan is not to be believed; or if she is, then creation is a more trifling thing than we ever thought it, and glibness is eloquence. Perhaps the plainest sign that she does not exist is her failure to bestow life upon those about her. Her parents, her sister Mary, her husbands, her children, her father-in-law, her teachers, her servants are in a singular degree uncreated—Mary, for instance, occurring merely for the sake of a contrast Mrs. Buck wants to state, and the children having been brought into the world so that one of them may be found to resemble his mother. As for the statues, we have to be sure Mrs. Buck's assertion that they have life. But "The Good Earth" was more than an assertion.

MARK VAN DOREN

Uruguay's Progressive Epoch

UTOPIA IN URUGUAY. By Simon G. Hanson. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

SIMON G. HANSON'S book, "Utopia in Uruguay," is a solid but uninspired account of the vast social-reform program of José Battle y Ordonez. The volume is overweighted with information about the administrative and budgetary aspects of the various state organizations, and its analysis of the broad social and economic forces shaping the Battle program can only be described as fragmentary. But Mr. Hanson has succeeded in compacting a great deal of valuable information into a small number of pages, and his evaluation of the general economic effects of the Battle reforms is competent if not exhaustive.

The progressive program which transformed Uruguay between 1905 and 1933 had two main components. State capitalism was extended to greater lengths than in any other country in this hemisphere. Parallel to this was social-security and labor legislation which antedated even the Mexican national revolutionary movement.

How could a program of this sort originate in a backward, agrarian country? Hanson mentions the relative weakness of the Catholic church, the racial homogeneity of the population which precluded a caste society similar to that of Peru, and the political backwardness of the conservative landlord class. The chief factor in the Uruguayan economy, he points out, was the preeminent position of a few British and American corporations and the dearth of native industrialism. Piecemeal nationalization appeared to be the sole practicable alternative to unbridled exploitation by foreign capital. The labor movement had broad support, because it served as a battering ram against the profit rate of foreign industry. "From the point of view of the national economy," wrote one of Battle's chief disciples, "a wasteful administration by the state is always preferable to the efficient management of an industry by foreign capitalists." Government control could appeal to nationalists as well as socialists, for it prevented the draining of industrial profits to foreign countries.

Battle refused to admit either the necessity or the advantage of class struggle, but none the less enthusiastically supported trade unionism. "Every strike is justified and it would be ideal if all could be successful," he wrote as early as 1908. "Since the all-important matter is that the time be opportune, let the state help by keeping the workers informed on conditions in various industries, markets, availability of strike-breakers, and the technique of labor organizations abroad."

Hanson's book is largely devoted to a discussion of the separate measures comprising the Battlista program. The nationalization movement covered commercial, mortgage, and insurance banking, public utilities, railroads, meat refrigeration, and petroleum and alcohol production and distribution. For the most part these government concerns were remunerative, and in fact labor criticized the tendency to sacrifice long-range programs of social value for immediate profits. Hanson cites the attacks on the electricity trust for its failure to service interior towns at low rates.

Battle won his nine-year fight for an eight-hour-day law in 1915. Five years later Uruguay introduced accident insurance, and this was followed by old-age, retirement, and unemployment insurance. Agricultural labor got a minimum-wage law, but its enforcement was "dependent on the good faith of employers." The Battlista theory that the pension system would reach actuarial equilibrium was rudely shaken by the great depression. The number of pensioners increased rapidly while receipts from earmarked taxes drastically declined. With collapse threatened, President Terra succeeded in organizing a successful coup, repressed the Battlistas, slashed pensions and wages, and short-circuited the democratic movement.

Hanson's volume, unfortunately, leaves the unwary reader with the impression that Terra is continuing in Battle's footsteps. To be sure his regime has taken a few forward strides in the development of government enterprises. But economics cannot be rigorously separated from politics. The Battlista movement was pro-labor and democratic; the Terra administration is pro-fascist and dictatorial. This inevitably changes the direction of the state's mechanism of economic control.

NATHANIEL WEYL

The Totalitarian Tide

DICTATORS AND DEMOCRACIES. By Calvin B. Hoover. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

IN THIS book the author seeks to show the kinship of the German, Italian, and Russian dictatorships and thereby to revise and amplify some of his earlier conclusions respecting National Socialism and Bolshevism. He says that when he wrote "Germany Enters the Third Reich" he was aware that his conclusions were far different from what they would have been had he not already written "The Economic Life of Soviet Russia." He had been "tremendously struck by certain psychological similarities between the National Socialist and Soviet regimes." And he concludes that "if I had written the two books in reverse, I might just as well have thought of the Soviet Communists as a kind of National Socialists."

The author considers the similarity between the three dictatorships from three standpoints: (1) their encroachments upon private property; (2) the conditions that gave rise to them; and (3) the use of terror.

The encroachments upon private property of the respective dictatorships are viewed by Mr. Hoover on the basis of a revised version of Marx's theory of surplus value. While believing that the logic of orthodox economics has destroyed the theory of surplus value as a part of a tenable explanation of market price, he thinks that "surplus value as an explanation of the structure of income distribution remains, for practical purposes, a robust and virile idea." According to this Hooverian approach to surplus value, "any income which is not founded upon the need of the recipient and which is greater than that required to bring forth socially necessary exertion" must be considered property income whether this income is derived from physical and mental efforts or from ownership of property. On the basis of this definition Mr. Hoover concludes that while private property is non-existent in Russia, the Soviet state has gradually permitted the return of the private receipt of surplus value. In Russia the differentials in income, both monetary and non-monetary, seem to be increasing and cannot be justified as income socially necessary for productive efficiency. Thus the Soviet state, without private property, is reviving the essential inequalities characteristic of capitalist economy. On the other hand, in fascist states the regimentation of business and industry has surpassed mere interventionism, although private property has not been actually abolished. Under National Socialism the power of the party apparatus and the government machinery over business and industry is steadily increasing. Furthermore, through government control of investments, price-fixing, compulsory contributions to the party, and the control over the uses for which income from property can be spent, the National Socialist regimes have diverted income from one industrial group to another. Thus it would appear that while the Soviet state is introducing some of the essential features of capitalist economy, the National Socialist states, by making heavy inroads upon these essential features, are changing the character of capitalism.

It is rather difficult to understand the logic which enables Mr. Hoover to reject Marx's theory of surplus value from the standpoint of the theory of prices but at the same time permits him to use it from the standpoint of the distribution of income. According to Marx, labor is the only "socially necessary" cost and therefore the only real cost of production. All above this he designates surplus value, which is appropriated by capitalists and landowners. This labor-value principle is one of the main philosophical pillars of Marx's system of economics. But when he looked at the problem of value from the standpoint of business accounting, he said that the only cost the capitalist recognized was the money cost of production, or the "expenditure of capital." Marx never contended that his labor-value theory explained the daily fluctuations of market price. He did contend that the empirical validity of the labor-value concept was established in the long run by the interaction of market forces. It is only by a spurious eclecticism that one can reject the empirical validity of the concept and still make empirical use of its counterpart, surplus value, in analyzing the distribution of income. It is this specious reasoning which prevents Mr. Hoover from penetrating surface similarities to see the fundamental difference between National Socialism and Bolshevism.

No Marxist can sanction the economic and social distinctions that the Stalinist bureaucracy has inaugurated. And no one reared in the tradition of democracy, be he Marxist or merely a liberal sympathizer with the objectives of the Russian Revolution, can with clear conscience condone or justify the mass murders, exiles, and persecutions of Stalin's regime. Nevertheless, the Russian Revolution, unlike the German and Italian, has destroyed private property in the means of life. And in its attempt to reorganize society on a new pattern of life it has erected new social ideals and values, the most dominant of which is the idea of proletarian equality. The very fact that there is underground muttering and stifled dissatisfaction because this ideal is being repudiated in practice and because democracy in the Communist Party itself has been supplanted by the authority of one infallible leader is the most hopeful sign of the transitory character of the present reaction. It is in terms of the new principles of social conduct created by the Russian Revolution that Marxists inside and outside Russia condemn the Stalinist bureaucracy and hope to produce change. But National Socialism has created no new values or ideals in terms of which the struggle for human progress can be carried on. It can therefore only be fought on the grounds of its brutality and feudal character.

Formerly Mr. Hoover looked upon the German and Italian dictatorships as the handiwork of reactionary capitalists faced with the collapse of their system. He now believes that while this is the way in which both capitalists and Marxists would like to see the situation—of course, for reasons that differ according to their respective class biases—the interpretation is belied by the facts. One of the common conditions, we are told, that made dictatorship possible in each country was the ruling class's loss of confidence in itself. The governments that fell lacked the necessary "dynamism" for survival. The other condition was Marxism. In Russia Marxism overthrew the ineffectual bourgeois democracy of Kerensky and established the dictatorship of the proletariat. But in Italy and Germany a relatively strong middle class, frightened by the prospect of a proletarian dictatorship and its own annihilation, which Marxism decrees, erected another kind of anticapitalist dictatorship under the aegis of Il Duce and Herr Hitler. The dictatorships thus established in the three countries are non-Caesarian in character. For they rest upon mass support rather than upon the personal prowess of the dictator. This mass support is in each case reinforced by terror.

The view that the present dictatorships are the products of reactionary capitalists, we agree, is all too simple an explanation. It is not, however, as Mr. Hoover seems to think, the explanation that Marxists have given of the situation. Having thrown overboard his former "naive conclusions," Mr. Hoover now submits an explanation of the collapse of parliamentary government in Germany and Italy which, indeed, is not an explanation but rather a superficial and partial statement of the facts of the case. He simply repeats what Eduard Meyer stated some years ago, "Die Kultur lebt sich selbst aus." The question to be answered, however, is, "Why does a culture live itself out?" Or why does a ruling class or government lose confidence in itself at one time and at other times resolutely crush the slightest threat to its rule?

The question, we think, is to be answered only on the basis of Marx's class theory of society. The validity of this theory has not been destroyed by the abdication of the capitalist class to Hitler and Mussolini any more than it was destroyed by a similar abdication of the capitalist class in France during Marx's lifetime. Frightened by the economic collapse and by the demands of a weak but irate proletariat, the French bourgeoisie in 1852 took refuge in a "strong central government." As Marx put it:

> The French bourgeoisie . . . recognized that all the weapons which it had forged against feudalism could have their points turned against itself; that all the means of education which it had created were rebels against its own civilization; . . . that all the so-called civil liberties and instruments of progress were menaces to its own class dominion, which was threatened alike at the social base and the political apex.

This mental attitude of the French bourgeoisie in 1852 was historically duplicated by the German and Italian bourgeoisie in 1930 and 1922. It is substantially the attitude only recently exhibited by our own Liberty Leaguers, who, to protect property, would destroy civil liberty and those democratic rights which have been the bulwark of private property.

Marx did not base the rise of the July monarchy merely upon the willingness of the French bourgeoisie to transfer its power to a dictator. There were other important factors in the equation of class forces. First, there was the urban proletariat, which by virtue of the immaturity of economic circumstances lacked the necessary revolutionary decisiveness and the resourcefulness to carry through a fundamental political and industrial reorganization of society. Secondly, there were the petty bourgeoisie and the slum proletariat, which furnished the dictator with mass support. Marx attributed the action of the petty bourgeoisie, our contemporary middle class, to the modality of its thinking determined by its intermediate position between the capitalist and proletarian classes.

> Eternally tossed about [wrote Marx] between the hope of entering the ranks of the wealthier class and the fear of being reduced to the state of proletarians or even paupers . . . this class is extremely vacillating in its views. Humble and crouchingly submissive under a powerful feudal or monarchial gov> ernment, it turns to the side of liberalism when the middle class [the capitalist class] is in the ascendancy; it becomes seized with violent democratic fits as soon as the middle class has secured its own supremacy, but falls back into the abject despondency of fear as soon as the class below itself, the proletarian, attempts an independent movement.

No one, not even the most fanatical of Marx's present-day disciples, would for a moment contend that he foresaw fascism. Marx was a revolutionary thinker in the social sciences, not a St. John of the Apocalypse. But it is only by following the general lines of his analysis of social change that fascism can be understood and fought. Of course, the mechanical interpretation of his ideas to which his critics and many of his followers are addicted can only reduce Marxism to a set of sterile formulas. ABRAM L. HARRIS

DRAMA

The Case of Erskine Caldwell

THE novels of Erskine Caldwell have received more than respectful attention in literary journals, but for some reason or other dramatizations of those same novels have been greeted with an uproar difficult to understand. So far as I can remember I was almost the only reviewer to praise "Tobacco Road" or even to remain articulate while discussing the subject; and the recent production of "Journeyman" (Hudson Theater) was the signal for an outburst in which certain of the critics of the daily press seemed determined to outdo one another in the effort to discover some sufficiently forceful way of saying that this was, without any exception, the worst play ever produced on Broadway.

That "Journeyman" should have created strong feeling is not in itself surprising. Even if it be judged by the broad standards of the present moment it is a violent and bawdy play which makes no apologies, either sentimental or otherwise, for its violence and bawdiness. Anyone who denounced it as lewd and perverted would be taking a position understandable enough if not necessarily justified. But to treat the play as it was treated, to speak as if it were the mere meanderings of an illiterate, is to exhibit a blindness difficult for me to comprehend. I should have said without hesitation that its imaginative force was the one thing no one could possibly miss—if critics with whom I commonly agree were not anxious to advertise that they do miss it completely.

Mr. Caldwell is said to think of himself as a realist with a sociological message to deliver. If that message exists I fail to find it very clearly expressed in the present play, and I am by no means sure that the characters in it are not monsters rather than men. But there is no use discussing what a work of art means or whether or not it is "true to life" unless one is convinced that the work "exists"—that it has the power to attract and hold attention, to create either that belief or that suspension of disbelief without which its "message" cannot be heard and without which the question of its factual truth is of no importance. And to me the one incontrovertible fact is that both Mr. Caldwell's novels and the plays made from them do in this sense "exist" with uncommon solidity, that his race of curiously depraved and yet curiously juicy human grotesques are alive in his plays whether or not they, or things like them, were ever alive anywhere else. And if they seem, when abstractly considered, highly improbable, that only strengthens the tribute one is, in simple fairness, bound to pay to the imagination of a man who can make them credible. Perhaps this imagination is corrupt and perverted. Perhaps—though I don't think this is true—the world would be better off without Mr. Caldwell's vision of its corruption. But that is not the point. The point is that his imagination is creative in the most direct sense of the term. His creatures live, and no attempts at analysis can deprive them of their life.

"Journeyman" is concerned with the adventures of a fabulous traveling preacher (brilliantly played by Will Geer) who descends upon a remote Georgia community to drink its whiskey, seduce its women, arouse it to orgy in a revival meeting, and then disappear one morning in an automobile acquired by the aid of a beneficent Providence working through the instrumentality of a crap game. I have already remarked that the bawdiness of the play is bare enough to shock even a Broadway audience. I might add that I am inclined to doubt the literal truth of the play as a picture of rural Georgia for the simple reason that I find it hard to believe a people physically so depressed could be endued with so much lusty life. But neither, for that matter, do I find it easy to believe in the existence of Falstaff outside Shakespeare's plays, and the important fact is that in Mr. Caldwell is some power of story-telling by virtue of which I at least cannot choose but hear. Nor do I see how any attack upon him, whether upon moral or any other grounds, can hope to be effective if it does not begin by recognizing the primary fact that he has, to an extraordinary degree, the power to imagine. It is said that John Ruskin once refused to write an article against the "poisonous honey" of the young Swinburne. I am, he said, righter than he, just as the lamb is righter than the tiger. But I am no match for him. That was sound sense. Moral fervor usually ends by looking rather silly when it refuses to recognize the power of anything which has been solidly imagined.

Probably Mr. Caldwell will not thank me for defending him in such terms as these. For all I know, creative imagination may be the last thing he wants to be praised for and "truth to life"—whatever that may be—the only virtue for which he has any respect. But creative imagination is one of the rarest things in the world and probably rather rarer now than it usually is. Accuracy, right-thinking, good-will, even, perhaps, virtue itself are commoner. And Mr. Caldwell has creative imagination. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

Georges Schreiber's Work

THE exhibition of pure water colors and of drawings current at the A. C. A. Gallery reveals two very successful transplantations: those of a young artist and an artistic movement. The successfully transplanted young artist is Georges Schreiber, the well-known contributor to The Nation, Fortune, and other New York periodicals and newspapers. The successfully transplanted artistic movement is the New Objectivism of such leading German moderns as Otto Dix and George Grosz. For it is pretty largely in evolving the forms of its strident, mordant, uncouth, and strongly caricatural realism that Schreiber, who was born in Brussels and educated in Germany, and came to the United States in 1928, has found his function, and achieved the expressions of his own personality and the life of his new country which compose this striking exhibition.

In the general spirit of the movement, Schreiber has taken as his subject life in the raw. He has found it on poverty-stricken farms, in Nevada gambling joints, in the galleries of Madison Square Garden and cheap movies. He has seen it in those moments of transport—in brawls, crowd frenzy, violent love-play—which bring the rawest impulses naked to the surface; and depicted it in a spirit that to say the least is uncaressive and in instances verges upon pitiless caricature. And precisely as his subject matter is his own, so too is the drama with which he presents it. Particularly in his figure-pieces one finds his form full of nervous animation. To an unusual degree Schreiber possesses the ability to give movement to his human shapes. In instances he injects great force into these movements. An almost elemental fury informs the grappling figures in the drawing entitled The Brawl—that welcome neo-objectivist successor to the many slack and fatuous "broils" of salon days. In other pictures the artist has opposed dynamically moving figures less violently but quite as strongly to each other: especially in the gambling scene entitled The Card Players and in the ironical Hauptmann Jury. With these movements he reveals motives.

What in a deal of his work he brings to expression is unshackled murderousness, but a murderousness which is referred to social conditions and causes. In certain cases the association is with the figures of starving farmers and poor work-people, and the references point to a desperation born of famine. In the case of the Hauptmann jury picture, the references seem to connect the deadliness of the expressions with mass-psychology, hundred percentism, and the suspiciousness, the prejudice, and the intolerance projected upon all that is alien to the norm and singular. Other of the water colors convey with considerable satire excruciating sensations of vulgarity: in particular, The Second Balcony, which now is in the collection of the Whitney Museum, and In Elko Nevada 5 a. m. and Madison Square Garden, which are in the present exhibition. Of the three the last piece is perhaps the most effective expression of this quality in present-day existence Schreiber has achieved. The entire circumstance here depicted has been caught in visual terms, so completely, indeed, that the gestures and the garish colors make one almost hear the whistles and yells of the hard crowd.

Yet it is noteworthy that even in Schreiber's sharpest irony there is no great amount of venom—certainly far less than in that of Grosz—but some humor, and unmistakable traces of human sympathy for certain of his subjects. For this reason one feels that he may readily develop into the sort of social satirist our little community greatly requires. This is the sort of satirist who renders hypocrisy, stupidity, vulgarity, and all the other anti-social forces less odious than ridiculous: and thus makes for sociality in a way that hatefulness is impotent to attain. In the meanwhile there is enormous encouragement in the show's testimony to this young artist's recent technical growth. The water colors in it exhibiting his greatest mastery of the means—for example, Italian Family and the little Jeu d'Amour—are among his very latest. Here form and content are thoroughly united; the medium contributes its power freely to the expression; the paintings approach the absoluteness of art. And in these pictures the smoky reds have singular depth.

PAUL ROSENFELD

A behind-the-scenes account of the international poker game developing from Italy's imperial ambitions

Italy Against The World

by George Martelli

At a time when European events are increasingly tense, this complete and impartial account of Mussolini's conquest of Abyssinia and the international situation developing from it holds special interest. Reading it, one has no doubt of the roles played by the great nations involved. Moreover, the principal actors are well described—the dethroned Emperor, Mussolini, M. Laval, Messrs. Baldwin and Eden, Sir Samuel Hoare, and the principal Italian soldiers. Amazing stuff is taken from the disclosures of Marshal de Bono, who must have written his records under the impression that Americans and Britishers never read Italian. Also, here is a revealing account of the manoeuvrings at Geneva. The author in his capacity of correspondent to the London Morning Post was a witness to many of the events he describes. His book compares in some respects to Harold Nicolson's studies of European diplomacy.

"It is the virtue of Mr. Martelli's study that it supplies a case-history of a complete international episode, thereby bringing out a living picture of that complex in action."—Walter Millis, N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"An impartial, eloquent, and thought-provoking account of how a war was promoted and accomplished and how games played in European chancelleries frustrated attempts to halt that war."—Mary Colum, Forum.

"With a discrimination rare in journalistic appraisals of international affairs, Mr. Martelli marshals the arguments presented by Italy, Ethiopia, and the League powers, always probing for facts and motives behind diplomatic verbiage."—Vera Micheles Dean, Saturday Review of Literature.

●

At your bookseller's, $3.75

●

Harcourt, Brace & Co., 383 Madison Ave., N. Y.

RECORDS

ANOTHER outstanding work on Victor's special list is Mozart's String Quartet K. 428 (three records, $6.50); unfortunately a great deal that should be fine comes out coarse and insensitive in the playing of the Pro Arte Quartet. What the Mozart string-quartet texture should sound like can be heard in the performance of the Quartet K. 465 recorded by the Budapest Quartet. And from all this you will understand what I mean when I speak of a poor performance: I judge a performance by what it does to the music; and it is judging this way that I find fault with Cortot's playing of Chopin's Ballades (four records, $8), Waltzes (six records, $12), and Etudes Opus 10 (three records, $6.50): I like Chopin's music, but I don't like it when the shape of every phrase is distorted. In the same way, I like Schumann's "Fantasiestücke," but not when they are blurred as they are in Harold Bauer's performances (four records, $8). And Schumann's "Dichterliebe" as sung by Lotte Lehmann was an unforgettable experience, but as sung by the baritone Panzera to the mannered accompaniment of Cortot (three records, $6.50) the work does not come to life for me. However, some readers would like Panzera's fine voice, and I am sure that some think Cortot is a fine pianist; and so I add that the Chopin and "Dichterliebe" are well recorded.

One album of the Victor special list assembles six ten-inch records ($9) made by Elisabeth Schumann. Three of these offer her art at its exquisite best in songs worthy of it: Hugo Wolf's "Nun wandre, Maria" and "Schlafendes Jesukind," Brahms's "Sandmännchen" and "Der Tod, das ist die kühle Nacht," and—all on one record—Schubert's "An die Nachtigall" and "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten" and Schumann's "Lorelei" and "Ständchen." Two others are devoted to less consequential songs by Beethoven, Grieg, and Smetana. And one offers a delivery of Brahms's "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" that is like caricature of Mme Schumann's art in the way it converts this art into exaggerated mannerism.

A song of Schubert or Wolf is a musical setting of a poem; and to appreciate the intimate relation of the substance and structure of the music to the lines and sometimes the individual words of the text one must know the poem—not just a summary but every word of the original German. The booklet accompanying an album of song-recordings should therefore give the texts of the poems even if it gives nothing else; actually the leaflets which accompany the "Dichterliebe" and Elisabeth Schumann albums give much else that one does best to ignore but not the texts of the poems.

So with the leaflets for other works. There are many persons who will approach the first movement of the Mozart Piano Concerto K. 459 with no idea of how its material is organized; and they would get more out of the movement if —not by word alone but by correlation of word with sound on record—they were enabled to perceive Mozart's use of what Tovey calls the concerto principle—the principle of opposition of unequal instrumental forces that is basic in the earlier concertos of Vivaldi, Händel, and Bach; to perceive further the use of this principle in the so-called sonata form of the first movement that achieved definition and perfection in the instrumental works of Haydn and Mozart; and to perceive finally an integration of all the detail of the movement that is as subtle and complete and tight as the integration of the thousands of brush strokes in a Cézanne canvas. But these persons will do better to take what their own ears get out of the movement unaided than to listen with this guidance of the Victor leaflet:

> The first movement is not, and hardly could be expected to be, in the conventional sonata form. This demanding structure was, at Mozart's time, scarcely solidified into a definite form. It was still highly plastic, almost liquid—which perhaps causes it to lend itself more aptly to the pliant nature of Mozart's music. But we must not expect to find here the substantial formal and tonal masses which the later Beethoven introduced into his heroic musical structures. The first movement, while it certainly contains all the material for a sonata, is by no means organized as such. Themes there are, and worthy of much exploitation; fragmentary incidents which could have been welded into a closely integrated whole, and brief, tentative developments which, exploited, might have achieved greatness and profundity. None of these things happen. The material is introduced, set forth in its most attractive tonal garb, and then, in many instances, discarded and forgotten.

This is to consider only one instance of the ignorance that clothes itself in the terms of erudition; it is not to consider at all the other qualities that make the leaflets good to start a fire with but not to read. Exceptions are some of the booklets written by men like Ernest Newman and Harvey Grace for English subscription sets—exceptions, that is, when they are issued with the American repressings, as they are by Columbia more often than by Victor.

B. H. HAGGIN

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY PARTY

LILLIAN HELLMAN
Author of "The Children's Hour," Screen Adaptation "Dead End." Recently returned from Spain.

CAPT. HANS AMLIE
Former Commanding Officer, "Lincoln-Washington Battalion."

MILLY BENNETT
Former Chief of Press Bureau, Loyalist Ministry of State.

SUNDAY
Feb. 13
at 8:30
•
BELASCO THEATRE
44 St. E. of B'way

also

ROMAN BOHNEN
STELLA ADLER
Heading a Committee of Entertainment including Leading Actors from the Cast of the Broadway Success
"GOLDEN BOY"
and Movie Star Fred Keating

DAVID McKELVY WHITE,
Chairman

Tickets: 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50
at all Workers' Bookshops and all Agencies
Ausp.: FRIENDS OF LINCOLN BRIGADE
125 W. 45th St., N. Y. C. LO 3-6215

FILMS

Artist of Anxiety

A COMMONPLACE about Alfred Hitchcock is that he has no peer among directors in the fine art of suspense. For most of his competitors, as for most story-tellers, it is in fact a gross art: we are kept waiting for the end and that is all. For Mr. Hitchcock there are as many ends as there are moments in the tale; even his means are ends; he polishes as he goes, lavishing as much skill upon details, and upon transitions between details, as upon the swift disastrous curve described by the whole. His material is melodrama, and he does not mind if the examples of it which come to his hand are relatively empty; he even prefers them thus, since then he is freer to be the virtuoso he naturally and by discipline is. The virtuoso of suspense; or, by a further refinement, of anxiety. For his special distinction is that he knows perfectly how to worry us and keep us worried. If there were time to do so we might reflect that it did not matter whether the young man ever reached Mr. Memory ("The Thirty-Nine Steps"), or whether the bomb ever got to the point where it would do the most public mischief ("The Woman Alone"). But Mr. Hitchcock sees to it that we do not reflect; he makes us as restless as the hero is, and keeps our anxiety identical with his until the sudden moment when the mystery dissipates.

The new Hitchcock film now about to be released in America, "The Girl Was Young" (Gaumont British), is perhaps not as good as the best of its predecessors, but it is better than any current melodrama and it is typical of Mr. Hitchcock. The situation here is that the hero (Derrick de Marney) must find his stolen raincoat before he can prove to the English police that it could not have been his raincoat belt which strangled Christine Day. The fact that when he finds the coat its belt is missing does not for the moment matter; another pursuit begins then, and that is not the good one, Mr. Hitchcock's conclusion for once failing in a measure to come off. The pursuit of the coat is also a flight from the police, undertaken with the hazardous help of none other than the chief constable's daughter (Nova Pilbeam), a marked girl. If the two of them can keep far enough ahead of the law they may come into the only evidence which would stop it in its tracks. Were there time to think—but again there is no time to do anything except urge on the boy and girl with our enlisted nerves and groan at each unexpected delay. For of course there are devilish delays. At Tom's Hat, where the raincoat was stolen, a free-for-all fight threatens to hold up everything; at the house of Erica's aunt, where the couple think to invest a precious three minutes establishing an alibi, children playing blind man's bluff draw the newcomers into their game and will not let them go; at the lodging house where Old Will, the fellow last seen with the raincoat, is scheduled to spend the night the boy himself falls asleep from exhaustion and wakes up the next morning almost too late for his purpose; and so on. I speak of the children's game although I have not seen it; it has been cut out of the present version. Yet plenty of what remains is good, and the whole can be recommended to those who can take their excitement straight.

"The River" is in New York at last, at the Criterion, and should be seen by literally everybody.

MARK VAN DOREN

THE THEATRE GUILD presents the
ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE production of JEAN [illegible] comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:40
Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:40. 300 Seats at $1.10

THE CRADLE WILL ROCK
Sam [illegible] Grisman
presents
A MERCURY THEATRE PRODUCTION
by MARC BLITZSTEIN
WINDSOR THEATRE [illegible] St. East of Broadway. BRy 9-0178
Evenings, 8:40. Matinee Wednesday [illegible] Saturday 2:45
SEATS, 50c to [illegible] (plus tax) All Performances

"One of the best musical shows of the year . . . Witty, Fresh."—Atkinson, Times
PINS AND NEEDLES
NEW YORK'S HIT MUSICAL REVUE
LABOR STAGE 39th St. & 6th Ave. BR 9-1163
Evenings 8:40
Matinees Wed.
& Saturday 2:40
Prices:
Matinee
55c to $2.20
Evenings
55c to $2.75

The Group Theatre presents a preview of "CASEY JONES"
by ROBERT ARDREY
for the benefit of
CONSUMERS UNION'S LABORATORY FUND
TUES. EVE., FEB. 15
Enjoy an important new play by a promising young playwright—help build a great testing organization of and for American consumers! Tickets from 85c to $4.40 may be had by calling or writing Consumers Union of United States, 55 Vandam St., N. Y. C., WAlker 5-6616.

The "Your Winter Home" Vendome
MADISON AVE. AT THIRD ST. LAKEWOOD, N. J.
Private Baths — Private Sun Porches — Southern Exposure. All sport facilities. Intelligent supervision of diets. Moderate rates.
M. SCHWARTZ, [illegible] Phone Lakewood 555

if you're going to write a letter · · submit a report
· · make a speech
WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY
check your English and your facts with the Best Handy-Sized Dictionary
WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE
FIFTH EDITION—This handy, desk-size dictionary, containing ALL the most commonly used words, is not only a quick-reference authority on the spelling, pronunciation, meaning and use of words, but also an invaluable checking source for facts. 110,000 entries; 1,800 illustrations; 1,300 pages; $3.50 to $8.50, depending on bindings. Purchase of your bookdealer, or from the publishers.
Write for New Quiz and Picture Game—Free.
G. & C. MERRIAM CO., 921 B'way, Springfield, Mass.

The Columnists Are Coming to The Nation in a series of columns

by MARGARET MARSHALL

The leading newspaper commentators and their role in today's journalism—their techniques, their individual appeal, and their effectiveness as "molders of public opinion"—will be discussed by Miss Marshall in a readable and illuminating series beginning in one of the forthcoming February issues of The Nation. From among the most widely read of the current columnists Miss Marshall will present:

Eleanor Roosevelt
Westbrook Pegler
Dorothy Thompson
Dale Carnegie
General Hugh S. Johnson
Walter Lippmann
Heywood Broun
Mark Sullivan

NEXT WEEK: The Nation's

MIDWINTER BOOK NUMBER

featuring

John Dos Passos and the " U. S. A."

by T. K. WHIPPLE, author of "Spokesmen"

A Review of William Faulkner's "The Unvanquished" by Louis Kronenberger
Other reviews by Eliseo Vivas, Franz Höllering, Harry Levin

Mail the coupon immediately to be sure of getting Miss Marshall's complete series on the columnists.

Subscription Order Form

THE NATION 20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK

Please enter my one-year subscription, for which ☐ I inclose check for $5. Or ☐ I will remit upon receipt of bill.

Name . . . . Street . . . .

City . . . . State . . . .

Extra Postage: Foreign $1; Canadian 50¢ 2-12-38

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame Cal.

Letters to the Editors

Boycott Heat and War Fever

Dear Sirs: Opinions differ as to whether a boycott will really do enough financial hurt to send the Japanese back home. What this old subscriber particularly regrets is to see his favorite weekly ignore the fact that the boycott movement is playing the game of the war-makers by encouraging national and racial hates. With apparent approval you tell how children in a settlement house returned Japanese-made Christmas gifts, thus testifying to "the children's hatred of war." Are you not idealizing? Perhaps the children hate not war but Japanese war-making, or even the Japanese. Is it the injustice to China which is actually moving our millions, or is it injury to America?

Somehow I cannot help recalling how President Wilson said in all sincerity in 1917, "We have no quarrel with the German people." Did this keep us from shooting Germans and from trying to starve noncombatants by a blockade? To wage that war, moods had to be unleashed which prevented the making of a sane peace. Will a widespread anti-Japanese movement help America to consider soberly now the President's request for increased armament?

You regret that the Panay incident was made to serve an inflammatory purpose and that the running comment on the newsreels in the theaters "was assuredly not intended to cool fevered brows." Do you think that millions of consumers can be kept at boycott heat for at least a year without creating moods which The Nation has usually been eager to prevent?

HENRY NEUMANN

Brooklyn, N. Y., February 3

Visas for Liberals

Dear Sirs: In the January 22 issue of The Nation appears a protest signed by forty-five "liberals" against your editorial policy on collective security. The list of signers reads like a veritable who's who of liberal impersonators. Among the distinguished mummers I note Mr. Bertram D. Wolfe, who in real life is educational director of the Lovestonite Party, otherwise known as the Communist League. Also Mr. Charles S. Zimmerman, whose Lovestonite affiliations are surely no secret. Also Mr. Norman Thomas and Mr. Harry W. Laidler, who according to unconfirmed rumors are said to be members of the Socialist Party. Also the Misses Mary Fox and Molly Yard, who offstage are Socialist Carrie Nations guarding the proletarian habits of their party. Also James Rorty and Edmund Wilson and Philip Rahv and James T. Farrell and Lewis Corey—would anyone guess from their smooth-shaven liberal chins that they were really bewhiskered "Old Bolsheviks" who left the Stalinist camp in disgust when it began to flirt with liberalism and reformism? Also the Misses Suzanne La Follette and Anita Brenner, who have raged in the columns of The Nation against the bourgeois Loyalist government for shadowboxing with Franco instead of immediately establishing communism in Spain. Also the learned Drs. Sidney Hook and Louis M. Hacker, who freely admit that they are the only accredited American interpreters of that famous liberal economist, the late Karl Marx. All in all it is the most complete collection of "liberals" ever corraled in a petition. There was only one distinguished liberal whose name I looked for in vain. It was Mr. Leon Trotsky.

Now it would be pleasant to continue in this jocose vein and assume that no one will be taken in by this ideological masquerade. Boys will be boys and "Marxists" will have their fling. But the matter cannot be dismissed facetiously. Apparently The Nation was taken in or it would have not featured the protest on its cover as "A Letter from Forty-five Liberals."

Sooner or later the contending factions of the left will be forced to unite into a people's front against fascism. Liberalism can play an important part in bringing this about by acting as a trusted umpire of factional friction. But if it permits any left faction to fly its flag as a decoy, it throws the whole movement into ideological confusion and delays the process of clarification which must precede unity.

I want to close with a practical proposal—for another Nyon conference to deal with piracy on the political high seas by Jolly Rogers flying liberal flags. Let the liberal publications get together and draft a system of ideological passports for all those who wish to register as liberals. The qualifications shall be as liberal as possible. Anyone shall be considered a liberal unless there is evidence to the contrary, and be furnished with a passport which will entitle him to sign petitions and protests as a liberal. But as soon as the holder of such a passport aligns himself with any Socialist or Communist faction, he shall be enjoined from signing protests or posing as a liberal in any other way.

ALTER BRODY

New York, January 28

Honor Enough for All

Dear Sirs: In a recent issue of The Nation I was named as one of those on the 1937 Honor Roll for work done by the Federal Writers' in connection with the American Guide Series. I understand, of course, that I was selected merely as representing the more than three thousand workers on the project, and that this honor was really intended for all of us. I am sure the editors of The Nation fully realize that the Guide Series is the product of a great cooperative undertaking and that no one person can take exclusive credit for its success.

Since it is impossible to list by name all the workers, I take the liberty of singling out here a few of those who have done especially distinguished work on the project.

From the Washington staff: Reed Harris, assistant director, whose organizing ability has insured the smooth functioning of the project in spite of serious administrative difficulties; George Cronyn, who for a long time has had large editorial responsibilities for copy coming in from all parts of the country; Katharine Kellock, in charge of all tour copy; Joseph Gaer, who pushed a number of our most important books through publication; Edward Barrows, now carrying the chief editorial responsibility; Roderick Seidenberg, for his intelligent handling of the architectural material; Waldo Browne, for his keen and sensitive editorial supervision; Sterling Brown, for his able handling of material concerning the American Negro and Negro folklore.

In the states: John T. Frederick (Ill.), Jeannette Eckman (Del.), Charles Finger (Ark.), James Hopper (Cal.), Ray Billington (Mass.), Dana Doten (Vt.), Charles Ernest White (N. H.), Jarvis Morse (R. I.), Edwin Bjorkman (N. C.), William T. Couch (N. C.), Bertrand M. Wainger (N. Y.), John Derby (Conn.), Lisle Reese (S. D.), Ethel Schlasinger (N. D.), Irene Fuhlbruegge (N. J.), Dr. Mabel Ulrich (Minn.), J. Harris Gable (Neb.), Eri Douglass (Miss.), Dr. U. R. Bell (Ky.), Eudora Ramsey Richardson (Va.), Alexander Crosby (N. J.), Merle Colby (Mass.), Vincent McHugh (N. Y. C.), Robert Muir (Cal.), Leon Dorais (Cal.), Grant M. Sassaman (Pa.), Edward Radenzel (Cal.), Lyle Saxon (La.), Ross Santee (Ariz.), J. Frank Davis (Texas), and Vardis Fisher (Idaho).

HENRY G. ALSBERG,
Director, Federal Writers' Project
Washington, February 2

No Excuse for France

Dear Sirs: I agree with Professor Albert Guérard (see his letter in The Nation of December 25) that England has the greatest responsibility for the present state of Europe. I cannot, however, agree with him that successive French governments are not to be blamed for policies disastrous alike to France and to Europe, because they adopted those policies to please the British government. Would Professor Guérard consider that an individual was right to commit suicide at the request of his next-door neighbor?

I deny the assumption that French governments have had to choose between breaking with England and submitting to the dictation of the British Foreign Office. They could perfectly well have had a policy of their own and yet have remained on good terms with England. Speaking of the capitulation of the Sarraut Cabinet when Hitler violated the Treaty of Locarno in March, 1936, an official of the British Foreign Office said about a year ago: "What fools the French were to consult us! If they had acted, we should have been obliged to follow."

I have criticized the foreign policy of both right and left governments in France, when I believed it to be mistaken. Louis Barthou was Foreign Minister in a government whose policy in home affairs I detested, but I supported his foreign policy because it seemed to me to be a wise one. When the Popular Front government came into power in June, 1936, I was one of those who hoped that Léon Blum would retrieve the blunders of previous governments, notably those of Laval, and restore the situation in Europe. His failure has been a profound sorrow to me, but I cannot allow my friendship for him to blind me to the fact that he has failed.

Professor Guérard is mistaken in thinking that the blunders of Daladier and Chautemps in 1933 "were committed with open eyes and a heavy heart." On the contrary, Daladier believed that he was going to reconcile France and Germany and secure perpetual peace. The Four-Power Pact became inoperative, not because of French reservations, but because France never ratified it.

ROBERT DELL
Geneva, Switzerland, January 20

O. K. but —

Dear Sirs: As a member of the Department of Labor Employees' Conciliation Committee from the A. F. G. E. (A. F. of L.) lodge, I want to comment on the article by Spero and Puner entitled Uncle Sam, Privileged Boss, in your issue of January 8. Their description of the set-up and functioning of the committee is O. K., but—

First, there is nothing compulsory about referring cases to the committee. Second, the secretary might reject a nominee from one of our three unions, but never has. Third, it is equally possible that the committee might decide a case against an employee, but even that hasn't happened yet.

Obviously if the U. F. W. A. (C. I. O.) dislikes for sentimental reasons to have grievances of its members considered by a committee of eleven containing four members from other unions, it has so many other avenues of negotiation open to it that its attempts to sabotage the entire Conciliation Committee were unreasonable.

T. J. MEAD
Washington, January 24

Cooperative Book Club

Dear Sirs: Christopher Lazare, in his discussion of "two events of major interest in the publishing world" in your January 22 issue, overlooked one recent occurrence of great significance—the formation of a national cooperative of book buyers. This organization, the Cooperative Book Club, Inc., recently opened offices at 118 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City.

Organized on true Rochdale principles, the C. B. C. is supplying members with current books of all publishers at list price, postpaid. Savings-returns will be paid to each member in proportion to his purchases. By this device members will be freed to a considerable extent from the increasing "stabilization" of book prices at budget-draining levels. Reviews and lists of recommended books appear monthly in C. B. C.'s Reader's Observer, which members receive free of charge. When the membership enrolment warrants it, the club's program will be greatly widened. A committee will select one book each month to be made available to members at a special price, and the club will sponsor discussion groups, forums, and lectures.

ALBERT HORLINGS
New York, February 2

CONTRIBUTORS

E. S. McLEOD is the pseudonym of a Canadian journalist.

ERNEST DAVIES is a British Labor economist. He has just published a booklet entitled "How Much Compensation?" which studies in detail the problem of the transfer of industry from private to public ownership.

MINNA LEDERMAN is the editor of Modern Music, published by the League of Composers.

MARTHA EMERY is a daughter of the Mormon church.

HARRY LEVIN is a member of the Society of Fellows at Harvard University.

LOUISE BOGAN, the poetry critic of the New Yorker, is the author of "The Sleeping Fury."

NATHANIEL WEYL is a member of the staff of the New York Post. He is working on a book which will deal in part with fascism in South America.

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, is the author of "The Negro as Capitalist."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ FEBRUARY 19, 1938 NUMBER 8

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 197
EDITORIALS:
- EUROPEAN JIG-SAW 199
- BIG-NAVY STUFF 200
- PLOWING A NEW FIELD 201

WAR IS IN THE AIR by Paul Y. Anderson 202
NEW FERMENT IN INDIA by John Gunther 203
THOSE "REGULATED" BRITISH UNIONS By Leo Huberman 206
GOD GETS AN IDEA by George S. Kaufman 208
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 209
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
- DOS PASSOS AND THE U. S. A. by T. K. Whipple 210
- POEM by H. B. Mallalieu 212
- CHARWOMAN: 20 VESEY STREET by Ben Belitt 212
- FAULKNER'S DISMAL SWAMP by Louis Kronenberger 212
- THE FAÇADE THAT HITLER BUILT By Franz Höllering 214
- "DUTY'S FAITHFUL CHILD" by Maxwell Geismar 216
- SNAKES IN ICELAND by Harry Levin 216
- THE ERROR OF PHILOSOPHY by Eliseo Vivas 219
- ART FOR CULTURE'S SAKE by Paul Rosenfeld 220
- PAMPHLETEERING FICTION by Margaret Marshall 222
- THE WHITMANS OF OREGON by W. J. Ghent 223
- DRAMA: "OUR TOWN" by Joseph Wood Krutch 224
- RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 225

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor
MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
*
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

SOMETHING CALLED THE "THIRD BASKET" has found its way into the vocabularies if not the hearts of business men and tax lawyers. It is a new tax device, intended for snaring some of the bigger fry in the tax-avoidance game. For the last month or so it has been the object of a strenuous tug of war between the liberal and conservative groups on the Ways and Means Committee of the House, which has been preparing a revised tax measure. The "third basket" is a contrivance of Chairman Fred Vinson, who has been doing yeoman's work in defending the Administration's tax structure against one of the most high-powered drives in our legislative annals. Aimed at closely held, or "family," corporations—what the Treasury officials are in the habit of calling "rich men's pocket-books"—the "third basket" would levy a penalty tax up to 4 per cent on corporations which fail to distribute as much as 60 per cent of their profits in dividends. It would prevent some of our more substantial citizens from escaping a heavy surtax in their personal income returns by allowing their income to accumulate as reserves in these corporations. The irony of the whole business is that Mr. Vinson, who will probably succeed in salvaging the essential idea of the "third basket," was spurred to this ingenuity by the attack on the undistributed-profits tax. It will be remembered that this attack had behind it the battalions of big business, but was all carried on in the name of the small corporations. Well, the new tax bill provides for exemptions to ease the burden on the small fellows; and to make up the revenue the emphasis is shifted to the big fellows. Which proves what dire consequences may follow when rhetoric is taken seriously.

*

THE OUTLINES OF THE GERMAN PICTURE ARE still blurred, but they are gradually coming into focus. There can be no doubt that the Nazi regime as a whole has been considerably weakened by the army purge, or that Hitler's own power has survived the immediate crisis and has even been increased by it. Between these two observations, however, there is a middle ground that shades off from analysis to mere conjecture. It is fairly clear that the crisis was by no means restricted to the army but was a national crisis, extending into the foreign office and embassies, the Cabinet, and the structure of economic control. But the center of this radiating unrest was the army, and one may hazard a conjecture that the margin that separated a potentially successful army coup from an army purge was a slender one, and that on it hung the fate of the Nazi regime. Whether the removal of the generals at the top has really been sufficient to stabilize the army for the future, moreover, may be doubted. The replacing of conservative junkers by other junkers more sympathetic to the regime but by no means thoroughgoing Nazis looks like a palliative or a compromise rather than a clear victory for the party. Crucial in the situation is the question of the continued loyalty of the Reichswehr rank and file, and that cannot yet be answered. One thing can be said with definiteness. A totalitarian regime is not healthy, even in its own terms, if it continues to seek solutions for unrest by piling up more and more responsibility in the hands of a single man. The very fact that the regime is totalitarian imposes strains upon it that can only be met by the broadening of the bureaucratic base and by a growing process of converting the power of a man into the power of an institution. Hitler's regime seems to be moving in the opposite direction. And the fact that the Führer is preparing for new and dramatic decisions, or at least pronouncements, concerning foreign powers is an indication of his unstable hold on his followers and of the price he may have had to offer for his continuance in power.

✶

AFTER FIGHTING JAPAN TO A STANDSTILL for more than a month in the Lunghai railway zone, the main Chinese armies have been placed in a precarious position by the collapse of Wan Fu-lin's former Manchurian troops in northern Honan. Japanese soldiers advancing south along the Peiping-Hankow railway are reported to be within forty miles of Chengchow, the junction point of the two railways. Capture of this city would be a disaster of the first magnitude for China, since it would completely cut off the 400,000 crack troops which have been defending Hsuchow a hundred miles or so to the East. While China will probably have to surrender the Lunghai zone ultimately, it is highly important that it exact the maximum price for every square li evacuated. For time is working on the side of China. Both in the north and in the Yangtze valley guerrilla bands and small mobile armies are operating effectively against the invader. China is steadily receiving new supplies of munitions through Hongkong, while Japan is encountering increasing difficulties in obtaining raw materials. Much may depend, therefore, on Chiang's ability to hold Chengchow for a few more weeks, and upon his good judgment in ultimately withdrawing before it is too late.

✶

THE NEW FARM ACT PASSED BY CONGRESS contains 62,000 words; almost the size of a popular novel, it is a good deal less readable and more contradictory. Like its predecessors, this act satisfied no one, yet it stirred little effective revolt. It may be said to have made its way through Congress largely by default. What it amounts to, in effect, is an omnibus measure containing crop insurance, soil conservation, benefit payments, price-fixing loans. The crux of the bill lies in the crop-reduction provisions, which are linked with the ever-normal granary device: when the supply of cotton, corn, wheat, tobacco, or rice outstrips a "normal" amount, severe marketing quotas are allotted—unless one-third of the farmers object—and penalties are applied to their enforcement. The act has raised cries of regimentation, and there can be no doubt that it carries the principle of government control over production farther than it has ever been carried in America, and through a set of intricate and perplexing devices. The old Supreme Court would surely have held it unconstitutional; the new Supreme Court, if it validates it, will thereby show that it is really new. Yet those who raise the cry of regimentation and unconstitutionality are in a weak position, for the only alternative they offer is the Hoover anarchy, which can mean only the collapse of farm incomes. Admittedly the total effect of the present act is that the farmers, in return for some sort of income, paltry enough for most, subject themselves to a complicated network of regulation, the consumers pay higher prices, and the nation gets a decreased food supply. As economics this is childish; as politics it is transparent; yet given our present economy, little more could have been expected. We should love to know what Americans, looking back at this crazy-quilt a quarter of a century from now, will think of it.

✶

THE NATION HAS AT TIMES IN THE PAST leaned favorably toward the spirit of an equal-rights-for-women amendment. But the character and timing of the present agitation for the amendment puts it in a dubious light. The tendency of exploiting groups to dignify their acts with the language of "human rights" is a familiar one, and it is becoming ominously plain that the projected amendment fits into this pattern. Years of effort have finally established important legal safeguards for women workers in many states. Growing out of biological differences which are palpable enough for the Supreme Court to discern, this protection should not be readily relinquished. As progressive women leaders have emphasized, the amendment will jeopardize existing laws and confuse attempts for further legislation. It is worth recalling that the National Woman's Party, one of the most ardent supporters of the amendment, was quick to urge the Supreme Court to declare New York's minimum-wage law for women unconstitutional—presumably because it interfered with women's "right" to equal exploitation. There is little doubt that industry will gallantly seize the opportunity offered by this amendment. In the setting of the present drive against improved working conditions, nostalgia for sweatshop oppression will be heightened. Women long ago learned to beware of gifts from benign employers, even when the package was labeled "equal rights." They should apply the same caution to gifts from legislatures.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

A DEEP WRONG CAN NEVER BE RIGHTED when it has first been allowed to destroy a man's craft and blast his life. That is what happened to Professor William A. Schaper of Wisconsin, who on America's entrance into war in 1917 was summarily dismissed as "pro-German" by the regents of the University of Minnesota. He was denied all but the barest mockery of a hearing—a fact all the more startling when it is recalled that the dominant figure among the regents and the prime mover against Schaper was Pierce Butler, now Justice Butler of the United States Supreme Court. The regents voted several weeks ago to rescind the dismissal as unwarranted, to pay Dr. Schaper $5,000, and to make him professor emeritus. For him it can be only a welcome gesture; for them it is an act of conscience. But it is also more than that. The comments that we have read on the regents' action have missed an element that bulks large in its meaning. For the regents went beyond Schaper's case to place on record an admirable statement in the form of a six-point credo of academic freedom. This recognizes that the former members of the board acted in a time of great strain and hysteria, but it goes on to affirm, "in these calmer days and against another day of storm and stress," that it is in times of crisis that a strict adherence to academic freedom is most necessary. The guaranties contained in the credo might well form the basis of an academic Bill of Rights. Other college boards of trustees should not have to wait for a Schaper case of their own before following the example of Minnesota.

* * *

HAVE YOU A FIRST-RATE PICCOLO PLAYER in your university? According to the thirty-second annual report of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, the familiar technique of bringing glory to the campus by persuading brawny athletes of very little brain to submit to a college education, with guaranties of a living wage and protection from the ancient grammars in the Latin Department, has been extended to tuba players, drum majors, and pretty girls. "Fraternities and sororities vie in recruiting students who can pay their bills [and the college bills?] and bring glory (in press notices) to a chapter." Joel Sayre celebrated in "Rackety-Rax" the practice of buying football teams for the greater glory of Alma Mater and the gate receipts. Now he can write a sequel about swing orchestras and pretty girls who know their Greek-letter fraternities. We have already composed the scene in which the college scout goes recruiting in Hollywood, with blue sound effects and an all—well, perhaps not all—star cast. The Carnegie Foundation is shocked and says such recruiting of the fair is unfair. But the foundation is behind the times. It thinks the function of a college is education, when everybody old enough to lift a saxophone or learn the words of a popular song knows it's a place where you dance the big apple and fool your profs by not learning anything. The foundation needs to get in step. A trombone test would do wonders in popularizing the college-board examinations. And may the best band win!

European Jig-Saw

KING CAROL'S revamped dictatorship in Rumania and the reported Austro-German pact have tipped the delicate balance of power in Europe to such an extent that only time can reveal how it will right itself. Although the new Rumanian government is likely to be as reactionary as that of Goga's in its domestic policies, it is expected to be somewhat more hesitant in tying Rumania irrevocably to the Rome-Berlin axis. This will be small comfort to the hundreds of thousands of terrorized Jews who still face the prospect of being driven from the country, but it may mean the difference between war and peace within the next twelve months. Rumania, though far from a great power, occupies a peculiarly strategic position. It furnishes a natural corridor between the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia. Its oil and wheat would be indispensable to Germany and Italy in a war against the democracies. Moreover, the disruption of the Little Entente would greatly add to the prestige of the fascist powers.

It is difficult to believe that the accession of Patriarch Miron Cristea will long check Rumania's drift away from the Little Entente toward the Rome-Berlin axis. As Premier, Tatarescu was clearly moving in that direction. The Hohenzollern Carol is notoriously pro-German, and is likely now to have far more influence on foreign policy than in the past. Nevertheless, it is evident that there will be no sharp break with France or the Little Entente such as Goga contemplated. And the failure of the Goga brand of fascism is bound to be felt wherever would-be Führers are making a bid for power. The atmosphere of pessimism reflected in German press comments on the Rumanian developments would indicate that the effects of the change may be far more important abroad than within Carol's kingdom.

Had it not been for Rumania the reported agreement between Hitler and Schuschnigg might have been a major coup for the Führer. But coming several days after the setback in Bucharest, it has undoubtedly lost part of its significance. If a permanent settlement of outstanding differences between the two countries has been reached—which is by no means certain—it should definitely strengthen Hitler's ties with Mussolini. It may also bring nearer the realization of Hitler's dream of a four-power European agreement directed against the Soviet Union. But this depends chiefly on the outcome of the struggle now going on within the British Cabinet. While it is reported that the Chamberlain-led Tories, who desire a settlement with Germany, have the upper hand over the Eden faction, it is not at all clear that Britain is prepared to reenact the Halifax fiasco. On the contrary, there is a possibility that the Nazi purge and the pact with Austria may so strengthen the bonds between Hitler and Mussolini that any general European settlement will be out of the question.

Somewhere in this European puzzle must be fitted Josef Stalin's letter to Pravda calling for the cooperation of the working classes of the world in the inevitable war that is to come. If the four-power pact were already in existence, such a statement might be interpreted as marking a fundamental shift in Soviet foreign policy. But dark as the situation is for all anti-fascists, there is little in the events of the last few days to justify such an interpretation. Collective action against fascist aggression is still within the realm of practical politics, and the Soviets are unlikely to abandon efforts to obtain cooperation until hope for such action is definitely lost. As it is, there is nothing in Stalin's statement which is likely to embarrass Litvinov in Geneva or to strengthen the hands of the Soviets' enemies abroad. It may, however, be interpreted as a warning that the U. S. S. R. will not be content to work with the democracies indefinitely unless they show some disposition to take a stand against the growing menace of fascism. Russia may ultimately find in the world situation, as the progressive forces have found in Spain, that when it comes to a crisis reliance can be placed solely on the working classes. But only a gross oversimplification of the present complex situation would suggest that another July 19 is already at hand.

Big-Navy Stuff

THE big-navy issue is leaving frayed and jittery nerves in its wake as it plows through Congress, the press, and the country. And the tragic thing about it all is that whichever way it is settled, it will have settled nothing. If the big-navy boys triumph, our course in foreign affairs will be more dangerous than ever; if they are beaten, we shall still have the problem of a positive program for peace, to the solution of which the big-navy discussion is contributing next to nothing.

Mr. Roosevelt is asking for an $800,000,000 naval construction program to supplement the regular appropriation of some half-billion. By realistic calculation, that means an increase in our effective naval strength of virtually 40 per cent. Anyone who has watched Mr. Roosevelt's thinking knows that this proposal flows organically from his bent toward sea power, and that he has not been averse to timing it to the growing anti-Japanese feeling here, to the slaps administered to our embassy officials and our national pride, to the Japanese refusal to stay within the treaty limits of naval building. This does not mean, however, that we question Mr. Roosevelt's sincerity, nor Senator Pittman's, nor Admiral Leahy's. There has been too much piffle written and spoken about sincerity in this case. There have been too many whisperings about a Jekyll-Hyde game that the President is supposed to be playing, and too much melodrama about the sinister commitments we are presumed to have made to Great Britain. All that is slightly hysterical devil-chasing. In politics what we know about the consequences of action counts for more than what we can guess about motive. And we know that a big-navy program cannot be peaceful in its consequences. We stand to lose everything by it and to gain nothing.

The Nation is flatly and unequivocally opposed to the Administration's big-navy plan because it smacks of militarism, because it increases the arms-race tension, because it invites war, because it is an economic waste, and because—if it is aimed at stopping fascist aggressions and building a structure of peace—it is exactly the wrong way to go about it. Whatever Admiral Leahy may say and believe about needing a navy to defend the Atlantic and Pacific coasts simultaneously, the shrewd sense of Americans tells them that the point is strained. A navy beyond the strength of our present one is not necessary for defense, and we do not want one big enough for aggression.

Where we differ from most of the people who have been appearing against the navy program before the Senate committee is that they oppose it as isolationists and we oppose it because we believe in collective security. The bulk of the opposition has come from the isolationists of both schools—the old, imperialist isolationists of the Hiram Johnson kind, and the new pacifist isolationists represented by the peace societies. The trouble with the collective-security supporters has been partly that they are not so well organized and partly that the big-navy proposal seems to hold out possibilities for fortifying the position of the democracies as against the fascist powers.

But nothing can be more dangerous than this fallacy, unless it be the fallacy that American isolationism would really cut us off from the problems of foreign policy. No healthy movement for collective security can possibly be built on the basis of militarist preparations and military sanctions. What Mr. Roosevelt is driving at is not too hard to discover. He is not at heart a war-monger. The clue to his policy is that he thinks he is steering a middle course between definite military sanctions on the one hand and complete isolationism on the other. He is, morever, tangled up with a bad Neutrality Act, which he is unwilling to open up all over again. He is accustomed to pragmatic waiting, and as events move along he wants to be in a position to adopt either a big-stick policy or complete withdrawal. For either course, he may well argue, an increased navy is a necessity. This is then, for him, the "middle way" in foreign policy. Yet actually it is the old system of armaments dressed up in new clothes. For there is no middle course here that does not become the old course. One may start out to follow a policy of the golden mean, but one ends up following the sea-power theory of Admiral Mahan and the sacred-war theory of Woodrow Wilson.

In foreign policy today we are faced with the necessity for adopting one or the other of two radical solutions—radical in the sense that they depart drastically from past practice. If a policy of complete isolationism were possible—which it is not; if America could really cut itself off from the world—which it cannot—then we should prefer that to the President's policy of indecision plus a big navy. But isolationism is not a policy; it is a reaction against the intolerable humiliation of having been taken in by the rhetoric of the World War. The other radical solution—difficult but possible—is to turn from the old diplomacy, the old armament races, the old war system, to a genuine policy of collective economic action. It is not, despite Professor Charles A. Beard's eloquent statement before the Senate committee, Europe itself with its centuries-old blood rust that we must turn away from. It is the war system and the armament system; and unless we can transform them in Europe they will entangle us here. To do this requires new energies, a willingness to use new methods. It requires a will to enter with the rest of the world into collective economic action to restrain the aggressors, and a determination to pursue that action only so long as it remains economic. America can show its bigness not by the size and number of its battleships, but by the boldness and scope of its efforts toward building a new system of collective security.

Instead of the big-navy stuff, we propose a threefold program: economic action with the other democracies in extending assistance to China and limiting Japan to its own economic resources; a conference for limiting armaments and stopping the arms race; and a renewed fight on the depression centering around the construction of public works instead of battleships.

Plowing a New Field

WITHIN the past three years two new springs of talent have sent up geysers among the artificial fountains of Broadway. The Federal Theater opened in New York in October, 1935. Since then it has chalked up an amazing record of innovation and success: the Harlem "Macbeth," "Murder in the Cathedral," "Dr. Faustus," "Power," "The Cradle Will Rock" (prepared but not produced under federal auspices). It has invented one important new form, the Living Newspaper. Today the current edition, "One Third of a Nation," is one of the most dramatic and interesting shows in town. And the Mercury Theater, of current sensation, is the first lineal descendant of the Federal Theater. The second spring has produced the hit revue "Pins and Needles," sponsored by the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. Its freshness, humor, and distinctive flavor are authentic expressions of working-class experience and pride which have not heretofore figured in Broadway productions.

The two springs seem to be separate, but the social geologist need not search very far to discover that they come from one source. In the past few years, to put it briefly, a great new reservoir of creative energy in this country has been tapped, with the WPA projects and the Committee for Industrial Organization as the principal agents. The achievements of the WPA have been duly if not adequately celebrated by such journals as The Nation. The cultural significance of the C. I. O. and the problems it raises have not been sufficiently noted.

The activities of the C. I. O. have released the energies of millions who have for the first time taken part in a movement that touched their deepest interest. We have seen its results in the soaring figures of trade-union membership and in the wave of strikes. Politically, too, the effects have been clear. But Pennsylvania going Democratic was less significant as a factor in the reelection of President Roosevelt than as a sign of a spiritual revolution in the lives of thousands of steel workers. There are endless stories, some of them already grown into tall tales, to show that joy has come with the C. I. O. in the industrial towns.

The giant having been roused, the problem of guiding his energies and educating his desires is pressing. Among the newer unions the United Automobile Workers has shown much enterprise in educational work. It systematically sets funds aside for it, though the amount thus available is necessarily small, and thousands of its members attend classes or lectures. The union has also used WPA teachers, which suggests a cooperation between government relief programs and workers' education that should be widely extended. Certainly all the art projects would do well to give attention to the human and other materials gathered under the banner of the C. I. O. The union at this stage must necessarily confine itself to the elementals of trade unionism.

The word education has a dull sound, but workers' education is not dull in practice. In the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee, for instance, the prosaic rules of parliamentary procedure have actually opened the door to democracy in union meetings for many an inarticulate. The steel workers were organized by the miners, and the U. M. W. was never noted either for its educational work or for its democracy. In spite of enlightened leadership at the top and a vigorous rank and file, the lodges are more or less dominated by a conservative subleadership. The main impetus toward education here must come from such outside agencies as the Workers' Schools of western Pennsylvania. Sponsored by a group which includes in an unofficial capacity high officials of the C. I. O. and of individual unions, as well as local progressive leaders, this organization has no central plant but sends lecturers and teachers into the industrial towns. In cooperation with local union committees it arranges for forums and classes. Actual problems are discussed in what often amounts to a rehearsal for the next union meeting. An attempt in one lodge to handpick delegates for the steel convention was stopped by a rank-and-filer who had just found out that a motion could be tabled. "What they like best in practicing parliamentary procedure," an observer reports, "is appealing from the chair."

It will be a long time before the newer unions get around to the more strictly cultural phases of education. But a token of the rewards to be expected are available in the achievements of the federal art projects. "Pins and Needles" is not a happy accident but an end-product of a program of education which has been built up over a long period and which functions wherever the union has a local. The I. L. G. W. U. is well established and relatively prosperous. In the newer unions the present recession makes it hard to maintain, much less expand, even simple programs. Yet they must somehow be maintained. Gifts of money to specific enterprises are essential. Books are in great demand. The WPA should be pressed into service. The new field must be plowed. And the public has a responsibility.

War Is in the Air

BY PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 14

AMERICANS who want peace and don't want higher taxes had better rouse themselves to the shape which events are taking in Washington. During the last three weeks the martial spirit, needled by the navy's brass hats and nourished on notes to Japan, has grown with a speed almost incredible to those who recall the indifferent response to Roosevelt's "quarantine" speech and the calmness with which the country received the news and newsreels of the Panay sinking. Yet here it is, larger than life and four times as expensive. Like a man starting up in a bad dream, the Administration tears off its nightshirt and begins defending the country against invisible foes on both sides of the bed and across the footboard. The whole business has a nightmarish quality, but taxpayers will soon learn there is nothing unreal or comic about the expenditure of $800,000,000 for naval expansion. If and when they are reconciled to that prospect, let them reflect on the possibilities of the Vinson amendment, under which it would be our declared policy to maintain a navy sufficient to insure victory "in both oceans at the same time." If this is not sheer lunacy—or if it is—it could mean a Pacific fleet large enough to lick Japan's and an Atlantic fleet stronger than the combined naval forces of Germany, Italy, and whatever fascist allies they might hereafter acquire in South America. In short, if turned into reality, it would mean the largest navy in world history.

A significant and revealing feature of that part of the expansion program already authorized, as well as that merely proposed, is the increase in the number of battleships. It is significant and revealing for two reasons: battleships run into money—about $70,000,000 a throw at prevailing costs, which rise almost automatically once such a program is authorized; and battleships primarily are weapons of offense. Writing as one who has always rejected pacifism and now sees its folly convincingly demonstrated in the plight of China, I cannot believe that battleships contain the answer to the problem of defending this country. If the United States were a far-flung empire, the problem would be different. The defense of a self-contained nation involves the comprehensive employment of submarines, aircraft, mine-laying equipment, and powerful coast batteries. The powerlessness of a battle fleet to penetrate such defenses was amply demonstrated against the British navy by Germany and Turkey in the World War. Indeed, one authority has said that if a Pacific enemy ever became strong enough to attack our coast, the safest course to pursue with our battleships would be to hide them up the Columbia River. Right now official Washington is pervaded with startling rumors about a suppressed War Department report dealing with the results of the army bombing tests conducted against the Pacific fleet last August. Members of Congress who have asked for this report have been told the War Department wouldn't dare assume responsibility for causing it to become public. One of the rumors is that, under conditions of very low visibility, one battleship received nine direct hits from planes which the navy gunners never once sighted. One direct hit may be sufficient to cripple a battleship.

The truth is that neither our naval policy nor what appears momentarily to be our foreign policy makes sense except on the assumption that we have some kind of an understanding with Great Britain. With all due respect to Cordell Hull, it remains a fact that diplomatic denials are not worth a dime a dozen in any language. I haven't the slightest doubt that Arthur Krock of the New York Times was "expertly informed" of such an understanding, and the mass of circumstantial evidence pointing to its existence is conclusive. Why was it "vital to the interests and defense of the country" that Admiral Leahy refused to disclose the nature of the London conference between Captain Royal Ingersoll, chief of the War Plans Division, and the British Admiralty? Why, for similar reasons, did Anthony Eden decline to tell the House of Commons about the concert of action by the United States and Britain in the Orient? When the implication of those unanswered questions is considered in conjunction with the President's proposal that democratic countries impose a quarantine on aggressor nations, no mere diplomatic denial will erase the impression.

That is not all. More impressive still is the evidence supplied by the very nature of our naval program. Members of Congress who asked the Navy Department for information which justified the building of new battleships were furnished with a set of documents which included the Inskip report, made by a subcommittee of the British Imperial Defense Committee in 1936, dealing with the vulnerability of capital ships to air attack. The report freely admits that tests have shown battleships can be crippled and even sunk by air bombs. However, it emphasizes the necessity of battleships for protecting communications and trade routes to preserve the empire. One big-navy member of the House Committee on Naval Affairs was detected reinforcing his argument with a passage lifted verbatim from the Inskip report, except that he substituted "the country" for "the empire"!

Britain has a coast-defense problem. What is she doing about it? Building aircraft at a rate unprecedented in history and probably unequaled by any other country at this time. She also has a problem of empire defense, and to meet it she is building battleships and cruisers. This program apparently will enable her to cope with any challenge which Germany and Italy may offer in European waters but not at the same time protect her interests in the Orient. That is where our new battleships would become useful under the terms of an "understanding" whereby Britain enforced "peace" in the Atlantic while we did our part in the Pacific. How snugly that would fit! And how snugly our new battleships would fit into the new British base at Singapore, formally opened today in the presence of three United States cruisers! Pieced together in that manner the picture puts a strange aspect on the navy's plan to "defend our coastline," but it does make sense.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

The general tendency in Washington is to assume that the understanding exists simply as the result of conversations among British and American naval authorities, but the better-informed and more alert members of Congress do not share that opinion. For all Cordell Hull's high purposes and outward suavity they know him at heart to be a tough old Tennessee mountain feudist. He never forgets the breaker of a promise, whether it be man or nation. He has the capacity of a volcano both to smolder and to erupt. He is now talking privately and bitterly about "international bandits" who are menacing the peace of the world. The vigilante spirit possesses him.

I am not sure that it will not eventually be necessary for the democracies of the world to unite against fascism. That is a question to be faced and answered. It cannot be properly answered by shamming a foreign policy of isolation behind a naval policy of "coastline defense," while actually pursuing the logic of an understanding with Great Britain behind a naval policy designed for application in distant waters. First of all the Administration should determine its foreign policy, then formulate a naval policy to make it effective, and, finally, take the country into its confidence about both. There is a present danger that the navy will formulate its own policy, which subsequently will determine our foreign policy, and that the country will remain confused about both until it is too late to do anything. To reduce the matter simply and dogmatically, it would appear that if we expect to fight in the Pacific, our navy should be twice as large as that contemplated by the expansion program; if we don't expect to fight in the Pacific, we already have more battleships than we need.

To those who would like an idea of what we are heading for, I commend for study the May bill, now apparently about to be reported by the House Military Affairs Committee. It contains complete plans for a Presidential dictatorship automatically to go into effect upon a declaration of war. Space prevents giving the details, but Representative Maury Maverick described it accurately as "a complete fascist blueprint."

New Ferment in India

BY JOHN GUNTHER

Bombay, January 10

IT REALLY is a continent. I feel like a mouse nibbling at an elephant. I have seen people from the Aga Khan to Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Nehru, from Parsee millionaires to young Congress Socialists and Communists. Their different stories both interlock and conflict. One may explore any number of drifts, tensions, situations. There are, one might say, at least four different major confrontations of power. British versus Indian. Native princes versus British India. Congress versus government. Hindu versus Moslem. They all intermingle, with perplexing contradictions and cross drifts.

The Working Committee of the Indian National Congress has just met. It meets often and will meet again before the annual plenary session of the congress at Haripura next month. The meeting just concluded was not so important for its agenda or decisions as for another drift in Indian affairs it shows. It would be absurd to state that the congress has suffered a real cleavage, or is formally truncated between left and right. There is no split yet. But we are seeing, after many years of development, the jelling of two distinct congress groups.

First to define terms. The Indian National Congress is more than a party; it thinks of itself as the organized expression of the aims and the will of the Indian people. It includes Moslems as well as Hindus, though in small proportion; vastly rich industrialists as well as the laborers they hire; agitators in the princely states as well as prime ministers in the seven new congress governments. Anyone may join the congress who pays the annual subscription of four annas (about nine cents) a year—even this minuscule sum is too much for many Indian peasants—and who signs the congress pledge to work for the independence of India by legitimate and peaceful means. The congress has perhaps three million members; it has been since 1919 (its origins go much farther back but that is another story) both the reservoir and the attacking stream of Indian man-power against Britain. It is a sort of people's front—though for years the Communists stood outside it—against imperialism.

The congress structure is complex. First come "primary members" in the towns and villages, who choose delegates to the provincial congress committees. A constituency is 250 primary members. The provincial committees choose the All-India Congress Committee, a sort of parliament. The president of the congress, elected annually—for two years the president has been Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru—is responsible to it. The president selects fourteen men to be, roughly speaking, his Cabinet, though force of tradition requires him to choose men of varying sorts on an all-congress basis rather than those who reflect his personal views. The president and his fourteen associates, the top of the congress structure, are called the Working Committee.

Having done my best to understand this (I am skipping many details now), I was puzzled during my first days in Bombay to hear incessant references by congressmen to the "high command." I assumed at first that the high command was the Working Committee. But it is not. The high command is Mr. Gandhi. But Mr. Gandhi, for purposes of his own, is not a member of the Working Committee; he is not even a member of the congress. Yet he dominates the congress absolutely. When I arrived in India I thought, like many visitors innocent of its complexities, that Mr. Gandhi was a back number. I thought he had been superseded by the younger men. Nothing could have been more wrong. Mr. Gandhi is sixty-eight and not in the best of health; his doctors permit him only a limited amount of political discussion; he lives inaccessibly in a remote village in the Central Provinces; but he is still very nearly the heart, soul, brain, and fingers of the congress. Practically nothing can be done by the congress without his advice and consent. They call it "Gandhi-raj."

Why? Because to the people of India Mr. Gandhi is Jesus Christ. Rather, he is a sort of unbelievable combination of Jesus Christ and Tammany Hall; a revered leader, a leader who is literally worshiped, who adds an exquisite sense of the temporal to his spiritual qualities, who is a sublime political tactician as well as savior.

The Working Committee of the congress is a fascinating study in human and political nature. Devoted, disinterested, the members remind one of the old Politburo in the U. S. S. R. They represent different spheres of action, but they are united by congress ideals. The membership is fantastically variegated; when I saw most of the members in Juhu, waiting in Mr. Gandhi's anteroom for a word with the master, I thought I had never met such different types of men bound by common faith. Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, the wealthy and cultivated leader of the bar in Bombay; a tough party boss like Vallabhbhai Patel, who except for his congress uniform of white homespun might have stepped out of the Fifth Ward in Chicago; the Moslem theologian Abdul Kalam Azad, who was born in Mecca; the poetess Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, one of the few Indian politicians I met who likes to laugh; Khan Abdul Ghaffer Khan, the tall soldier from the Northwest Frontier; a peasant from Bihar with shaggy beard—these are leading members of this oddly assorted but homogeneous committee.

The president, Jawaharlal Nehru, is perhaps the finest man in public life I have ever met. As everyone knows, he is a Kashmiri Brahman (in American, say a Boston Lodge or Cabot), the son of the greatest lawyer in India, who went to Harrow and Cambridge and became while still in his twenties the leader of the congress youth. He has been in jail seven times. He has given everything he has to the Swaraj (independence) cause. Sensitive, fastidious, a bit ingrown, an intellectual, he is yet a man of action and a great popular leader.

Now it is said frequently that Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Nehru represent opposite poles in congress politics. This is far from being correct. The two are deeply devoted to each other. Nehru needs the "high command" because Gandhi alone carries the mass of the Indian people. Gandhi needs Nehru, not only for his faith and his abilities but because his influence is so powerful, especially with the youth.

Gandhi, people say, represents the "right," Nehru the "left." Again this is not quite correct. There are potent forces in the congress to the "right" of Gandhi, especially some millionaire mill-owners; similarly Nehru is outflanked by leftists much farther left than he. Commonly called a socialist, Nehru is not a member of the All-India Congress Socialist Party, which is a sort of autonomous left-wing body within the congress. Gandhi is, one might say, "right center," Nehru "left center."

The left began to emerge as a distinct political force within the congress when civil disobedience was called off in 1934. The revolt against Britain then fizzled out; the congress had to become legal again. It turned "respectable," and many prominent politicians of the right became members. At the same time, largely under Nehru's influence, a vast irrigation of socialist thought watered India. Hitherto the congress had been, in the large, dominated by only one tenet—nationalism. Thereafter a great many congressmen became socialists as well as nationalists; the Socialist Party, within the congress, was formed. This was a natural enough evolution, because imperialism is what the congress hated, and British imperialism is capitalistic. But it gave the British opportunity to attack the congress on class as well as national lines. I have not yet met an Englishman in India who talked of Gandhi without respect. But almost all the English dislike Nehru and fear him on class grounds.

So much for background. In 1937 a tremendous event occurred. It is the cause of all the fermentation now. It is the core of the story, and out of it no one quite knows what will grow. The tremendous event was that, after the passage of the new Government of India Act, elections were held in the eleven provinces of British India, and that Congress won in seven of them and took office. Thus "provincial autonomy," as promised in the new act, came into being. Thus the congress, the congress which had fought Britain, came into the British structure!

Mr. Nehru and his wing of the congress violently opposed taking office. His followers thought that autonomy, as defined in the act, did not go far enough; they thought that acceptance of office, working under British governors, was a fatal compromise. But after almost four months of delay and haggling Mr. Gandhi evolved a formula which seemed to permit the congress to take office without loss of face. A kind of gentleman's agreement appeared to bind—perhaps not quite bind—the Viceroy and the governors not to use their veto powers except in circumstances of great public crisis. The right wingers in the congress were satisfied. Seven congress prime ministers, with seven congress cabinets, began the task of governing their part of India.

Perhaps a further word of explanation is necessary. British policy since the war has been, in a sentence, to give India something, but not too much, with dominion status as the distant end in view. Congress policy has been to get what it could, with complete independence—though for years Congress did not go so far—in view. Almost twenty years of negotiation and painful strife produced the compromise constitution of the new Government of India Act. The congress at first opposed the act. Later it accepted part of it. Provincial autonomy, the first part of the act to go into effect, did beyond doubt greatly increase the powers of the provinces. One can see how the congress was tempted. It ended dyarchy; it abolished the "reserved" subjects which the old provincial assemblies were not allowed to touch; it did indeed keep foreign affairs and defense in the hands of Delhi, but the provinces were given full powers over such items as local finance, police, prisons, education, health, public works, agriculture and forests, land revenue, above all law and order. Moreover, whereas ministers under the old system were little but mouthpieces of the British governor, the new ministers, elected by the Indian people, have complete administrative charge of their own departments.

Congress governments were finally formed in Bombay, Madras, the United Provinces, the Central Provinces, Bihar, and Orissa in July, 1937, and in the Northwest Frontier a little later. Now a curious point. The "high command" and the Working Committee under Mr. Nehru decided not to take office themselves in any province. Logically one might have assumed that the Working Committee leaders, if they stood for election and were returned, would be the new prime ministers. But they decided not to enter office themselves. Instead, they deputed a second line of leaders to take on the new administrative posts. The Working Committee, rather like the Politburo in the Soviet Union, decided to keep out of actual administrative work, and to guide the seven governments from behind the scenes. So second-line congressmen (I know that one or two of them may dislike this appellation, but I do not mean it personally) became the prime ministers and finance ministers and all the rest, and the Working Committee was transformed into a sort of composite Eminence Grise.

This may prove to be a misfortune. For already, in the seven months of provincial autonomy, fairly grave dissidences have arisen between the Working Committee and the congress governments. The Working Committee holds the whip hand, of course. It can break any provincial government. Their men are its men. But it cannot afford to attack its own ministers openly. Thus, when there is divergence of opinion, negotiations have to be very delicate.

Two dangers, from the left point of view, face the new governments. First, as in the case of the Wafd in Egypt, they may find that the sweets of power are sweet. They may be tempted by the comforts and advantages of their position to modify the pure fervor of their congress nationalism. Second, they may find that running a government is a great deal more difficult than criticizing it; this too may seduce them into "moderation," which word congress radicals are apt to interpret as subservience to Britain.

Provincial autonomy was an enormously shrewd gesture by the British, though many Englishmen think—and fear—that it gave the congress "too much." But in essence it was a masterly business, because it brought the congress for the first time within the fold of government, with governmental responsibilities; it gave the congress most of the prickly things to handle while holding on to veto power, defense, foreign affairs, and federal finance for the British.

What has happened? What have the provincial governments done in their baptism of office? First, let it be noted that almost all the congress ministers are right wingers. This follows the complexion of the Working Committee, which numbers roughly eleven right wingers to four left wingers. So the ministers began their legislative programs cautiously. In several provinces they declined to have social relations with the governors, though official relations might be quite correct; in Bombay the prime minister introduced a bill banning the British titles and honorifics which flood India every New Year's Day. But they did not attack the fundamentals of British power anywhere; they moved gingerly to avoid conflict with the governors; their program of social reform—housing, education, reduction of agricultural debt, and so on—got under way very slowly. They cut their own salaries to 500 rupees a month—while their British secretaries might be getting five times that sum—and promised as a first effort at economy to slash salaries in the provincial civil service.

Second, in five of the seven provinces at least they began to introduce prohibition legislation. It is difficult for an American who saw our prohibition débâcle to sympathize with this. But prohibition is a foremost point in the congress program. It can be introduced only at great cost. Revenue from "toddy" and other alcoholic drink amounts, by and large, to almost one-quarter of the provincial revenue. Moreover, the cost of enforcement will be very considerable. Altogether prohibition will mean that Bombay, for instance, may lose one-third of its total revenue, which must be met by other means. The congress ministers, if they take toddy from the peasant, must cut salaries of school teachers from, say, thirty-five rupees a month to twenty-five.

Third, most of the congress governments, especially Bombay, the United Provinces, Bihar, and Madras, have been unendingly perplexed by the problem of extremism. The situation is peculiar. Here is the congress in office at last, after many years of electoral propaganda and electoral promises. But the congress, no matter how well disposed, cannot begin to fulfil these promises at once. In the United Provinces, for instance, the congress has held out the bright beacon of land reform. The restive peasantry in the United Provinces is demanding action, like liquidation of the agricultural debt, which the congress cannot now perform. Any drastic solution of the land problem like collectivization would instantly lead to conflict with the governor. In Bihar the kisans (peasants), awaiting the promised reforms, refused to pay rent to the landlords, who thereupon refused to pay taxes to the government. Refusal of tax payment to a British government was one thing. The congress sympathized with it and indeed advocated it for years. But refusal of tax payments to a congress government is quite another thing, because it means that the congress loses revenue.

Again, the congress governments, particularly that in Bombay, are worried about political agitation by extremists. Take the case of the new congress minister for law and order, Mr. Munshi. For years Mr. Munshi has been part of a movement which taught the people to hate and despise the police; Mr. Munshi himself, like almost all congress leaders, went to jail for civil disobedience. But now Mr. Munshi is in charge of the police, and sometimes he finds that he has to use them even against his own people. It is an unenviable situation to say the least. He is asked to repeal the repressive acts still on the statute books, but it is difficult for him to do so.

Two congress ministries at least—Madras and the United Provinces—have had actually to arrest congressmen under an act of the Indian penal code which governs sedition and its punishment and which all good congressmen, for twenty years, have learned to hate like arsenic. Yet in one case all that the offender did was make a speech against recruiting. He got six months. The case has been appealed. The leftists say that it is intolerable for the congress to prosecute a man for sedition when the congress by its basic nature is itself seditionist, that is, advocates complete severance of the tie with Britain. Another highly unpopular act which gives a magistrate summary right to quell disturbances has had to be invoked by congress ministers in connection with strikes at Sholapur and Cawnpore.

All this came to a head in the meeting of the Working Committee just concluded in Bombay. Leftists, especially Socialists, were resentful at the harsh treatment of the leaders of the Bihar peasantry, who had been threatened with expulsion from the congress. Argument was vivid. The rightists came out on top. The Working Committee's resolution expressed confidence in the various provincial governments, deplored extremism and violence—the congress is, after all, based on the principle of non-violence—compromised on the Bihar issue, and asked for patience by the people.

It would be easy to make out far too harsh a case against the congress governments. No one can blame them for holding on to office when retirement from office would mean that reactionaries would get the jobs. Administrative experience, which the governments are getting a-plenty, is something the congress has badly needed; these transition years may be a precious interlude for Congress to learn how to govern. Again, one should not criticize too warmly the incipient legislative programs. Seven months is not very long. The experience is just beginning. The governments have the promise of five years of office. And the congress still has independence as its final aim.

The next big issue is, everyone agrees, federation. The federal provisions of the Government of India Act are not yet in force. Federation means unity of the provinces with the native states under a new central legislature. Congress opposes the gigantic problem of federation vigorously. It is a moot point whether, as many think, opposition to federation will dwindle as did opposition to provincial autonomy. Mr. Gandhi has not, I believe, committed himself formally on federation. I imagine he will have the final word. Meantime the left is a bit unhappy; the right is standing pat.

Those "Regulated" British Unions

BY LEO HUBERMAN

EVER since the Supreme Court upheld the Wagner Act editorial writers and big-time columnists have been echoing the demands of the employers that trade unions be saddled with a load of responsibilities to balance their newly won privileges. The argument runs something like this: The Wagner Act is obviously one-sided. It is unfair to the employers and should be amended. Trade unions, for their own good, should be made responsible bodies, as they are in England. The English model is the one to follow. In England trade unions must be incorporated; in England long-drawn-out disputes, so costly to employers, employees, and the general public, are settled by compulsory arbitration; in England etc., etc.

This has been told us so long and so often that we have begun to believe it. It is an impressive argument. But it has one serious defect—it is simply not true. Let us take the advice of our employers; let us look at England. We will consider here only those rights and privileges which the trade unions have according to law. Whether or not the present trade-union leadership is militant and wide-awake, taking full advantage of its opportunities, is another story.

What are the facts? In England trade unions are not incorporated. There are no if's or but's to that flat statement. It stands just as it is. In England trade unions may be registered with the Registrar of Friendly Societies, a government official. But registration is not compulsory. The latest available official figures are those for 1935. At the end of that year, of some 1,042 trade unions known to be in existence, only 441 were registered. It is true that these 441 unions comprised about 80 per cent of the total trade-union membership, but it is also true that several of the largest unions were not registered. And the point to remember is that the unions which registered did so not because they had to but because they wanted to.

BURLINGAME PU LIBRAR

Why should they want to? The report of the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies gives us a clue. "The registration of trade unions was first permitted by the Trade Union Act of 1871, which is still the principal act. The main purpose of the act was to relieve trade unions and their members from some of the disabilities which they suffered owing to their objects being in restraint of trade." Ever since the time of Henry V, in the fifteenth century, it has been a principle of English common law that practices in restraint of trade are illegal. This meant that trade unions, even after they were granted the legal right to existence by the repeal of the Combinations Acts in 1824, found it difficult to carry on, since their practices were in restraint of trade. After a series of bitter struggles workers forced a change in the law; the Trade Union Act of 1871 established that though their acts were in restraint of trade, trade unions were no longer illegal bodies.

The unions which register do so only because such registration confers several tangible advantages. For example, registered trade unions are absolved from paying income tax on their provident funds—moneys devoted to benefits to their members for sickness, death, accident, unemployment, etc.; registered unions can hold land and property in their own name; if an official of a registered union embezzles its funds, the fact of its registration has established its legal bona fides as a trade union and the procedure in law is swift and simple. Since the fact that it is a trade union entitled to act in restraint of trade has already been established, it only remains for the court to decide whether or not the accused official is guilty. An unregistered union, in bringing action against an embezzling official, is faced with the necessity of first proving that it is a legal body, that it has the right to hold funds.

Nevertheless, many unions feel that the obligations inherent in registration exceed the advantages. They feel, for example, that to disclose their accounts, to make public full information concerning their membership rolls and financial strength, is to give to employers too powerful a weapon. Accordingly, they prefer to remain unregistered. Since 1913 it has become possible for unregistered unions to obtain from the Registrar a certificate establishing their legal bona fides as trade unions, but neither certification nor actual registration can properly be compared to incorporation. In England trade unions are not incorporated.

In England there is no compulsory arbitration. The Minister of Labor may inquire into the cause of any trade dispute, he may attempt to bring about a settlement, he may, with the consent of both parties to the dispute, refer the matter for settlement to an Industrial Court or to a board of arbitration satisfactory to both parties; but the resort to conciliation or arbitration is entirely voluntary, and the decision is not legally binding upon either of the parties to the dispute. Even when there has been an agreement beforehand to accept the decision of the arbitrator, the award is not legally enforceable.

Similarly, there is nothing in English law to prevent a trade union from signing an agreement one day and breaking it the next. As a general rule, of course, trade unions in England, as in the United States, do not break agreements without good and sufficient cause. But there is no legal compulsion to keep an agreement.

In England it is impossible to sue a trade union, either civilly or criminally, for conspiracy or for any alleged wrong committed by or for the union. This means that a Coronado Coal case could not occur in England. It means, therefore, that trade-union activities cannot be stopped by smart lawful raids upon their funds. In England the union is not responsible for anything done in a trade dispute even if the trespassers are acting on orders from union officials. Suppose a strike is on and the leaders of the union encourage, even order, their men to break windows, smash machinery, beat up scabs. They do so and are arrested. The men who committed the acts of violence are themselves responsible. If the union leaders should be arrested and tried as party to the crime, they would be held as individuals, not as officials of the union. The union, as such, could not be held liable for damages; it could not be sued.

In England unions are free to organize strikes. This is not a privilege granted by law but an inalienable right accepted as a matter of course. It is true that the Trades Disputes Act of 1927 makes sympathetic strikes illegal for all practical purposes, and also curtails other important liberties which the trade unions had won after bitter struggle. This act, introduced after the decisive defeat of the British working class in the general strike, is perhaps the most reactionary piece of legislation instituted in England in the twentieth century. It is all the more striking, therefore, to find that neither incorporation nor compulsory arbitration is part of the act.

If it be asked why strikes are fewer and less bloody in England than in the United States, the answer is plain. There is, in England, little nonsense about the right of workers to organize. Employers do not hire detective agencies to report on the union activities of their workers. It is assumed that trade unions are here to stay. They must be dealt with. Employers in England, unlike those in America, offer little challenge to the workers' right to join unions, have ceased to prattle nineteenth-century arguments against recognition of unions or collective bargaining. Memorial Day massacres are rare in England because Tom Girdlers are rare. And Tom Girdlers are rare because some time ago a militant trade-union movement made it quite clear that they could not get away with murder.

Incidentally, the C. I. O.–A. F. of L. battle was joined in England back in 1889, when the movement to organize the unorganized unskilled workers gained tremendous headway after a notable victory in the great dock strike. Though craft unionism is still strong, the unions of unskilled workers which began at that time are today among the most powerful in England.

In England negotiations are carried on by employers or employers' organizations on the one side and trade-union officials on the other. Employers do not dish up any hooey about not dealing with "outside agitators," that is, the national or district officials of the union. Collective agreements covering wages, hours, and conditions for the country as a whole are continually being made. And increasingly these agreements include provisions giving to the workers a voice in workshop planning and in other functions which the employers have long considered exclusively their own prerogative—the employer's "right to do what he likes in his own business" is being restricted.

In England the trade-union movement is also a political movement. The Labor Party, in fact, was created by and for the trade unions back in 1900. Members of unions who wish to do so make regular contributions to the political fund of their union. In 1935, according to the report of the Registrar, the number contributing was more than two million, well over 50 per cent of all union members. The total amount of their contributions in that year was £163,000. How, according to law, may this money be spent? The trade unions have the legal right to hold political meetings, to give financial assistance to their candidates standing for election to Parliament or to any public office, and to help financially to support these persons while they are in office. Under such an arrangement can there be any doubt about whom a Labor M. P. really represents? The class lines are sharply drawn, and the trade-union movement has its own political party to safeguard its interests.

American workers may well follow their employers' advice—take a good look at England.

God Gets an Idea

BY GEORGE S. KAUFMAN

THE Lord got up one morning, brushed His teeth, and took a look at the world below.

"Things aren't very good," He said.

"No, Sir," said His secretary.

"It seems to Me," said the Lord, "that a lot of it's My fault. Maybe I haven't been trying hard enough. There must be a lot of people down there that don't even know I exist."

"But surely, Sir—"

"No, I mean it. I've been listening to the radio recently. And I'll bet you Lucky Strikes are much better known than I am."

"But, Sir—"

"But nothing. This is a new age, my boy, and we've got to use new methods. I'm going on the air. Get Me the biggest advertising man in the business."

So they got him—the biggest advertising man in the business. He heard the whole idea through, and shook his head uncertainly.

"You mean the whole talk would be religious?" he asked.

"Of course," said the Lord.

"It's pretty risky," said the advertising man. "We got in a lot of trouble with Mae West lately, on a thing something like that."

"But this would be serious," said the Lord. "In a world torn by strife and hatred, ruled by cruel and ruthless dictators—"

"Hold on," said the advertising man. "You can't say anything about the dictators, you know. Germany's sure to protest, and then we'll get in wrong with the government."

"But they're at the root of most of the world's trouble."

"Well, maybe. But we get our license from the government, don't forget. And we've got all kinds of clients, too. A lot of them don't like to hear that kind of stuff."

"Then suppose I just talk about peace? Just peace."

"That would be better. Of course it doesn't sound very exciting—it won't be easy to find a sponsor. But I'll see what I can do."

So he went after a sponsor. Jello thought it was a good idea, but finally decided that Jack Benny was a better bet. Packard turned it down cold. The Bayer people were impressed, but said that peace wouldn't sell aspirin. Now, if He would talk on another subject . . . Chase and Sanborn already had Edgar Bergen, but thought something pretty good could be worked out between God and Charlie McCarthy. And so it went. Most of them said they were sorry they couldn't use Him right then, but they would bear Him in mind, and if anything came up . . .

The best he could offer, said the advertising man, would be a sustaining program. That meant He not only wouldn't get paid for it, but would have to pay for the band Himself.

"What band?" asked the Lord.

"Why, the band that would go on with you," said the advertising man. "You didn't expect just to talk, did You?"

"Yes, I did, kind of," said the Lord. "You see, I've got a good deal to say."

"They won't listen for more than five or six minutes," said the advertising man. "They're not used to it. Now, the way I see it is this: we open with a bit of your theme music, something like 'Have You Met Miss Jones?' Then comes a snappy announcement—'JQX takes pleasure in introducing an old Favorite'—something like that. Then You do six minutes, maybe six and a quarter. And after that the band again, with something hot."

"Maybe," said the Lord, "we had better let the whole matter drop."

"No," said the advertising man, "it sounds to me like a good idea. All You've got to do is catch on a little bit and we'll get a sponsor and make a lot of money. Now, when would You like to go on?"

"The sooner the better," said the Lord, "considering how things are. What about this Sunday night?"

"This Sunday?" said the advertising man. "Good heavens, no! Roosevelt is on!"

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A WEEK'S stay in Washington has finally convinced me that there is a determined drive on the part of certain persons, some connected with the government, to put us into war with Japan. They are careful to say that that is the very reverse of their purpose, but their words and their acts are precisely such as one would expect if they were part of a deliberate plan to embroil us in the war now going on in Asia. Why else should the State Department be making so much of the fact that one of our diplomats had his face slapped; however humane and chivalrous his motives, he was mixing into something—if the dispatches I have read were correct—that was not his business, which he would have kept out of if he had really understood the duty of a neutral diplomat. Then there was an attempt to play up the rough handling of an American newspaperman, but that fell quite flat. Next came the identical notes of the United States, Britain, and France demanding information about what Japan is really up to in the matter of battleships. I may be wrong, but I would be willing to bet quite a little sum that if Japan should come across with the desired information Mr. Hull's warriors would be the most disappointed men in Washington. I believe that from now on this policy will continue; the government will play up every incident it can to arouse public opinion. Washington newspapermen were freely saying that they expected to see strong action against the Japanese fishermen who are fishing off the Alaskan coast. Their presence provides a wonderful opportunity to rush some cutters and destroyers up there to prove to Japan once more that we are good red-blooded Americans who cannot be trifled with.

When I said this to an official the other day, he replied: "Well, why not? Have we got to take lying down everything those Japs do to us? With the Japanese army and navy out of hand and refusing to obey the orders of their own government, it's up to us to let those militarists know in the only language they can understand just what is likely to come to them." That is exactly the point of view of the belligerent persons I have in mind. When one says to them, "Then you are going to let these militarists lead you into the horror and cost of a war?" they reply that we owe something to our national honor and that it is time we let the dictators everywhere know that we "can still fight if we have to."

Well, if this policy is not changed by an immediate outpouring of public sentiment in opposition, it is only a question of time when we shall come to grips with Japan. Personally I think that a continuation of this policy is certain to infuriate the very Japanese militarists we are seeking to overawe. Those who favor our going to war and are trying to engineer it are setting three months as the necessary time to have enough Japanese "incidents" and work the country up into such a fury that it will be ready to let loose our dogs of war. They "fear" that our ships and sailors will be the victims of other Panay happenings, but when you suggest to them that this is the time to prevent such events by taking our ships out of China they look at you with scorn and repeat Mr. Hull's words that we have rights, responsibilities, and duties in China.

Fortunately this campaign is already running into difficulties; the process of waking up America and making it war-minded is not going as well as had been expected. Many people are speaking out, and acting too. Boake Carter continues his magnificent work on the radio and in his column. Professor E. M. Borchard has just shown up what is on foot in a splendid address under the auspices of the Bronson Cutting Foundation in Washington. Father Coughlin has come to life with a proper broadcast that it is much more important that we take care of the alarming increase in unemployment and suffering here at home than that we undertake the disciplining of berserker Japanese militarists.

The Congress has opened well. That indefensible $800,000,000 armament program is not slipping through so easily and unanimously as the White House hoped. Admiral Leahy has already been nine days on the witness stand, and he appeared to be an extremely unhappy and worried witness when I heard him last week. The revelation that Captain Ingersoll of the navy had been in London masquerading as "Captain Smith" and Leahy's refusal to tell what he was doing there so alarmed Secretary Hull that he answered Senator Johnson's proposed resolution, which the Senate had tabled, before the Senate thought of passing it. Mr. Hull may well say that there are no formal alliances between the United States and England, but he will hardly deny that there have been those long and detailed informal conversations which play so deadly a part at times in international relations. I believe that a perfect understanding exists concerning the role the British navy will play if we go to war with Japan. At any rate Washington is full of stories about the six battleships which the British are to send to Singapore to cut off all Japanese ships at the Straits while we cut the trade routes at Panama and Cape Horn. One of our squadrons, the story runs, is based near the Dutch islands to protect them from sudden raids.

The saddest thing of all is that Secretary Hull cannot see that the day we go into the war all the fine things he had done for peace through his bilateral trade agreements will crash.

BOOKS and the ARTS

DOS PASSOS AND THE U. S. A.

BY T. K. WHIPPLE

THE choice of the ambitious title "U. S. A."* for the volume which brings together Dos Passos's "The 42nd Parallel," "Nineteen-Nineteen," and "The Big Money" looks as if it might be intended to stake out a claim on the fabulous "great American novel." And Dos Passos's claim is not a weak one. A single book could hardly be more inclusive than his: in the stories of his main characters he covers most parts of the country during the first three decades of the twentieth century. His people have considerable social diversity, ranging from Mac, the I. W. W. typesetter, and Joe Williams, the feckless sailor, to Ben Compton, the radical leader, Eleanor Stoddard, the successful decorator, Margo Dowling, the movie star, and J. Ward Moorehouse, the big publicity man. The background of the panorama is filled out with "newsreels" of newspaper headlines, popular songs, and the like, with the autobiographic "camera eye" which gives snatches of Dos Passos's own experience, and with a series of biographical portraits of representative men—Debs, Edison, Wilson, Joe Hill, Ford, Veblen, Hearst, and twenty more. Probably no other American novel affords a picture so varied and so comprehensive.

Furthermore, the picture is rendered with extraordinary vividness and brilliance of detail, especially of sensory detail. Sights and sounds and above all smells abound until the reader is forced to wonder that so many people, of such different sorts, are all so constantly aware of what their eyes and ears and noses report to to them: might not some of them, one asks, more often get absorbed in meditation or memory or planning or reverie? But it is no part of Dos Passos's scheme to spend much time inside his characters' heads; he tells, for the most part, what an outsider would have seen or heard—gestures, actions, talk, as well as the surroundings. The result is a tribute to the keenness of the author's observation—not only of colors, noises, and odors but, even more important, of human behavior and of American speech. People as well as things are sharp and distinct.

Nor does the presentation lack point and significance. As the book goes on, the U. S. A. develops, with the precision of a vast and masterly photograph, into a picture of a business world in its final ripeness, ready to fall into decay. Though Dos Passos does not call himself a Marxist—and would seem in fact not to be one—his point of view is unmistakably radical. The class struggle is present as a minor theme; the major theme is the vitiation and degradation of character in such a civilization. Those who prostitute themselves and succeed are most completely corrupted; the less hard and less self-centered are baffled and beaten; those who might have made good workers are wasted; the radicals experience internal as well as external defeat. No one attains any real satisfaction. Disintegration and frustration are everywhere. The whole presentation leads to the summary: "Life is a shambles." Perhaps there are implications that it need not be; but no doubt is left that actually it is.

These generalities, when stated as generalities, have of course become the trite commonplaces of a whole school of literature. But actual people shown going through the process of victimization can never become trite or commonplace; the spectacle must always be pitiful and terrible. And no one, I should suppose, could look on Dos Passos's picture wholly untouched and unmoved. But still one might ask whether he has quite achieved the tragic effect which presumably he aimed at.

To complain that the picture is one-sided may appear captious and unreasonable, and in one sense of "one-sided" it is. The whole truth about a hundred million people throughout thirty years cannot be told in fifteen hundred—or in fifteen million—pages. The novelist has to select what he considers representative and characteristic persons and events, and if Dos Passos has chosen to omit big business men, farmers, and factory workers, and to dwell chiefly on midway people in somewhat ambiguous positions—intellectuals, decorators, advertising men—perhaps that is his privilege. The question is whether this picture of his, which is surely extensive enough as novels go, is entirely satisfactory within the limitations which must be granted. How close does "U. S. A." come to being a great American novel? That it comes within hailing distance is proved by the fact that it has already been so hailed; indeed, it comes close enough so that the burden of proof is on those who would deny the title. Yet to grant it offhand would be premature.

On one point at least everyone probably agrees: that the biographical portraits are magnificent, and are the best part of the book. But wherein are they superior? Is it not that these portraits have a greater depth and solidity than Dos Passos's fictional characterizations—a more complete humanity? If so, the implication must be that his creation of character is not complete. And indeed when Mac is put beside Big Bill Haywood, or Ben Compton beside Joe Hill and Jack Reed, or Margo Dowling beside Isadora Duncan, the contrast is unflattering to Dos Passos's powers as a novelist. There is more human reality in the 10 pages given to Henry Ford than in the 220 given to Charley Anderson. Nor is the explanation that the real people are exceptional, the fictitious ones ordinary, satisfactory: some of the fictitious ones are supposed to be leaders; and besides it is a novelist's business so to choose and treat his imagined characters as to reveal his themes in their utmost extension, not at their flattest. No; the contrast has nothing to do with the positions people occupy; it is a fundamental matter of the conception of human nature and the portrayal of it in literature.

---

*"U. S. A.: The 42nd Parallel; Nineteen-Nineteen; The Big Money." By John Dos Passos. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

In thinking of this contrast, one notices first that the real men have a far better time of it in the world, that they do find a good many genuine satisfactions, that even when they fail—when they are jailed like Debs or shot down like Joe Hill—they are not wholly defeated. Inside them is some motive power which keeps them going to the end. Some of them swim with the stream and some against it, but they all swim; they all put up a fight. They all have persistent ruling passions. Furthermore, they are all complex and many-sided, full of contradictions and tensions and conflicts. They have minds, consciousness, individuality, and personality.

Not that all these things are entirely lacking in the fictitious characters—Dos Passos is too good a novelist for that—but they do appear only in a much lower degree, played down, degraded, reduced to a minimum. As a result, the consciousness of these people is of a relatively low order. True, they are aware with an abnormal keenness of their sensations, but is not this sensory awareness the most elementary form of consciousness? On the other hand, these folk can hardly be said to think at all, and their feelings are rather sharp transitory reactions than long-continuing dominant emotions. Above all, they are devoid of will or purpose, helplessly impelled hither and yon by the circumstances of the moment. They have no strength of resistance. They are weak at the very core of personality, the power to choose. Now it may be that freedom of choice is an illusion, but if so it is an inescapable one, and even the most deterministic and behavioristic novelist cannot omit it or minimize it without denaturing human beings. When the mainspring of choice is weakened or left out, the conflicts and contradictions of character lose their virtue and significance, and personality almost disappears. Dos Passos often gives this effect: that in his people there is, so to speak, nobody much at home, or that he is holding out on us and that more must be happening than he is willing to let on. This deficiency shows itself most plainly in the personal relations of his characters—they are hardly persons enough to sustain real relations with one another, any more than billiard balls do—and in his treatment of crises, which he is apt to dispose of in some such way as: "They had a row so that night he took the train . . ."

The final effect is one of banality—that human beings and human life are banal. Perhaps this is the effect Dos Passos aimed at, but that it is needless and even false is proved by the biographical portraits, in which neither the men nor their lives are ever banal. The same objection holds, therefore, to Dos Passos's whole social picture as to his treatment of individuals, that he has minimized something vital and something which ought to be made much of—namely, forces in conflict. Society is hardly just rotting away and drifting apart; the destructive forces are tremendously powerful and well organized, and so are the creative ones. Furthermore, they are inextricably intermingled in institutions and in individuals. If Dos Passos is forced, by sheer fact, to present them so when he writes of Ford and Steinmetz and Morgan, why should he make little of them in his fiction? Is it to illustrate a preconceived and misleading notion that life nowadays is a silly and futile "shambles"?

One might hope, but in vain, to find the answer in the autobiographic "camera eye." To be sure, the author there appears as the extremest type of Dos Passos character, amazingly sensitive to impressions, and so amazingly devoid of anything else that most of the "camera eye" is uninteresting in the extreme. The effect of this self-portrait is further heightened by the brief prologue which introduces "U. S. A.": an account of a young man, plainly the author himself, who "walks by himself searching through the crowd with greedy eyes, greedy ears taut to hear, by himself, alone," longing to share everybody's life, finding his only link with other people in listening to their talk. If the obvious conclusion could be accepted that Dos Passos had been never a participant but always a mere onlooker hungry for participation, so that he had to depend only on observation from outside, it would explain much. But such is not the fact; he took part in the World War and in the Sacco-Vanzetti case and other activities. He has been no mere spectator of the world. Moreover, he must have had powerful and lasting purposes and emotions to have written his books, and it is hardly credible that he has done so little thinking as he makes out. His self-portrait must be heinously incomplete, if only because he is a real man. But it is possible that he may have chosen to suppress some things in himself and in his writing, and that he may have acquired a distrust of thought and feeling and will which has forced him back upon sensations as the only reliable part of experience. Some such process seems to have taken place in many writers contemporary with him, resulting in a kind of spiritual drought, and in a fear lest they betray themselves or be betrayed by life. Perhaps the disillusionment of the war had something to do with it, but more probably a partial view and experience of our present society are responsible.

According to any view, that society, in all conscience, is grim enough, but not banal, not undramatic. Dos Passos has reduced what ought to be a tale of full-bodied conflicts to an epic of disintegration and frustration. That reduction—any reduction—is open to objection, because it is an imperfect account of human beings and human society that does not present forces working in opposition. In that sense "U. S. A." is one-sided, whereas life and good literature are two-sided or many-sided. In a word, what we want is a dialectic treatment of people and the world. Dos Passos does not call himself a Marxist; if he were more of one, he might have written a better novel. The biographical portraits are the best part of his book because they are the most nearly Marxist, showing the dynamic contradictions of our time in the only way they can be shown—namely, as they occur in the minds and lives of whole men. Nothing will do, in the end, but the whole man.

Poem

H. B. MALLALIEU

And if the nightingale can still be amorous
It has been banished to the plains of Thrace.
Now love bids you voyage southward without fuss,
Where boiling-point is chastened by the ice.

This mimic screen has no use for birds,
No ear for song except the beating drum.
If you would more than whisper words
Then flee from giant ears. Southward come.

Think of snowfields where no rack of storm
Twists painfully the lives of men. The white snow
Lying miles long in unimpassioned calm,
Invites you, wrapped in furs, from Europe's vertigo.

And though you hide your eyes, indignant hate,
Burning your glance, freezes my cowardice.
We will wait here for winter and the night
When hail and cold will sting the uncovered face.

Charwoman: 20 Vesey Street

6:00 p.m.

BY BEN BELITT

Clapping the door to, in the little light,
In the stairfall's deepening plunge,
I see, in the slate dark, the lumped form, like a sponge,
Striking a rote erasure in the night—

I keep that figure—while a watery arc
Trembles and wanes in wetted tile, as if
It wrote all darkness down in hieroglyph,
And spoke vendetta with a water-mark.

That shadowy sleight shall presently define
A scuffed and hazardous wrist, a ruined jaw
Packed into goiter, like a pigeon's craw.
A bitten elbow webbed with a naphtha line;

While light shall lessen, blunting, by brute degrees,
The world's waste scanted to a personal sin,
Till all is darkness where her brush has been
And blinds the blackening marble by her knees.

. . .

I mark what way the dropping shaft-light went:
It flung the day's drowned faces out and fell
Hasped like a coffin, down a darkening well:

And poise on the shaftway for my own descent.

BOOKS

Faulkner's Dismal Swamp

THE UNVANQUISHED. By William Faulkner. Random House. $2.50.

THE twisted heritage which the Confederate South bestowed upon its descendants is something few of them have renounced. It has got into their blood, and all that their weakened minds can do is resort to a rather vague, rueful, and inadequate irony. The truer irony is that they are its victims, forever driven on to commemorate their loss of Eden till one greater man (and where will he come from?) restore them and regain the blissful seat. The South languishes in race infantilism. The South is a fetishist because of something that disrupted its childhood; it goes on fondling a faded gray uniform with epaulets, a sword put up in its worn tired scabbard.

The South, to be sure, knows its moments of awareness and revulsion, as who would not, seeing impoverished brains and bodies in crazed retreat, seeing backward children lost in benighted folkways. But frequently these are moments of fascination also, for the process of decay can take on rich and gorgeous colors. We have evidence of this powerful revulsion and fascination in the works of Mr. Faulkner, who is a poet of disintegration, a necromancer of half-lights, but as yet no true visionary. Mr. Faulkner's saga of Jefferson, Mississippi, and its environs—spread out through half a dozen books—is, if not the only end, at least one end to a story that begins with drums and bugles, high-bred horses and gallant women. The decline and derationalization of the South can go no farther than Mr. Faulkner has taken them; it is now only possible for him to carry the story back to its source.

So here are tales of the Sartoris family during the War Between the States—a series of vivid exploits seen through the eyes of Bayard Sartoris as a boy, and set down by him long afterward. His father John, a reckless soldier and skirmisher, is away from home, where Bayard is living with his grandmother and the slaves. Always at his side is the Negro boy Ringo, presumably his half-brother. The status of Ringo in the family circle is one of the most interesting things in the book, as to my mind Ringo is by far the most interesting character. But for those who read "The Unvanquished" in the spirit that millions have read "Gone with the Wind," it will be the grandmother who holds the stage—that indomitable ramrod, fierce as only sheltered and ladylike women can be. Lies, theft, murder itself count less with her than the twirling of a fan when it comes to saving the South, and her courage is quite equal to her criminality. I suppose that a great many women like Rosa Millard lived and behaved as she did during those desperate years. I am not so cynical as to refuse them homage. But they will never remind me of anything but the theater.

What Faulkner thinks of such women, and of such exploits as they achieved, and of all the disorder and valor and Marquis of Queensberry bloodshed that went on, is never altogether clear. The point of the book seems to be made when Bayard returns from law school after his father has been shot by an enemy, and defies the Southern code with a gesture that surpasses it. He will not kill his father's murderer; but neither will he ignore the insult. He goes unarmed

BURLINGAME PUBL

Eighth big printing!

by Eugene Lyons

ASSIGNMENT IN UTOPIA

Widely read, hotly discussed for its sensational revelations about Communism in the U. S. S. R. $3.50

•

by George Baidukov

OVER THE NORTH POLE

Preface by Vilhjalmur Stefansson. One of the three Soviet aviators who flew the ANT-25 from Moscow to the U. S. in the first trans-Polar flight tells the story of that flight in a personal and revealing narrative. Illustrated, $1.50

---

in fiction . . .

this big three-decker novel is your richest reading experience this season

U. S. A.

by John Dos Passos

"His novels stand out among the most forceful, the truest of our post-war time in this country. And now that the three books in his trilogy — THE 42ND PARALLEL, NINETEEN NINETEEN, and THE BIG MONEY — have been published together as they were meant to be, it can be seen that he has produced a major work of considerable stature in 'U. S. A.' . . . He has been able to use effectively more of the available ways of story-telling, and with them he has been able to get into a book more of the life of his day than any other modern American novelist."—Charles Poore, N. Y. Times.

1500 pages, $3.00

---

in non-fiction . . .

this is the devastating exposé of BLAB that is being talked about everywhere

THE TYRANNY OF WORDS

by Stuart Chase

"All clever persons will get in early on the controversy THE TYRANNY OF WORDS by Stuart Chase will arouse. . . . I doubt if any book to be published in 1938 will be more important. . . . It is so good-tempered a book that I was afraid it would not stir up enough fury to be recommended by the enemies it makes. I was wrong. Already I have heard it denounced by a 'philosopher,' an 'economist,' a 'publicist,' and a bookseller as shallow and unfair, so it is certain to have a triumph."—Sinclair Lewis, News-Week.

2 big printings in 2 weeks, $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue New York

---

by Katherine Mayo

GENERAL WASHINGTON'S DILEMMA

An almost forgotten incident of the Revolutionary War is the center of this narrative by the author of "Mother India." The amazing episode concerned the honor of our young republic and the personal honor of Washington. A book of unusual interest, filled with the rich pageantry of our early history. $2.50

•

by Louis Untermeyer

HEINRICH HEINE: PARADOX AND POET

Of these two volumes Time Magazine has said, and others have agreed: "It ranks as the definitive biography of Heine in English."

THE LIFE, $3.75 THE POEMS, $2.75
2 volumes, boxed, $6.00

to Redmond's office and lets Redmond shoot at him. This substitution of moral for physical bravura leaves the whole series of incidents uncomfortably question-marked. Certainly the tone and proportions of "The Unvanquished" are heroic rather than satiric. Certainly the merits of "the Cause" and the fortitude with which the Cause was defended—though I don't doubt that Mr. Faulkner has separated them in his own mind—are never clearly separated in the story. The very title of the book bespeaks an irony purely literary; it has the same double meaning as a pun. The book, at any rate, is pretty high-romantic stuff, cinema stuff, though where "Gone with the Wind" is pure Hollywood, "The Unvanquished" is coated with the expressionism of the foreign studio.

As writing, this is much the simplest book that Faulkner has written in a long time. To be sure, one keeps stumbling over nonsense like "Then he flung the door violently inward against the doorstop with one of those gestures with or by which an almost painfully unflagging preceptory of youth ultimately aberrates," but for the most part "The Unvanquished" gains from having been partly published in the Saturday Evening Post. As thinking, however, it seems to me as wilful, cluttered, sunless as ever. Faulkner is a master of sensation, the more lurid the sensation the better, and can throw marvelously strange lights over any scene he selects. But if he is fitted by neither temperament nor training to be a rational novelist, then, if he is to survive, he must move on from the company of the spellbinders to that of the seers; he must acquire and articulate a profounder moral sense, a capacity to enlarge life after the manner—to name the greatest—of a Dostoevski or an Emily Brontë. I do not see where, in this book, he has done more than brightly varnish rotten timber. I do not see where this book does more than repopulate a scene that Faulkner would do better to forget about. We are told, quite sensibly, that novelists should deal with the material they know best. But not forever, surely; and not if that material is a swamp, slowly, voraciously sucking the novelist in. LOUIS KRONENBERGER

The Façade that Hitler Built

THE HOUSE THAT HITLER BUILT. By Stephen H. Roberts. Harper and Brothers. $3.

STEPHEN H. ROBERTS, professor of modern history at the University of Sidney, author of many imposing works, went in the autumn of 1935 to Europe to spend sixteen months in Germany and neighboring countries. His main aim was "to sum up the new Germany without any prejudice," except that his general approach was that of a "democratic individualist." He had been in Germany twice before, at the end of the inflation period and immediately prior to Hindenburg's treason, as he calls, with dangerous objectivity, Hitler's accession to power. He states that the Nazi authorities "did everything possible to aid his investigation" although they knew he was a critic. "The only refusal I encountered in all Germany was in being denied access to their collection of banned literature." This statement would be of greater value and interest if the author had given a list of the requests he did not make, knowing beforehand that they would be refused—requests of the sort that could only have shortened his obviously pleasant trip through the Third Reich. But even so, we can guess. Of the twenty-four chapters and fifty-eight sub-chapters of his work not one deals explicitly with Hitler's terror, the concentration camps, the Schulungslager for old people, the prisons of the Gestapo. If not the whole German house, certain rooms were closed to the Australian professor, and all the cellars.

The author himself admits that the faults of omission in his work are everywhere obvious and apologizes for them. To stress the limits of an investigation made with Nazi help is in itself no reproach. But it is very necessary to emphasize them when a paper so important and so carefully pro-Hitler —that is, profoundly anti-German—as the London Times calls Professor Roberts's book "excellent, restrained, concise, accurate—the best general book as yet about Nazi Germany."

The author is genuinely brilliant in his description and analysis of how Hitlerism works in special fields. He is at his best in solving the puzzle of Hitler economics. The chapters on autarchy and foreign trade, especially that on the "multiple-geared" currency, may enlighten many political romantics. The author's excellent sketch of the total fiasco of Hitler's agricultural policy—blood and soil but nothing to eat, the junkers still in their privileged position—shows convincingly that Hitler built no house but a façade.

Professor Roberts's appraisal of the origin of Hitlerism and its way to power is weak. The author reports many facts, perhaps all he knows, truly, but his interpretations wander astray. Such a chapter heading as The Riddle Hitler, such phrases as "almost a miracle" (Hitler's victory) or the reference to the timely outbreak of the Reichstag fire as "fate or design" indicate that the author belongs to the numerous group of historians who do not dare to call a swindler a swindler when he swindles a whole people, or a criminal a criminal when his spoil is a great country. In this frame of objectivity the author does not even hesitate to say that "all the brutal sides of his movement pass Hitler by. The killings, the oppressions, the imprisonments do not belong to the world of his imagination. He is too remote for them." It passes the author by that Hitler incites the terror, and sometimes is its very cruel executioner, like any top gangster.

And what has the author to say about Hitler's gorilla-in-chief, Himmler? He found him "much kindlier and much more thoughtful for his guests than any other Nazi leader, a man of exquisite courtesy . . ." Foreign opinion is wrong about him. He is "a justification of the wildly empirical methods of Hitlerism." He seems to possess "the simplicity of true greatness." To be sure, the author does not approve of his methods, but he seems to think that true greatness and murder combine very well. When Professor Roberts stops reporting he falls for the convincing concept of successful power, and cruel terror, the essence of Hitlerism, dwindles into the background. Many German-born democratic individualists became Nazis this way before they knew it.

There are few descriptions of personal experiences in this book, though the author traveled 8,000 miles through Germany and spoke to everybody without restriction. Of course he could not meet the underground workers, but he found the German people as a whole in favor of Hitler's dry pogrom! "Everybody accepted the idea of race penalization as such." It did not occur to him that the Germans who talked to the foreigner did not dare tell him what they really thought. It did not occur to him that there could not be 470,000 Jews still alive in Germany if the German people had really sunk to the level of the Gott-Führer Hitler, who has not yet punished anyone for torturing a Jew, but has made many of the Jew-killers national heroes.

Excellent again is the historian's analysis of Germany's international situation, the country's just, and Hitler's stupid, claims, the army's strength, the strategic possibilities of the

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal

By JOSEPHINE LAWRENCE

BOW DOWN TO WOOD and STONE

The story of three sisters, each trying to hold, through relentless self-sacrifice, the thing most dear to her—one her children, one her husband, and one her job.

"In their faults, their virtues, their aspirations and failures, they are average people made luminous by an artist's vision." — Sidney Williams in Philadelphia Inquirer.

"She has made her three character sisters, each in her own way, terribly and unforgettably real." — Fanny Butcher in Chicago Tribune. $2.50

2nd Large Printing

By MARI SANDOZ

SLOGUM HOUSE

The story of a modern Lady Macbeth on the prairie frontier.

"Written on sandpaper with a piece of barbed wire."—N. Y. Times.

"There are readers whom it will gratify beyond any American novel of its time, and there are others whom it will merely appall. The only reader impossible to imagine is the one who can turn its pages unswayed by some extreme of emotion." —Wilson Follett in the Atlantic Monthly.

An Atlantic Novel.
$2.50
22nd Thousand

DR. CRONIN'S
THE CITADEL

THE NOVEL ABOUT DOCTORS

$2.50 216th Thousand

MARGERY SHARP'S
THE NUTMEG TREE

The story of Julia whose daughter was a lady. $2.50 38th Thousand

By GEOFFREY HOUSEHOLD

THE THIRD HOUR

The story of four adventurers and their amazing scheme for a better world — a novel that opens new horizons.

"A remarkable first novel. A tale of adventure . . . but the adventure is of the mind and spirit as well as of the flesh."—N. Y. Herald Tribune "Books." 11th Thousand

An Atlantic Novel. $2.50

By WALTER LIPPMANN

THE GOOD SOCIETY

A book for those who want the Nation to meet its responsibilities to its less fortunate members but who wish to preserve liberty and democracy in the process.

"The importance of this answer to the dilemma of the liberal—saturated with thought and brilliantly written—is that it is a vigorous, positive program for the reconstruction of liberalism." — Thomas K. Finletter. 19th Thousand

An Atlantic Book. $3.00

LITTLE, BROWN & CO. PUBLISHERS, BOSTON

coming war; and very timely indeed is his discussion of the relationship between the Nazi Party and the army. "So far Hitler has built up a 'one-party state'; it seems as if that state is in process of becoming an 'army state.'" This observation still holds. In the crisis of the last weeks in Germany certain generals and the aristocratic wing of the officers' corps lost. The event is the logical beginning of the belated liquidation of German feudalism. The subject Hitler is forced to act against his own will in order to construct a thoroughly modernized army. But a state under the heel of the army remains his goal. He started in 1918 as a spy for the Reichswehr generals; now he is the super agent provocateur who gives the orders.

I have stressed the shortcomings of this book because I want to recommend it to every student of contemporary history, with the warning that it is to be read with critical consciousness, the more carefully the more brilliant it is. Not that the author would come to false conclusions. On the contrary he sees very clearly that the German nation "has been duped in the sense that it has been launched along a road that can only lead to disaster." He proves this point in a thousand ways. His main mistake is that he identifies the German people with the Nazis and such an attitude prepares the way for a condemnation of the successful terrorist and of his victim as well. This attitude has already become a part of the new general war propaganda and it will make the overthrow of the war lords of all nations more difficult, or again impossible as in 1918. FRANZ HOELLERING

"Duty's Faithful Child"

LOUISA MAY ALCOTT. By Katharine Anthony. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

I BELIEVE it was Rebecca West who said of course there are many more literary men than women: the women are busy creating all these literary men, and all their readers too. It would be difficult to find, as Miss Anthony understands, a more tragic variation on this theme than Louisa May Alcott. At ten she began the impossible task of squaring, so to speak, the Alcott domestic circle. Prodigy and hoyden, she managed this house which was so fine a refuge for "lost girls, abused wives, friendless children" except when their name was Alcott. With her unworldly and unpractical father and her worldly but unpractical mother, Louisa dreamed early of her future "fame." For fame meant money. "I long to honestly get a little." And throughout the balance of her harried existence Louisa, this strangely respectable product of Boston's famous bohemian family, transcendental Sangers whose unhappy offspring may in fact be termed a sort of constant literary nymph, continued to serve as the psychological whipping-boy for the social and domestic failures of her parents.

Miss Anthony tells this history of fame and frustration in the first mature biography of Louisa Alcott. Louisa's father has himself lately received a delayed credit in Odell Shepard's admirable "Pedlar's Progress." But while Professor Shepard made and substantiated many claims as to Bronson Alcott's value as an American type, he made no claims, and it would be hard to substantiate any, as to Bronson's value as a typical family man. It was, in fact, Professor Shepard's main defect that, resolutely hewing to his line, he ignored the worldly tragedies resulting from Bronson's quest of pure spirit. It seems to be the sad and absurd pattern of human progress that every absolute emphasis creates its absolute reaction, and Louisa indeed played Marx to Bronson's Hegel. In this sense Miss Anthony's new biography is a necessary and valuable supplementary portrait of one of New England's most interesting families.

I should like to say it was more than this. But the definitive biography of Louisa Alcott will also demand a little more than Miss Anthony gives us. Though one would value her realistic view of a period which is rapidly disappearing behind a veil of glamor, Miss Anthony makes no claim and little attempt to evaluate Louisa's age. "Thoreau, Emerson, Hawthorne," so the book jacket states, "the Henry Jameses, father and son, pass across the pages of Miss Anthony's book"—and this is precisely what they do. Miss Anthony, that is to say, deals almost exclusively with the personal history of Louisa. It is true that no previous biographer has adequately explained Louisa. But neither, and this is the disappointment of the book, does Miss Anthony. What is the crucial relationship of Bronson and Abigail Alcott with the enigmatic philanthropist Charles Lane? On this relationship, which so strongly impressed Louisa that twenty years later she writes of it in "Moods," Miss Anthony records that it was "a more complicated situation than she had any idea of." But need it also be too complicated for us to have any idea of? What is the root of the psychic ill which drives Louisa, dwelling as she did, with her bags and pill boxes, her paralysis and contemplations of suicide, in a "permanent borderland of hysteria," to general practitioner after general practitioner, specialist after specialist, homoeopathists, mental healers, osteopathists? The diagnosis of nervous disorders, Miss Anthony realizes, has made phenomenal progress since Louisa's day. "In the light of what is now known . . . it is supposable that Louisa Alcott's case might have been helped by more understanding." It is too late for Louisa's doctors to benefit by this progress, but is it too late, one wonders, for Louisa's biographers?

It is the general fate, however, of more profound books to be duller books, and Miss Anthony has not erred in both these respects. Presenting the facts of Louisa's life in her very readable fashion, she catches, if she does not always explain, the torments and domestic trials of America's charming apostle of domesticity. Miss Anthony has moreover, and this I think is the virtue of her book, sympathetically and acutely portrayed the sterile rewards of a life ruled by unreasoning conscience rather than reasonable pleasure. And in a time which is suffering from a recrudescence of the Victorian moral earnestness in an altered but none the less virulent form, it may not be amiss to mention that this thwarted life of "Duty's faithful child" points only to the faithlessness of duty. An excess of moral virtue is a psychological vice.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

Snakes in Iceland

LITERARY OPINION IN AMERICA. Edited by Morton Dauwen Zabel. Harper and Brothers. $3.25.

TO SO uncertain and fitful a subject as contemporary American criticism the mere appearance of a book like this lends a harmony and a dignity that are somewhat specious. Interesting as they are, none of these fifty essays seems an inevitable choice. It would be easy to suggest critics who could have been included; it would be impolite to point to articles that might have been left out. It might be possible to compile several other volumes of the same size and scope

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

WHICH 1938 AUTOMOBILES ARE BEST BUYS?

Consumers Union's Annual Report on Automobiles Rates Over 46 Models in Order of Merit

Are you planning to buy a 1938 car? With prices up 10% you'll want to know which car at the price level you're prepared to pay will operate most economically, which one has the soundest mechanical construction, which is safest to drive—in short, which car will give you the best value for your money.

Divided into eight price groups (ranging from below $700 up to $2300) more than 46 models of 1938 automobiles are rated by name as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable" in Consumers Union's annual report on automobiles just published in the February issue of Consumers Union Reports. This report was prepared by unbiased automotive experts and is based on driving tests, and engineering examinations. The report evaluates the new overdrives, fourth speeds and other innovations in transmissions and shifting devices, discusses brakes, riding qualities, durability, steering and safety, and gives a table showing the "gas consumption factors" for the various cars. Among the cars discussed by name in this report are the Ford, Buick, Packard, Willys, Oldsmobile, Chevrolet, Hudson, DeSoto, Lincoln, and Plymouth.

Read this report before buying a car. It will give you a sound basis for making an intelligent and economical choice. The report may be ordered by filling out and mailing the coupon below.

HOW TO BUY AN INSURANCE POLICY

In the fourth installment of a series of reports on life insurance—also appearing in the February issue of Consumers Union Reports—CU's insurance consultants point out the soundest and cheapest form of insurance available, naming the companies which supply this type of insurance. Also continued in this issue are the series of reports on HOME BUILDING & BUILDING MATERIALS and VITAMINS. Your subscription to Consumers Union Reports may be begun so as to include all of the reports in these series. Simply write the name of the month with which you wish to begin in the coupon. Here are the issues in which these series appeared (together with a partial list of the other subjects covered in these issues)—NOV., Life Insurance, Portable Typewriters, Anti-Freezes, Men's Hats; DEC., Life Insurance, Radios, Playthings, Electric Shavers, Cigars, Lipsticks; JAN., Life Insurance, Home Building & Building Materials, Vitamins, Auto Batteries, Lisle Stockings.

Stimulating and provocative, Consumers Union Reports, which goes to the 55,000 members of this non-profit consumer organization, will give you a new insight into your daily buying, lead you to a new awareness of your problems and power as a consumer. Become one of the thousands of American consumers who are taking part in this organized effort to get the best value for their money. Cut out and mail the membership coupon today!

CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc.

55 VANDAM STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Coming in March!—Consumers Union's 1938 Buying Guide. A 250-page, compact, pocket-size reference book for use in shopping. Contains ratings of over 1500 products by name as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable" based on laboratory tests and examinations. Included in the regular membership without extra charge.

On the Answers to These Questions Intelligent Buying Depends

(You'll find them in the February Reports)

AUTOMOBILES

What innovations in some 1938 cars boost gas mileage about 20% at high speeds?

How can you avoid "overbuying" when you go to purchase a 1938 car?

Of the four cars in the Economy Group (Plymouth, Ford, Willys, Chevrolet) which one was found to be the best buy by competent engineers?

What factors will conserve the durability of your car, minimize adjustments, and increase operating economy?

VITAMINS

Up to what age should children be given cod liver oil?

How many units of Vitamin D is the proper dosage for infants?

Is cod liver oil toxic?

What are the advantages and disadvantages of artificial sunlight?

LIFE INSURANCE

For permanent, constant protection what is the cheapest and soundest insurance available? What companies sell this type of insurance?

Why do certain insurance companies refuse to sell certain types of insurance to women, Negroes, and manual workers?

HOME BUILDING

What factors should you consider in selecting a site for your home?

What factors should you consider in planning the arrangement and size of your rooms?

Should the outer style of your home be decided upon first or should it develop from the inside plan?

TO CONSUMERS UNION OF U. S.
55 Vandam St., New York, N. Y.

Send me CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS for one year (12 issues) starting with the.............................issue. I enclose $3 for membership, $2.50 of which is for subscription. I understand that this fee also entitles me to the 1938 Buying Guide which will appear in March. I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Name ....

Street ....

City.............................. Occupation.................N-2

COMMUNISM, FASCISM, OR DEMOCRACY?

By EDUARD HEIMANN

A BOOK that compares the three principal political systems of our time and demonstrates the actual working of each form: the growth and development of modern capitalism and its relation to political democracy; a clear-cut exposition of the origins of socialism and its application in the communism of Soviet Russia, and the story of the coming of fascism in Italy together with an entirely new and revealing explanation of its rise to power in Germany.

In conclusion the author states his faith in a new democracy and describes what must be done to safeguard it, not only against communism and fascism but also against political encroachments that are an inevitable outgrowth of the technological progress of our time. Formerly professor of economics at the University of Hamburg, the author is now a member of the "University in Exile" at the New School for Social Research. $2.50

BRITISH EXPERIMENTS IN PUBLIC OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL

By TERENCE H. O'BRIEN

Formerly Department of Government, Harvard University, and Magdalen College, Oxford

A FACTUAL, unbiased description of a new type of government control which permits private management while promoting the public's interest, and how it works in actual practice with the British Broadcasting Corporation, the London Transport Board and the Central Electricity Board. These three institutions represent a striking departure from orthodox public corporations and their type of organization may well become the model for state-controlled businesses in other democracies. $3.00

W. W. NORTON & COMPANY
70 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK

without duplicating material. And each of these volumes might present a different picture. So much should be said, not in disparagement of the anthologist, but in appreciation of the difficulties of his task. As a former editor of Poetry and a Catholic professor contributing to liberal journals, Morton Dauwen Zabel can be depended upon to do a tactful job. But the situation calls for detachment rather than tact.

Not that the book is calculated to provoke controversy. On the contrary, it makes a game effort to steer clear of the ethical, social, and historical preoccupations that have dominated our critical tradition. An introduction poses the main postwar issues—realism, humanism, Marxism—as more or less "external distractions," obstacles to the more exacting functions of criticism. The bulk of the volume consists of reviews of current books or plays and individual evaluations of modern writers, salvaged from the files. Aside from a few preliminary generalities by elder critics and occasional verbal manipulation by newer critics, no positions are stated and no one is permitted to make explicit "what literary quality and distinction are." With no guide to the forest, we are lost among the trees. Even the Marxists are represented by works of extenuation and modification and not by any positive assertion of doctrine. R. P. Blackmur, a sympathetic spokesman for the editor, glibly disposes of "separable content" as if there were such a thing; as if a writer did not choose attitudes and order experiences in the same way that he chooses words and orders rhythms.

But there is no danger of proceeding in an aesthetic vacuum. We are constantly encountering implicit values, not to say prejudices. Such far-fetched subjects as Viola Meynell and François Mauriac suggest that the principle of selection is not always catholic in the widest sense. The sole revaluation of a classic is a study of "Lycidas" by Paul Elmer More, probably the single figure of our time who could really get indignant about Milton's anti-episcopal views. In general, rebels, romantics, and realists fare badly. The extreme of abject conformism is reached by Yvor Winters, when he climaxes his praise of a poem by calling it "sufficient justification of Dr. Bridges's laureateship." Allen Tate interrupts his sermon on Hart Crane with a trick he learned from Eliot: "Professor Charles A. Beard has immense information about American history, but understands almost none of it." Now Beard may be vulnerable to honest attack, but he remains unscathed by petulant sniping of this sort. If only we could avoid distractions—

And concentrate on technique. Yet here, in spite of many brave words about "craft" and "tools," we are faced with a pitiful minimum of dissection and an intolerable deal of impressionism. Eriger en lois ses impressions personnelles, to build up their private responses into dogmas—this is all too disarmingly what most critics have in mind. Modern criticism is better equipped to distinguish than to judge, and Edmund Wilson's work derives its peculiar validity from his historical method and his Sainte-Beuve-like willingness to enter into the outlook and intentions of the author he is criticizing. If it were more detailed, it would be better still. Some of the writing in this book, notably Theodore Spencer's on Yeats and Robert Cantwell's on Sinclair Lewis, reveals close technical insight. But most of it is degustation, tasting and seeking adjectives. A suspicious eye, observing that fully half of these critics are, or were, practicing poets, might expect them (a) to display craftsmen's competence, or (b) to hold other writers up to a personal standard, and (c) to use words diffusely. Eliot assumed that Shakespeare had tried to write a "Waste Land" and concluded, logically enough, that "Hamlet" was a failure.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC

The habit of generalizing a subjective impression and clothing it in concrete metaphor is often bewildering in a master of precise diction like Henry James. Under less literate auspices, this pursuit of the mot juste is likely to end up in a carnival of malapropisms. Since the editor has printed a generous portion of his own criticism, he will not object if we help ourselves to a random phrase—"the belabored hard-boiledness of Hemingway." Through mixed metaphor, and perhaps a pun, it is possible to extract some meaning out of this expression, but the context implies that the word "labored" would make less flash and more sense. The business of criticism is too prosaic for these critics. This is Marianne Moore on Wallace Stevens: "Upon the general marine volume of statement is set a parachute-spinnaker of verbiage which looms out like half a cantaloupe and gives the body of the theme the air of a fabled argosy advancing." At this stage, clearly, the critique casts no light on the poem, but the poem is necessary to explain the critique.

With Bourne, Sherman, and Parrington prematurely dead and Babbitt and More now belonging to the ages, with Eliot writing Criterion commentaries and Santayana sentimental novels, with Mencken turned stuffed-shirt and Brooks doing fancy-work, with the academic approach more myopic than ever and the journalistic racket more venal, with the Dial and Hound and Horn gone the way of little magazines, with our most distinguished regional writers flaunting their provincialism, with our sharpest Marxist minds blunted in factional friction, with ourselves forced to show serious consideration to such half-baked and indigestible books as "The Double Agent," "Reactionary Essays on Poetry and Ideas," "Primitivism and Decadence," and "Attitudes toward History," whom are we deceiving when we pretend to possess a body of literary opinion worthy of the name?

HARRY LEVIN

The Error of Philosophy

THE UNITY OF PHILOSOPHICAL EXPERIENCE. By Etienne Gilson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

M. GILSON'S newest book is a most exciting history of philosophy. For it is written not only by a superb scholar—perhaps the greatest living historian of medieval philosophy—but by a self-avowed dogmatist with an ax to grind and by a brilliant writer ruthlessly malicious toward what he takes to be the chief source of error of Western thought.

The book is not a history of philosophy in the usual sense of the word. It is a mordant study of some of the chief turning-points in the development of philosophy, beginning with Abélard and ending with Comte. And it illustrates the failure to which M. Gilson believes any thinker is doomed who attempts to discover the ultimate grounds of reality by explaining it by one of its parts. Thus Abélard was really a logician who did not realize the limitations inherent in his method. Descartes sought to solve the problem of philosophy in terms of fundamental conceptions borrowed from mathematics. Kant approached philosophy from the standpoint of Newtonian physics. And Comte was a sociologist.

Contrasted with the many failures stand Plato, Aristotle, and Thomas. These thinkers—"the three greatest metaphysicians who ever lived"—had no "system" of their own to propound. They were the servants of "perennial philosophy." They attempted to "relate reality . . . to the permanent principles in whose light all the changing problems of science, of ethics, and of art have to be solved." They looked "for an

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF REGULAR PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House

ALL STRICTLY THE ORIGINAL EDITIONS

(Not cheap reprints as the prices would seem to indicate)

1. THE ART OF MARRIAGE. By J. F. Hayden, B.Sc. Extensive, frank, complete, this book includes notable chapters on unequalized sexuality, frigidity of wives, sexual satiety, prematurity, lack of art in procedure, impotence, prudery, etc. Also contains the fullest treatise on Frigidity that can be found today, as well as on Reservatus. Illustrated, Revised, Enlarged. $1.98

2. BEHIND THE SCENES WITH THE KAISER. The world-astounding exposé by the Baroness von Larisch of the Imperial Household. "Here at last is the powerful, graphic picture of the Kaiser's private secret life—of his birth, his strange disease, his power, his degraded court favorites, his ghastly dissipations, his terrible utterances—and finally his exile!" Originally published in two volumes by subscription at ($5.00). The 2-volume set, only $1.98

3. FORTY THOUSAND QUOTATIONS. Prose and Poetical. Selected from the standard authors of ancient and modern times, classified according to subject and covering almost the entire range of thought and emotion. 1400 Topics. Over 2000 pages. Original red cloth, gold top edition. ($5.00) Our special price, $1.98

4. DIEGO RIVERA'S MOST FAMOUS FRESCOES. Ten prints in full color. Size 9" x 12". Diego Rivera is universally recognized as the world's foremost fresco painter. When these prints were first issued they were sold FROM $5.00 TO $10.00 PER PRINT. ($6.25) The 10 prints for 98c

5. FAMOUS VAN GOGH PAINTINGS IN FULL COLOR. Zuave—Still Life—Cornfield—Blooming Apple Orchard—four famous Van Goghs beautifully reproduced in full color. Ideal for framing—they look like original oil paintings. Together with Introductory Booklet by G. Benson, containing 17 Van Gogh halftones. Size 14½" x 18". ($10.00) Our special price for all, $1.98

6. TORTURES AND TORMENTS OF THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS. By the Rev. Antonio Gallonio. Contains 46 remarkable full-page illustrations, depicting the unutterable cruelties suffered by the first followers of the Great Master. First published in 1591, now for the first time translated in an edition limited to 1,125 numbered copies. Size 7¼" x 10½". Published in England at ($12.00) Our special price, $3.88

7. BEVERIDGE'S LINCOLN. In 4 illustrated volumes. Abraham Lincoln. 1809-1858. By Albert J. Beveridge. Boxed. "The author has traced to its source every fact, incident, tradition or statement, bearing on the life of Lincoln." ($20.00) The 4-volume set, only $3.98

8. GEORGE WASHINGTON'S COMPLETE DIARIES. The first complete issue. From his first expedition as a youth of 16 to the days of his final illness. Illustrated from old prints, engravings and facsimiles. "The material contained in these handsome volumes constitutes beyond question ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT HUMAN DOCUMENTS THAT HAS BEEN LATELY ADDED TO THE LITERATURE OF AMERICAN HISTORY."—Sat. Review of Literature. ($25.00) The 4-volume set, only $3.98

9. DON QUIXOTE. By Cervantes. Profusely illustrated with over 400 drawings by the famous Gustave Doré. ($10.00) $1.98

10. MARK TWAIN'S "1601." This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. ($5.00) Our special price, $1.58

11. WRITE IT RIGHT. By Ambrose Bierce. A little blacklist of literary faults, by America's foremost master of style. Useful, witty. Interesting to those who like to write and think precisely. Our special price, $1.00

12. NUDISM. ADVENTURES IN NAKEDNESS. By Julian Strange. Illustrated with 74 unretouched photographs of nudists. $1.59

13. DIEGO RIVERA'S PORTRAIT OF AMERICA. By Bertram D. Wolfe. With [illegible]0 full-page illustrations from Diego Rivera's frescoes. "Diego Rivera is not only the world's foremost fresco painter today, but the foremost fresco painter of modern times." ($3.75) Our special price, $1.49

14. MASTERPIECES OF MODERN ART. Magnificent hand-mounted reproductions in full color, size 11½" x 14", as follows: 2 of RENOIR; 2 VAN GOGH; 3 CEZANNE; 1 MANET; 3 MONET; 1 PISSARRO; 1 SISLEY; 1 MATISSE; 1 MARQUET; 1 DE VLAMINCK; 1 UTRILLO; 3 DERAIN; 4 PICASSO; 1 GAUGUIN. Any 6 full color prints for $1.79

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-30

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $........................for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14

(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 291-N, containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains—just off the press!

Name ....

Address ....

City.................................... State..................

ultimate ground of all real and possible experience" under the guidance of "immutable principles"—and found it in the word "Being," spelled with a capital "B."

In spite of his extraordinary erudition M. Gilson permits his dogmatism to betray him. And yet the error into which it leads him is not difficult to demonstrate. Let us grant that philosophers have failed because they have attempted to explain the whole by one of its parts. Let us assume that the whole can be explained. And let us also assume that there are immutable principles and that these can be found. Is it not rather easy to show that Plato and Aristotle committed the very same error of which the philosophers who are said to have failed are accused? And if Aristotle, then Thomas. For Plato's thought borrowed its orientation from his interest in geometry. And Aristotle attempted to correct his teacher's errors by means of a poor biology and a physics at least as poor—both poor because verbal. And if Thomas was not guided by a positive science of which he was a master by right of his own contributions to it, it was simply because the best science within his reach was that of Aristotle.

Thus the perennial philosophy to which M. Gilson would bring us back is a philosophy grounded on an inadequate science twenty-five hundred years old. And this science is not rejected merely because antiquated but because it turned out to be, on prolonged examination, mostly verbiage. The forms and potencies and entelechies explain nothing. Positive science explains very little indeed, but it does it well. Is it a wonder then that we prefer our unstable certainties to Thomas's and M. Gilson's immutable principles?

ELISEO VIVAS

Art for Culture's Sake

THE PAINTINGS OF REMBRANDT. 630 plates. $3. THE CIVILIZATION OF THE RENAISSANCE IN ITALY. By Jacob Burckhardt. 421 plates. $2.50. FIVE HUNDRED SELF-PORTRAITS. 478 photogravures, 7 color plates. $3. TITIAN. Paintings and Drawings. 329 photogravures, 8 color plates. $2.50. THE ART OF ANCIENT EGYPT. 340 plates. $2.50. VAN GOGH. 105 colored and monochrome plates. $3. BOTTICELLI. 103 colored and monochrome plates. $3. ART WITHOUT EPOCH. 132 plates. $2.50. CEZANNE. 108 monochromes, 18 color plates. $3. THE IMPRESSIONISTS. 103 monochromes, 14 color plates. $3. GOYA'S THE DISASTERS OF THE WAR. 85 plates. $1.50. Vienna: The Phaidon Press. Oxford University Press.

INTO the American book market there recently has come a remarkable series of handsome and inexpensive art books varying in size between fourteen by ten and three-quarter inches and eleven by seven and a half inches. They are the products of the Phaidon Press. The great majority of their photogravures in color and in monochrome convey to a surprising degree the bloom of the paintings and the drawings they represent. Most of the monochromes are richly inked and deep in tone and amazingly expressive of the gradations in hues of the originals. Many of the color plates give one the illusion of actual paintings. Of the eleven titles of the series, only Goya's "The Disasters of the War" is somewhat disappointing. But this volume is the least expensive of all these beautiful and inexpensive books. Of the color photogravures, only those in the "Titian" make one slightly conscious in a disagreeable sense of the process involved in their production.

A HISTORY of the BUSINESS MAN

By MIRIAM BEARD

"A brilliantly patterned series of biographies presenting the man of business in all the ages; forcefully written and singularly timely. No one has ever 'bowled' a book quite like this. . . ."—New York Times. $5.00

●

LAUGHING ODYSSEY

By EILEEN BIGLAND

Russia from a refreshingly new viewpoint: that of the people of the smaller towns and villages off the beaten track of controlled tours. The author successfully dodges all politics and partisanship. $2.50

●

YOUTH IN THE TOILS

By L. V. HARRISON and PRYOR McN. GRANT

An authoritative, thorough consideration of the delinquency problem in New York and the system for handling it. The authors provide concrete suggestions of what may be done for improvement. $1.50

●

A VISION

By WM. BUTLER YEATS

Published hitherto only in a limited English edition, Mr. Yeats has revised and enlarged this volume giving the esoteric principles from which much of the inspiration of his work was drawn. $3.00

●

at all bookstores

●

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue • New York

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The volumes shine not only by reason of their format and technique. Their contents have been assembled with great and loving care and thoughtfulness; and most of them are valuable pieces of research, and a boon to the serious students of art and all persons moved by the desire for self-education. The three folios, "The Impressionists," "Cézanne," and "Van Gogh," reproduce [illegible] quantity of important paintings and drawings scattered among the multitude of museums and private collections in Europe and America and hence almost inaccessible to the person of ordinary means. The "Rembrandt" is the result of [illegible] scholarly attempt to sift the great Dutchman's oeuvre in the light of the recent inquiries into it and to rid it of the pictures, by pupils and followers, which have been attributed to the master. Since the reproductions are arranged with regard to their subject matter, the broadside of the sixty-two self-portraits which opens the volume supplies an almost matchless autobiographical introduction to Rembrandt's entire work. The "Titian," together with reproductions of all this sumptuous colorist's paintings and drawings, includes close-ups of important details, especially of some of the small, exquisite landscapes which play inconspicuous but important roles in so many of his forms.

A most original piece of research is presented by the volume "Art Without Epoch" by Ludwig Goldscheider. With 140 powerful, almost unknown, and in many instances affectingly tragic works from many climes, ages, and civilizations, it reveals [illegible] timeless reality. Its selections from the treasures of the last four thousand years startlingly parallel [illegible] number of works characteristic of our own age, from naturalistic and impressionistic work through expressionistic analyses of form to constructivistic and modern advertising art. They resemble the productions of men as ultramodern as Matisse, Picasso, and Maillol and the craftsmen of the Wiener Werkstätte. All the volumes have good critical prefaces and a few of them quite brilliant ones: in particular the "Van Gogh" and "The Impressionists," which are introduced by Wilhelm Uhde, and the "Cezanne," introduced by Fritz Novotny.

No special idealism, in the sense of [illegible] desire to spread the love of art among great masses of people, in fine "to educate," can be held responsible for this couple of armfuls of handsomely educational picture books. To all appearances they are the consequence of a shrewd though modest mercantile exploitation, on the part of a Viennese publisher named Horowitz and his associates of the Phaidon Press, of the improved photogravure process. Yet this very circumstance renders their existence doubly delightful. It points—as do so many similar phenomena—to the persistence of [illegible] great historical movement which has been one of the civilizing, liberating factors of the last 150 years of Western life. This is the impetus to self-education: one which bears little relation to that of the person who, assuming a recumbent attitude before lecturers or the radio, permits what is styled "culture" to be pumped into him. On the contrary, it is active, aggressive, and something besides the urge to acquire knowledge—even the knowledge of "the best that has been thought and said in the world." It is the strong, almost unconscious determination toward the development of spiritual gifts and powers by experience in connection with the great true works and things which help develop them, and a motive which for the reason that its object is neither money nor social position, pleasures or power, tends to make men free. Widely manifest at the close of the eighteenth century—particularly in the Teutonic countries, where some unusually vigorous predisposition to it may have existed—and symbolized by

A selected list of

BOOKS ABOUT THE SOUTH

The Collapse of Cotton Tenancy

By C. S. Johnson, Edwin R. Embree, and W. W. Alexander ". . . probably the most scathing indictment of the cotton tenant and cropper system that has ever been printed under such respectable auspices . . . its bill of particulars is so well supported by graphically presented evidence that the total impression it leaves with the reader is calculated not only [illegible] convince, but [illegible] arouse sympathy and indignation."—The Texas Weekly. 5½" x 8½". 81 pp. $.35

Southern Regions

By Howard W. Odum ". . . an amazing assemblage of facts on every aspect of Southern life; yet instead of causing the reader bewilderment, the catalogues, maps, charts, and data hold him with a fascination which rapidly transforms mere scholarly interest into personal enthusiasm. Better than any poem or novel could do, this book convinces one that there are still worlds in America to conquer." —The North Carolina Historical Review. 7" x 10". 664 pp. $4.00

Human Geography of the South

By Rupert B. Vance "Describes the soil, topography, climate, and historical background of the South as well as the diet and the diseases peculiar to this region and the relation of all these factors to human life in the South."—The American Historical Review. 5½" [illegible] 8½". 596 pp. $2.50

Culture in the South

Edited by W. T. Couch ". . . thirty-one essays, representing as many authors . . . the most comprehensive portrayal of contemporary civilization in this section to be found anywhere between the covers of a single volume. Embraced . . . [illegible] such salient topics as agriculture; industry and industrial workers; politics and religion; journalism, magazines, and literature; the fine arts and handicrafts; social classes and social legislation; towns and cities; folksongs and folklore; speech and humor; and education, both lower and higher . . . a fine book, highly intelligent, and invaluable to anyone who would know the South."—The Journal of Southern History. 6¼" [illegible] 9¼". 720 pp. $4.00

The South Looks at Its Past

By B. B. Kendrick and A. M. Arnett ". . . it would be difficult to find a more satisfactory introduction to the study of Southern history than is here presented."—The Herald Tribune "Books." 5½" [illegible] 8". 196 pp. $2.00.

The Wasted Land

By Gerald Johnson ". . . should be compulsory reading for everybody south of the Potomac and Ohio who can read, and the illiterates should have it read to them."—The Knoxville Journal. 5½" x 8". 110 pp. $1.50.

Homicide in the United States

By H. C. Brearley Recommended along with Arthur Raper's Tragedy of Lynching ($2.50) and Mr. Brearley's chapter "The Pattern of Violence" in Culture in the South as required reading for Southern Senators. This book would have provided interesting and pertinent reading matter for Senators during recent weeks. The highest rates of homicide are not in Chicago. 5½" [illegible] 8½". 249 pp. $2.50

90° in the Shade

By Clarence Cason "Unpretentious, allusive, civilized, [illegible] of the most intelligent books that have [illegible] out of the South."—Herald Tribune Books. 32 halftone illustrations by J. Edward Rice. 5½" x 8½". 186 pp. $1.00

Stories of the South

Edited by Addison Hibbard "Twenty-seven corking good stories chosen from the vast field of Southern short story literature by [illegible] one who knows how to pick them."—The Savannah News. 5½" [illegible] 8½". 540 pp. $1.00

Write for our complete descriptive catalog.

THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS • CHAPEL HILL

★ Sweeping the Country! ★

THE Folklore OF Capitalism

By THURMAN W. ARNOLD

author of THE SYMBOLS OF GOVERNMENT

●

The new best seller everyone is discussing. "Personally, I think Mr. Arnold has his fingers on something miles ahead of Marx—in maturity, acceptability and, especially, present usefulness." —Fred Rodell in The New Republic.

Get your copy today
6th large printing

YALE

$3.00
AT ALL BOOKSTORES

Seven Soviet Arts

By KURT LONDON

The first attempt by a qualified and well-informed critic to give a true account of what is happening to the arts in Russia. The author bases his review upon first hand information procured during a recent trip to Russia. Illustrated. $4.00

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS New Haven, Conn.

One of the Best Reviewed Books of the Year!

FOUR WAYS OF PHILOSOPHY

By IRWIN EDMAN

Author of The Mind of Paul, Richard Kane Looks at Life, etc.

THE NATION: "A brilliant interpretative study. . . . The intelligent layman will have to go far to find a comparable introduction to the systems of thought whose vital nerves are here so deftly laid bare."—Sidney Hook.

NEW REPUBLIC: "He is one of those rarities, a schoolman who writes for the worldly reader . . . relates philosophy to the rest of life, and yet does not offer the pre-digested pap with which the victims of philosophy courses are so frequently served."—Eliseo Vivas.

SATURDAY REVIEW: "Golden words from a thoroughly contemporary oracle on the ultimate themes of human life and destiny."—Harold A. Larrabee.

DOROTHY CANFIELD: "Not to be missed by anyone of mature intelligence."—Book-of-the-Month Club News.

331 pages, $2.00 at all bookstores

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY
257 Fourth Ave., New York

Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister," this impulse subsequently showed itself in all the Western lands and the United States; and, maintaining itself though the earthquakes of our civilization, continues to prompt educational institutions and museums to nourish it.

It is plainly visible among the causes underpinning these art books, and not alone in the circumstance that they address themselves to persons of very moderate means who wish to come into relation with what exists in Rembrandt's play of light and Titian's solemn color. It is, to begin with, visible in the circumstance that these books respond to a contemporary need. Horowitz began publishing in connection with the educational program of the Viennese Socialists, and thereby grew aware, as did so many other Germanic publishers, of the desire among the working classes for good editions of good books, including "Das Kapital"; and began experimenting with the means at his disposal toward the end of filling and profiting by this need. Again, one sees it in the quality of his press's response to this situation: in the almost gratuitous fineness of his cheap editions and the love of the magnificent subjects and the desire evident in their pages to approach them as fully and closely as possible. They make plain the editors' and craftsmen's pleasure in self-education during the very process of working out their problems.

Lastly, one sees the persistence of this impetus in the circumstances of the series' appearance in the English and American markets, with good English translations of their various prefaces; and its ready welcome. There it seems to speak to us of its firm roots among us and of its endurance amid the almost intolerable uncertainties of life.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Pamphleteering Fiction

THE FLIVVER KING. By Upton Sinclair. United Automobile Workers of America. Ford Organizing Committee, New York. 25 cents.

I THINK it was Lewis Gannett who said that "The Flivver King" was a Model T of fiction. But like the Model T it goes. It carries the reader by the shortest route and at a fast clip from the idyllic valley of America before mass-production to the mountain top of finance capital and the belt-line, from the dirt road to the four-lane highway, from the sunny land of opportunity to the forbidding plateau of industrialization, where at least six million are permanently unemployed. Its principal characters are Henry Ford, who proves magnificently that the rugged individual can make good in America, and his workers, who demonstrate conclusively at whose expense he became the richest man in America. It might be described as the history of a great maker of automobiles and of the workers who came out at the little end of the horn.

Pamphleteering fiction being a vehicle with an actual destination and not an end in itself, it does not stop for inner subtleties either of character or motivation. Instead it makes use of ready-made character and motivation and it depends for its conviction on the reader's general knowledge of the facts and characters involved rather than on the writer's capacity for creation. In general this is true of "The Flivver King," but because of his special knowledge of Ford, Sinclair has given us news about him, and because he understands, out of his own experience and personality, the crusading yet practical, individualistic elements in Ford's nature, he makes of him far more than a mere symbol and succeeds to a certain extent in creating a character.

BURLINGAME
PU

What Sinclair mainly creates in all his books, however, is not literature but a weapon. And since that is his intention he is not required to pass an artistic examination, though this is not to say that a weapon that was also literature would not be a better weapon—therein lies the difference between "The Flivver King" and, say, "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Mr. Sinclair uses a simple technique. He traces the history of Ford and of a family of Ford workers, represented in the last of three generations by a union organizer. At the end, the shifting, section by section, from the one to the other becomes so mechanical that interest flags, but in general the material with which he is dealing is so rich that its bare recital sets up in the reader's mind overtones of implication and association—such as one might experience in reading a synopsis of one's own life—that give the story a scope and momentum which it does not in itself, as a piece of writing, possess. It cannot fail to stir the imagination of the average automobile worker, whose life and problems it invokes; its simple and direct telling holds no difficulties even for the thousands of uneducated Southern hill-billies who comprise a large section of the United Automobile Workers and whose fresh pre-industrial spirit has made it one of the most lively and forward unions in the labor movement; and yet there is no suggestion of writing down.

It seems almost irrelevant to say that "The Flivver King" will not outlive its immediate uses, that it lacks the invisible dimension of a work of art, and that better books will be written about the rise of Henry Ford. It is a Model T, but its immediate uses are relevant and important. It is designed to be a handle with which automobile workers may obtain a grasp of the industry they live in and, more particularly, a weapon for unionizing the Ford empire. The U. A. W. undertook to sell 200,000 copies, and there is already talk of a new edition—which indicates that it fulfils the specifications and will play a part in the conquest.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Whitmans of Oregon

MARCUS WHITMAN, M. D., PIONEER AND MARTYR. By Clifford Merrill Drury. The Caxton Printers: Caldwell, Idaho. $5.

THIS is a biography of both the Whitmans—Marcus and Narcissa—and the work has been admirably done. Dr. Drury has ransacked all the available sources and has brought to light much new material of value. With balanced judgment he has kept a straight course between the too credulous "Whitman-saved-Oregon" sect and the iconoclasts of the Bourne-Marshall following. Bourne and Marshall rendered a valuable service in deflating a number of myths that had grown up about Whitman, but they carried their campaign so far as to leave him a rather shadowy figure of no particular consequence. The mass of evidence, skilfully handled by the author, restores him to his true place. That his religious zeal was blended with a social or political motive—that increasingly he labored for the settlement of the Oregon country by immigration from the East—is now so firmly established that few dare deny it. What share he had in the "saving" of Oregon no one can definitely say. It is enough to know that the dream for the realization of which he so arduously labored was a dream that came true.

Unhappily he chose the wrong Indians for his flock.

THE PEOPLES
WANT PEACE

By ELIAS TOBENKIN

The author, a distinguished foreign correspondent, has turned himself into a kind of International Inquiring Reporter. Visiting fifteen countries throughout the world, he has talked with the man in the street, the field and the factory, as well as the men in the chancelleries. He reveals facts, carefully kept out of the controlled European press, conclusively demonstrating that the honeymoon is over so far as dictators with war plans are concerned: that concentration camp or no, the peoples don't want war. $2.75

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS 2 W. 45th St., N. Y.

THE WRATH OF THE WARMAKERS

descended upon the head of "Fighting Bob" LaFollette when he opposed this country's entry into the World War in 1917.

TODAY, with war talk growing louder, even in the United States, the Senior LaFollette's words against war are as timely and compelling as ever.

YOU CAN HAVE A COPY FREE of the historic LaFollette senate speech against war with a trial subscription to The Progressive.

THE PROGRESSIVE
LAFOLLETTE'S NATIONAL WEEKLY NEWSPAPER
Regular Subscription Price—$2.00 a year

8 full newspaper size pages of news and comment on the progressive movement in the U. S.—Not a line of paid advertising. — Suppressed news that advertising subsidized newspapers dare not and cannot print.

TRIAL OFFER—20 WEEKS FOR 50c

Send 50c today and receive "Fighting Bob's" famous anti-war speech and this unusual newspaper for 20 weeks.

•

THE PROGRESSIVE Dept. N Madison, Wis.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents the
ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
production of JEAN GIRAUDOUX'S comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., W. of Broadway. Evenings 8:40. Mats. Tues., Washington's Birthday and Sat., 2:40. 300 Seats at $1.10

"One of the best musical shows of the year . . . Witty, Fresh."—Atkinson, Times
"PINS AND NEEDLES"
NEW YORK'S HIT MUSICAL REVUE
LABOR STAGE 39th St. & 6th Ave. BR 9-1163
Evenings 8:40
Matinees Wed. & Saturday 2:40
Prices:
Matinee
55c to $2.20
Evenings
55c to $2.75

RADIO CITY MUSIC HALL
Showplace of the Nation • Rockefeller Center
MARK TWAIN'S Beloved Story of American Life
"THE ADVENTURES OF TOM SAWYER"
Produced by DAVID O. SELZNICK
IN TECHNICOLOR
•
ON THE GREAT STAGE
"COSMOPOLITAN," Russell Markert's kaleidoscopic revue with Music Hall cast and specialties. Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erno Rapee.
First Mezzanine Seats Reserved • Circle 6-4600

Enjoy Special Privileges in RUSSIA
THIS SUMMER
WITH
DR. JEROME DAVIS
Pres., American Federation of Teachers
See, know Russia face to face—15 cities Black Sea to Baltic. Also Poland, Denmark and Sweden. . . . One of Eight Exciting Study Tours in Europe. For complete details
Write to Box J-26
RUSSIAN SEMINAR
The Bureau's 46th Year!
A non-profit Foundation. Every dollar adds enrichment to the satisfactions of travel. . . . .
Ask for Table of 68 Tours.
BUREAU OF UNIVERSITY TRAVEL
NEWTON MASSACHUSETTS

JOURNEYMAN
the novel by Erskine Caldwell
which (in its dramatic version) is arousing a storm of controversy
At all bookstores, $2. VIKING PRESS

Among the Nez Perces his apostolate might have been highly successful. Among the pilfering, fitful, and treacherous Cayuses it was doomed from the beginning. Though both Marcus and Narcissa recognized the increasing danger of their position, they determinedly held on. Marcus, only two days before the massacre, could resignedly say to a friend, "But my death will probably do as much good to Oregon as my life can." These are the true Whitmans here pictured with their faults as well as their virtues—a pair of noble zealots who gave all for a cause. The book is likely to remain the standard single-volume account of their lives.

W. J. GHENT

DRAMA

"Our Town"

"OUR TOWN," Thornton Wilder's new play now current at the Morosco, is not easy to describe. On the surface it is only a few typical days in the life of some typical New England citizens as those days were lived in a typical village of a generation ago. As such it sounds commonplace enough, and so far as action goes that is what it is intended to be. But Mr. Wilder—who seemed to me so precious and so thin in "The Bridge of San Luis Rey"—has brooded over his subject and at last succeeded in communicating a mood as rich and tranquil and satisfying as it is hard to define.

Two attitudes toward the recent past are so familiar that one or the other seems almost inevitable, but the mood of "Our Town" is neither sentimental nor satiric. Here is no easy fun poked at the age of buggies and innocence, but here also is no sentimental overvaluation. Indeed, it is amazing how little Mr. Wilder claims for his villagers, how readily the local editor admits with a shake of the head that there is no "culture" in his town, and how calmly the commentator remarks at the wedding of his chief personages that the result of such unions is interesting "once in a thousand times." There is no tendency to claim for the homely virtues more than their due, no effort to hide the fact that such simple lives are led in ignorance of the heights as well as of the depths of possible human experience.

And if one asks what remains, what is left to feel when one feels neither condescension nor partisan warmth, the answer is simply that the mood of quiet contemplation which Mr. Wilder generates is one which would be hopelessly submerged by any suggestion of either satire or sentimentality. The spectacle of these undistinguished men and women living out their endlessly retold tale fascinates him, I think, not because undistinguished men and women are more admirable than others but because even they are men and women, because even undistinguished lives tease the imagination with a riddle not to be solved and stir it with an emotion not to be analyzed. Satire and sentiment alike are efforts to dispose of the problem by passing a judgment. The still sad music of humanity is most clearly audible when both are rejected.

The last scene of the play takes place in the village cemetery, to which a company of the recently dead welcome a newcomer upon whom the calm of death has not yet descended. Against their advice she returns to live over again one day of the past, but she soon rejoins them, convinced as they are that such attempts are useless. It is impossible to endure association with those who do not know how things are going to end; who, more intolerably still, are not aware of what ought to be the vividness and the poignancy of every moment. In that, I take it, lies the real moral. Only the dead can adequately realize either the wonder or the brevity of life.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

The dramatic method is everywhere unconventional in the extreme. The piece is introduced by a soft-spoken master of ceremonies who remains on the stage throughout the performance to offer occasional comments, and the players act out their roles without benefit of scenery. But while such eccentric devices are commonly used for the purpose of heightening the colors of a play and tend frequently in the direction of the stridently insistent, Mr. Wilder uses them in the interest of a quiet intimacy. It is difficult to see how he could achieve the effect he desires by any other means, and fortune has provided him with a miracle of disarming ease in the performance of Frank Craven as the gentle commentator who bridges every awkward gap and holds the audience continuously under his spell. Without him the play would fall to pieces; with him it seems not so much to develop as to exist in a moment of eternity.

"On Borrowed Time" (Longacre Theater) seems to be competing with "Our Town" for the favor of public and press alike, but despite an admirable performance by Dudley Digges I found it sentimentally whimsical and altogether trying. Apparently there are many to whom the story of a doting grandfather who keeps Death up an apple tree is thoroughly satisfactory symbolism, but I was able to make little sense of it and found no compensating virtues in the humorously tender passages between the little boy and his grandfather. There is a great deal of stress upon the toilet and some considerable emphasis on the various scatalogical preoccupations of childhood, but unlike most members of the audience I am not among those in whom the spectacle of a little boy with his pants down stirs all the tender emotions.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

OUTSTANDING among recent releases is Gamut's album (four ten-inch records, $4.50) of Moussorgsky's songs. If you are not familiar with Moussorgsky's works in this genre and come to them with only Schubert and Brahms—rather than Debussy, or even Wolf—as your previous experience, you will do best to begin with "Pride" and "Ballade" and then go on with the cycle "Sunless" in reverse order, from No. 6 to No. 1. In this way you will go from superb examples of what is usually thought of as a song to equally superb examples of the vocal style very much like recitative that is Moussorgsky's. Also, you will begin by noting the beautiful voice and phrasing of Moshe Rudinov, and will end—especially if you have the music before you and watch the shaping of the recitative—by appreciating his imagination and feeling for the music's every subtlety. He is a rare artist; and it is to be set down against our concert life as at present organized that these records give him his first opportunity to be heard by the general public since he shows you more than tourist sights

THE OPEN ROAD

at least cost of time and money.

EUROPE • MEXICO
• SOVIET UNION •

Small travel groups recruited from the professions—authoritative leaders assisted by cultured native guides—social contact with people of each country.

DENMARK, SWEDEN, NORWAY, under leadership of Prof. Hartley W. Cross. Cities and countryside including Norway's fjords and mountains. Study of cooperatives and folk schools. Sailing July 2, returning August 29.

CENTRAL AND BALKAN EUROPE. Auspices Oneonta State Normal School, N. Y. Vienna, Budapest, Venice, Geneva, Paris plus several weeks of Bulgarian peasant life and art. Sailing July 7, returning August 29.

ITALY, TURKEY, SOVIET UNION AND GERMANY, under leadership of Prof. Goodwin Watson. A contrasting study of the psychology of social change. Sailing June 29, returning September 2.

THE SOVIET UNION, under leadership of Dr. F. Tredwell Smith. Leningrad, Moscow, Volga, Caucasus, Soviet Armenia, Crimea, Kiev, etc. Sailing July 2, returning August 30.

MEXICO, under leadership of Julien Bryan. More than a month in the cities and native villages. Sailing July 7, returning August 17.

For rates and descriptive circulars on these and other trips address:

THE OPEN ROAD

DEP'T. C

8 W. 40th ST.
NEW YORK

NOW you may order

BOOKS

from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C.O.D.

Please address your orders to

The Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 20 Vesey St. • New York

Variety!

MANY-SIDED characters are the most interesting to associate with; and a magazine that discusses many different aspects of the social and political scheme is the most consistently stimulating. See, for instance, a few of the articles scheduled for next week's Nation and for later publication!

Justice Black's striking record since his elevation to the Supreme Court, as evidenced by his tradition-breaking dissents, will be presented by MAX LERNER.

The introductory article of a lively series about the columnists, by MARGARET MARSHALL, will appear next week.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON will continue his correspondence from Washington.

A thorough analysis of Collective Security will be contributed by LOUIS FISCHER.

The Bronx "slave-market" and similarly intolerable conditions elsewhere that have led to the beginnings of unionism for domestic workers will be described by EVELYN SEELEY.

From Europe will come an analysis of German economy, by ALEXANDER VIDAKOVIC.

ELIOT JANEWAY will present the results of his study of the auto industry and the depression, and of the quality of generalship displayed by automotive leaders.

BARBARA WERTHEIM will present a description of the character and methods of the French press that will prove enlightening to many American readers.

*

The principal reason for subscribing to The Nation is that you can't skip an issue without missing something important that appears nowhere else.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5 ☐ two years for $8 ☐ three years for $11 ☐ I inclose my check OR ☐ I will pay upon receipt of your bill.

Name______________________________

Address____________________________

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50¢ 2-19-38

sang in Stokowski's productions of "Les Noces" and "Oedipus Rex."

"Ballade" is also in the Parlophone subscription set repressed here by Decca (six records, $6), along with other songs of Moussorgsky, including the "Songs and Dances of Death." These are not so much sung as snarled and growled through clenched teeth melodramatically by Vladimir Rosing. Like the Gamut set this one is accompanied by a line-by-line transliteration and translation of the Russian texts.

Not only is there the sublimity Tovey speaks of in Schubert's great B-flat Piano Sonata, but the scherzo movement is one of the most ravishing pieces of music ever written, breath-taking in the rapid succession of its Schubertian miracles. As for the sublimity, the word carries with it a connotation of calm, but Ernst Victor Wolff's playing in the Columbia set (four records, $6) is nervous, over-intense, mannered. The performance of Beethoven's A-major Sonata for 'Cello and Piano that Emanuel Feuermann and Myra Hess have recorded for Columbia (three records, $5) is very beautiful; the older Casals-Schulhoff performance is, however, more dynamic and I like it better for that. On the fourth side of a Columbia two-record set ($3.25) is a fine performance of the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" by Beecham with the London Philharmonic; the other three sides are given to Brahms's "Tragic" Overture, also very well played.

Among the single records of Victor's special list Chaliapin's of the Monologue and Clock Scene from "Boris Godounov" ($2) takes first place, as any record of any part of his Boris must, particularly if it was made when his voice was still adequate to his purpose. In addition there is beautiful singing by Hüsch in Händel's "Dank sei Dir, Herr" and an aria from his "Julius Caesar" ($1.50); by Helge Roswaenge in Strauss's "Freundliche Vision" and "Ach, Lieb', ich muss nun scheiden" ($1.50); and by Ina Souez in "Ernani, involami" ($2). As for Victor's January list, it is headed by Toscanini's recording of the Overture to "Semiramide" (two records, $4.50), which is beyond anything I have ever heard in recorded orchestral performance. Then there is a fine performance by the Kolisch Quartet of Mozart's Quartet K. 589, which is not one of the most impressive of Mozart's works but also not one of the least (three records, $6.50). And finally three Bach Sonatas for Flute and Harpsichord (four records, $8), with beautiful flute-playing by Georges Barrère and less emphatic playing than usual by Yella Pessl, but with one exception—the Sonata No. 2 on the third record—dull music to my ears.

Timely has issued a single record ($2) of some agreeable music for lute and strings by John Dowland, played by Suzanne Bloch and the New York Simfonietta under Max Goberman.

In reply to recent questions I recommend (1) a record-changing mechanism—the Garrard, playing both sizes of records in one series for $59.50, or only one size at a time for $47.50, and to be had from the Garrard Sales Corporation, 17 Warren Street, New York; and (2) a needle—the Universal, the best of non-metallic semi-permanent needles in shape and durability, with a reproductive power approximating most closely to steel and falling short of it only by enough to reduce the harshness of present-day recording, and to be had from the Center Music Store, 1242 Sixth Avenue, New York. If however you prefer steel, the shape of the Victor half-tone shadowgraphed needle makes it superior to the Acton that I recommended last year.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

It Wouldn't Work

Dear Sirs: In the editorial entitled Wanted: Three-Year Plan in The Nation of January 15, you recommend to the government a plan for putting into effect the expressed wish of the President to raise our annual national income from 68 billion to 100 billion dollars. You say: "It would be far better to start with an estimate of national income and an estimate of potential consumption for the products of each basic industry based on that national income. Each industry . . . could then produce for an expanded market; and in the very process of doing so it would create the employment and purchasing capacity that would constitute such an expanded market." I wish to point out that "the very process" (of stepping up production) would not produce the "purchasing capacity" for buying back the goods thus produced.

It is a fallacy, and one that is dangerous and widespread, to assume that when ten men, or ten thousand men, are put to work in productive industry they will create a market which will absorb what they produce. It is a well-known fact that their wages and salaries will buy back only a portion of what they produce. The surplus is what makes all the trouble, and brings on depression. Your plan of expansion would simply aggravate the disease.

The government could not carry out this plan even if it wished to, for it has no power to fix and enforce production schedules.

WILLIAM RAOUL

Navesink, N. J., January 31

[Mr. Raoul raises two objections to our proposal. The first is economic, the second constitutional. We do not quarrel with his "well-known fact" that the wage outlay in any single industry will not in itself create a market for its goods. We have always objected to piecemeal attempts to solve the problems of an industry by increasing the wages and prices in it. The big trouble with such a procedure, however, is not the one Mr. Raoul points out. It is rather that since only one industry is dealt with at a time, and reemployment is not created in the rest of the industrial structure, the industry is trying to produce more for a market that remains essentially the same. If, however, reemployment were created in every industry more or less simultaneously, the general level of purchasing power would be raised for all products, and a demand would be created not only for the finished products but for the raw and half-finished materials along the way. This is the heart of the argument for a planned economy. As for the constitutional objections, Mr. Raoul will do well to remember that if the Supreme Court follows John Marshall's conception of the scope of national powers, economic planning may easily pass muster as part of the Congressional function. Whether we shall have a court liberal enough to follow such an old Federalist as Marshall is another question.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Chicago Cares a Little

Dear Sirs: Milton Mayer's Chicago Doesn't Care in The Nation of February 5 is a good job on a big subject, but some of its statements seem unjustified. I feel Mr. Mayer left the rails at the following points:

1. When he says, "Chicago won't get reform, because it doesn't want it. There isn't a citizens' organization in town." And when he dismisses the Labor Party as a paper organization and Labor's Non-Partisan League as without friends. Finally, when he writes, "The reform movement in Chicago consists of serious groups of little thinkers sitting around" talking about New York.

If Mr. Mayer meant that these groups will not swing the next election, he's right, but his language isn't accurate. The Labor Party and Labor's Non-Partisan League have fair prospects of developing strength quickly; at present, they are well away from a paper basis. As to reform groups, the record shows they won a big battle for permanent registration in 1936; this took more than sitting and talking. The drive for a city manager and the P. R. system of voting has substantial support, with 200,000 Chicagoans backing the movement in such organizations as the Illinois League of Women Voters and the Chicago City Manager Committee.

2. Mr. Mayer is unfair in making the Civic Federation appear wholly reactionary and in comparing it with the New York committee which approved Tweed's bookkeeping. The federation proposed a state income tax as lately as 1933, has urged a separate personalty tax after amendment of the Illinois constitution, and has indorsed the present effort to assess personal property. It has perennially denounced city accountings, and last month issued a blast about the books of the Board of Education.

ROBERT E. ACKERBERG, JR.

Chicago, February 9

Testimony from the Fo'c'sle

Dear Sirs: As one who has been to sea in a fo'c'sle rather than a steamer chair, I was much interested in the recent denunciations of seamen made to the Senate Commerce Committee's subcommittee on maritime labor conditions. In the light of my sea experience, the most significant thing anent the testimony has been overlooked. That is that all the criticism has been of men working in passenger vessels.

I have worked on passenger ships and freighters. The differences between the men employed on them are enormous. Those I met on the freighters, tankers, and transports would take a job on a passenger ship only as an absolutely last resort. Because I have worked on a passenger ship to the Orient, the President Pierce, I believe it is possible that some of the charges placed against the personnel of the President Hoover after she ran aground are true. Out of the dozen of us in the wipers' fo'c'sle of the Pierce, two were graduates of a Honolulu reform school, one had been cashiered from the Marine Corps, and one we took on at Manila had just been released from jail after serving sentence for opium smuggling.

But it only took one trip on that ship to learn why such men were there. The Pierce was my second ship and a decided shock after the six months I spent on my first, the Utacarbon, which paid higher than average wages and provided good, clean quarters and decent working conditions. The crew's quarters of the Pierce would have made a brute out of the Savior. The fo'c'sles were small rooms crowded with as many narrow bunks as possible. Ventilation was by means of the customary portholes, but, since fo'c'sles are on a deck just slightly above water level, they had to be "dogged," or closed, whenever the weather was at all rough.

There were approximately thirty-five men in the wipers and firemen section of the "black gang" on that ship, and our bathroom contained two toilets, one shower, and two washstands. If you got tired of waiting for a chance at the shower after coming off watch, you could take a bath in a bucket of water, as every sailor has learned to do.

As for the food, you had to force yourself to eat it after eight hours of hard manual labor. The oranges and apples of the weekly fruit ration were invariably half spoiled. The nearest my thoughts ever came to mutiny was when I saw crates of oranges from the passengers' supplies, which had been allowed to spoil, being thrown overboard as we neared San Francisco. The soup was water with a few shreds of vegetables floating in it, and—this is no sailing-ship yarn—we had to brush weevils off the crackers that were served with it.

To judge the entire merchant marine by the passenger ships, however, would be utter folly. It also strikes me as folly to aim programs for correcting the present conditions, such as Joseph P. Kennedy's three-point plan, at the men. I am convinced that the ship owners are to blame for most of the present evils. They have gone on for years enlarging cargo space and improving passenger accommodations, while doing their best to keep the men in the same all-around conditions as sailors had in 1850.

JACK Y. QUAYLE, JR.
Washington, February 10

Let the Public Be Served

Dear Sirs: Your editorial Does the Boycott Hurt American Labor? in your issue of February 5 was splendid. I cannot help commenting on the statement of the National Association of Hosiery Manufacturers quoted by Professor Eugene Staley—"We are prepared to furnish the American public with whatever they desire in the line of hosiery." As the late President Woodrow Wilson once said, "Business was made for society, not society for business." It is the function of manufacturers to make what the public wants and not make the public want what they deem it wise for the public to want. It seems to me that if business in general would wake up to that fundamental fact a lot of worries would be over.

H. J. FULLER
Milford, Conn., February 8

Correcting an Error

Dear Sirs: I want to acknowledge with thanks your generous offer of an apology in print for publishing an unfounded attack of a certain Mr. Brody against me. In a letter to the editors, published in The Nation of February 12 under the heading Visas for Liberals, he said: "Also the Misses Suzanne La Follette and Anita Brenner, who have raged in the columns of The Nation against the bourgeois Loyalist government for shadowboxing with Franco instead of immediately establishing communism in Spain." You assure me that by the simple method of going through your own files it was easy to establish the falsehood of this severe accusation. Though I am convinced that every unbiased reader of Mr. Brody's letter recognized his statement as slander at the first glance, I thank you nevertheless for having taken the trouble to check up. I am satisfied. I shall be more so if you will follow in future a sound principle of editorial efficiency: check before printing.

May I add for the sake of the record that I have nowhere done what Mr. Brody's crank letter accused me of doing. On the other hand I collected a considerable amount of money for The Nation's Food Ship for Loyalist Spain.

SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE
New York, February 12

[While the editors do not accept responsibility for the interpretations of those whose letters they print, they wish to express their regret over an error of fact in Mr. Brody's statement. In justice to Miss La Follette they are glad to point out that she has not written anything on the subject of the Spanish war in the columns of The Nation. The editors regard the letter section as a battleground for their readers, and in consequence subject those pages to less of that checking process which they intensively apply elsewhere in the magazine and which they are proud to agree with Miss La Follette is a "sound principle of editorial efficiency."]

Texas Labor History

Dear Sirs: Professor Ruth A. Allen of the Department of Economics, University of Texas, is gathering material for a history of the labor movement in Texas and would like very much to hear from anyone having information about the Southwest Railway Strike of 1886 under the Knights of Labor, or about Martin Irons, one of the leaders of the strike. Any material lent for copying and examination will be promptly returned. It should be addressed to P. O. Box 1695, University Station, Austin, Texas.

BEN L. OWENS
Austin, Texas, January 26

CONTRIBUTORS

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a well-known Washington correspondent.

JOHN GUNTHER, author of "Inside Europe" is making a trip around the world, gathering material for articles and a book.

LEO HUBERMAN is the author of "Man's Worldly Goods. The Story of the Wealth of Nations" and "The Labor Spy Racket, and is in the Social Science Department of New College.

GEORGE S. KAUFMAN is the co-author of the Pulitzer prize play "You Can't Take It With You."

T K. WHIPPLE is the author of a book of criticism entitled "Spokesman."

BEN BELITT teaches poetry at Bennington College.

H. B. MALLALIEU is a young English poet.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, dramatic editor of Time, is the editor of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany."

FRANZ HOELLERING was editor of the Berliner Zeitung until forced to take refuge in America.

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.

HARRY LEVIN is a member of the Society of Fellows at Harvard University.

ELISEO VIVAS is a member of the Department of Philosophy of the University of Wisconsin.

PAUL ROSENFELD, author of "By Way of Art," is a well-known critic of modern painting.

W. J. GHENT is the author of "The Road to Oregon" and "The Early Far West."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.
APR
MAR

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 26, 1938 NUMBER 9

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 229
EDITORIALS:
SURRENDER IN VIENNA 232
RECESSION AND RELIEF 232
FRANCO'S CONQUEST OF THE ATLANTIC 233
KENNEDY VS. THE C. I. O. 234
AUSTRIA—LAST CHAPTER by Ludwig Lore 235
FARM AID: FOURTH PHASE by Mordecai Ezekiel 236
THE ROAD TO PEACE by Louis Fischer 238
ADRIEN ARCAND, FASCIST—AN INTERVIEW By David Martin 241
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 245
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
COLUMNISTS ON PARADE by Margaret Marshall 246
THE REVISED COMMUNIST FAITH By Reinhold Niebuhr 247
DEFOE—MAN OF THE PEOPLE By Donald A. Roberts 250
THE BUSINESS LIBERAL by R. K. Lamb 250
GUIDE TO RELIEF by Marquis W. Childs 251
OXONIANS IN THE DEPRESSION By Eda Lou Walton 252
DRAMA: MORE ROPE AND LESS SAUCE By Joseph Wood Krutch 253
FILMS: SERIAL SENTIMENT by Mark Van Doren 254

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor
MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
*
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

HITLER'S SPEECH GAVE NO INDICATION of where the lightning of Nazi fury would strike next, but made it abundantly clear that in the Führer's mind the Austrian coup was only a step in an unending war against democracy. He denounced the League, the Spanish government, China, the Soviet Union, England, and France. His wrath exceeded all bounds in castigating the free press of the democracies which dared to present him in an unfavorable light. He was warm in his praise of his fascist allies—Franco, Italy, Japan—and of his new province, Austria. In all of this there was little that was new; nothing that was unexpected. Yet, paradoxically, it was the most alarming of Hitler's speeches, for it revealed unmistakably that, far from satisfying his ambitions, his recent victories over the army and Schuschnigg have rendered him more determined than ever to obtain mastery over Europe and more confident that he can do so. While his reference to Czecho-Slovakia was oblique, the inference was unmistakable. And as if in answer to Chamberlain and Halifax, he indicated that Germany could not be bought off, on colonies or on any other issue. The Reich is now committed openly and irrevocably to a program of power politics in alliance with Italy and Japan. And, by implication, the world is told that the only argument Germany will heed is one backed up by superior force.

*

ALTHOUGH EDEN'S RESIGNATION IS BEING hailed in Rome and Berlin as a major triumph for fascism, it may be of immense value in dramatizing the fundamental choice that lies before Britain and the other democracies. Eden, as a representative of the younger generation, has stood unwaveringly for a new concept in international relations—the establishment of an effective system of international law based on collective responsibility. He has held that concessions to aggressors and potential aggressors would destroy the foundations of such a system. The dominant faction of the British Cabinet, on the other hand, has tried rather clumsily to play the dangerous game of power politics, seeking to curry favor with whatever country or group of countries seemed likely to attain a position of dominance in Europe. As Foreign Secretary in the Chamberlain Cabinet, Eden was a virtual prisoner of the group which wished to make terms with Hitler and Mussolini. Outside the Cabinet he may not have any immediate influence on foreign policy, but he will automatically become the leader of a powerful opposition—an opposition which was shown by the peace ballot to represent a majority of the British people.

✢

PRICES ARE TOO LOW, PRICES ARE TOO HIGH: both these cries have recently been heard, and both have come from the Administration. The report of the President's committee on prices last week indicates that both may be true. Foodstuff prices have been falling too fast, while prices in the basic mass-production industries have in many instances remained rigid. The actual fact is, as the committee recognizes, that a healthy economic system depends upon a balanced relation between the prices of various commodity groups, as well as on the general price level. The committee's report is welcome because it serves once more to emphasize that rigid prices in the industries where prices are in effect set by the big corporations have served to retard recovery and intensify the depression. Steel and cement prices, for example, are still far too high; automobile prices have been coming down through a voluntary ukase of the auto magnates, and as a result there are signs of reemployment among the automobile manufacturers and the auto-parts companies. Other prices, the committee tells us, are not high enough. This sounds plausible, but we await a bill of particulars. Perhaps Mr. Roosevelt fears to be specific about high and low prices because if he mentions names he runs the risk of bringing down the heavy battalions of big business. But the concerted attack on the problem of price policy must be removed from the region of generalities. We doubt that it is a prelude to an inflationary drive. Rather it seems to us a promising opening wedge for that planning of price and production policies in the key industries which we have been advocating, and which alone can bring reemployment and lift the national income.

✢

SENATOR O'MAHONEY HAS CHANGED HIS bill intended to regulate certain activities of corporations in interstate business by means of a federal licensing system. On the whole the changes are in the wrong direction. The exemption of corporations of less than $100,000 means the exemption of many of the centers of infection so far as child labor is concerned. The vesting of the power to revoke licenses solely in the courts will make the proposed measure as cumbersome and ineffective as the anti-trust laws; what is needed is administrative action. The dropping of provisions for labor standards is similarly unwise. Nevertheless the measure, even with these changes, probably dictated by business pressure, is better than no measure at all. The bill seeks to wipe out child labor, grant equality of wages and working conditions to women performing the same jobs as men, regulate trade practices, and fight monopoly. The first two of these objectives have never been attempted by federal agencies, and their inclusion gives the O'Mahoney-Borah measure its principal value. We indorse it for whatever effectiveness it may carry. But its advocacy and passage should not preclude continued efforts for the child-labor amendment, for a wage-hour bill, and for vigorous measures to deal with holding-company control of business.

✢

TO MODIFY THE GOLD-STERILIZATION POLICY so that the first $100,000,000 in gold imported in any quarter will not be segregated is a meaningless gesture as far as practical effects are concerned. It will be recalled that $300,000,000 of "sterilized" gold was liberated early in September without affecting the deflationary cycle which was just beginning to get under way. While the "desterilized" gold is available, in theory, as a basis for a credit expansion of approximately ten times its value, the existence of $1,360,000,000 in excess reserves indicates that there is already an abundant supply of credit available. The Treasury's action may be interpreted either as a new effort in the direction of a controlled economy or as an abandonment of the whole sterilization program. If the former, it is without value; but if the latter, it is distinctly encouraging. For while the sterilization did not affect the American price level one way or the other, it undoubtedly led to the accumulation of unneeded gold and had an adverse effect on prices and monetary stability abroad. The recent French financial difficulties can be traced, in part at least, to the continuous and unhealthy flow of gold to this country which was accentuated by our sterilization policy. If the Administration is determined on a "managed" monetary system, the least it can do is to allow gold to flow out to strengthen the countries less fortunate financially.

✢

THE JAPANESE THREAT TO CHENGCHOW, grave a week ago as a result of the collapse of the former Manchurian troops, appears to have been at least temporarily lifted by the success of the Eighth Route Army in cutting the Peiping-Hankow Railway in the rear of the invaders. Only one train is reported to have got through in a week between Paotingfu and Peiping, while farther south between Paotingfu and Shihchiachuang the former red army is said to control a seventy-five mile stretch of this vital artery of communication. To the north, in Shansi, Communist troops are gradually reconquering the province against the weakened Japanese forces. To the east, around the strategic junction at Suchow, Kwangsi troops under Li Tsung-jen have held the main Japanese army virtually stationary for two months. Although the main Chinese armies defending the Lunghai Railway are still in some danger of being cut off by a sudden southward drive along the Peiping-Hankow Railway, the offensive power of the Japanese seems definitely to be on the wane. Chinese morale is higher than at any time since the first weeks in Shanghai. After seven and a half months of undeclared war Japan finds itself with less territory than most foreign military observers expected it to win in the first three months. And every week that the struggle is protracted adds to Japan's difficulties in obtaining essential war materials. Its own trade figures for December indicate that imports were 15 per cent less than for the corresponding period of last year, a drop necessitated by the decline of almost 50 per cent in silk exports.

✶

A MOVE TO REORGANIZE THE GOVERNMENT is bound to meet suspicion and hostility with the country in a state of jitters over concentrating power in the President's hands. Mr. Roosevelt first proposed such a reorganization a little over a year ago. At that time we objected mainly to the provision for redistributing the quasi-judicial independent agencies and putting them under the roofs of various Cabinet officers. That item of the plan was a triumph of blueprints over governmental sense. We are happy that the revised Byrnes bill, now coming up for Senate discussion, specifically exempts these agencies. The other features of the new bill would distinctly improve the efficiency of the national government. Congress is given a check on any regroupings the President may make. A new Department of Public Welfare is created. The President is given six new administrative assistants. The Civil Service Commission is replaced by a Civil Service Administrator, appointed for fifteen years. The Comptroller General is replaced by an Auditor General, responsible to Congress and the President. A permanent agency is set up, to be known as the National Resources Planning Board, under which some of the newly emerging functions of national planning may be carried on. Opposition to these changes is already beginning to be heard. Amos Pinchot has written another of his interminable open letters to the President; Frank E. Gannett, as head of the National Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government, has launched a campaign against the plan. Unfortunately for these gentlemen, there is very little in what they call the "third crisis" of the nation which will give this fight of theirs the popular appeal that their court crusade had. The Byrnes bill in its present form is a sane and effective step toward streamlining the executive branch of the government to aid in making it capable of resisting the pressures of a frantic world.

✶

IN OPPOSING A REOPENING OF WAR-DEBT discussions, Congressional leaders acted more wisely than they realized. While it is impossible to doubt the sincerity of the Administration in desiring to see this troublesome issue settled for all time, more is actually to be lost than gained from such a settlement, assuming that it could be achieved. Any resumption of payments large enough to be consequential would impose fresh burdens on the sensitive world economy and accentuate the current recession. And unless the settlement were substantial, which is out of the question, opponents of the Administration would be quick to take advantage of the "sell-out" to the European debtors. At present the debts are canceled for all practical purposes. It is to the advantage of both the debtors and the United States to allow them to remain so. If the Johnson Act stands in the way of world recovery—as it doubtless does—the most intelligent step would be to repeal the act on that ground rather than become involved in a futile and dangerous effort to revive the corpse of an issue which, as it was, lived beyond its day.

✶

WAR, OF COURSE, IS HELL, BUT IF WE MUST fight again, let's make everyone—including the wealthy—show more school spirit. Behind such cheerful camouflage, the Hill-Sheppard bill, designed to establish a war-time dictatorship in the United States, is once more being pushed. It was shelved a year ago after widespread protest; now, in the midst of a big-navy program, the bill's sponsors hope to find the atmosphere more congenial. The press continues to label it a "war profits" measure, ignoring the fact that it has virtually no bearing upon the status of war profits. What the bill does outline, with some mild concessions to public sensitivity, is the War Department's program for M-Day. It lays down the rules under which patriotic Americans will behave—or else—when the shooting starts. It intrusts to the President controls over our economic and civil life, from price-fixing to press censorship, which will stir envy from Rome to Jersey City. Scarcely less odious is the bill sponsored by Congressman May, which similarly promises to "equalize the burden" but neglects to indicate how that will be accomplished. In all these measures the fine hand of the War Department may be detected. Their reappearance with White House sanction is further evidence of the growing cynicism in our foreign policy. They are the domestic expression of a "big-stick" program. We sympathize with efforts to provide equal distribution of war-time suffering. But neither these nor probably any other measures will do just that. While wars are fought for profit, "dollar-a-year men" are not to be taken seriously.

✶

SINCLAIR LEWIS, AFTER SPENDING YEARS on his feet attacking the old fogies of American literature, has sat down—in Chair 17 of the American Academy of Arts and Letters. Only a few years ago he said the academy represented not American letters today but Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. He has now accepted its invitation in a letter which sounds like an early Lewis burlesque of the letter of an author accepting a chair in the American Academy of Arts and Letters: " . . . it has not been until today that I could write you to express my feelings of honor at being elected . . . and my pleasure in accepting it." Mr. Lewis has for some time now been indicating a belief that Sauk Center after all knows best. In his last book he took a house in Main Street and defended it against young upstarts whom he pictured as brainless reds. His acceptance of Chair 17 makes his position secure. He has made his peace with Babbitt and if you don't like it you can go back where you came from.

Surrender in Vienna

IN THE agreement for the "coordination" of Austria Hitler has won his first major victory on foreign soil with an ease that bodes ill for the future. For years proponents of democracy have been telling themselves that it was impossible to check Hitler's high-handed methods as long as they were applied within the borders of the Reich, but that the minute he reached out for foreign territory—such as Austria, Memel, or Czechoslovakia—he would be brought up short by international action. Hitler himself doubtless feared this, for he has moved with unusual circumspection. But by playing his hand skilfully he has achieved the ambition of every German statesman in recent years—Anschluss with Austria. And he has done so without serious risk of war.

His tactics were essentially those which he has used so successfully in the past, both in domestic affairs and in casting off the restrictions imposed at Versailles. After careful preparation backed by overwhelming force of arms, Hitler struck with bewildering speed, and presented his opponents with a fait accompli. While the intimidation of a minor power by display of arms can scarcely be construed as other than a violation of international law, Hitler very skilfully refrained from overt illegal action.

Without doubt the success of the Austrian adventure will strengthen the myth that fascism is irresistible. It will be said, with much truth, that the democracies have shown once again that they are unable to cope with a determined dictatorship in the international arena. Seven years ago, when the Social Democratic government of Germany proposed a customs union with the Social Democratic government of Austria, the project was thwarted by the vigorous opposition of Italy and France and, to a lesser extent, Great Britain. Today when a vastly more dangerous type of union is consummated at the point of the bayonet by a dictator in Germany, both Britain and France hasten to indicate their lack of concern over the turn of events. There is even a suspicion that the coup was engineered at the suggestion of the dominant faction in the British government.

France professes to find comfort in the fact that the Nazi gains in Austria were primarily at the expense of Italy. Certainly no basic change has occurred in the line-up of European powers. Austria has long been completely under the dominance of the fascist bloc, the difference being that Mussolini heretofore held the whip hand. Yet it is obvious that the Duce has not surrendered his position in Austria without compensation. While it is not clear what price has been exacted, it may be assumed that it is substantial. The only concession which Mussolini would be likely to consider of sufficient importance to offset the loss of Austria is either an iron-clad military alliance between Germany and Italy or the promise of substantial aid to the Spanish insurgents. Either would seriously jeopardize peace in Europe; which is further endangered by the strengthening of the extremist element in Germany. There can be no doubt that the army opposed the Austrian adventure, as it did the Spanish campaign. But whereas caution prevailed in the case of Spain, the recent purge of the army and the triumph in Austria have greatly enhanced the power and prestige of the Nazi fanatics. It is highly possible that the next coup, which will presumably occur in Czechoslovakia, will not be executed with the finesse that has characterized the present one.

NEMESIS RESTAURANT.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

In fact, about the only comfort that believers in democracy can derive from the present situation is the hope that the Nazi extremists will be led to overplay their hand. Undoubtedly there will be a reaction. Already there are indications of sporadic opposition within Austria which might conceivably broaden into something approaching mass resistance. It is at least possible that the Nazis may go to extremes that will dampen the enthusiasm of the pro-German faction in the Chamberlain government.

It must be admitted, however, that hope of action by the democracies is slight, owing to the apparent lack of any realization that the fascist bluff must be called soon if at all. For in failing to take a stand against fascist aggression while they have overwhelming military preponderance, the democracies are not only making a world war inevitable, but are endangering their chances of victory when it comes.

Recession and Relief

THE late lamented recovery is only a memory in the public mind—except in the matter of relief. In that field the recovery psychology persists in spite of the unemployment census, which showed from 7,500,000 to 10,500,000 out of work in mid-November (the number has greatly increased since then) and in spite of the easily available evidence that the total relief need is uncomfortably close to that of the worst depression years. One-sixth of the population of New York City is on relief. Raymond Clapper recently reported from Detroit on February 2 that the number of families on relief of all kinds was within 3,000 of the depression record. What is even more conclusive, a report of the Social Security Board early in February said that telegraphic advices from ninety urban areas in twenty-nine states showed that the number of cases receiving general relief (not including regular welfare expenditures, WPA earnings, or loans and grants by federal agencies) increased 13 per cent from December to January. The reports showed that only about one-third of the reporting districts indicated an increase of less than 10 per cent; in ten urban areas the increase exceeded 40 per cent; and Flint, Michigan, headed the list with an increase of 285 per cent.

At present some 2,000,000 are on WPA work relief. State and local relief agencies were reported to be taking care of 3,500,000 individuals at the end of 1937. The additional WPA appropriation of $250,000,000 passed by the House and now pending in the Senate will take care of 500,000 more, according to Aubrey Williams. The C. I. O. has asked that the figure be increased to $600,000,000; the mayors' conference suggests $400,000,000. Both groups are in a position to know what the need is, and their figures are far more realistic. The President himself, in asking for the appropriation, said that 3,000,000 people had lost their jobs in the last three months. But the President's mind is running on battleships, and in general at the moment he is leaning toward "trickling down" relief through such projects as rearmament and transcontinental highways which also have a national-defense appeal. Meanwhile the drive to substitute a dole for work relief continues. The New York Times admits that if federal relief is to be administered exclusively on the basis of work relief more money is needed. But it complains that the present program spares the states too much, prevents a given amount of federal money from being "stretched" to cover more cases, and depresses business by increasing the deficit. It has been pretty well shown that the states have no magic purses in reserve. On the second point a recent report by a board appointed by Mayor LaGuardia speaks with eloquence. Home relief allowances in New York City—they are the highest in the country—are 40 per cent below maintenance standards and 15 to 25 per cent below emergency standards.

As for the deficit, since the Administration is following Great Britain's lead so slavishly in rearmament, it might also emulate its taxes. That would seem more advisable, from any rational point of view, than "stretching" relief to feed two where one was only half-fed before.

Franco's Conquest of the Atlantic

HEAVEN knows we don't look to the Atlantic Monthly for social guidance, and we have never ranked Ellery Sedgwick, its editor, as a potent force for progress. But until a short time ago we had always regarded him as a reliable, if not too exciting, journalist. Then General Franco invited Mr. Sedgwick to go to insurgent Spain to see for himself how grand it all was—and to write about it in the home press. If the customary procedure was followed, all Mr. Sedgwick's expenses were to be paid. Shortly before his departure Mr. Sedgwick was urged by Dr. W. B. Cannon of the North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy to visit Loyalist territory as well while he was about it, but he declined on the ground that to do so would make him "persona non grata on the other side of the fence." He assured Dr. Cannon, however, that he proposed only "to write of what I see."

What Ellery Sedgwick saw in insurgent Spain is something hitherto vouchsafed only to angels and William Carney. Aside from the prosperity and happiness which abounded, what impressed him most, judging from the stories in the New York Times, was Franco's political acumen in the face of the seemingly conflicting groups that rushed to his banner. "Monarchists, great landowners, rich manufacturers," Sedgwick found, make up only "a fraction of his support." "Progressives, as we should call them, follow him in great numbers, and tens of thousands of genuine radicals shout themselves hoarse in his honor . . . the liberal spirit is clearly in the ascendant." What Ellery Sedgwick ("we") calls progressives, is a little hard to guess, but by "genuine radicals" (as opposed to those spurious Loyalist radicals whom he contrarily labels "reds") Mr. Sedgwick says he means the Falangists—"loosely called the Fascist Party." These, he explains, are the followers of the son of Primo de Rivera—"a great administrator who brought peace and order to Spain for six years" until he was ousted because the King "distrusted his sympathies with the proletariat."

The Falange "is recognized" by Mr. Sedgwick "as essential to the success of Nationalist Spain," but it doesn't inflame the romantic imagination of the Atlantic's editor quite as much as those medieval relics the Carlist requetes. "Ah! the requetes. You see them . . . whenever the front-line trenches call for the bravest of the brave. No such romantic folk since the Highland clans came down from the hills to fight and die for the Pretender."

And so Mr. Sedgwick wallows on, making his persona more and more grata to General Franco until at the end of his sickening fantasy we find him pilfering even the Loyalists' fighting slogan for the benefit of his—shall we say?—host. "'No Pasaran,'" according to Mr. Sedgwick, "say the patriots now to the reds."

Note: A few weeks ago a fellowship was established at Harvard to give journalists a chance to improve themselves and thus "promote and elevate the standards of journalism in the United States." Among the overseers who will administer the fund is Editor Ellery Sedgwick. We'll try a correspondence school.

Kennedy vs. the C. I. O.

THE American people are being treated to as neat an exhibition of pre-fascist union-smashing as it has been our lot to witness. The principal figures on the scene are Senator Copeland of New York, Mr. Kennedy of the Maritime Commission, now ambassador to England, and Joe Ryan, head of the racket-ridden International Longshoreman's Association of New York. Behind the scenes are more shadowy figures, notably the big shipowners on both coasts, the New York Tammany machine, Dave Beck and his labor-political machine in the Northwest, and the coalition of tory Senators and big employers.

The ordinary newspaper reader will find such an interpretation of what is happening rather far-fetched. He gathers from the papers merely that the heroic Mr. Kennedy has been turning his fine gifts to the task of creating order out of the shipping chaos; that the Senate Committee on Commerce, under Senator Copeland's chairmanship, has been doing its best to make the American flag and American womanhood safe from molestation at sea; and that to do this we shall have to outlaw all ship strikes, establish compulsory arbitration, and send Harry Bridges back to Australia.

There can be no doubt that conditions at sea are bad. But they are bad in the sense that the men's food, wages, hours, and living-quarters would all be intolerable even for men not brought up to expect something approaching American standards. There can be no doubt that the labor situation in the shipping industries is disgraceful. But the disgrace lies in the fact that only a portion of the men have been unionized, that up to a year ago the dominant unions on the Atlantic coast were controlled by Tammany politicians like Joe Ryan, that the successful organizing drive of Harry Bridges on the West Coast has met with the foulest sort of strike-breaking tactics.

We do not regard Mr. Kennedy's schemes for subsidizing the shipping companies to the tune of some twenty-five million a year as anything more than a preparation for war. The announcement last week that the government was preparing to purchase three ships from the International Mercantile Marine in order to give that company a chance to build more ships with government subsidies fits in with such a war program. But whatever one's views on that question, they should not blind one to the unqualified gall and fascist tactics of Kennedy, Copeland, and Ryan in their attack on maritime labor.

Their program calls for outlawing strikes and for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes in addition to a government training school for the merchant marine. In his parting shot before he left for the Court of St. James's, Mr. Kennedy attacked Secretary Perkins for her courageous opposition to compulsory arbitration and pointed to the fact that the machinery he proposes is being used in the railway industry. The machinery is working tolerably well in railroads because that industry is already completely unionized, and the negotiations are carried on between two groups comparable in strength. But before the railroad workers achieved that position they had to go through a series of strikes that were bitterly fought by the employers. The maritime workers are going through just that process today. They have made good progress under Harry Bridges on the West Coast and Joseph Curran on the East. But if they are now saddled with the complications and delays of this mediation machinery, their use of the strike as an instrument for organization is as good as taken away from them. And as for negotiating with unorganized workers, the shipping companies will, of course, find that very much to their taste.

The big stumbling-blocks in the path of Mr. Kennedy, Senator Copeland, and Mr. Ryan are the C. I. O. maritime unions. The strategy of this trio accordingly is to hold over Bridges the club of deportation for alleged membership in the Communist Party, to hold the Senate committee hearings without allowing Bridges to appear, to intrench Tammany Ryan more strongly on the Atlantic coast, and to brand the whole C. I. O. as "communist." What is new is that the shipowners have now stepped into the background and that they are using the Senate as their national stage and a United States Senator and an ambassador as their stooges.

Austria—Last Chapter

BY LUDWIG LORE

WHEN the history of our times is written, the fifteenth of February, 1938, will not be forgotten, for on that day Germany conquered Austria without firing a gun or drawing a sword. Formally Vienna is still the capital of Austria; actually Austria is ruled from Berlin. Its long-drawn-out struggle against German domination has ended in capitulation without honor.

The question of a union between Germany and Austria arose for the first time in modern history when the national German parliament met in Frankfort in 1848. What was to be the place of the Austrian monarchy in a united Germany? Were only the German provinces to be included or was it to be incorporated as a whole? The Austrians refused to split their empire in half. The Germans could not stomach the idea of including a vast non-German population. When Bismarck came to power in Prussia, he saw that German unity could only be achieved by the exclusion of Austria. The falling out between Berlin and Vienna over the Schleswig-Holstein question led to a definite breach between the two great German powers, to the campaign of 1866, and the collapse of Austria on the field of Königgrätz. Eight million Germans were cut off from all political union with their fellow-Germans.

The half-century that followed was outwardly uneventful, but internal affairs were marked by constant friction between the different nationalities included in the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. This nationality issue was a constant source of irritation to Austria's Balkan neighbors and culminated in the fateful assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand in 1914. The World War ended with the dissolution of the monarchy. Austria, with an area of 240,000 square miles and a population of 46,000,000 before the World War, was left a head without a body, comprising a total area of 32,369 square miles with a population of about 6,500,000.

Austria's new status as a German vassal is, without a doubt, the personal victory of Adolf Hitler, but the foundation for it was laid in pre-Hitler Germany. The world forgets that Anschluss is not a Nazi but a German policy, that long before Hitler, Social Democratic governments, in both Berlin and Vienna, called for a united Germany and Austria. Had the makers of the Versailles and St. Germain treaties been less short-sighted and less vengeful, who knows what the future of Europe might have been? As it was, Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain expressly commanded Austria to "abstain from any act which might, directly or indirectly or by any means whatever, compromise her independence." Lloyd George, who is so critical of the post-war treaties today, feared nothing so much as a peace that would give Germany a chance to combine with German Austria and encircle the new Czechoslovak Republic.

The Anchluss idea was kept alive through the entire Weimar period. Socialists continued to demand a united German people in tremendous demonstrations, and we doubt whether any considerable group of Germans in either country would have been seriously opposed to an Austro-German Republic had the Allied powers been sane enough to permit it. The German Republic made a tentative move in that direction with its proposal of a customs union with Austria, but the powers turned thumbs down. It has been characteristic of all post-war "statesmanship" to give to reactionaries and fascists under duress what was refused to liberal and democratic governments. It was this blindness to realities that made the powers block the path of the liberal-democrat Karolyi in Hungary and then make concessions to the arch-reactionary Horthy. The sins committed by the Allied powers against European democracy during the first decade after the war paved the way for fascism.

Chancellor Schuschnigg, who appears before the world today as the knave who sold Austria's birthright, gave in to Hitler with a heavy heart. He knew that Austrian independence was a chimera, but he tried to keep up the fiction in the hope that another Systemwechsel in Germany would remove Hitler from his throne. A drowning man grasps at straws. Now Austria belongs to Germany, for better or for worse. Before long Germany will be a nation of 73,000,000 people, against 42,000,000 for France. For the present regime in the Reich that is a tremendous achievement. With Austria behind her, Nazi Germany is well on her way to becoming the dominant power of Continental Europe.

What does this mean for Czechoslovakia? Prague's submissiveness in the face of recent manifestations of Nazi aggressiveness points to the answer. "Allied" with France and "protected" by the U. S. S. R., she faces dismemberment and division by Germany, Poland, and Hungary. Poland and the Balkan states, which have tried to safeguard their independence by carrying on a nervous flirtation with the Nazi regime, are in a panic. France, their only bulwark against the Nazi Goliath, is hopelessly far away.

Messrs. Daladier and Sarraut may well weep over the chances they missed. When Hitler trampled the constitution of the German Republic under foot in 1933 France would have been justified, under the terms of the Versailles treaty, in sending her troops back into the demilitarized Rhine zone. This could have been done without losing the life of a single man. When Nazi Germany left the League of Nations nine months later, and when she rearmed immediately after, France had another chance to enforce the Rhine guaranties. At that time Germany could not have offered more than a perfunctory resistance. When Hitler sent troops into the Rhineland in March, 1936, the Reich was so little prepared to back up its venture that the general in command of the German troops had secret orders to retire at once if France should offer resistance. But the Germans were good psychologists. As they had expected, France dodged the issue and allowed the potential enemy to advance to her very borders, relying on her magnificent chain of underground fortresses and ignoring the fact that the presence of the German army in the formerly demilitarized area would make it impossible for her to come to the aid of her allies in Eastern Europe.

France has not suffered such a decisive defeat since she lost to the Germans at Sedan in 1870. Since February 15 there is every indication that she will have to play a secondary role in world affairs. Germany will leave no stone unturned, after her easy victory in Austria, to extend her control from the Rhine to the Dardanelles. If her plans succeed she will be, in the not distant future, the economic overlord of a bloc of some 150,000,000 people in an area that can supply her with practically everything she needs in food, oil, coal, and metals.

The last word, to be sure, has yet to be spoken. Germany's victory of today may still become her defeat of tomorrow unless Hitler and his associates have the wisdom to act with the utmost discretion for some time to come. It is inconceivable that England, France, and Russia will indefinitely stand by with folded hands while German fascism prepares to terrorize all Europe. Even the most peaceful of peoples must decide to fight when submitting to oppression is the only alternative.

Farm Aid—Fourth Stage

BY MORDECAI EZEKIEL

Washington, February 21

THE federal government has already gone through three stages of positive action in dealing with the problem of farm production and prices: Farm Board price-stabilization purchases in 1930-32, AAA commodity-control programs in 1933-35, and the agricultural conservation program of 1936-37. The farm bill just passed initiates the fourth stage.

The ever-normal granary is a dominant element in the new legislation. That concept, gradually evolved out of past experience with gluts and shortages, is a daring attempt to satisfy and protect both producers and consumers. For consumers, it encourages the establishment of reserve food supplies adequate to protect against short crops due to drought or other natural causes. Pinched recently by high prices for hams, bacon, and other hog products, consumers realize the need for such assurance. Those high prices, the direct consequence of the destruction by drought of half the crops of corn and other feed grains in 1934 and 1936, show the need of heavier feed reserves to protect against weather hazards. To farm producers the ever-normal-granary plan offers a guaranty that even in years of bumper yields prices and incomes will not be driven to disastrous lows.

To protect against future crop disasters, supplies at the end of the season will be built up to levels materially higher than in the past. Acreage allotments will be so adjusted that, with normal yields, carry-overs of wheat will run about 210 million bushels, as compared with an average of 140 million in the past. Carry-overs of corn will be increased by nearly 100 per cent. Meanwhile farm income will be maintained, despite the higher storage stocks, by benefit payments, commodity loans if prices are low and supplies are large, and parity payments. These last, however, will depend entirely on whether appropriations for them are made hereafter.

Commercial producers of the several major crops will be given acreage allotments so calculated as to produce the supplies necessary to satisfy domestic and foreign demand and to provide carry-overs larger than the averages of the past. Producers who keep within these acreages, and who also carry out the soil-conservation practices that may be required, will receive benefit payments and be fully eligible for crop loans. But despite these acreage controls, bumper yields may produce crops larger than are anticipated, or carry-overs may prove to be larger than was expected when the acreages were allotted. If the current supplies are in such excess as to provide carry-over reserves of some 250 million bushels of wheat or 400 million bushels of corn, then marketing quotas will be imposed. These quotas will restrict sales for the season, with a penalty tax on sales in excess of individual quotas. Marketing quotas will become effective, however, only if two-thirds or more of the farmers to whom they will apply, voting in a referendum, favor them.

The law also formalizes the procedure for extending crop loans to farmers. It materially reduces the administrative discretion in handling such loans, and specifies the amount of the loans under given conditions. Minimum loans to cooperating producers of wheat, cotton, and corn will be at not less than 52 per cent of the parity price. Under existing conditions this would tend to put a floor to farm prices of approximately 60 cents for wheat, 43 cents for corn, and 10 cents for cotton. Loans will not be made in any season when the price is above 75 per cent of parity, except in the case of corn, for which they may be made in any year, regardless of price, when the corn crop is estimated at more than a year's normal domestic requirements and exports. Loans will be available to non-cooperating farmers, but only at the low level of 60 per cent of the loan rate to cooperators. No loans will be available for a commodity in any season when its supplies are so heavy that marketing quotas are proposed for it but are rejected by the farmers' vote.

In actual operation, the program will not be devoid of difficulties. In essence it will tend to keep domestic market prices lower in years of small crops and higher in years of bumper crops than would otherwise be the case. In the case of corn this should tend also to hold live-stock production and prices within more stable limits. But for the export crops, especially cotton and wheat, complications may still follow. Holding our domestic price above the world market in years of large crops tends to check our own exports and to encourage expanded production elsewhere. (As a matter of fact, however, a large part of the increases of foreign cotton acreage has been in response to other factors, such as the low price of coffee or exchange depreciation abroad, which have no relation to our own cotton policies.) As an offset to this possibility, the pending legislation provides broader powers to "stimulate exports." Funds adequate to carry on a large export-dumping program, either in wheat or cotton, are not, however, provided; nor is there any assurance that exports could be subsidized on a large scale without leading to retaliatory action by foreign countries. If adjustment of production in this country were matched by concerted production adjustments in other countries, this difficulty would not arise. In a recent speech outlining his wheat policy, the Secretary of Agriculture expressed a willingness to revive the international wheat agreement, under which the leading wheat exporters had agreed to curtail production. Such action for cotton was once proposed by Egypt, but was never followed up. For this crop, for which our export market is still a major one, such an international agreement would be even more helpful than for wheat, but less progress has been made in that direction.

The increased emphasis on adequate supplies meets the accusation of "scarcity economics" which in the past has often been leveled at the AAA. As a matter of fact, scarcity as such has never been an objective of New Deal farm policy. Rather "balance" has been the keynote, to obtain the proper proportion between the supplies of farm products and the domestic and export demand for them. This resolves itself down to maintaining the proper balance between the production of farm products and that of industrial products. Larger industrial production and increased consumer buying power for farm products will be welcomed by farmers, and the demand gladly supplied, but low industrial production cannot be remedied by glutting the existing markets for farm products. Viewed in this way, the whole AAA mechanism is a device to put farmers, who formerly operated under free competition, in a position of bargaining equality with modern industry, which operates under the economy of monopolistic competition.

The soil-conservation features of the farm program are a protection to consumers even more than to farmers. If soil depletion went to the bitter end of inadequate supplies of farm products, the major burden would fall upon consumers. Food would have to be shipped to this country from the distant corners of the earth; expensive artificial fertilizers would have to be used far more extensively than now; food prices would shoot up. Such possibilities do not seem far-fetched to anyone who has visited the productive black-land area of Texas and seen the infertile white subsoil coming to the top on the upper slopes of all the gently rolling fields, or who on the fertile loess bluffs bordering the Mississippi, from Wisconsin to Arkansas, has seen the ravines and gullies cutting back deeper and deeper, and great sheets of soil washing off slopes above. Nation-wide surveys show that already 35 million acres of good land have been destroyed by gullying or other forms of erosion, while more than half the remainder of our farm lands is in more or less advanced stages of top-soil destruction.

Secretary Wallace

In its intensive demonstration projects the Soil Conservation Service (previously the Soil Erosion Service) is showing dramatically what can be done to hold the soil in place and to increase its fertility. The AAA, in its general soil-conservation program, is trying to spread such practices generally among all farmers. The program demands that an adequate proportion of the land of each farm be devoted to soil-improving crops; that not too much be used for the inter-tilled crops which deplete the soil or accelerate erosion; and that such production practices as the use of winter cover crops, terracing, strip-cropping, and green-manure crops be adopted to build up the organic content and fertility of the soil. From the point of view of soil conservation, the chief question is whether the AAA and the Soil Conservation Service can move fast enough to save much of the good land that is still left.

The new legislation, in many of its detailed provisions, provides for modifications of methods previously in use. Some of these changes may work well in practice; others may cause difficulties and require correction later. The marketing quotas, for example, in the case of tobacco, wheat, and rice are expressed in units of the commodity marketed, while for cotton they are expressed in terms of the actual yield of the given year on an allotted acreage. That would mean that in a year like 1937, when the crop is large solely because of unusually high yield per acre, the cotton marketing quota would have little effect upon the quantities marketed. On the other hand it might increase the effectiveness of the voluntary acreage control, since non-cooperators who greatly expanded cotton acreage would be penalized when selling the product of their excess acres if the sales quotas were in operation.

The proposed stabilization of live-stock production through corn prices represents a new measure. Under the original AAA the voluntary contracts directly limited the production and marketing of hogs, as well as the acreage of corn. Under the soil-conservation programs of 1936 and 1937 there was no control of hogs, and control of corn was entirely voluntary. Under the new law the corn program will apply primarily to the commercial farms in regions of heavy corn production. In those areas there would be definite acreage limits on corn under the soil-conservation program, backed up by corn loans, and then by marketing quotas once the national granary was filled to the generous levels already mentioned. Three-quarters or more of our corn is fed on the farm where it is produced, and is marketed as hogs or cattle. Accordingly the "marketing quotas" for corn are to be enforced, not by penalizing corn sales, but by requiring that an appropriate share of the crop be withheld from the market. The stored corn would then be released for feeding or marketing in years of shortage. It is expected that this device will reduce the range of fluctuations in corn supplies and corn prices, and thus lead to more constant production of live stock and live-stock products. This recognizes the fact once stated by a Southern Senator during farm-bill hearings, "Why, suh, a hawg is nothin' but cawn on foah laigs."

The penalties imposed on sales above the quotas are of moderate proportions: 15 cents a bushel on corn and wheat, 2 cents a pound on cotton (or 3 cents a pound if marketed in a subsequent year), ¼ cent a pound on rice, with relatively heavier penalties on tobacco. Whether the threat of these moderate penalties, plus the loss of the soil-conservation benefits and of most of the loan privileges, will be sufficient to lead most farmers to cooperate in the adjustment program and will thus be adequate to prevent continued excess production after the granaries are filled, is one of the questions which only operating experience can answer.

In many other details the new legislation shows efforts to meet problems which have arisen in the past. An attempt is made to provide a flexible basis for allotments to individual farms instead of freezing them in the rigid mold of past averages. The early AAA programs calculated individual farm allotments directly upon the "historical base" of average acreages on each farm in the years preceding 1933. Farmers who had already reduced their production of export crops or who were following good farm management with low cash crop acreages often suffered severe injustices. The present legislation modifies this rigid system in various ways, including use of a moving average of past acreages for distribution among states and counties. New effort is made to protect small farmers by providing minimum acreage allotments for them, increasing the benefits payable to them, and exempting them from some of the marketing quotas. Likewise, beginning in 1939, the total benefits payable to any one individual, partnership, or estate in any one state are limited to $10,000.

In part, the new legislation crystallizes into definite statutory form administration devices which have evolved under the broad authorizations of previous legislation; in part it provides new and more powerful mechanisms. Some of these new mechanisms may work as expected; others may reveal defects which will require further modifications later on. The basic objectives of the new farm program remain much the same as under the current programs: to stabilize farmers' incomes; to assure consumers adequate supplies; and to protect both the farmers and consumers of the future by conserving our soil resources.

The Road to Peace

BY LOUIS FISCHER

THE outstanding fact in the world today is that wars are raging in three countries—in China, Spain, and Ethiopia. The greatest fallacy of our political thinking suggests that this situation offers only two alternatives: to stay out and allow the aggressor to have his way, or to go to war and stop him. If I thought so I should be an isolationist. I should say: let the aggressor run amuck; it will be years before he gets ready to strike at us, and any respite is a blessing. I have seen so much of the horrors of war in Spain during the last eighteen months that I would even be ready to advocate peace at any price. But I am convinced that isolationism is a greater menace to peace and to democratic institutions in this country than a wise American foreign policy based on free international collaboration with a view to preventing war.

The aggressors have been made bold by their successes. Manchoukuo, the Rhineland, Abyssinia, Spain, China—and now Austria. Nor does Austria bring the story to an end. In August the Angriff, official Nazi organ, said: "Money is being collected in Czechoslovakia for Soviet Spain. And who will later collect for Czechoslovakia?" The implication is obvious: Czechoslovakia is next. Why not?

France, England, the Soviet Union, and the smaller states are therefore alarmed, and announce unprecedented accelerations of already unprecedented rearmament programs. We do the same. The more progress Japan makes in China and the farther Italy and Germany penetrate into South America, where their support of Spanish fascism has earned them many friends (what happens in Spain is quickly reflected in the Spanish-American republics), the more feverishly the United States will arm. We shall have a large military establishment, mobilization of industry for war purposes, greater surveillance of individual citizens, more repression, more reaction. Successful aggression stimulates the world arms race. So does the prospect of successful aggression. There is no use asking for smaller army and navy subsidies while wars are in progress or while aggression pays.

As the aggressors advance they must reach a line which the opposing armed giants, if they are to protect their national interests, cannot allow them to cross. And then a major conflict will ensue. This is the gravest implication of fascist conquests. Isolationists may believe that America can remain aloof. This immature notion is not shared by those who understand the complicated pattern of international relations. Once war has started, Ludlow amendments will not help. War must be prevented long before it becomes imminent. Measures like the Ludlow amendment would tend to draw us away from a policy of war prevention and toward one of stopping a war in the eleventh hour.

The road away from armaments and back to appeasement and peace must start in a conscious attempt to stop the assaults of totalitarian states upon unoffending peoples. The first duty of the true pacifist is to take the profit out of aggression. If one aggressive war ended in failure thanks to collective action, a second would be less likely. The choice lies between mad rearmament, plus frail dams like the Ludlow amendment to hold back the inevitable flood, and the reestablishment of peace by a policy of war prevention.

Peace can be reestablished by non-violent measures. The assumption that Germany or Italy or Japan would, if subjected to economic pressure, strike back in desperation is based on an error not difficult to disprove. Ever since October, 1936, the Soviet Union has helped Loyalist Spain with munitions. If it had not, fascism would now be triumphant in Spain. Have Germany or Italy attacked Russia in retaliation? No. France today pursues a pro-Loyalist policy which is immediately translated into greater Spanish war costs for Italy and Germany. Have the invaders of Spain moved against France? No. Hongkong is the gateway through which a broad stream of British and other war materials is entering China. The Japanese have not yet attacked Hongkong, or French Indo-China, or Soviet Siberia, whence the Chinese are now receiving airplanes and other weapons to defend themselves against invasion. The fascist nations have not struck back because they cannot. They are too weak. We often mistake their audacity for strength. They are merely made brave by other nations' passivity.

Poor Loyalist Spain, which began the war with no army and with political disunity, has been able to resist Franco, Hitler, and Mussolini. Germany and Italy have helped the rebels as much as their resources, their preoccupations, and the international situation permitted. Italy has had 200,000 soldiers in Spain. The two dictators have sent 1,800 airplanes to the disloyal generals and equipment for an army of half a million. Franco, according to the London Financial News of January 10, owes Rome two and a half billion lire and Berlin eight hundred million marks. Germany and Italy will try to do more but it will not be enough. Their arm is too short. Meanwhile, the fascist investment in Spain has so weakened the investors as to prevent them from launching a European war. This is the Loyalists' contribution to world peace.

The Nazi Frankfurter Zeitung said on December 28 that when the rebels rose in Spain no one thought that the war would last longer than a few months. The Japanese were similarly mistaken about the war in China. The German theory of the short war has been exploded. Continued Chinese resistance will increasingly undermine Japan's economy. Will aggressor nations which cannot conquer their weak victims assume the additional task of attacking great powers which are helping those victims? The fact is that the powers which are aiding Spain and China have not been attacked although they are within easier reach of the aggressors than the United States.

Not only do the fascist states hesitate to fight the large countries. They even retreat when hard pressed by diplomacy. The Nyon conference against submarine piracy was one case. Again, a year ago, the French were disturbed by the German penetration into Spanish Morocco. On January 11, 1937, François-Poncet, the French ambassador in Berlin, told Hitler that these activities would have to stop. They stopped. No force was used. No force would ever have to be used. The moral and economic influence of the pacific nations would suffice.

America's contribution to this peace policy would be safe and inexpensive. It would consist, chiefly, in withholding from aggressors the materials which they need to pursue their murderous adventures. On January 11, 1938, the German steamer Crefeld sailed down the Delaware River with 200 aerial bombs. Its destination was a German port, where part of the cargo was to be unloaded, probably for reshipment to Spain. The remaining bombs were to be sent on to Japanese army depots in China. This was the first shipment of a 2,500-ton order of bombs for Germany and Japan. About the same time President Roosevelt appealed to the Red Cross to give a million dollars in relief to Chinese civilians.

It is not neutral to assist the stronger side. In accordance with the Neutrality Act we deny arms to Franco and to the Loyalists. Franco, however, needs no American munitions. He receives all he needs from Germany and Italy, and we sell arms to Germany and Italy. But the legal Spanish government suffers, and Spaniards die in thousands in air raids because the government is short of arms. Apparently impartial, we are in fact anti-Loyalist. We take sides by doing nothing. Though the sympathies of the American people are undoubtedly with China, we facilitate Japan's war on China.

The Neutrality Act should be repealed or at least amended so that it does not aid the bully and penalize the under-dog. Does any danger of war lurk in such changes? Suppose we sold arms to the Loyalists. Would Franco or Hitler or Mussolini attack the United States? At worst they could seize the foreign ships in which those arms would be carried. The same applies to shipments of weapons for China. And always it must be kept in mind that nations are actually supplying China and the Loyalists without getting themselves into the slightest trouble.

United States government policy and the private attitude of Americans as expressed through a boycott can foster peace by making it clear that aggression will receive no encouragement or aid from America. We could, if necessary, proceed independently of others. But American efforts might be correlated with similar measures by the bourgeois democracies and the Soviet Union. The French and British have been guilty of imperialist robberies. They have bombed peaceful inhabitants in the Northwest Frontier of India, in Palestine, and elsewhere. I am under no illusions regarding the reactionary potentialities of these countries. But they want peace, for they know they can gain nothing from war. This is not a very idealistic reason, but it is all the more reliable since it is a selfish one.

We dislike hearing about struggles for democracy because Woodrow Wilson in 1917 camouflaged an ugly combat between rival imperialisms as a lofty crusade to make the world safe for democracy and to end all wars. Ever since we have been zealously on guard against such hokum. Now in Spain a feudal military clique, inspired and supported by reactionary foreign dictatorships, is trying to snuff out a democracy where civil liberties have manifested remarkable virility even in war conditions. China, painfully seeking to become a nation, is threatened by a neighbor who would make it a slave. England and France, in the past, did similar things. Yet France sympathizes with the Loyalists for national-defense reasons. England looks with disfavor on the Japanese thrust for imperialist reasons. We do not approve the reasons but we welcome the result.

In international politics, which is a hard-boiled game, motive and consequence do not always match. For instance, Soviet assistance in Spain stimulates revolution in Spain and contributes to the downfall of totalitarian fascisms, but it also aids the bourgeois imperialisms of France and England. The naive and malicious have contended that each of these effects is deliberately sought. The discerning realize that one effect is not obtainable without the others. So, too, the capitalist democracies may set out to defend their sordid interests and end by buttressing true democracies with advanced social programs.

It has been argued that if the fascist nations cannot obtain the raw materials they need and solve the problem of their excess inhabitants they will explode. I do not accept the facile division of the world into haves and have-nots. Was it to have that Mussolini took Abyssinia? Then why, before he had even finished fighting there and before he began economic exploitation of the country, did he plot to invade Spain? If Italy needs new lands because it is overpopulated, why does the Duce distribute prizes to encourage large families? In "Mein Kampf" Hitler objected to colonies for Germany, and wisely. For in 1913 Germany's total trade with its colonies—and it had held some of them for more than thirty years—amounted to $25,000,000, or .005 of its total exports and imports. It got practically no important raw materials from its colonies. Yet it was rich and powerful. First Hitler wanted no colonies. Now he insists on them. First he proposed autarchy, or national self-sufficiency. He still has his four-year plan for substitutes and armaments, but he has also struck out for foreign-trade expansion. Mussolini too talks of self-sufficiency and in the next breath of empire. The two aims are at odds. The point is that fascism seems to be the last chance for these countries to solve their problems within the present social system. Frantically they take up with first one panacea, then the other, then they merge the two; finally they appear to achieve partial success in both and nevertheless continue to pursue the same goals with a madness that suggests the eternally ungratified.

Japan, in 1931, asserted that it coveted Manchuria for its surplus population and as a source of natural wealth. Yet Manchuria's economic surface was scarcely scratched when Tokyo occupied northern China, and that enterprise was far from consolidated when it launched its present assault on all of China. The motive is not economic. It is insanity born of futility. Even in Poland, with its tremendous stretches of sparsely settled land, a large Polish organization, officially inspired, directs a movement to acquire for Poland distant domains in Africa, South America, and Asia.

Czarist Russia was a colossal empire. Yet it neglected opportunities for internal development to absorb vast new provinces in Central Asia and the Far East. Russia was a big "have," but it wanted to have more. The revolution in Russia changed the have which wanted expansion to a have which needs none. But fascist states are have-nots by their very political nature, and no Van Zeeland plan or raw-material redistribution will help them.

The millions in Germany and Italy who thought and voted liberal or democratic or Socialist or Communist are neither all dead nor all converted. Outside opposition to fascism heartens internal opposition, whereas foreign political victories for the dictators depress it. Domestic discontent cannot yet cause the collapse of Hitler or Mussolini, but it must be put down on the debit side of the ledger when the totalitarian governments count up the pros and cons of initiating a major war. In this calculation, too, the neutrals appear as assets. If European fascism were certain that the United States would refrain from helping the democracies, it would feel less reluctant to challenge them. If Hitler and Mussolini were certain that America and England would remain neutral, France would be in danger. The goal of Nazi foreign policy has been to foster American isolationism and to separate England from France, and France from the Soviet Union. Similarly, Japan, Germany, and Italy have sought to cripple the League of Nations lest it become an instrument of common action against aggression. The bitterest opponents of collective security are not American isolationists but Hitler and Mussolini. In May, 1935, Hitler urged that when hostilities break out between two nations "the other nations withdraw at once from both sides."

This is his idea of neutrality. Germany attacks Czechoslovakia, for instance. All other nations withdraw from the conflict. Germany wins. Hitler marches into France. Everybody remains neutral. Germany wins.

The aggressors seek to drive isolationist and neutral wedges between their potential enemies. At the same time, however, the aggressors themselves unite for collective insecurity under the guise of the "anti-Communist pact." This device fools some people, for communism is a very popular red herring. Yet the three fascist militarisms are concerned first of all with Great Britain, and it is British interests that have suffered most in Abyssinia, Spain, and China. Those who believe that collective security is a Soviet machination are taking the anti-Communist pact at its face value and Hitler and Mussolini at their word.

Even in their union, however, the fascist aggressors lack complete cohesion. Germany and Italy cannot come to an agreement on strategy in Spain. Germany and Japan have not the same interests in China. Moreover, the fact that each of the aggressors is at war—Italy on two fronts—lessens the practical aid they can give to one another. The task of checking fascist aggression, while not easy, must therefore not be exaggerated. France and England must before long awaken to the necessity of resistance, and America's role would consequently be a minor one. If China and the Loyalists fight on for another year, the aggressors will be incapable of disturbing the peace much longer. Today collective security means help for China and Spain in stemming invasion. America could give this help without expanding its navy. But if past and present aggressions make us build a bigger fleet, people who don't like it ought to do something to oppose aggression.

Adrien Arcand, Fascist—an Interview

BY DAVID MARTIN

STUDENTS of modern history will be interested to learn that in the summer of 1934 Leon Trotsky visited the United States disguised as the valet of Baron Maurice de Rothschild. The trip was made via Shanghai. Upon arriving in the States, Trotsky conferred with Bernard Baruch and other members of the Roosevelt Brain Trust in the "Red House" in Washington and discussed with them the preparation of the Communist revolution in America. That, at least, is the story of Adrien Arcand, leader of the Quebec fascists, as published in Le Patriote.

Scarcely known to the public a few months ago, Arcand's name is today blazoned in the headlines. When newspapermen took photographs of blue-shirted fascists drilling under the instruction of ex-officers and began to write stories about a fascist movement 80,000 strong in the province of Quebec alone, the Canadian public sat up with a start. And it was still more perturbed when it learned that the provincial government was on intimate terms with the leader of the movement. Threatened with a federal investigation recently, Adrien Arcand, head of the P. N. S. C. (Parti National Social Chrétien), stated that he was prepared to march his men to Ottawa and display them to the Minister of Justice, and that "they would be better drilled and in better order than the soldiers they have down there."

The provincial government of Quebec, under Premier Maurice Duplessis, already shows strong fascist tendencies. Abetted by the Roman Catholic church, it is directing a campaign against "communism" that is destroying freedom of the press, speech, and assembly. Under the notorious "padlock" law, the provincial police have been raiding printing plants, bookshops, offices, and houses almost daily for several months. Certain news commentators, impressed by the scope of the corporatist movement and by the Huey Long parliamentary manners of Duplessis, have even suggested that the establishment of a corporate state in the province of Quebec was only a matter of time. Arcand's National Social Christian Party is made up of avowed fascists openly working to that end.

Tall, angular, wearing easily a brown corduroy sport shirt, Adrien Arcand received me in the office of L'Illustration Nouvelle, the Montreal daily of which he is editor.

"Mr. Arcand," I began, "can you tell me something about yourself—your life, how you came to the fascist movement, your experiences in it?"

Arcand smiled. "Nothing interesting about myself. I studied to be a chemical engineer but after leaving college I became a reporter. From there I worked up to my present position."

"I have been told," I continued, "that you are conversant with a number of languages, among them Yiddish and Hebrew."

"Yes, I know several languages," Arcand replied. "I read Yiddish and Hebrew—not too well, but sufficient to permit me to follow the press."

I turned to other matters. "Now about your organization? Could you tell me briefly what you stand for?"

"Our organization stands for God, family, private property, and personal initiative." Arcand spoke very deliberately. "We believe that the Jews are responsible for all the evils in the world today. Through the two internationals that they control, the proletarian and the financial, they provoke economic crises and revolutions with a view to taking world power. The present system is absolutely incapable of destroying the Jewish influence or of resisting communism."

"Do you stand for the destruction of democracy?" I asked. "In other words, if you were to take power in Canada, would you permit opposition groupings to continue to exist, or would you immediately illegalize them, as Hitler and Mussolini have done?"

I had expected Arcand to be evasive on this point, but he answered squarely and without hesitation. "We will immediately illegalize all other parties, declare unionism obligatory for bosses and workers, and organize the corporate state."

"If I understand you correctly, you are opposed to democratic liberalism because it tolerates communism?"

"No, that is not entirely so. Even if there were no communism we would still be opposed to liberalism, which is also an instrument of world Jewry."

I came now to a more delicate point. "How do you propose to take power in Canada?" I asked.

"We intend to take power by regular constitutional means—by means of a majority in the parliament." This was the answer I had expected. Arcand has consistently denied that his movement stands for force. The bands of men who are drilling under army officers? Mere physical training—"you won't find a sling-shot among them."

"Your organization," I said, "stands for the complete destruction of democracy and the parliamentary system. Yet you propose to take power by democratic and constitutional means. How can you reconcile your goal with the methods by which you propose to achieve it? How can you reconcile this position, moreover, with your support of Franco?"

"But the situation in Spain was entirely exceptional." Arcand exclaimed. "Law and order had broken down completely; churches were being burned; hardened criminals were being released from the jails. What is more, the Popular Front did not have a voting majority—the rightists had actually obtained 450,000 more votes in the elections."

"There is, of course, another side to that story," I replied. "But you stand solidly with Franco, you believe that his uprising was justified?"

"Entirely," affirmed Arcand.

"Let's bring the situation a little nearer home," I continued. "Suppose that a situation similar to that which confronted Franco did arise in Canada, would you do as Franco did?"

"If law and order broke down completely as it did in Spain—then, yes, I would resort to force to save Canada from communism." Conditioned as it was, I nevertheless had obtained the admission I was after.

"Now, about the size of your movement," I continued. "How many members are there in your organization and how big is your following?"

"From the showing which we made in the provincial and municipal elections," Arcand replied, "I would estimate our following at about 80,000 in the province of Quebec. That is the number of votes obtained by the candidates we supported in the last provincial elections."

From a many-sided investigation I knew that the figure that Arcand has claimed for his following is a grotesque exaggeration.

"Your paper is Le Fasciste Canadien?" I asked.

"Yes."

"It appears monthly?"

"Yes," replied Arcand—with irritation. Arcand himself and a number of his colleagues are modestly well off. With a following of 80,000 it should almost be possible for them to publish a daily. In 1933, at the time the P. N. S. C. was founded, his paper did appear as a weekly. But not today. He claims a circulation of 12,000 for it, but that is much exaggerated in the opinion of competent critics. Only a few newsstands in Montreal carry his paper.

"One of the chief sources of strength of the fascist movement in other countries," I said, "has been the sympathy which it has commanded in governmental and other nominally anti-fascist circles. Does your movement enjoy a similar support here?"

"Our movement is entirely independent," Arcand asserted. "We have no connections with the government or with any political party."

"You are the editor of L'Illustration Nouvelle?"

"Yes." L'Illustration Nouvelle acts as a semi-official organ of the Duplessis government. The attitude of Premier Duplessis himself has been one of complete tolerance towards Arcand's movement. And the columns of L'Illustration Nouvelle have within recent weeks been thrown open to the statements and proclamations of the National Social Christian Party.

"I understand also that you had an important position in the Conservative campaign apparatus during the last federal election?"

"I was in charge of their propaganda for the province of Quebec. I specialized in anti-Communist work."

"You are on friendly terms with Mr. Bennett? Could you tell me anything about Mr. Bennett's personal views on fascism?"

"Yes, I know Mr. Bennett. But we will have to give Mr. Bennett and the Conservative Party as clean a licking as anybody else."

"Your movement is sympathetic to the Nazi regime in Germany?" I asked.

"We are a national organization and we have no international affiliations," replied Arcand. "But we feel ourselves to be in moral solidarity with Hitler."

"What stand do you take on the conflict between the Nazi and the Vatican?"

"That is very far from here. We do not mingle in it."

"You do not support the Catholic church against the Nazis?"

Once again Arcand hesitated. "From this distance it is difficult to take a stand. We receive contradictory reports."

"I have heard," I persisted, "that your sympathy for the Nazi regime and your failure to support the Vatican against Hitler has resulted in the alienation of a considerable section of the Catholic church that formerly was sympathetic to you. The Catholic church in Quebec still stands for corporatism and is sympathetic to fascism, but is opposed to your movement for that reason."

"The Catholic church is not fascist," insisted Arcand. "It stands for corporatism, but they do not know what they mean by this corporatism." It was obvious that I had touched a sore spot. Arcand paused before he completed his reply. "There are a number, a very small number, in the church who support us. But for each one who does there are at least two who are opposed."

"What about the story that you distribute Nazi propaganda in Canada?" I asked.

"It is entirely untrue," replied Arcand emphatically. "Most of our propaganda is printed in Canada. What little we import comes from the Imperial Fascist League in London."

"But what about this German-printed material that is being circulated in Canada?" I asked. "If your organization is not distributing this material, then can you tell me who would be? It is only logical to assume that just as the Nazis use material printed by you, you use propaganda put out by the Nazis."

"We have received an odd bundle of leaflets from Hamburg," Arcand finally admitted. "But by far the greater part of our imported propaganda comes from the Imperial Fascist League in London."

I delved into my brief case. "I have here a copy of a letter that you are supposed to have sent to a certain Major Frank Peace in Germany," I said. "Before I use it I should like to know what you have to say about it."

The letter I produced is dated September 28, 1933, and is addressed to Major Frank Peace, Bad Aachen, Germany. It begins with a report on Arcand's activities in Canada and concludes with this paragraph: "If it can help you, you can act as correspondent of Le Patriote, which is known to Hitler and which is very well appreciated by the Nazi propaganda bureau. If need be, use this letter. Don't forget to reach Lüdecke, a most estimable friend, who was in the United States for several years. I have great faith in him. . . . I am, faithfully yours, in our great Aryan cause, Adrien Arcand."

Arcand glanced at the letter. He was annoyed. "Yes, I remember that. Peace wrote to me telling me that he was hard up and I entitled him to act as correspondent for Le Patriote."

"You had connections with Lüdecke?"

"I met him in Montreal. I helped his wife buy a fur coat. I did not hear from him after that."

"Now, about the Communists," I continued. "Do you actually believe that they constitute a menace at the present time? According to their figures, you know, their membership does not exceed 12,000 in Canada."

"It is not the Communist Party alone that has to be considered," explained Arcand. "There are many people who say they are opposed to communism, but when you question them about political matters, they will give you typically Marxian answers—for example, they will be for the nationalization of certain industries. [Subsequently I found that Point 6 in the program of the P. S. N. C. calls for the nationalization or municipalization of all public utilities.] The Communists have at their disposal not merely the one international; there are four internationals. On the surface they seem to have differences, but actually they work together under the direction of international Jewish finance. The A. F. of L., founded by the Jew Gompers, and the C. I. O., led by the Jews Hillman and Dubinsky, are integral parts of this movement."

"Your statements about the Jews are not believed by many people," I said. "It is a fact that there is not a single Jew on the board of directors of a single Canadian bank or mortgage company or of a single utility company or of the rail or ocean transportation companies. How is it possible for the Jews to exercise the control you say they do? You say the Jewish financiers inspire the Communist movement. But communism is opposed to the entire capitalist class. Jewish capitalists fight just as bitterly against communism and the workers' movement as do Christian capitalists."

"The Jews do not work openly," Arcand replied, "but they control everything nevertheless. The price of wheat is set by Louis Dreyfus in France; the price of diamonds by Barnata, Spavier; the price of nickel by Melcheta; the price of silver and copper by Guggenheim; the price of pulp and paper by Graustein and Dreyfus. The price of butter right here in Montreal is determined by the Sassoons in London." Arcand paused, pulled a five-dollar bill from his pocket, and snapped it. "You see this? It is worth only fifty-one cents on the dollar. Why? The Jewish International Gold Bank has decided that this shall be its value. By inflating currency, they reduce the purchasing power of the workers' dollar. The workers naturally become discontented and demand increases in wages. The Communists take advantage of the movement to advance the revolution. It has been proved that Jacob A. Schiff of Kuhn, Loeb and Company in New York financed Lenin and Trotsky through the German Westphalian Bank, which was controlled by a cousin of the American Jew, Warburg."

I thought this would be an ideal time to pop certain questions I had been holding in reserve, and I reminded him of the fantastic Trotsky story printed in Le Patriote.

"These things sometimes happen with newspapers," explained Arcand a trifle embarrassed. "There were some rumors to that effect." (Le Patriote, at the time, had prided itself on being the first paper in the world to carry this earth-shaking news.)

"There is one other story I have in mind," I continued. "In your issue of last September there appeared a note which told of plans for a Communist coup in Toronto and how they were frustrated by police vigilance. I was in Toronto at the time and I heard of no such plans."

"Premier Hepburn himself spoke about the danger of a Communist uprising," insisted Arcand. "According to the plan, the Communists were to start strikes and riots in the course of which the majority of the Liberal Cabinet were to be killed off. The surviving members were then going to set up a dictatorship."

I could not suppress a blink. "You mean to say that members of the Liberal Cabinet, people who are bitterly opposed to communism, would actually participate in a Communist plot to overthrow the government and establish a Communist dictatorship?"

"Not actually a Communist dictatorship," Arcand explained, "but one that would push towards communism. Liberalism, after all, is only a name."

"I notice that the last issue of Le Fasciste opposes the proposed military appropriation of the King government. How do you reconcile this with your rejection of French Canadian nationalism and your support of the British Empire? Are you also opposed to Britain rearming?"

"We believe that Britain has to rearm in order to defend her interests. But against whom is Canada rearming? There are only two possible sources of invasion—the United States and the Eskimos. From the latter we have nothing to fear; the former we could not hope to resist."

"I notice that your paper supports Japan against China. Would the fact that a large part of the present appropriation will be devoted to fortifying the Pacific Coast, obviously against the eventuality of war with Japan, have anything to do with your stand on the military budget?"

"No. If there actually should be a foreign invasion, Canada could not hope to add anything to the fleets of the United States and Great Britain."

"What about the fascist movement internationally?" I asked. "Do you think there will be civil war in France?"

"Much worse than in Spain," was the reply. "I expect it any time. Belgium may make a final decision this year as may also Yugoslavia and Denmark."

"What about the fascist movement in the United States?" I asked.

"In the States, too, things are rapidly approaching a climax. I would estimate that the forces of the left have 22,000,000 against 24,000,000 for the forces of the right."

"Don't you think those figures are somewhat exaggerated?" I suggested. "After all, even if we accept your characterization of the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. as Communist, their combined membership would hardly exceed 8,000,000."

"The figures I gave take into consideration their families and dependents," was Arcand's explanation.

I rose to leave. "Oh yes, one more question," I remembered. "What do you intend to do with the Jews? Kill them off?"

"The Jews? We will ship them all to Madagascar. The French and Polish governments have investigated the island and according to their report it is capable of sustaining 110,000,000 people. We will not give it to them for nothing, of course; we will make them pay for it. Rothschild personally can pay $1,000,000,000. I have nothing against the Jews as long as they leave us alone. I would like to see them all together and happy. Palestine would be all right, but it is too small."

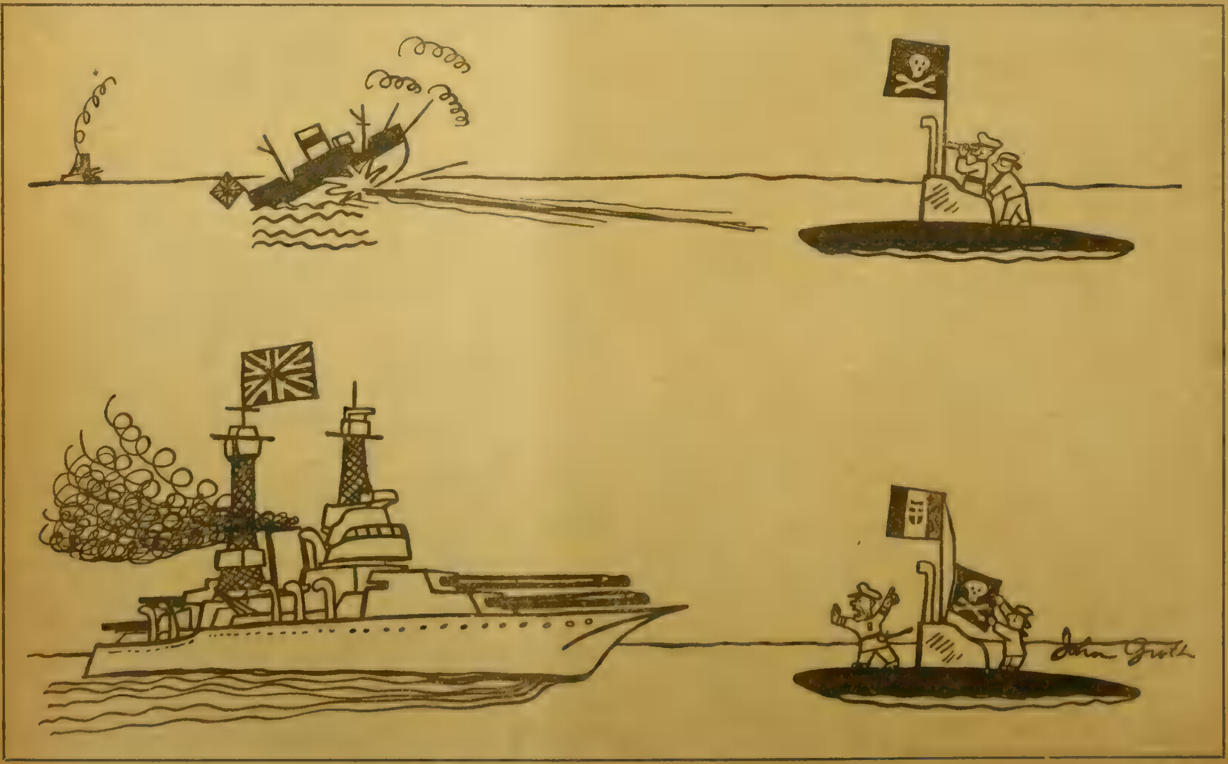
"We could put you down as a Zionist, then?" I asked.

Arcand laughed and waved his arms. "The greatest Zionist in the world!"

That is Adrien Arcand.

I also spoke to Hubert Desaulniers, provincial secretary of the C. C. F., who, ironically enough, used to sit next to Arcand in school.

"People thought that Hitler was crazy, too," Desaulniers told me. "But he took power in spite of, or perhaps rather just because of, that."



Quick-Change Act in the Mediterranean

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

I WISH that these lines might be read by every voter in the state of North Dakota. My reason is that Senator Gerald P. Nye is up for reelection this year with the primary looming quite near at hand, and I should like every voter to realize that the whole country has a stake in that election. For Gerald Nye has made himself not only one of the most valuable members of the Senate, but a great leader in the fight for peace. His loss to the Senate now, when we are being rushed into war by the utterly mistaken policy of the Administration, and especially by Secretary Hull, would be incalculable. The nation needs him, for he has refused to allow himself to be bamboozled by the militarists or by the diplomats whose statesmanship has broken down.

I well remember when Senator Nye first came to Washington twelve years ago. He seemed extremely youthful and callow; he was in fact quite inexperienced in the ways of Washington. He had not held high office before but had made his reputation as a small-town editor. He did not give the promise of Henrik Shipstead of Minnesota or of others who arrived at that time; but as the years have passed, Gerald Nye has made not only a national but actually an international reputation. No more valuable job has been done in Washington in the last quarter-century than the munitions inquiry which Nye headed. True, the idea of it did not originate with him. But he was quick to see the value of the proposal, and he accepted the task when many another would have given a dozen different reasons for declining. It meant an enormous amount of work; it meant that he would be subjected to all sorts of pressure and incur much unpopularity. But he went at the job with an understanding and courage beyond all praise. That alone should entitle him to reelection.

The repercussions of the munitions inquiry had astounding results abroad. It brought about armament inquiries in Canada and Great Britain, and in Canada resulted in regulations giving the government close control of the export of munitions—if my memory serves. In England the inquiry was soft-pedaled by the government and failed to produce the hoped-for action. I have no doubt that the facts uncovered by the Nye committee helped the government of Léon Blum in France to nationalize the munitions industries—the change is reported to be working well and to be aiding French preparedness for war. Here the inquiry made literally millions of Americans aware of the international alliances of the "merchants of death" and enormously stimulated the demand for taking the profits out of war. Its reports are sought and utilized by students of war and peace all over. With war looming on the horizon today, it would hardly be short of a crime if the voters of North Dakota should be misled into keeping Gerald Nye at home.

There is unfortunately some danger of that, for it is to be a three-cornered fight. The Senator may have to run independently. If the men he has exposed and thwarted can contrive it, he will be defeated. Certainly the munitions makers would not be above sending money into his state to defeat him, and the war-makers among us would hail his defeat as a turning of the tide, as proof that America has become war-minded and that therefore they can go ahead with their schemes to have us at war within three months. But it is not only the militarists who would rejoice. They are not the only ones who have found that they cannot control the Senator from North Dakota. Nye was chairman of the Senate committee which ferreted out the Continental Trading Company during the oil scandals. This led to the jailing of Sinclair, the removal of Robert Stewart as president of the Standard Oil of Indiana, the recovery of millions in taxes for the government, and the preservation of oil resources worth hundreds of millions of dollars. Always a liberal and a progressive, he has never let his being a Republican keep him from being independent. He has voted for New Deal measures whenever he could, but he has also courageously criticized the National Labor Relations Board, the NRA, or any other New Deal creation whenever his conscience told him to do so. That is the great thing about Gerald Nye—he votes not as he is told to vote but as his conscience dictates; and that is so rare a quality that it would call for his reelection even if his career had been quite inconspicuous.

Of course Nye has made mistakes. Who has not? Who could find his way through the economic confusion and turmoil of this day and generation, the welter of legislation of every conceivable kind with which a member of Congress is confronted today, without making mistakes? I have had a long and unusual experience with issues and men in this country and abroad, yet I realize clearly how inadequate I should be in dozens of fields if I were suddenly dropped into a seat in Congress and told to help legislate for the benefit of all the people. Nye has really done his best. No one has ever questioned in my presence his absolute courage, sincerity, and honesty, qualities which should win him forgiveness for many more mistakes than he has made. They tell me he has done a lot for his state, getting much federal aid and money. I do not doubt it, but that seems to me far less important than the things I have recited. Liberals everywhere who can help in any way to keep Senator Nye in the Senate should not lose a moment in getting to work.

BOOKS and the ARTS

COLUMNISTS ON PARADE

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

AN AUSTRIAN friend has remarked that if America had coffee houses it would not have columnists. But we have no coffee houses and we do have columnists. Their words, sentences, paragraphs—the model syndicated column should be capable of being cut in lengths, like yard goods—fall into the minds of millions every day. One cannot read a column of Hugh Johnson's without being convinced that the General is convinced that he is riding that mettlesome steed Public Opinion. One cannot help wondering if he really is.

The syndicated column as we know it is largely a postwar growth; the Lippmann-Thompson variety is a product of the past few years. "Most anything" columns of verse and aphoristic comment were once typical. B. L. T., F. P. A., Don Marquis, and H. I. Phillips have been in that line, and the commentator goes far back into our journalistic history. It persists locally—Jack Raper's column in the Cleveland Press which is called "Most Anything" is said to be the oldest continuous one of this type; but it does not syndicate well. The pseudo-sophisticated gossip of O. O. McIntyre or Walter Winchell was better suited to the uses of commercialization than what was by comparison the column of an age of innocence. McIntyre, who has just died, had the widest circulation of all with the possible exception of Dorothy Dix, who is an exception any way you look at it. (She is a real person and has been advising the lovelorn since the nineties.) McIntyre's column was dispensed to 508 newspapers having a circulation of 15,000,000; its appearance was two weeks removed from its writing and much farther removed from reality. That was its appeal. But the political columns seem to be operating in a rising market. The Washington Merry-Go-Round by Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen appears in 313 newspapers (circulation nearly 12,000,000). Paul Mallon's distributors claim for his News Behind the News 200 newspapers, which sounds plausible, with a circulation of 25,000,000, which doesn't. But though concerned with politics, these columns fall more accurately into the category of gossip. They have also gone in for prediction. Some trace this to the Winchell influence and predict decline on the ground that the public doesn't forget as quickly as the predictors suppose. The literary column never had anything like prosperity. The "inspirational" column had a heyday with Frank Crane, whose circulation is said to have rivaled that of Lippmann; it has found a new prophet in Dale Carnegie, who has been hired by 200 newspapers in three months, while the rising tide of Frank Buchman's pabulum—"The secret of changing human nature and giving everyone a new start" (Advt.)—suggests another candidate.

Syndicates and syndicated columns are naturals in a country of prodigious size and high technique. Their growth also coincided with the commercialization of journalism. In this process the independent editor went down as a public figure. The editorial page as it flourished under Greeley, Godkin, Watterson, and Villard faded out in newspapers confronted with ever-mounting costs and depending for their main support on advertising. Today's social-political columnists are in one sense substitutes for yesterday's fighting editors—with a difference which will appear as this series proceeds. Certainly they demonstrate that the demand for personality and strong opinion persists.

Every field has its commentators from Hollywood to science. They may be divided into the gossipers who dispense a soothing opiate of vicarious experiences of the rich and famous, whose function merges into that of the pulps; the service trade; and the Molders of Public Opinion. Here is a list of representative molders in the big press with their alleged circulations:

Free lance, mainly political
Walter Lippmann	160	newspapers	8,000,000
Dorothy Thompson	140	"	7,500,000
Hugh S. Johnson	67	"	4,179,583
Boake Carter	92	"	11,000,000
*Writers from Washington
Mark Sullivan	54	newspapers	4,000,000
Frank Kent	112	"	7,000,000
David Lawrence	100	"	3,000,000
Raymond Clapper	49	"	3,653,385
Free lance, personal
Westbrook Pegler	110	newspapers	5,907,389
Heywood Broun	42	"	2,829,487
Inspirational
Dale Carnegie	200	newspapers
Unique
Eleanor Roosevelt	62	newspapers	4,034,552

*Walter Lippmann, I understand, has just moved to Washington.

Two columnists just budding into syndication seem to indicate minor trends. The two have nothing in common except that they are both tories and both write only once a week. George Sokolsky, who speaks for an intensified reaction, has landed in twenty-five newspapers in a year, which is accounted good for a weekly column. Lucius Beebe has only ten papers, which nevertheless must make him feel almost common; and within his little kingdom he is something of a cult. Will his New York fill the place of O. O. McIntyre's west of the Hudson? The smart sets of Fort Worth and Kansas City swear by him, and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch printed the New Yorker Profile in full, with a four-column photograph. In Detroit no paper subscribes to his super-sophisticated fare, but all the papers, I was told, send reporters to meet him when he comes to town. Mr. Sokolsky is met by a different set—the Weirs and Girdlers. His most flaunted proof that he knows what he is talking about when he denounces labor unions and the left is that he used to associate with radicals himself. Since then he has crawled so far back into the womb of capitalist reaction and Jewish orthodoxy that he can easily be mistaken for a feudal remnant. From his warm retreat he recently announced: "I recognize Herbert Hoover as my leader in the Republican Party . . . its vital intellectual force." As I write his scope is being extended, by radio. In the language of Variety:

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

> National Association of Manufacturers is gifting stations with free transcriptions to propagandize the N. A. M.'s economic views. George E. Sokolsky talks on the quarter-hour discs, . . . 235 stations around the country have agreed to carry the wax series on a once weekly basis.

Much of my factual information has come from the offices of syndicates, notably all figures, and the atmosphere of a syndicate office may be described as fond, like that of a champion's dressing-room. "Odd" McIntyre was the star at McNaught's. Eleanor Roosevelt, though her circulation is smaller than some, is tops at United Features, where she is called a "great trouper" and where her two remarks on being approached with trepidation for a newspaper diary are office lore. The first was, "When do I start?" The second was, "What's the deadline?" She never misses deadlines and she never "pulls a prima donna." When I called Walter Winchell's secretary, the warm air rolled right into the telephone. He is syndicated in over a hundred newspapers and he appears, believe it or not, in London, Honolulu, and Paris. In French? In this atmosphere figures expand, and while they indicate relative popularity, since the air of one syndicate is perhaps no warmer than that of another, they cannot be taken literally.

In an age of transition, in which propaganda has become a decisive force, today's journalism helps, if only by a molecular process, to shape tomorrow's society. It is clear that the commentators must rise to eligibility through the selective mechanism of an industry which has huge investments to defend and adheres to Elisha Hanson's interpretation of freedom of the press. Are they merely the froth on the beer? Or do they have an independent function in a democracy that does not know where it is going and is only less ignorant of where it has come from? Do they express public opinion? Do they influence it? What is public opinion?

The current search for definitions has become so feverish and so fashionable that the blunt citizen is in danger of turning anti-semantic, but when it is not an escape it has its uses. Dr. Gallup had no ready definition of public opinion but agreed tentatively that it might be defined as that part of mass opinion which has means of expressing itself. Mass opinion presumably expressed itself rather widely in the last election—and was completely at odds with public opinion as represented by the dominant press. A new poll just taken by Dr. Gallup's institute indicates that in spite of the hammering of the press, including the commentators, mass opinion is still with Roosevelt in almost exactly the same proportion as on Election Day, 1936. If the C. I. O. had a newspaper comparable to the New York Times in size and prestige a great new sector of mass opinion might be given voice. But that is a good many strikes in the future.

This latest Gallup poll speaks badly for the influence of the Molders of Public Opinion. Fortune, in a survey published in January, 1937, calculated that the leading columns were read regularly by only 15 per cent of the adult public. It also said that 66.3 per cent of the "politically definite" readers of Brisbane, since deceased, voted for Roosevelt; 32 per cent of the Lippmann clientele did likewise. The Brisbane figure is interesting because the Hearst papers have a mass rather than a "class" circulation. Mr. Lippmann once wrote a book called "The Phantom Public." The findings of Dr. Gallup and Fortune suggest a Phantom Press and even a Phantom Lippmann. But this cannot be. The Public, the Press, and Lippmann are too much with us.

Whatever the facts, the columnist writes as if he were molding public opinion. This high consciousness is indeed one attribute of the columnist. If we think of public opinion as a whole herd of horses of many different colors, are Thompson, Pegler, Lippmann, Johnson, and the others expert horsemen, wielding the crop of free speech, reining their chargers toward the America of the future? Or are those gay-colored horses mounted on a merry-go-round with central music? Or both? The columnists themselves may yield some answers. Beginning with the mellow holiday season, when columnists, like other human beings, begin all over again, let us review their talk of the past few weeks. We should be out of the trenches by Easter.

[Next week: Westbrook Pegler.]

BOOKS

The Revised Communist Faith

THE PEOPLE'S FRONT. By Earl Browder. International Publishers. $2.75.

SINCE Mr. Browder is not only the most official but also the ablest spokesman of Communist policy and strategy in this country, it is valuable to have his addresses and essays of the past two years gathered together in book form. "The People's Front" offers the thoughtful reader the opportunity to make a careful examination of the tenets of the revised Communist faith and to analyze its implications.

The burden of all Mr. Browder's utterances can be summed up in two categories. The one deals particularly with foreign policy and is expressed in the title of his book. The other is concerned with domestic policy and is summarized in the slogan of the party: "Communism is twentieth-century Americanism." That is, the Communist Party offers itself as a vanguard of the forces of democracy, seeking by the policy of collective security to stop the fascist nations before they engulf the world in war; within the nation it presents itself as a force "continuing the traditions of 1776 and 1861; it is really the only organization entitled by its program and work to designate itself as 'the sons and daughters of the American Revolution.' "

The foreign policy of "collective security" so strongly advocated by Mr. Browder is too well known to require elaboration. It is a policy, he declares, "which will keep America out of war by keeping war out of the world." This line requires that a significant distinction be made between the peace-loving democratic nations and the "fascist war-makers." While this is an obvious, though not an admitted, deviation from orthodox Marxism, which allows for no distinctions between types of capitalistic imperialism, it may be well to waive that point for the moment. As one who is in general agreement with the policy of bringing collective pressure to bear upon the fascist powers, the writer's difficulty with Mr. Browder's position lies in what seems to be a certain lack of candor in presenting it.

There is no suggestion anywhere that the peace-loving nations love peace not so much because they are democratic as because they are the satisfied imperial powers. Failure to mention this point makes it impossible to assess correctly the possibilities of making collective security effective. The fact is that the so-called democratic powers have failed in every significant instance to use their economic power against fascist aggression. They want peace no doubt, but inner contradictions in their class structure make it impossible for them to proceed resolutely against the fascist nations. Instead, they build up huge armaments for an eventual conflict. Mr. Browder declares himself opposed to an increase of armaments but it cannot be said that the party is very vehement upon that point.

The simple reason is that while the party sincerely wants peace it also wants powerful allies on the side of Russia in an eventual conflict. In other words, the fortuitous alliance between Russia and the satisfied imperial powers makes impossible a completely realistic analysis of the present international situation from the official Communist perspective. It would be a splendid thing if we could stop the fascist nations by collective action. But the time for doing that is rapidly running out. If war should come upon us because of this failure of the democratic capitalist powers, the question is whether the workers should be encouraged to participate in it or not. Upon that question Mr. Browder is silent. If the present line were followed consistently it would lead to a participation in the war on the side of democracy against fascism. But to advocate it would require something more than a careful choice of proof texts from Marx and Lenin. It would necessitate a drastic and obvious revision of Marxian theory.

In domestic politics Mr. Browder's espousal of the formation of a Farmer-Labor Party and the cooperation of his party with it leads him to an appreciation of the American revolutionary tradition which carries him rather far beyond Marxian analysis. "Lincoln," he declares, "carried the fight against reaction to the American masses. He roused and mobilized them for an offensive against tyranny, for liberty and democracy." One would not guess that the Republican Party of Lincoln's day, which Mr. Browder counts as a banner bearer in the revolutionary history of the country, was composed of Northern industrialists and Western farmers and that the dominance of the former in its councils is responsible for the gradual reactionary corruption of that party, a development which Mr. Browder regards as "one of the ironies of history."

The present party line is probably more correct and fruitful than the old one. It is probably both pedagogically and historically correct to relate the struggle of the worker to the previous struggles of bourgeois democracy, as a new chapter in an essentially progressive development. But if this revision of policy is not undertaken with complete candor, the task of relating the worker's cause to that of the farmer for instance is obscured. Mr. Browder does not allude in a single page to the desperate difficulty of bridging the chasm between the small farmer and the worker, a difficulty vividly illustrated by the tension between the Radical Socialists and the Socialists and Communists of France. Fascism can probably be avoided only if a way of cooperation between the radical workers and the petty bourgeoisie is found. But that difficult problem can only be solved by conscious and candid revisions of party platforms and by analyses which recognize basic incompatibilities between these two groups.

It is unseemly for a very unorthodox Marxian to engage in heresy hunting, but while on the subject of candor it does seem strange that an obvious revision of the party line is never admitted. On the contrary, Mr. Browder consistently maintains that the Trotskyites are merely fascist allies and that his group alone follows the orthodox Leninist line.

A few quotations comparing Mr. Browder's present sentiments with official Marxian doctrine will reveal the extent to which he has gone in making communism respectable.

Mr. Browder declares:

> The Communist Party is not a conspirative organization, it is an open revolutionary party, continuing the traditions of 1776 and 1861. . . . The Communist Party is a legal party and defends its legality.

Lenin on the other hand has this to say on legality:

> The crisis has shown that the bourgeoisie is violating legality in every country, including the freest, and that it is impossible to lead the masses toward revolution without creating an illegal organization for preaching organizing, discussing, preparing revolutionary means of struggle.

Mr. Browder writes of democracy:

> It is a popular superstition, which it is the main task of our party to dispel, that Communists are anti-democratic. This arises from a vulgar interpretation of our slogan of the dictatorship of the proletariat as the means of transition to socialism. The Communists are not and have never been anti-democratic. The Communist program is only realizable through the fullest possible extension of democracy and the realization of democracy on a scale which has not been dreamed of in this country.

Lenin says upon this point:

> What forms a necessary aspect or a necessary condition of dictatorship is the forcible suppression of exploiters as a class and consequently an infringement of pure democracy, that is, of equality and freedom in respect to that class. . . . Kautsky has evaded this, the only important theoretical question. He has quoted all sorts of passages from Marx and Engels except the one relating to the subject and quoted by me. He talks about everything which may be pleasant to bourgeois liberals and democrats and does not go beyond their system of ideas. As for the main thing, namely, that the proletariat cannot triumph without forcibly suppressing its enemies and that where there is forcible suppression there is of course no "freedom," no democracy—this Kautsky did not understand.

Mr. Browder declares:

> The Communist Party repudiates now as in the past all theories and proposals looking toward the forcible imposition of socialism or any Utopia upon the majority of the people. We repudiate the "reckless resolve to seize power" by any minority.

Lenin says:

> To suppose that in any serious revolution the issue is decided by the simple relation between majority and minority is the acme of stupidity, a typical delusion of an ordinary bourgeois liberal. . . . The truth is that in any and every serious revolution a long, obstinate, desperate resistance of the exploiters, who for many years will yet enjoy great advantages over the exploited, constitutes the rule. Never except in the sentimental Utopia of the sentimental M. Kautsky will the exploiters submit to the decision of the exploited majority without making use of their advantages in the last desperate battle or series of battles.

I suspect that Mr. Browder still agrees with this analysis but he obscures the reality of his agreement with vague phrases about democracy as the rule of "the people." What people? He declares:

> So long as the people can control their government there will be no necessity of a bloody revolution. If capitalists would submit to the decisions of the American people the change to socialism will be bloodless.

Everywhere Mr. Browder artfully implies though he does not say that communism will fight reaction only if reaction seeks to overthrow a constitutionally created government as in Spain. Surely this is not the authentic position of communism on the role of democracy in the class struggle.

On the question of religion Mr. Browder declares:

> The reason the church suffered from the revolution in Russia was because it was a state church. If the church separates itself from the state and confines itself to the proper sphere of religion it has nothing to complain of anywhere.

He adds what seems to me a perfect gem of understatement:

> We Communists, in general, are not adherents of any church. In this respect we follow the example of Abraham Lincoln and Thomas Paine.

Lenin says:

> The masses must be provided with every species of atheist propaganda . . . must be approached by every possible avenue in order to kindle their interest, waken them from their religious slumber, in short, arouse them by every possible approach and in every conceivable way.

One may, as the present writer does, find more numerous points of agreement with this Stalinist revisionism than with the original and purer Marxism. But is any good purpose served in insisting that this is not revisionism and in pouring vituperation upon the more orthodox sects of the true faith? What we need is a rigorous comparison between the old Social Democratic position and the present Communist position. There are probably important differences. But there are also interesting and disturbing similarities. Are these similarities prompted by the rise of fascism as a dynamic anti-democratic movement or by the development of Russia as a "satisfied" world power? Perhaps a still more important question is whether either or both of these new factors justify a policy which was once condemned as "social fascism."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

How Strong Is It?

The HOUSE that HITLER BUILT

BY STEPHEN H. ROBERTS

"This book is required reading for all intelligent readers who look anxiously at the European scene."—James C. Grey, N.Y. Sun

ENGLAND and AMERICA BOTH HAIL IT AS "THE BEST"

ENGLAND

"Undoubtedly one of the most careful and impartial studies of the German situation."
—Sir Norman Angell

"Most readable and reliable book on Nazism that has yet appeared."
—Times Literary Supplement

"The most readable, balanced, best written book on Nazi Germany."
—London Mercury

AMERICA

"Easily one of the best-informed and best-balanced books we have had. Mr. Roberts' appreciation of the realities of the situation is uncommonly keen."
—Prof. William L. Langer, N. Y. Herald Tribune "Books"

"A miracle of objectivity. His indictment derives its strength from the sobriety with which it is prepared and presented."
—T. R. Ybarra, N. Y. Times Book Review

$3.00 • HARPERS

A noted philosopher illumines the four roads to a philosophical understanding of life. . . .

FOUR WAYS OF PHILOSOPHY

By IRWIN EDMAN

Author of The Mind of Paul, Richard Kane Looks at Life, etc.

One of the best reviewed books of the year

THE NATION: "A brilliant interpretative study. . . . The intelligent layman will have to go far to find a comparable introduction to the systems of thought whose vital nerves are here so deftly laid bare."—Sidney Hook.

NEW REPUBLIC: "He is one of those rarities, a schoolman who writes for the worldly reader . . . relates philosophy to the rest of life, and yet does not offer the pre-digested pap with which the victims of philosophy courses are so frequently served."—Eliseo Vivas.

SATURDAY REVIEW: "Golden words from a thoroughly contemporary oracle on the ultimate themes of human life and destiny."—Harold A. Larrabee.

DOROTHY CANFIELD: "Not to be missed by anyone of mature intelligence."—Book-of-the-Month Club News. 331 pages, $2.00 at all bookstores

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY
257 Fourth Ave., New York

Defoe—Man of the People

DEFOE. By James Sutherland. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

THE life and career of Daniel Defoe were marked by a clear consistency. He never rose to the heights of expression or to the greatness of mind achieved by his contemporaries Dryden and Swift; but on the other hand he never sank to the peevishness and the sheer spite of Pope. In the midst of the most severe frustrations and of startling threats to life and fortune, he retained a calm sanity of thought and behavior. He was in fact the physical realization of the true-born Englishman. This circumstance makes him significant, for, as Professor Sutherland clearly points out, Defoe was not a writer of the first genius but rather a mirror of the normal life and thought of his time. The soaring ideals of political reform and toleration of the earlier Puritans become in his words and deeds practical schemes for harmony at home and dignified peace abroad. His Essay on Projects, in youthful days, and his Augusta Triumphans, in later life, reveal a homely and immediately practicable concern for humane objectives and for modes of daily life designed to make human relationships more happy and profitable. He offers plans for the building of a vast system of good roads that will encourage free travel and bring the people of all England into fruitful acquaintance; he advocates institutions for the care of the feeble-minded; he proposes the establishment of academies for the more thorough study and wider diffusion of useful knowledge; he urges the founding of schools for the education of women; he suggests that there should be a university in London intended for those who enjoy fewer social privileges than the students at Oxford and Cambridge but who have greater desire for useful knowledge; and he considers reforms in court procedures designed to protect simple men from injustice and to bring malefactors, particularly street robbers, to speedier justice. Occasionally, indeed, he joins daring with practical convenience, as when he discusses a rudimentary league of nations, or economic boycotts, or government regulation of employment and business methods.

The Defoe that is most widely known is the victim of the pillory and the author of "Robinson Crusoe" and "Moll Flanders." To many he is either the ardent and indiscreet dissenter or the author of an adventure to beguile youth or a moralistic saga of a penitent prostitute. Too few know the Defoe of the projects or the brilliant and copious journalist of the Review. Cognizant of this fact, Professor Sutherland has devoted most of his book to a detailed presentation of Defoe's services to politics and of his multifarious pamphlets and periodicals. He has accomplished his purpose admirably, and though there are other excellent books on Defoe, notably the study by Paul Dottin, this volume easily takes its place as the best current presentation of an exceedingly involved subject. It has both learning and charm of style.

In his zeal to give his readers a full and accurate picture of Defoe the public man and journalist, the author has neglected, quite deliberately it appears, to present a complete account of Defoe's work as a writer of fiction. What discussion there is is effective in its analysis of style and its description of plots. In fact, it is so satisfactory that the reader regrets the absence of a fuller discussion of Defoe's relation to the picaresque type, the failure to develop more thoroughly the relation between the brief biographies of criminals and the longer narratives, the omission of any reference to Jonathan Wild and Peter the Great, and the lack of a completer statement of Defoe's place in the development of English fiction.

To ask for more from Professor Sutherland, however, is not to plead like Oliver Twist, out of hunger unsatisfied, but rather to sigh like the gourmet, out of taste delighted.

DONALD A. ROBERTS

The Business Liberal

A HISTORY OF THE BUSINESS MAN. By Miriam Beard. The Macmillan Company. $5.

OTHERS have already praised this work as one of profound philosophical insight into the theory of business enterprise, saying, "From any point of view, historical, literary, or philosophical, this book is a superb achievement." It remains for someone to praise it for what it is. Perhaps Miss Beard's reviewers are arrested by the thought that in questioning her achievement they are inviting replies from the entire literary company of which she is merely an outpost; father, mother, brother, and husband, scribes all, are indeed formidable, but surely the author herself would be the first to dismiss such uncritical encomiums.

It would have been more enlightening had most reviewers imitated the well-known minister who was accustomed, you remember, to defend himself during visits to the new parents among his parishioners by gazing admiringly at the infant and saying, "Well, that is a baby." This is a book—765 pages, filled with the scholarship of eight years. The author, no philosopher, has written a spicy narrative, a chronicle of the goings-on of the business man through the ages, from Ur of the Chaldees to the day after tomorrow.

And yet Miss Beard, too balanced and balancing a personality to welcome fulsome praise, clearly aspires to a reputation for insight into our present problems. It is with respect to that aspiration and its imprint on her work that it seems worth while to criticize her. Only at intervals in the chronicle does she pause to reflect her own views, but by piecing together these interludes, and by summing up the turns of phrase throughout the remainder of the work, some implicit substitute for an explicit philosophy may be reconstructed.

From this reconstruction Miss Beard emerges as a representative of that interesting species which adorns our era, the business liberal. The reader will search the book in vain for any demonstration that the author can envisage a world without business men. So great is her compassion for the class that a thousand fallen—whose falls she narrates, often with loud whoops—are as nothing beside one regenerate.

This produces a curious effect: first we have the theme, Business we have always with us; the more it changes the more it is the same. And then: "As far as historic record goes, there is no reason to suppose that American business must necessarily imitate any other type; indeed, if business history shows anything, it demonstrates the uniqueness of each people in its economic-social development, despite general trends and universal communication." Mark the words "necessarily" and "imitate" as reflections of this free-will attitude of the business liberal. Self-determination leads us (business men) to be isolationists and nationalists. This capacity characterizes the picture-book world she unfolds. In her universe there is no full-bodied inhabitant except the business man. The rest are paper cut-outs.

Her publishers celebrate the fact that this book is "not written around a rigid thesis," and perhaps the juxtaposition of two quotations, one from Miss Beard and the other from

Veblen, will show what it means to be a business liberal. By the round word rather than the sharp one, by the long view of the Olympian rather than the next step of the market-place, the business liberal achieves a release from necessity which abstracts her also from reality. Her "morality" is performed by her rational hero the Business Man, and in the following passage there appear the irrational, blood-lusty villains, the "old foes of business, the warriors." Time, the present:

> Empire thus proved as dangerous as Nature [she means "natural law"] to business. A device potent in rousing masses to cheer for war and support a capitalism which seemed to serve some higher purpose than profits, it had its menacing aspects. The symbol of Empire awakened dark forces of blood-lust, irrational mysticism, and pride of race. Above all, it gave increased power, in England as in Germany and elsewhere, to the old foes of business, the warriors, and shed a fresh glamor upon coronets, steel helmets, and massed banners. In this lay portents beyond the estimates of actuaries.

Compare this with Veblen, writing in 1904 on the same subject, in the closing pages of "The Theory of Business Enterprise":

> The quest of profits leads to a predatory national policy. The resulting large fortunes call for a massive government apparatus to secure the accumulations, on the one hand, and for large and conspicuous opportunities to spend the resulting income, on the other hand; which means a militant, coercive home administration and something in the way of an imperial court life—a dynastic fountain of honor and a courtly bureau of ceremonial amenities. Such an ideal is not simply a moralist's day dream; it is a sound business proposition, in that it lies on the line of policy along which the business interests are moving in their own behalf. If national (that is to say, dynastic) ambitions and warlike aims, achievements, spectacles, and discipline be given a large place in the community's life, together with the concomitant coercive police surveillance, there is a fair hope that the disintegrating trend of the machine discipline may be corrected.

R. K. LAMB

Guide to Relief

AMERICA ON RELIEF. By Marie Dresden Lane and Francis Steegmuller. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THE WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION IN NEW YORK CITY. By John D. Millett. Published for the Committee on Public Administration of the Social Security Council by Public Administration Service. $3.

THE first book is a highly useful handbook to relief in America. And what is more important, perhaps, it points the way to a future relief program based not upon the expediencies of the moment but on the long-time needs revealed during the past six years.

Mrs. Lane is a social worker of broad experience and background. She has definite ideas about the administration of relief, and she appealed to Mr. Steegmuller to put them into readable form. While she is critical of many phases of the federal relief program she recognizes frankly that the mistakes which have been made have come out of the very circumstances under which the system was established.

What is essential, in Mrs. Lane's interpretation, is to benefit by these mistakes. It is made abundantly clear that now is the time to revise the relief system from top to bottom. What we have today is still a stop-gap. On the relief rolls are thousands upon thousands of individuals who

THE OPEN ROAD
shows you more than tourist sights
at least cost of time and money.

EUROPE • MEXICO
• SOVIET UNION •

Small travel groups recruited from the professions—authoritative leaders assisted by cultured native guides—social contact with people of each country.

DENMARK, SWEDEN, NORWAY, under leadership of Prof. Hartley W. Cross. Cities and countryside including Norway's fjords and mountains. Study of cooperatives and folk schools. Sailing July 2, returning Aug. 29.

PUBLIC HOUSING IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND. Auspices National Public Housing Conference. Sailing June 29, returning Aug. 2.

FOURTH ANNUAL TRAVEL COLLECTIVE IN THE SOVIET UNION, under leadership of Dr. Joshua Kunitz. Leningrad, Moscow, Ukraine, Caucasus, Soviet Armenia, Crimea. Sailing July 6, returning Sept. 1.

THE SOVIET UNION, under leadership of Dr. F. Tredwell Smith. Leningrad, Moscow, Volga, Caucasus, Soviet Armenia, Crimea, Kiev, etc. Sailing July 2, returning Aug. 30.

MEXICO, under leadership of Julien Bryan. More than a month in the cities and native villages. Sailing July 7, returning Aug. 17.

For rates and descriptive circulars on these and other trips address:

THE OPEN ROAD
DEPT. C
8 W. 40th ST.
NEW YORK
Cooperating in the Soviet Union with Intourist

Rally to Keep America Out of War!
Speakers
Senator Robert M. LaFollette
Oswald Garrison Villard
Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers
Ernest L. Meyer
Homer Martin
Norman Thomas
John T. Flynn
Bertram Wolfe
SUNDAY, MARCH 6—2:30 P.M.
N. Y. HIPPODROME—43rd St. and 6th Ave.
Admission Free . . . Reserved Sections, $1, 50¢, 25¢ at all McBride Ticket Agencies, or write Keep America Out of War Committee, 242 East 14th Street, phone CHelsea 2-9174.

SEE AMERICA IN TRANSITION
Summer Traveling Economic Seminar

SEMINAR I —THE SOUTH. Washington, TVA, Sharecropper Country, Harlan County. July 5-30.

SEMINAR II —PACIFIC NORTHWEST. Bonneville, Grand Coulee, Great Inland Empire. Industrial and labor problems in Butte, Spokane, Seattle, Portland, Tacoma. Inspiring Interludes with Nature. August 1-26.

SEMINAR III—THE EAST. New York City, New England. Housing, Cooperatives, Marketing, Studies of Leading Industries. Last Two Weeks with Wellesley Institute for Social Progress. June 24-July 23.

The Directors Know Their Fields. You Confer with the Leaders Who Are Rebuilding America. Modest Cost.

Write to RELIGION AND LABOR FOUNDATION
87 ORANGE STREET NEW HAVEN, CONN.

will never be reemployed in industry again. Nor are they eligible for the benefits established under the social-security program. They are, many of them, in that unhappy twilight zone between forty-five and sixty-five. Or they are incapacitated by illness or injury. Or there is no longer any demand for their skills.

It is not only cruel but inefficient to keep these individuals on an impermanent relief basis. If they have not succeeded in establishing their employability under the Works Progress Administration, they are in most instances at the mercy of local relief agencies. And in a great many, perhaps the majority, of communities that means in this winter of the "recession" a precarious existence close to starvation.

Certain major changes are necessary within the relief administration itself. Mrs. Lane shows that the so-called sewing projects, enrolling some 200,000 women, are "an expensive and unfruitful blind alley." Although the word is not used, they appear to be a form of boondoggling out of which comes very little that is socially useful. Mrs. Lane makes specific recommendations for caring for the women who cling to the sewing projects. Social-security grants to mothers with dependent children should be liberalized. Projects of definite community service should be established. Mrs. Lane recognizes clearly that to many women the sewing projects represent the first security they have ever known. But it is a security which is delusive, since obviously this particular form of emergency work relief cannot be sustained indefinitely.

If relief has done nothing else it has shown the basic needs and desires that have long gone unfulfilled in America. In setting forth these long-time needs, against the relief picture, the authors perform an invaluable service. First and foremost is the appalling lack of medical care. Thousands of persons who had never had any medical attention whatsoever besieged the relief offices. And only slightly less conspicuous is the glaring want of educational facilities to supply the special needs and desires of millions of Americans. Vocational training and adult education have scarcely got a start.

No one connected with the problem of relief can afford to ignore the concluding chapter, Next Steps. Expressed here, forcefully and concisely, are the recommendations that have come out of Mrs. Lane's experience. First she suggests the establishment of a commission to make a thorough study and evaluation of the whole relief program. This study would be the basis of a long-range program which would be coordinated with all forms of public assistance

It should be added that although Mrs. Lane is a social worker, the book displays no unwarranted social-work bias. And it is written in language that the layman as well as the specialist can understand. A guide through the complex mazes of FERA, CWA, and WPA, the book points the way to what may eventually be another alphabetical combination.

Mr. Millett presents a comprehensive survey of the WPA in New York City, where nearly 250,000 persons have been employed and one-seventh of all Works Progress funds have been spent. This book, too, should be very useful to those who are concerned with the future of relief. Mr. Millett makes the sound point that no attempt to revise or abolish the WPA should be made until the Administration has decided upon a basic philosophy concerning relief. In the past it has been the sudden shape-ups that have been most disastrous to relief administration.

MARQUIS W. CHILDS

Oxonians in the Depression

STARTING POINT. By C. Day Lewis. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

NOVELS concerning youth formerly had to do with their psychological problems; today they deal with the methods by which youth comes to understand a difficult world. Here, as in his first novel, C. Day Lewis chooses for his characters the young Oxford intellectuals whom he knows best. His thesis lies in the quotation from Franz Kafka which introduces the story: "From a certain point onward there is no longer any turning back. That is the point that must be reached."

Anthony, the young idealist and liberal, turns finally to socialism and the book ends with his going to fight for Loyalist Spain. But Lewis is well aware that many educated young men do not fit so easily into the modern heroic pattern. Each has his own "starting-point." For Theodore, the son of the sophisticated actress Harriet Blair, that point is in childhood: a memory half-thrilling and half-terrifying causes him to kill his mother and himself. He is the ivory-tower artist who never matures and whom neither egotism nor success can shelter. Henry, an innocent, cannot be protected from his sense of insufficiency and sin. Tragedy leads him into the monastery. John, a socialist in college and a scientist, becomes the man who conforms to keep his position and support his wife and children. Anthony alone, of whom it would least be expected, grows finally to complete political awareness. He undertakes the small problem of reforming the conditions of the tenant farmers on his father's estate and learns the strength of the economic structure he wants to change. A scab in the general strike, he meets the strikers face to face and against his better judgment accepts their terms.

Lewis writes a very competent prose. He chooses his [illegible] well, and his psychological motivation is subtle and convincing. Some of his dialogue is brilliant and some is merely pseudo-intellectual. But certain scenes, undramatic in themselves, are so well handled that they remain unforgettable. Theodore, playing ping-pong as if his life depended on his winning against the champion player in the boys' club run by Henry, is both ridiculous and pathetic; Theodore is also symbolic of the blind hatred between the classes. Murder scenes are difficult to make convincing, but Lewis has so well motivated Theodore's relation to his mother and his essential childishness that the reader believes in the horror and rebellion in which Theodore commits his crime. The scenes in Anthony's home between Brenda and her brother and John are humorous, real, and very human. Nothing is overemphasized or poeticized in this book. The novelist achieves his effects quietly, and largely by the careful selection of small details which slowly build to a full awareness on the reader's part of the characters and their potentialities for action. The novel, on its own small scale, is successful. Lewis attempts no portrayal of people or situations with which he is not entirely familiar. He has undertaken to analyze the position of the Oxford student and graduate in the late economic crisis. If he is a little less successful with his women characters than with his men, it is obviously because he is most sensitive to the ways in which the young man confronts life. The book is readable; the narrative grows steadily into greater intensity. There is no doubt that Lewis, who has not betaken himself to the realms of legend and allegory for his method, but portrays naturalistically what he has studied, is a thoroughly good, though not a great, novelist.

EDA LOU WALTON

BURLINGAME

DRAMA

More Rope and Less Sauce

INA CLAIRE is even more charming than usual in a witty play called "Once Is Enough" (Henry Miller's Theater). The author is Frederick Lonsdale, and as rational entertainment there is little or nothing to be said against it. From the standpoint of the reviewer it does, however, suffer from one very grave defect. Twelve hours after the fall of the final curtain I am already finding it difficult to separate this particular play from various other comedies by Mr. Lonsdale, or from dozens of others which he will probably get around to later.

The heroine is a wise and beautiful woman (she always is) whose husband has been observed dining in Soho with someone else (he always does) not worthy of him (she invariably isn't). So far I am indubitably right, but unfortunately as right about many other plays as I am about this one, and I must distinguish. The question which arises is this: Does she bring him to his senses by flirting with some one else? Now that the question is asked I do remember. She does not. She belongs, not to the "sauce for the goose" school of thought, but to the "give him enough rope" school. She is as nice and reasonable—in a thoroughly cattish way—as anyone could possibly be, and in due course the erring husband comes to his senses. To say this is to separate "Once Is Enough" from half the plays that are like it, but I find it difficult to go any farther.

And is this what I call "a rational entertainment"? It is. Mr. Lonsdale may not say anything new, but what he says he says well and the lesson he tries to teach is one which has never been learned. Comedy writers may have been telling us for a good many centuries that we ought to be sensible about things like this, but so far as I can judge from the newspapers even the best people who sit in orchestra seats often forget what they have applauded at the end of innumerable evenings. The wronged wife very frequently sends for her lawyer instead of either stirring up a sauce or letting out more rope; the injured husband goes out to buy a pistol instead of remembering that what a gentleman really ought to do under such circumstances is to tap a cigarette thoughtfully on a monogrammed case while suggesting that they talk this thing out. Comedy which is even moderately well written always seems new for the simple reason that it represents people as behaving in a rational manner—thus affording a spectacle too astonishing ever to seem commonplace.

Does "Once Is Enough" deal with a problem of contemporary existence? Can it come home to men's hearts and bosoms? It does. It can. So far as the members of the audience to which it is addressed are concerned the answer to these questions can be given in a much more confident affirmative than I, at least, should like to venture in the case of many graver plays whose claim to greatness is said to rest upon the fact that they present the spectator with living issues. On returning home, most of the people who attend Henry Miller's Theater are much more likely to find that their wife or husband has been dining tête-à-tête with someone else than they are to find the struggle between capital and labor reaching an acute stage on their doorstep. And there are many things wives might do less profitable than making a resolution to look as well as act more like Miss Claire in the present play.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
The ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
production of [illegible] GIRADOUX'S comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., W. of Bway. Eves., 8:40. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:40. 300 Seats at $1.10. Telephone reservations: Circle 6-5990—No one admitted during prologue.

WINE OF CHOICE
a new comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN with
LESLIE BANKS CLAUDIA MORGAN ALEXANDER WOOLCOTT
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., West of Broadway. Mats., Thurs. and Sat. 2:30; Eves., 8:30.

"One of the best musical shows of the year . . . Witty, Fresh."—Atkinson, Times
PINS AND NEEDLES
NEW YORK'S HIT MUSICAL REVUE
LABOR STAGE 39th St. & 6th Ave. BR 9-1163
Evenings 8:40
Matinees Wed. & Saturday 2:40
Prices:
Matinee 55c to $2.20
Evenings 55c to $2.75

5 SUNDAY NIGHTS—Feb. 27, Mar. 6, 13, 20, 27—8:45
SHAWN and His Men Dancers
Prices: 55c, $1.10, $1.65, $2.20, $2.75 Seats now on sale at Box Office
MAIL ORDERS NOW to SHAWN Advance Sale
MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway

MERCURY'S production of Marc Blitzstein's play in music, "The Cradle Will Rock" moves to the Mercury Theatre, 110 West 41st Street, Monday Evening, Feb. 28th. Seats selling through April 2nd. Prices 55c to $2.20. Evenings at 9 P. M.—matinees Wed. & Sat. at 3 P. M.

Call or Write the Commodore for
ALL your RECORD NEEDS
Whether it's the 4 B's—Beethoven, Brahms, Bach or Biederbecke—or whether your interest lies in symphonic, operatic, chamber music or popular recordings—we have a complete selection. Ask to hear the new Victor release, Beethoven "The Pastoral" Symphony No. 6 in F Major, B.B.C. Orchestra, Toscanini conducting. Telephone orders promptly filled. We mail everywhere. Send name to receive Victor catalogs.
• COMMODORE MUSIC SHOP •
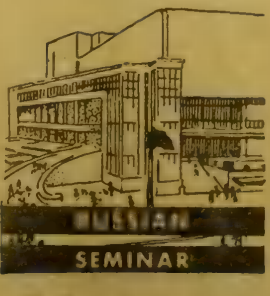
144 E. 42nd St., New York, N. Y. • LExington 2-0214



The Bureau's 46th Year!
A non-profit Foundation. Every dollar adds enrichment to the satisfactions of travel. . . .
Ask for Table of [illegible] Tours.
Enjoy Special Privileges In RUSSIA
THIS SUMMER
WITH
DR. JEROME DAVIS
Pres., American Federation of Teachers
See, know Russia face to face—15 cities Black Sea to Baltic. Also Poland, Denmark and Sweden. . . . One of Eight Exciting Study Tours in Europe. For complete details
Write to Box J-26
BUREAU OF UNIVERSITY TRAVEL
NEWTON MASSACHUSETTS

$1,000 Prize Poetry Contest

Can a Poet Save Our Democracy?

THE FORUM has organized a prize competition for the most compelling poems challenging the American people to be alert to their liberties.

A total of $1,000 will be awarded in prizes.

This nation won an independent existence not by some process of abstract thought but because her men and women burned for liberty. And now the terrifying complications of a machine civilization have bred new forces which threaten the kind of government we call democracy and, with it, our hard-won and long-cherished freedom. Where are the poets who can reawaken our love of liberty?

In relating this poetry competition to the major world issues of the day, the Editors are not seeking to offer a theme but merely to strike a keynote. They hope that many leading American poets will be moved to enter the competition, which has been divided into groups, with prizes for each, as follows:

A—General Public	B—College Undergraduates	C—Secondary-School Students
1st Prize $300	1st Prize $150	1st Prize $100
2nd Prize $150	2nd Prize $100	2nd Prize $ 60
3rd Prize $ 50	3rd Prize $ 50	3rd Prize $ 40

WRITERS' CONFERENCE FELLOWSHIP

The Olivet Writers' Conference, of Olivet College, Michigan, offers a fellowship for 1939, covering all costs of the Conference, to the prize-winning contestant who, in the opinion of the Conference admissions committee, seems most likely to benefit by attendance at the Conference.

CONSOLATION PRIZES

A copy of "The Complete Rhyming Dictionary," edited by Clement Wood, will be awarded to each of the 50 contestants who seem most likely to profit by it.

JUDGES

Padraic Colum William Allan Neilson Carl Van Doren

•

Instructions:—No poem is to exceed 40 lines in length. Manuscripts must be addressed to the Poetry Contest Editor; THE FORUM; 570 Lexington Avenue; New York City; and must be mailed before midnight of June 30, 1938. Under no circumstances will any manuscript be returned or its receipt acknowledged. Manuscripts must be clearly marked with the name and address of the contestant and with the group letter (A, B, or C) of the class in which the poem is being entered. Contestants in class B or C must state name of college or school attended. In order to qualify for a prize, the contestant must accompany his submission with a remittance of 25 cents in stamps.

FILMS

Serial Sentiment

ONE of the worst sins against movie form is committed lavishly by two current headliners. Many others have committed it and will continue to do so, and the form sinned against is more than movie form; it is form in general, or rather that first law of art of which the name is unity. So that there would seem to be no good reason for picking on "Of Human Hearts" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer) and "Tom Sawyer" (United Artists) among so many of their kind. The only reason, in fact, is that they come by coincidence close together and that there is nothing else to talk about in the dullest movie month I can remember.

Both films are sentimental, but that is not the point. They publish their sentiment serially. At perhaps a dozen moments in each film there is something like a dead stop, with something like a voice saying: "Continued in our next." That the next issue follows immediately by the clock does not mean that continuity has been kept. It has been broken in the worst way: one sentiment having been exhausted, another one has been started working, soon of course to grow tired in its turn and drop the lead to a third, and so on. A single controlling sentiment is so much better than this as to seem no sin; or if it is to be given that name, then this must be labeled abomination. "Of Human Hearts" is not singly and therefore perhaps honestly sentimental. It has been calculated as a series of devices to "get" us, each of them well tried, known to have worked before, and counted on confidently now—so confidently that nobody in power has given a thought to the story supposedly being told. The devices, or the sentiments, have familiar names: Doctor, Mother, Civil War, Lincoln. And any one of them could have been built into something respectable through the simple process of being believed. What we have instead is a medley, an amateur hour, a series of climaxes mechanically brought off. The village doctor who drinks too much gives way to the boy who forgets his mother; then she takes the stage, assisted by a scene in Lincoln's office during war time; and finally there is the old family horse—a nice fellow in himself, but worked all but dead in his tracks when the director suspects that there have not been enough spasms of sentiment thus far and so there must be still another. A sign that the audience was taking the film as it had been intended was the applause when Lincoln's face first became visible. The applause was not for anything that Lincoln did or said, but quite automatically for the idea of Lincoln's having been added to all the other "fine" things of the film. The audience had been well trained in the automatic response, the pressed nerve.

"Tom Sawyer" is too kidsy for my taste. It was perhaps bound to be, since the book is kidsy too, as "Huckleberry Finn" is not. But the film's worst fault is that it depends on the book to carry it, the whitewashing scene, for instance, serving no other purpose than to remind us of Mark Twain; as it stands here it is incomplete and feeble, an episode the point of which is neither emphasized nor developed. So with the treasure found hidden in the cave; its source is not explained, the finding of it does not seem important, and the public announcement of it at the end causes the merest ripple of surprise. The book is but sketched, and heedlessly at that.

MARK VAN DOREN

Letters to the Editors

Instead of the Ludlow Bill

Dear Sirs: Many arguments have been made for and against the proposed Ludlow amendment to the Constitution calling for a referendum on war. But there is one weakness in the proposal which both its advocates and opponents have apparently overlooked, and which I believe to be a valid objection. It lies in the following phrase, "except in case of invasion of the United States or its territorial possessions, and attack upon its citizens residing therein."

Who is to decide this point? Congress, of course. But if Congress were in a mood to declare war it could easily declare it to be a defense against invasion, whatever the circumstances. Then what becomes of the war referendum?

Instead of a referendum on war I propose a referendum on conscription. The President of the United States could wage war without a declaration of war, but he couldn't wage an aggressive, unpopular war for very long without conscription. Suppose we had such an amendment as the following: "No Act of Congress to conscript American citizens for any military purpose shall be legal without receiving the approval of a majority of the electorate in a popular referendum, and then only for the period of time specified in the referendum." This would leave the power to declare war in the hands of Congress, where it now lies. This would not unnecessarily handicap the President of the United States in his conduct of our foreign affairs. This would not prevent him or Congress from taking immediate steps to repel any threatened invasion of this country because the President would have at his disposal the standing army of the country, the navy, and the air force, and he could call for any number of volunteers.

If conscription were found necessary, Congress and the President could submit their case directly to the people for approval or disapproval. One point on which the average citizen in a democracy should be consulted is whether he wants to kill or be killed for a cause. And if a government is afraid to consult its citizens before drafting them to fight in a war, how does such a government differ in substance from a dictatorship or an absolute monarchy?

Moreover, the act of conscription, unlike the act of invasion, is capable of exact definition.

DAVID RHYS WILLIAMS

Rochester, N. Y., February 16

Substitute No. 2

Dear Sirs: May I bring to your attention a proposed amendment to the Constitution which I have offered for consideration to certain peace organizations and to certain Congressmen who supported the Ludlow bill? The purpose of this proposal is to define exactly national defense, in such a way as to leave no uncertainty about the powers and duties given to the President by the people, while avoiding all interference with the administration of foreign affairs by the Executive.

> No armed force of the United States shall be sent outside the territory and territorial waters of the continental United States and a patrol zone extending five hundred miles from the shores thereof, except such forces as may be authorized by Congress for the protection of Alaska, Hawaii, the Isthmus of Panama, and the West Indies; provided, that Congress may authorize the sending of convoys to protect commerce in times of danger; and provided, that the operation of this article may be suspended by vote of the people of the United States when hostilities threaten and until conditions of peace are restored.
>
> This article shall not be construed to forbid the transfer of a naval vessel from one coast of the United States to another; nor to prevent the use of a naval vessel for giving succor in time of distress; nor to forbid the protection of mandated territory placed in the custody of the United States by treaty with other nations.

BARCLAY W. BRADLEY

Pasadena, Cal., February 7

Mr. Hacker on Mr. Brody

Dear Sirs: I see in your issue of February 12 that Alter Brody is peeved at the fact that I, in company with some forty-four others, publicly expressed displeasure with your editorial policy on the war question. You yourselves titled the letter "A Letter from Forty-five Liberals," and that is your concern as well as the signers'. What interests me at the moment is the cute way Mr. Brody goes about getting rid of as many of the signers as he can identify. He thinks that Sidney Hook and I, for example, are not liberals, because, he says, we "freely admit" that we "are the only accredited American interpreters of that famous liberal economist, the late Karl Marx." Mr. Brody seems to be hinting that I am a bad Marxist and a bad historian, from which it follows that I am no liberal.

This is the second time that Stalinist correspondents of The Nation have made references to my competence. But if they don't think I am so hot, why do they lift my stuff? Academic scholars are beginning to remark on this wholesale borrowing.

In a review of "The First American Revolution," the work of the pseudonymous Stalinist Jack Hardy and published by the official Communist house, International Publishers, Professor Curtis P. Nettels of Wisconsin and Harvard Universities wrote in the American Political Science Review for December, 1937:

> The significant ideas appear to have been taken (without due acknowledgment) from an article by Louis M. Hacker, The First American Revolution, in the Columbia University Quarterly for September, 1935. Those interested in the best Marxian interpretation of the revolution should read Mr. Hacker's able analysis.

Mr. Brody and all his Stalinist friends cannot eat their cake and have it too. He will have to find some other way of insulting me. LOUIS M. HACKER

New York, February 10

Protest and Rebuttal

Dear Sirs: When a reviewer says that he—or she—dislikes a certain book, no author has any right to protest. But when a reviewer states flatly that an author holds views which he demonstrably does not hold, then the author has cause to speak out. In your number of December 25 appeared a review by Eda Lou Walton of my autobiography. In it she says: "He admires Mussolini, dislikes Russia, retires in the end into the most perfect of all retreats—sectionalism of the good old Southern variety."

There is not one statement in my volume to bear out these assertions. In point of fact I am extremely critical not only of Mussolini but of one of his upholders; I admire and value Russia's considerable cultural achievement, while remaining skeptical whether Russia's present economic policy leads toward or away from communism. Nor is "sectionalism of the good old Southern variety," in my case, a retreat; my object has been to transform it into an active social policy. But reviewers like Miss Walton have neither desire to speak the truth nor respect for the truths discovered by others to guide them. When anyone steps on their favorite prejudices, they are capable of asserting that black is white, and that an author has written what, in point of fact, he never said.

JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

Kansas City, Mo., January 20

Dear Sirs: In reply to John Gould Fletcher's letter concerning my review of his book, "Life Is My Song," I shall quote three passages from his book. On page 314 occurs this passage:

> Moreover, I was now intensely curious to see for myself how Italy was faring under Benito Mussolini, the first of the Caesars whose advent on the European stage Spengler had accurately predicted. I must admit that I not only went to Italy in a spirit disposed to be critical of Mussolini and of all the achievements of fascism, but that I came away favorably impressed.

That was in 1925. On page 355, with reference to his book "Two Frontiers," Fletcher says:

> I pictured in my last chapter a presumptive clash between the two great powers of America and the U. S. S. R.—a clash that would, in fact, be inevitable provided one assumed that Russia in any case must stand or fall by communism, while Amercia is always to be taken as the greatest and most openly powerful upholder of capitalism in the world. But fresh thought along lines of my own study has now convinced me how greatly I was mistaken in my first diagnosis. America only accepts capitalism pragmatically, because it either works now or has worked in the past; just as Russia only accepts communism theoretically, with infinite modifications—which at present rather tend to produce a system of competitive mass-production for rewards regulated by the state—in actual practice. Russia still is, therefore, under all its present applications, a centralized autocratic state working toward the goal of theoretical equality under communism. . . . In Russia whatever real communism does exist is imposed from above, not from below. Sentimentally the Russian is still a nihilist; but the state makes war on his nihilism.

In reference to agrarianism Mr. Fletcher says on page 361:

> The future of regionalism in America seemed to me to be bound up with something else—some unknown and incalculable moral factor of conscious agrarianism, which would set its face alike against further centralization of industry and against the big-city culture of sophistication which had followed upon the centralization from the days of the eighteen seventies down to the great boom of the nineteen twenties. What factor was there in the American intellectual landscape which had set itself the task of consciously upholding the cause of agrarianism except that small group of twelve Southerners who with myself as a member had brought out the symposium "I'll Take My Stand?" I could find none. Moreover, perhaps now the time was ripe for America to take moral stock, to see that behind all this talk of economic planning which had followed the coming of the great depression lay another question, not of economics, but of ethics—a question of what were the best elements upon which man could plan, and which would be the most conducive to the good and the full life.

As to whether this is a "retreat" or not, I leave it to the reader to decide.

EDA LOU WALTON

New York, February 4

Bard Needs Help

Dear Sirs: The announcement that Bard College at Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, is in immediate need of funds to carry on during 1938-39 is shocking to those who know of its unique liberal-arts program and its value to our educational scheme. I hope that those who are deeply concerned with the education of our youth will accept the responsibility and privilege of providing the necessary funds to sustain this type of educational pioneering.

Bard College, which is part of Columbia University, has a philosophy of education based on the following principles: education means development of capacities at individual rate of growth toward self-direction, creative effort, research for critical thinking, and social responsibility; close, informal relation between students and faculty tend to establish a confidence and understanding which make personality adjustments possible; the learning process is accelerated through interest, and through related studies the student continues to widen his horizon.

The effectiveness of the Bard system can best be realized when one observes that students there are actually discovering adventure in the educative process. The type of education which can develop this attitude is so rare that it should be supported by a social-minded public. ESTHER GRAY

New York, February 17

One Reader's Indorsement

Dear Sirs: Since your support of the principle of collective security has been challenged by readers whose numbers and reputation carry weight, permit another reader to record her warm indorsement of it. Our isolationists do not seem to realize that isolationism and imperialism are merely two sides of the same medal. Selfishness is selfishness, whether it is on the aggressive or on the defensive. And selfishness in the long run is usually shortsighted. It has been conspicuously so of late years, when a policy of keeping out of trouble has landed us all—where we are.

More power to your elbow!

C. I. CLAFLIN

New York, February 1

CONTRIBUTORS

LUDWIG LORE, formerly editor of the New York Volkszeitung, conducts a column called "Behind the Cables" in the New York Post.

MORDECAI EZEKIEL is economic adviser to Secretary Wallace.

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's correspondent in Spain, is in the United States for a short visit.

DAVID MARTIN has been active in trade-union work in Canada and is a frequent contributor to the Canadian labor press.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, is the author of "Reflections on the End of an Era" and "Beyond Tragedy."

DONALD A. ROBERTS is a member of the Department of English of the College of the City of New York.

R. K. LAMB teaches economic history at Williams College.

MARQUIS CHILDS, Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, is the author of "Sweden: The Middle Way."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ MARCH 5, 1938 NUMBER 10

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.
APR
MA

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 257
EDITORIALS: EUROPE AND AMERICA 260
EUROPEAN BALANCE SHEET 260
BRITAIN'S LAST CHANCE 261
AMERICA MUST ACT 262
THE PROFITEERS MOVE UP by Paul Y. Anderson 263
JUSTICE BLACK, DISSENTING by Max Lerner 264
BARCELONA FACES FRONT by Leigh White 266
WALL STREET IS A RACE-TRACK By Keith Hutchison 268
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 271
COLUMNISTS ON PARADE. II. WESTBROOK PEGLER by Margaret Marshall 273
VERSE FOR A SOWER by LeGarde S. Doughty 276
BOOKS:
WHOSE SIDE IS THE LORD ON? by Maxwell Geismar 276
THE ENGLISH by Lincoln Kirstein 277
THE REALM OF TRUTH by William Gruen 278
AFRICAN TALES by Julius E. Lips 278
AFTER "ANTHONY ADVERSE"—WHAT? By Dorothy Van Doren 279
SHORTER NOTICES 280
DRAMA: DRAWING-ROOMS AND BATTLEFIELDS By Joseph Wood Krutch 280
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 282

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER

Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER

Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE LEGISLATIVE PICTURE HAS NEVER BEEN darker in Washington. The only legislation that seems to stand a chance in Congress these days is the emergency sort, such as relief appropriations and the big-navy stuff. As we go to press, there is very little probability of defeating the naval appropriation. But in the process of the debate, the progressive anti-armament bloc in Congress will have a chance to demonstrate its opposition and to warn the country not only of the rising military spirit but also of even more drastic legislation to come. The big struggle that is looming in the Senate is over the government-reorganization bill, on which we have commented several times. It is likely to hang like a shadow over the Senate for weeks, and the country will be treated to a repetition of the fight against the court plan. Already some of the Senators who figured prominently in that fight and a few others have been meeting as a strategy board; and they have enlisted in the opposition to the measure the same citizens' committees and patrioteering societies which succeeded in killing court reform. Watch for their propaganda. We are glad that the merchant-marine legislation, with its vicious labor provisions, has been stymied in the Senate committee; there are indications that the House bill will omit the labor sections. As for the wage-hour bill, it will take strong pressure from the C. I. O. and progressive legislators to get it through in any acceptable form. Washington is chiefly in the phase of "studying" various problems, including the railroad problem and that of commodity prices. The latter has real possibilities for inaugurating a policy of central planning for prices and production. But amid the present uncertainties, that would require decisive Presidential leadership. And on this issue at least such leadership is not in evidence.

*

THE ANTI-LYNCHING BILL HAS AGAIN BEEN buried under an avalanche of sectional hatred and partisan Republican spite. It is clear that while it was the Southern bourbons who linked hands to form a filibustering Hindenburg line, it was the Northern Republicans who prevented a two-thirds' vote from being piled up to apply the cloture rule and break the filibuster. No one who had any hand in the entire shameful proceeding has any reason to feel proud of his role in keeping the South free for rope and faggot. There are a few words that are worth saying now over the grave of the anti-lynching bill. We come to praise it for the things which, in dying, it made clear to the country. The greatest result of the fight was the realization on the part of the Senate and of Washington newspapermen that the issue far transcended lynching itself or the larger question of race discrimination; that if a group of reactionaries can by this means succeed in killing an anti-lynching bill, they can also succeed in killing any other sort of progressive legislation. Secondly, it has become clear that the fight against the bill had an economic base. It was a fight on the part of reactionaries in the South not only to continue the right of terrorizing Negroes through lynching, but also to continue the right of terrorizing whites as well as Negroes and keep them from organizing for decent wages and for political and educational opportunities. It is important to note that the Wagner amendment to the relief appropriation, providing for collective bargaining on relief projects, was killed mainly by Southern opposition. Finally it has become clear that the Negro vote will have to be reckoned with increasingly as a factor in American life. The fight against the bill has done much to complete the process of bringing the Negroes to political consciousness. It has become clear to them who their enemies are, and clear also that their enemies are the enemies of civil liberties and economic progress. As for Senator Wagner, despite the defeat of his bill, he emerges from the fight with increased stature.

✶

MAY A PRESIDENT TURN AUTHOR WHILE still in office? And if he does, may he reap the financial rewards of authorship like anyone else, or should he treat his literary products as he treats his public statements and give them impartially to the entire press? These are the questions that are now agitating official, journalistic, and publishing circles. For Mr. Roosevelt has again shattered precedent. He has not only undertaken to publish his state papers this spring, in a five-volume edition to be put out by Random House, instead of waiting until the issues they raise and their writer as well are both safely dead; but he has also written notes and comments on those papers and has sold the prepublication rights to the United Features syndicate; and he is planning two Liberty articles of a similar nature. This has raised a howl, notably from the New York Herald Tribune and from David Lawrence. The Herald Tribune, in an editorial headed Big Business in the White House, speaks of it as "cashing in on a huge scale on the job" of the Presidency, and as "a steep descent for a President of the United States." Mr. Lawrence, more ironic, sees in it proof "that the profit motive is rising in Mr. Roosevelt's psychology," and wonders why by the same logic he should not give paid testimonials for "what cigarettes he smokes or what suspenders he wears." We find it hard to grow either indignant or ironic about the matter. It is a fine thing for a President to take the time and trouble to prepare his state papers for posterity and to annotate them while he is still of vigorous mind and has around him the resources for doing a competent job. The treatment Mr. Roosevelt has thus far received from the press as a whole has scarcely been such as to warrant the belief that it would give his New Deal comments a square deal. It is a safe guess that in selling them to a syndicate he felt that he could get for them the continuous attention they warrant. He may have been wrong in his reasoning, and there may be enough people who feel that he has impaired the dignity of his office to make the strategy backfire. But we doubt very strongly that mercenary motives were involved. To dispel all controversy on that score, the President would do well to make it clear that he is devoting his earnings to charity.

✶

LOCAL CONTESTS IN WHICH LABOR AS A political force is directly involved are for the moment gaining the center of the national stage. There is a feeling that they may serve as a forecast of 1940 as well as 1938. The anti-labor press has been getting a good deal of comfort out of the results of the Seattle municipal primary. Although Mayor Dore, the candidate of Dave Beck and reactionary labor, ran behind Vic Meyers, the C. I. O. candidate, their combined vote was less than that of Arthur Langlie, who ran as an "honest-government" business man's candidate. The results prove something, but not that labor is on the wane as a political force. They prove rather that in Seattle, as in Detroit last year, labor is handicapped politically by the C. I. O.–A. F. of L. split. Langlie appealed to the lower middle class, which was tired of the Beck-Bridges labor fight. And the business groups will continue to capitalize on that fatigue, which may prove decisive nationally as well as locally. The same applies to the Pennsylvania situation, where the anti-labor Democrats have put through a state ticket without giving Lieutenant Governor Tom Kennedy of the United Mine Workers a major place. Their argument is that the A. F. of L. will turn against the Democrats if a C. I. O. man runs for governor or senator. William Green, with his characteristic blindness, has served notice to that effect, thereby putting himself on record as placing his factional fight ahead of the interests of labor as a whole. There can be little doubt that if labor could settle its difficulties, both in Seattle and Pennsylvania, not only would the labor vote be pooled but middle-class votes could also be won, as they were in the last New York City election.

✶

THE KILLING OF A POORMASTER IN HOBOKEN by a relief client is a dramatic flare that lights up a scene of sordid misery in one corner of Frank Hague's empire. Another was the death by starvation of a three-year-old boy last May. Hoboken, once prosperous, is poverty-stricken. It has 60,000 inhabitants, yet it spent only $3,000 on relief last year. It was the boast of Harry L. Barck, the poormaster for forty-two years and a faithful Hague man, that he had cut the Hoboken relief rolls from 7,000 to 360, and his brutality in handling the poor over whom he wielded such final power was notorious. In addition, Joseph Scutellaro, who killed him, was not in political favor because, simply, his father, who had formerly been a thriving contractor, had backed a non-Hague Democrat in 1931. His business has since been reduced to nothing. The fact that Governor Moore, immediately after the incident, instructed that $1,500,000 be withdrawn from general state funds and issued to municipalities for relief purposes indicates that the officials, even of New Jersey, realize that Scutellaro's act was not simple homicide but a fanatical gesture against misery long drawn out.

*

THE JAPANESE DIET'S FIGHT AGAINST THE war-mobilization bill is not so much indicative of a resurgence of democracy as of ire at the bad faith of the military. For years Japan has been ruled under a compromise arrangement whereby the army dominated foreign policy and military expenditures, while financial and civilian interests had a free hand in domestic policy. The present bill would give the army complete control over all business and financial affairs, a power which it has been seeking since 1931. Once control passes into the hands of the military, it will presumably remain there irrespective of the outcome of the hostilities in China. In arguing for the passage of the bill the government has unwittingly revealed the growing seriousness of the country's economic plight. Already the shortage of raw materials for the war industries is being felt. Proposals have been advanced to mix artificial fiber with wool in the manufacture of uniforms, and otherwise make use of substitute materials. Coordination of the country's economic life under army dictatorship may bring a more efficient use of materials, but it cannot furnish the needed war supplies as long as other countries refuse to buy Japanese goods. The difficulties which Japan is facing today are insignificant compared to those which it is likely to face six months from now.

*

NEWS OF INDIA IS USUALLY CONCEALED between two divorce notices in your family newspaper. To those who read John Gunther's full report on India's changing political pattern in The Nation two weeks ago the recent crisis will seem less startling and more intelligible. Two of the seven provincial cabinets which the Indian National Congress won in the elections last year have resigned. They did so after the British governors vetoed a move to release political prisoners in those areas. Although only forty-one prisoners were actually involved, the incident has crystallized those crucial divisions within the Congress which Mr. Gunther detailed. When the Congress, after bitter internal controversy, yielded to the plea of the "moderates" for participation in the government, the radical wing asserted its skepticism of the result. It predicted arbitrary exercise of the "safeguard" power retained by Britain, allegedly for use in "emergencies" only. Now at least a measure of this skepticism has been vindicated. The veto action has brought renewed demands for open resistance to British domination, and a pronounced shift in the strategy of the Congress may take place. That the British have precipitated this crisis now, when they have their hands full on every front, is perhaps its most significant aspect. Presumably they can ill afford another period of colonial conflict. But neither can they ignore the implications which might flow from a successful trial of authentic home rule in India.

*

IF MRS. PAULINE MAE CLARKE OF TORONTO does not win a share in the baby derby, with its prize of $500,000, it will not be through lack of single-hearted devotion to the task she set herself. She cleared the decks for action by putting her earlier offspring in foster homes and separating from her husband. She then had five children by another man with whom she made an agreement, not a gentleman's agreement but a written one, to give him a percentage of her winnings in the derby. It is not explained why she changed fathers, but the judge who is faced with the problem of passing on the legitimacy and eligibility of the five entries is "very much troubled." "I think," he said, "she deliberately turned her back on her first children." And not only on her children. We ourselves are torn between wonder at the enterprise of Mrs. Clarke and her threat to middle-class virtues. The man, now dead, who posted the prize was undoubtedly a family man who would turn in his grave at the spectacle his magnanimity has brought to pass. If she fails to place, it will be the greatest recent example of love's labor lost.

Europe and America

EUROPEAN BALANCE SHEET

WHAT has happened in Europe in the past few weeks may be viewed on three planes: first, it has again changed the diplomatic map of Europe — that nightmare construction, crisscrossed with alliances, threats, commitments — and thereby blasted some lingering democratic hopes; second, it definitely marks the end of the post-war system, which has involved at least the rhetorical dominance and support of the League by England; third, it shows more clearly than ever at what points the lines of power converge and in whose hands lie the determinations of the world's destiny.

The quick succession of events has been, to most people in America who care about democratic survival, like a sequence of communiqués from the world's battlefields —all carrying bad news. They have cast a pall over our press. For whatever may be the longer view, Hitler has, in immediate terms, survived a crisis, struck a number of swift, successful blows in pursuit of his final aims, and emerged more than ever as the man in whose ominous shadow European policy is being hammered out. The army purge, the Austrian coup, the Reichstag speech, the Nazi riots in Vienna, the British Cabinet decisions, the impending Anglo-Italian talks, the confusion in Paris, the fear that hangs over Czechoslovakia—there is no anodyne that will blot out the impact of these facts on the world's consciousness.

Realism dictates that we measure future events after the pattern of what has actually happened. But realism dictates also that we interpret that pattern not through Hitler's own rhetoric but through a sober appraisal of the effective forces in Europe, and also the potential forces which recent events may rouse to activity. For it is the way of dictators to dramatize their personal careers and national adventures. Hitler's Opera House speech, eight days after Schuschnigg's surrender at Berchtesgaden was in a sense an overplaying of the Nazi hand. In his three-hour word torrent Hitler presented the world with the material for the severest possible indictment of Nazi aims and methods. There had been those—even the well-informed editors of the New Statesman in London—who had confidently expected that Hitler would follow brutal deeds with soft words. Instead of that, he flayed England, threatened France if it sought to aid its Central European allies, expressed undying enmity to Russia, insulted Eden, recognized Manchoukuo, expressed hopes for a Japanese victory, renewed the anti-Comintern pact, condemned the League as "fantastic," offered no guaranties of Austrian independence, and laid claim to German national minorities everywhere in the world. He could not possibly have made a speech better calculated to throw confusion into the pro-Nazi circles in England and France or give comfort to Mr. Chamberlain's opponents.

A second event that was not an undiluted help to Germany was Eden's resignation. True, it weakens the collective-security forces in the British government. But Eden has always been isolated and for that reason ineffective in the Cabinet. His resignation has at least drawn aside the only remaining veil from Chamberlain's strategy. It has removed Britain's pretensions to be a supporter of the League of Nations, and has given a new rallying cry to British labor.

A third element in the situation that has implications in both directions is the role of Italy. It is safe to accept as an initial premise the fact that Mussolini is no fool. He has never had any hankering to see Germany facing him at the Brenner Pass. Yet that is what German annexation of Austria would mean. The only explanation of his apparent acquiescence is Italy's weakness. There are reports that Schuschnigg received his command-invitation to come to Berchtesgaden without the knowledge of either Mussolini or Ciano. But in any event, the Duce could have offered no effective opposition. Mussolini has been weakened by his costly adventures in Ethiopia and Spain, and by the armament program that he has sought to impose on an economic base unable to support it. Hence his flirtation with Chamberlain and the coming Anglo-Italian agreement, which, while in no sense extenuating the folly of Chamberlain's policy (what reason can England have to take Mussolini at his word?) nevertheless give reason for concluding that the Rome-Berlin axis is much shakier than the Nazis would have the world believe. On the other hand, Italy's weakness makes the German alliance necessary to Mussolini for whatever schemes of aggression he may have in mind at the expense of Franco-British interests. In any event, it is one of the important and incalculable elements in Europe's future.

The Austrian situation has moved with less rapidity than was at first expected. When Hitler pushed his Trojan horse into Vienna, in the form of Nazi control of the police power, it looked as if the other steps in the achievement of a completely Nazified Austria would follow at the staccato pace to which the world has by now become accustomed. That this has not happened is due to the firmness Chancellor Schuschnigg has shown and the support he has been accorded. That support has come from the Fatherland Front, from clerical elements, even from the Austrian workers; its extent may be judged from the fact that before Schuschnigg made his speech to the Federal Council he was handed a petition signed by a million Austrians asking him to stand firm for Austria's independence. His speech was, under the circumstances, a gallant one. The fact that it was received with such surprise in Berlin and that it so clearly announced the guaranty of Austrian independence that Hitler had failed to mention in his own speech would seem to indicate that German power in Austria will not be achieved through Schuschnigg. Thus far the Chancellor has used a strong hand, especially in sending troops and planes to Graz in Styria, as a result of which a huge scheduled Nazi demonstration was called off. And there are indications, notably the fact that Cardinal Innitzer, under orders from the Vatican, has asked for prayers and special masses throughout Austria for a "free Austria," that Mussolini may be working quietly against Hitler in Vienna.

Nevertheless, Schuschnigg's position is immensely difficult. The probabilities are that Hitler will in the end have his victory in Austria, just as he had it in Danzig. If that happens, Schuschnigg will have his own past deeds and those of Dollfuss to thank for it. For, as G. E. R. Gedye has pointed out in his brilliant dispatches from Vienna to the New York Times, Austria was doomed when Dollfuss turned his artillery against 32 per cent of his countrymen—the Social Democrats—and then sought to fight the 25 per cent of Nazis with the diffused residue of the population. Schuschnigg has continued the policy of trying to resist a powerful dictatorship with an inadequate one. The Austrian workers have bitter memories of the past, and are suspicious of Schuschnigg now. To add to his troubles, the Nazi organizations are on the point of changing their name and thereby legalizing their demonstrations. Eventually a bloody clash seems inevitable. The most that can be hoped is that when it comes the Austrian workers will be prepared for it and will have learned from the Spanish experience how to organize an effective resistance against a fascist coup from within and without. Hitler may win in Vienna, but his victory will be dearly bought.

What follows for the Nazis after the Austrian adventure is fairly clear. Their eye is on Czechoslovakia. Once in control of Austria they can use the same tactics in Prague that they are using now in Vienna. Against that eventuality the overwhelming vote of the French Chamber of Deputies to uphold the Delbos foreign policy, and Delbos's reaffirmation of the Soviet pact and his announcement that France will fight to protect Czechoslovakia come as an important reassurance. How long France will pursue so firm a policy it is impossible to guess. The shift in England left France holding a bag full of high explosives. In the past two years it has made repeated concessions to retain Britain's friendship, concessions which have virtually destroyed its independent influence in Europe. It has stood idly by while a friendly republican government in Spain has fought for its life against Italian-German intervention. A fortnight ago it agreed to the sacrifice of Austria on the altar of Chamberlain's policy. As a reward for its loyalty, France now finds itself more isolated than at any time in recent history. The Chautemps ministry has met its crisis in foreign policy with apparent courage. It faces a domestic crisis in the new labor code. Whether Chautemps can extract concessions from labor depends upon the willingness of the organized workers to trust his firmness in dealing with Hitler. If there ever was a time when a clear and militant policy was needed among the left elements in the Popular Front, it is now. Unfortunately the recent indications that the Soviet Union has given up hope of collective action and the announcement of the new conspiracy trials in Russia come tragically to diminish the chances of the labor groups in France and England uniting behind a program of collective security. It would seem, quite apart from the reasons for the trials themselves, as if the Russians had a genius for selecting for their own internal crises the exact moments when they were most likely to weaken the labor movements of the world and to forfeit the confidence of their allies among the nations.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Cutting across and beneath these diplomatic maneuvers and internal national considerations are three sets of factors that are likely in the long run to determine the future of Western cultures. One is the ever-present factor of economic power. The fascist nations have had numerous diplomatic victories; they have been relatively weak in their military adventures, despite the huge war machines they are building. But what of their economic power? The stability of whatever structures of political power they erect will depend on their economic resources and how they use them. Here Hitler, like Mussolini and Japan, is weak. If the industrial democracies made this fact the key to their policy, and were willing to pool their own economic strength to maintain the peace of the world, they would discover a new principle of international order. The second question is where the working-class movements of the various countries will stand in the coming crises. In England, in France, in Austria nothing decisive can be done to reverse the present reactionary trends unless it is backed by unified workers' movements. The third factor is the maintenance of morale among the democracies. Mr. Chamberlain may be a cleverer man than Mr. Eden, but his "realism," which implies capitulation to the entire scheme of international values of the fascist powers, is the most unrealistic sort of realism. For while economic strength will furnish the sinews of war, we have learned in the recent Spanish experience that morale is of enormous importance. The democracies may well take their cue from Thomas Mann, who in his American lecture tour is asserting that it is the democratic idea that is youthful, and fascism that represents the decadence of the world.

Britain's Last Chance

The days that have passed since Anthony Eden's resignation have permitted the world to grasp something of the manifold significance of the revolution which has occurred in Great Britain's traditional foreign policy. With Chamberlain's repudiation of the League an era has ended. Despite all compromises, all previous surrenders, the assumption that Britain recognized its obligations under the Covenant has been the basis of the foreign policies of France, the Little Entente, Poland, and, to a lesser extent, the United States as well.

Viewed in perspective, Chamberlain's policy would seem to be equally disastrous to fundamental British interests. It is frequently said that the British Commonwealth of Nations is held together by the same type of moral pressure which has maintained the League, and that the disintegration of the latter would perforce mean the collapse of the empire. While this seems to overlook the very important financial ties between the dominions and the mother country, it nevertheless is true that the growth of power politics and the development of the concepts of regionalism and autarchy associated with fascism would spell the doom of a voluntary commonwealth like the British Empire. Moreover, important links in the empire, such as Ireland, South Africa, and Australia, have remained loyal at least partially because of their faith in Britain as the dominating force behind the League. Public opinion in all the dominions, including Canada, appears to have aligned itself definitely on the side of Eden.

In fact, feeling in England itself seems to be running strongly against the government. That the Labor and Liberal parties would oppose Chamberlain was to be expected. Both parties have traditionally based their foreign policy on the principle of collective security. But there are also signs of revolt within the Conservative ranks. A number of "up-country" Conservative dailies have come out in support of Eden. In addition to Eden's opposition, which is far more important to the electorate than to Parliament, there is the opposition of the Churchill faction, which may prove serious in Parliament. And for the first time in years the opposition parties have an issue of unlimited possibilities. Knuckling under to the threats of a foreign dictator is no better politics in England than in any other country, particularly when it involves the surrender of vast interests. Moreover, they have a powerful weapon in Chamberlain's direct admission that the government has abandoned the policies upon which it was elected in 1935. No British government has ever dared undertake such a fundamental shift of policy without a popular mandate. To be sure, Eden has announced that he will not appeal to the country against Chamberlain and thus split the Conservatives. But he could have said little else, given the demands of party discipline. The fact remains that his resignation has finally awakened the British Labor Party from its long sleep and served to crystallize latent opposition.

To the question as to why the Chamberlain government is willing to risk its political future rather than stand by the principles of collective security to which it is committed, there is only one convincing answer: collective action implies not only the checking of fascist aggression but the strengthening of the left governments in Spain, France, and the Soviet Union. Since this would presumably lead to the ultimate overthrow of Mussolini and possibly of Hitler, the British tories have become convinced that they are faced with a choice between "communism" and "fascism." Faulty though their perspective may be, there can be no doubt that they have made their choice. The only remaining question is whether the British people as a whole are willing to ratify a decision resulting from the hysteria of a few.

AMERICA MUST ACT

The United States, no less than other countries, must now carefully reappraise its foreign policy in the light of the events of the past fortnight. The isolationists are jubilant, pointing to the débâcle in Great Britain [illegible] final proof of the validity of their position. Strangely enough, they denounce Chamberlain for adopting a policy which, in essentials, is the same as their own. For the isolationists have openly advocated concessions to the aggressors as a means of lessening existing world tensions. Like Chamberlain, they have ignored the possible effect of their policy on the smaller democratic countries; and while paying lip service to the principles of international cooperation, they have consistently sabotaged all efforts in that direction.

But if the isolationists are in an impossible logical position, the advocates of collective security have also been put on the defensive. In recent months emphasis has been placed on "parallel action" with the other democratic powers to restrain aggression. With Great Britain embracing the aggressors, people are asking whom the United States can cooperate with and to what end. Die-hard League of Nations supporters are in a particularly difficult situation if they insist, as many do, that cooperation must be through the machinery of the League.

Isolationism, however, is not rendered less dangerous by the practical difficulties standing in the way of collective action. Any step which contributes to international anarchy is a step toward war. Conversely, if war is ever to be eliminated, it will be through the creation of a system of cooperation. There is every evidence that an overwhelming majority of the peoples of the Western world desire such a system and will support it. A recent Gallup poll showed that, despite Chamberlain's policies, 69 per cent of the British public actively favor a policy of collective security. The setbacks suffered by the League are not due to weakness in its basic concept but to the opposition of vested interests to the application of sanctions. The League has also been hampered by the fact that few statesmen have really understood or had faith in collective security. They have paid tribute to the collective ideal, but their policies have been consistently nationalistic, especially in a crisis. That was to be expected. Men's minds do not change overnight. But what was not to be expected was that Great Britain would follow a line not in accord with its fundamental interests.

The breakdown of formal cooperation between the democratic governments before the fascist bluff increases the importance of informal cooperation by means of the people's boycott. Representatives of organizations numbering 123 million persons from 43 different countries attended the World Boycott Conference held in London a fortnight ago. Recent reports in the New York Times indicate that Japanese sales in the United States have fallen off 60 to 70 per cent since the war in China began. The January trade figures, just released, show that American purchases of raw silk were off 50 per cent from the corresponding period of the previous year for the second consecutive month. Success of the boycott against Japan, now within the reach of possibility, would do much to restore the world's faith in cooperative action.

Meanwhile, we should not let up in our pressure for governmental action. We have no reason for despair merely because Hitler has won another victory. Fascism is still essentially weak. The people of Spain and Austria have not given up the fight; both Czechoslovakia and France have reaffirmed their faith in the collective method; there are encouraging signs of a popular revolt in England. If the United States would respond by taking the leadership in cooperative action in the Far East, this development would transcend in importance the shift in British policy and would be the surest way of bringing its reversal. And even without Britain, there are still France, the Soviet Union, most of the minor countries, and a large section of the British Empire which would rally to American leadership.

The most crushing immediate reply which the United States could give Hitler at this moment would be a revision of the Neutrality Act making it inapplicable to civil strife and establishing a clear distinction between aggressors and their victims. The experience of the past year has demonstrated the basic injustice of the act as it now stands. If it cannot be revised so as to permit this country to cooperate in moves to aid the aggrieved and curb assistance to aggressors, it should be repealed. Joint economic action against aggression may be impracticable at the moment, but the United States should at least be in a position where it can withhold aid to aggressors in case the atmosphere changes in Europe. The Administration's lack of such power was one of the major causes of the fiasco of oil sanctions in 1935.

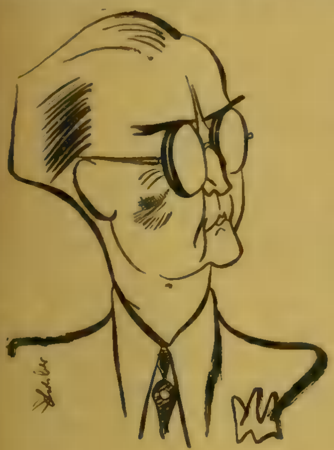
Revision of the Neutrality Act would have the immediate effect of permitting sales to the Spanish government, it would remove the danger of our being forced to help Japan at the expense of China, and it would be rightly interpreted as a warning that we are not wholly unconcerned with the march of aggression.

Profiteers Move Up

BY PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 28

IN OTHER days it was the quaint custom of American shipbuilders and armor-plate manufacturers to support a lobbyist in the person of Bill Shearer, self-styled "Big Bass Drum," whose duties included whooping it up for more and bigger cruisers, sabotaging disarmament conferences, "educating" and "irrigating" the more ignorant and arid Washington correspondents, and performing similar chores of a patriotic and lucrative nature. Nowadays Bill's singular talents go begging, and no wonder. Within a week Adolf Hitler and Neville Chamberlain did more to brighten the future for the American armament industry than the "Big Bass Drum" accomplished in years of faithful service.



Joseph P. Kennedy

Although the situation is somewhat confused, there is no doubt that recent events in Europe have been a boon to Washington's war-scare mongers. Opposition to the navy expansion program—always a thankless task—has been made infinitely more difficult and discouraging. Critics of the program, such as Senator Borah and Representative Maverick, instinctively coupled their objections with distrust of British motives and policy. Now their worst suspicions concerning Britain have been confirmed, but the net result is to strengthen the hand of the big-navy clique. Congressional reaction is that we can't trust anyone and hence had better look to our defenses.

More and more the drive for a gigantic navy and "an adequate merchant marine" points toward a saturnalia of profiteering at government expense unequaled since the World War. This fact even penetrated the breezy assurance of Joe Kennedy on the eve of his departure for London. But not until he had ordered his knee breeches and bought his ticket did it dawn on him that while he was dispatching crisp orders to place striking American seamen in irons, the "big six" among American shipbuilders had been outfitting for an adventure which would make any of Captain Kidd's look like sheer philanthropy. Invited to bid on the construction of twelve cargo ships to be partially subsidized by the Maritime Commission, four firms submitted figures which were approximately twice the costs estimated by the commission's experts and about three times the cost of building the same vessels in England. Two members of the "big six" failed to submit bids, although they were understood to have prepared estimates. Moreover, the bids submitted were in such form as to cause Kennedy to declare that "if they were not collusive, the result was the same as if they had been." I quote from testimony before the Senate Commerce Committee:

> SENATOR VANDENBERG: Are we not likely to run into precisely this situation when this new navy is built?
>
> KENNEDY: I should think it would be much worse.
>
> SENATOR VANDENBERG: So these estimates for $800,000,000 for battleships don't mean a thing if this sort of bidding is to persist?
>
> KENNEDY: Quite.
>
> SENATOR BERRY: What is the increase in labor costs?
>
> KENNEDY: . . . I cannot find that labor is getting any particular amount of this money. Nor are materials high enough to justify any such prices.
>
> SENATOR CLARK: I have run across evidence of this combine in other matters. In the present situation you can buy from them or not at all. Isn't it more or less of a sitdown strike?
>
> KENNEDY: That is the result. I do not know whether that is the premise, but that is the conclusion.

To understand how well-taken was Vandenberg's point, let it be remembered that the costs of new naval construction as submitted to the House Committee on Naval Affairs are simply the estimates of navy experts using the same methods of computation that were used by the commission experts. Indeed, some of the same experts probably worked on both sets of estimates. That simply means that a two-billion-dollar addition to the navy, as contemplated by the navy, would cost about four billion if constructed by the only builders in this country who are equipped with the necessary facilities.

By what ingenious method did the daring and resourceful Kennedy propose to circumvent this contemplated holdup? First, by subsidizing "independent" builders and using their competition as a club over the "big six"; second, by having the ships built in England; and third, "but only as a last alternative," by letting the government build them! But why "only as a last alternative"? To answer that it would be necesary to explain the social philosophy of Banker Kennedy—provided he did not sufficiently explain it himself when he ordered the striking seamen put in irons unless they called off the strike.

By the time this appears the La Follette committee will have resumed its vital investigation of the violation of civil liberties in labor disputes, and on its schedule is a subject of compelling importance. Among the sinister practices devised and applied in crushing the strike in "Little Steel" last year, one of the most viciously effective was that of inspiring and financing vigilante movements.

Such movements appeared in several states, notably Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan. Usually they took the form of "citizens' committees" whose strike-breaking tactics included organizing "back to work" movements, coercing or corrupting local newspapers in the rare instances where that was necessary, and even organizing mobs to assault the strikers. The application of this technique was set forth in elaborate detail in the notorious Mohawk Valley formula, of which it is an integral part. In essence it is a Ku Klux process with heavy overtones of the local chamber of commerce and local banks.

Pehaps the most notorious example of its use occurred in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, during the strike at the Cambria plant of Bethlehem Steel. It has been testified at hearings before a National Labor Board examiner that a company executive supplied the Citizens' Committee with $30,000 in cash, which was turned over to Mayor Daniel J. Shields for the hire of special policemen and the purchase of tear-gas equipment and other restoratives of industrial peace. Similar committees operated in Ohio towns dominated by Girdler's Republic Steel, but less is known about how they were formed and financed, although the effect of their activities duplicated that in Johnstown. Senators La Follette and Thomas (of Utah) may be expected to conduct a thorough exploration of these activities, and a more-needed job is hard to imagine. If there is a real danger of fascism in the United States—and I certainly believe there is—here is where it lies. It should not be forgotten that Hitler got his original financing from the steel barons of the Ruhr, just as his prototype, Mussolini, was launched on the March to Rome by the industrialists of Milan. No specter of a man on a white horse disturbs my dreams, but I have not forgotten the bloody ax handles, or the seven men who died last Memorial Day with bullet holes in their backs because they made the mistake of believing their government was strong enough to enforce the Wagner Act against the steel barons who defied it.

Justice Black, Dissenting

BY MAX LERNER

"THE man who wrote that opinion," I heard a legal friend say of one of Justice Black's dissents, "is a damn good lawyer." And he smiled broadly and knowingly. I did not smile back at the innuendo that Justice Black did not write his own opinions. The remark summed up the peculiar dualism of attitude of the anti-Black people now that he is writing his name large in the court's annals. They cannot help admiring the courage and ability shown in his decisions; yet the censor that watches over our self-esteem will not permit them to confess that they were wrong about him in the first place. The result is the conclusion that since the opinions are good ones, it must have been a couple of other fellows who wrote them.

Whoever wrote them, they have set the legal world on its ear. There were many among Justice Black's friends who wanted him to go slow when he came on the court, wanted him to establish his position before he began applying his drastic progressivism to the judicial process. This applies to several of Black's friends on the court itself, who received him with a mixture of welcome and trepidation. They regarded him much as a Social Registerite might regard a protracted visit by a relative fresh from the sticks, talented and high-spirited, but uncouth, unpredictable, and a questionable addition to formal parties. They wished he would give himself a chance to mellow. Several are reported to have said that given five or ten years in which to master the lore of the court and steep himself in its traditions and spirit, Black would make a great justice.

But Black didn't intend to wait that long. Outwardly he proved malleable enough. His relations with his colleagues have been personally cordial. Even the Chief Justice went out of his way to be friendly. Only Justice McReynolds is still hostile; he regards Black as a renegade Southerner. And well he may, for their two social philosophies are as widely removed as the antipodes. Responding to the friendliness of the other judges, Black has been almost hypersensitive to the court tradition about personal discreetness. He surrounds even his casual contacts with elaborate safeguards. He is still suffering from the trauma of having people forever on his trail during the agonizing weeks of his cause célèbre.

But while eager to play the game in all personal matters, Justice Black has challenged the rules of the game so far as constitutional law is concerned.

Of twenty opinions in which Justice Black's name appears, six have been dissents and six have been concurring opinions in which he disagreed with the court's reasoning but agreed with the conclusion. In eight he wrote the court opinion. This is a high ratio of divergence, especially for a new justice. I shall pass over the cases in which Black has written the court's majority or unanimous decision, because the cases assigned to him have been relatively unimportant. It is as a dissenter that he has most sharply broken the court's patterns of thought and most distressed even his liberal colleagues.

The case involving the "obligations of contracts" clause (Indiana ex rel. Anderson vs. Brand) does not at first sight reveal the importance that it possesses. The Indiana legislature in 1927 passed an act establishing a certain tenure for teachers, and then in 1933 it passed another act excluding township schools from the tenure provisions. A teacher in a township school who had lost her job sued on the ground that the 1927 act established a contract whereby she could not be discharged except under certain conditions, and that the 1933 act had impaired the obligation of the contract and was invalid. The Supreme Court, reversing the state court, held with her, but Black dissented. A comparison of his opinion with the majority opinion by Justice Roberts shows disagreements as to the construction both of the state legislation and of Indiana precedents. But basically the disagreement was over the extent of state sovereignty as against the overriding sanctity of contracts. And there, for Black, is the nub of the matter. He believes in legislative supremacy, state or federal, as against judicial supremacy and the rigid hold of contract doctrine. Intellectually he knows where he stands in the struggle, begun in America over a century ago with Fletcher vs. Peck and the Dartmouth College case, between those who would freeze our order through property institutions and those who would keep it fluid through legislative change.

But the struggle over the contract clause is more an echo of past battles than an expression of present conflicts. More central in Black's judicial career are his opinions in the utility cases. Two of them stand out—a dissent in McCart vs. Indianapolis Water Company and a concurring opinion in United Gas Public Service Company vs. Texas. The Indianapolis Water dissent created a flurry in legal circles on procedural grounds. For Black did the unprecedented thing of dissenting from a per curiam decision, in which the court speaks as a whole rather than through any particular justice. With a sharp, clipped severity the court held that the lower court, in upholding the state commission's schedule of water rates, had erred in not allowing for an upward trend of prices between 1933 and 1935. The rates had been held not confiscatory in 1933; but—the per curiam opinion argued—they might have become confiscatory by the time the 1935 decision was handed down. Black's answer to this decision forms the best opinion he has thus far written. It is full, detailed, statistical in the best Brandeis manner; it is powerful in its irony at the fantastic delays of due-process procedure; it cuts through the overgrowths of legal jargon which screen the fact that ultimately it is the consumer who pays for the impotence of the regulatory system and for the luxury of shuttling cases back and forth between courts. It had taken six years for the commission's order to reach the court; it was now being remanded; at the same rate, it should be back in the court again in 1943. Black preferred to settle it then and there. And he does so on the basis of the prudent-investment principle which Justice Brandeis had developed in his classic dissents. In the process he writes a severe condemnation of the whole practice of the court, since 1890, of invalidating state regulation of utility rates.

The Texas gas case was the second round of the utility fight between Black and the court. Here again he pulled no punches. In a separate concurring opinion he pointed out that the company is an affiliate of the Electric Bond and Share, that the salaries paid to the holding-company officials are set down to operating expenses for the subsidiary and are paid by the consumer in the form of inflated rates. This opinion is notable also for its defense of the jury trial as a method of fixing the validity of commission rate-setting (Justice McReynolds, in one of his ex tempore speeches from the bench, called it "little more than a farce").

But the dissent which has proved most breath-taking is the one on the corporation as a person (Connecticut General Life Insurance Company vs. Johnson). I do not myself regard it as ranking in importance with the utility opinions: it has not the same chance of being fruitful for the future. But there can be no doubt of its dramatic character. The California legislature laid a tax on insurance premiums. The court overruled it as violative of the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides that "no state shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person . . . the equal protection of the laws." Black says quite simply, "I do not believe that the word 'person' in the Fourteenth Amendment includes corporations." And thus he sweeps away fifty years of Supreme Court history and strikes at one of the props of corporate power.

But he does so only after an interesting survey of the legislative and judicial history of the amendment. I believe he is on solid ground so far as history is concerned. There has been for some time a controversy among American historians as to whether those who framed the amendment intended it as a protection of corporate property rights. That such was their intent was the argument of Roscoe Conkling, one of the members of the Congressional committee which drafted the amendment in 1866, when he appeared before the court in the San Mateo case in 1882. This would imply something of a plot or conspiracy on the part of the committee, for the purpose of the amendment was clearly the protection of the newly granted rights of Negroes against hostile state legislatures. Conkling's thesis was accepted as court doctrine in 1886 in the Santa Clara case. Black challenges it as irrelevant. Whatever individual members of the committee may have thought or intended, he points to the undoubted fact that the Congress that passed the amendment, the states that ratified it, and the people in whom the amending power rests were told that the amendment was to protect Negroes and not to remove corporations from the regulation of state governments.

Black's argument is good. There are, however, three things that trouble me about it. One is that in the face of fifty years of court history it is never likely to be more than a courageous gesture. Nor is it merely the time that has elapsed; it is the fact that the personality of the corporation has become an integral part of our constitutional law—right or wrong. The second is that his opinion would have been more complete if he had taken account of the fact that where "person" has been used previously in the language of the law and of lawyers, it has also been construed to include the corporation. The third is that the more strategic line of attack on the abuse of power by the courts would have been to insist that "due process" should be interpreted only to mean procedural safeguards and not substantive determinations of social policy. That was the direction of the Holmes approach, and an economic realist like Black could carry it out even more completely.

There remains the question of Black's impact on the future. He is not the sort of person who, like Holmes or Brandeis, can build a liberal minority around himself. His liberal colleagues are not ready to go with him; he is too acid, too impetuous, too downright; he ruffles judicial sensibilities. Like the child in the story he cries out that the king is after all naked, and it has been the whole function of constitutional law to weave imaginary garments for the nakedness of corporate power. Added to that, there is the fact that while his decisions are clear and well written they do not have the brilliance of phrase and the sure legal touch that Holmes had, or the scrupulous solidity and genius for procedure that Brandeis has. And they are, here and there, marred by somewhat careless footnotes and handling of precedents.

All of which means that Black has become a judicial crusader before he has come to maturity as a judge. His strength lies in the things in which he was strong as Senator—his feel for economic realities, his intrepid belief in popular democratic government as against any sort of oligarchy. He seems to belong in the Jacksonian period of the court, when the democratic upsurge brought to the bench tribunes of the people who had fought for them in the legislatures. Black has proved himself, in the deepest sense, a tribune of the people—ever watchful of their interests, zealous in protecting legislative power, reducing utility cases to the final problem of the interests of the consumer, zealous for government regulatory power over corporations. What remains is to see whether he can add to his other capacities that of patience, and whether he can discipline himself to make possible a common base for all the court liberals. For the time will come soon when the constitutional crisis will again be acute, and Black's dissenting doctrines will be put to the acid test—whether they can be translated into majority doctrines.

Barcelona Faces Front

BY LEIGH WHITE

Barcelona, February 7

ONLY the captious still regard the defense of Loyalist Spain as the expression of revolutionary ardor. It may have been so a year ago, when the Anarchists and Largo Caballero Socialists were far more prominent in Spanish politics than they are at present. Then there was plenty of revolution and not much real cooperation in winning the war. Today, however, the defense of Spain must be regarded as the refusal of a united people, bourgeois as well as proletarian, to accept an imported type of government that they do not want and will not have unless far more foreign assistance and military strategy are brought into action than General Franco has thus far been able to command. The Spanish war has become a war for national independence.

For a demonstration of the war's decreasingly revolutionary and increasingly nationalistic progress, one has only to look at Barcelona. In Barcelona the people have faced the more depressing aspects of war—economic maladjustment, hordes of refugees and consequent overcrowding, shortage of food and fuel during one of the coldest winters ever known, uninterrupted air bombardments, general disruption of social life—without any of the galvanizing factors of proximity to the front. In Barcelona the two mutually antagonistic, electric currents of the war are crossed—the military and the political. If there is a short circuit, it is in Barcelona that the sparks fly. And it is precisely in Barcelona, with its anarchism, its French Revolution libertarianism, and its Catalan cellularism, that the trend away from proletarianismo back to republicanismo has been most striking.

The other day I was walking in the lower ramblas and happened to pass what used to be the Cafe Lion d'Or. Until the "events of May" the Lion d'Or had been a stronghold of the ultra-leftist POUM. But after the uprising was put down and a part of the POUM sent to jail, the battle-scarred building was sealed by the police and more or less forgotten. The day I passed, however, an excited crowd was standing in front, and obviously something was about to happen. Another revolutionary disturbance? Nothing like it: the Lion d'Or had been quietly renovated and made into headquarters for the Loteria Nacional. What was about to happen was the first drawing ever to be held in Barcelona, replete with all the ritual that once marked the Madrid ceremony.

This incident is characteristic of the change that has come over Barcelona in its second year of war. A year ago the city was a teeming, phrenetic revolutionary base. The street cars, buses, trains, and subways all bore the red-and-black emblem of the Anarchists—except where the Socialist UGT was strong and there the emblems were combined. From noon to midnight the cafes that line the ramblas were thronged with blue-overalled workers, militiamen, and "guards of order," and similarly blue-overalled burghers anxious to look like proletarians. Everyone who could packed a gun. There were turbulent mass-meetings and frequent skirmishes, and at night there was firing in the streets. By day the people gathered in the gigantic Plaça de Catalunya or took long bus rides for pleasure. A sort of holiday proletarianismo was the fashion. The front, and the government in Valencia, seemed rather far away.

But with the prolongation of the war all that has gradually disappeared. It was beginning to disappear, in fact, when I arrived in Spain the first of May. The May uprising sponsored by the POUM was a challenge to the government of the Popular Front. Basically the issue was microcosm versus macrocosm: complete the social revolution and possibly lose the war, or scrap the social revolution and probably win it. The Popular Front, dominated as it was by Left Republicans, Socialists, and Communists, took the macrocosmic view: scrap the revolution and win the war and let social change take care of itself when fascism no longer threatens. The result in Catalunya was a reshuffling of the Generalitat to the advantage of the Esquerra Republicana, led by President Lluis Companys, and the PSUC (Unified Catalan Communist-Socialist Party), led by Economics Councilor Joan Comorera. The result in Spain as a whole was the dissolution of the Largo Caballero government and its replacement by the government of Juan Negrín, charged with subordinating everything to the winning of the war. The government's prestige, internationally as well as internally, has been gaining ever since.

After the test offensive at Brunete in July and the definitely successful offensive at Belchite in September, the Negrín government in November was strong enough to move to Barcelona and there proceed to coordinate the whole of Spain for the single purpose of winning the war. For the first time in history the political and economic hearts of Spain were one.

Since then there has been a gradual tightening of control in Barcelona along administrative, industrial, and police, as well as military, lines. Defense Minister Prieto and the army's general staff have been given carta blanca. The "fifth column" has been silenced if not removed; the war industries are working triple time; the problem of the food supply has been taken in hand; and air-raid precautions are being brought up to the efficiency of the anti-aircraft batteries that honeycomb the city. Existing bomb-proof and gas-proof shelters are rapidly being augmented. All street lights and all cafe and theater fronts have been painted blue, and the nights are blacker than anyone thought they could be.

The red-and-black flag is no longer the ubiquitous ensign that it once was; now the red, gold, and purple of the republic and the four red bars on gold of the Catalan Generalitat account for most of the city's color. The government of the republic is firmly in the saddle, and with it are the Generalitat and the government of Euzkadi (to care for its 150,000 refugee Basques). The militiamen went out a year ago, followed after the "events of May" by the POUM, or at least its Trotskyite wing, and the political supremacy of the Anarchists. What remains is roughly what existed before the war began—a Popular Front government resting on a broad trade-union base, with the difference that though the Anarchist CNT still dominates most of industry, the Communist-Socialist UGT has succeeded in aligning against it the petty bourgeoisie from traveling salesmen to hotel keepers.

The ramblas are as always jammed with crowds—organ grinders, flower women, and lottery vendors among them—but now they are bourgeois crowds and the identifiable proletarian is hard to single out. The workers' "guards of order" have disappeared, and the Guardia Nacional, assisted at night by the traditional serenos and vigilantes, now has charge of public order. The soldiers you encounter, and they do not overrun the city, are the uniformed men and officers of the republican army, not militiamen. If comandantes tend to eat and drink with privates still, they are soldiers, not revolutionaries, in speech and action as well as dress.

Even the forms of address are changing. Salud is still a fairly common form, but Buenas and Passeu Bé are much more common, and Adios is rapidly coming back. Though the street cars, buses, trains, and subways still bear the emblem of the CNT, their service has lost much of its compañerismo; conductors, like store clerks and officials, address you as Señor or Señora. Compañero itself has reverted to its traditional meaning ("fellow-mortal"), and Camarada has all but disappeared. Officers and public figures have become Señores Dons again.

Whereas a year ago propaganda was carried on mainly through mass-meetings, vivid revolutionary posters, exhortations in the press, and loud speakers in the streets, it has now taken a distinctly cultural turn, with an accent on war relief. Recently a recital at the rococo, Tiffany-ceilinged Orfeó Català featured the Czechoslovakian dancer, Mira Holzabajova. Its function was to raise money for the Children's Aid. The Mexican composer Silvestre Revueltas conducted the Catalan Symphony Orchestra in his popular "Redes" ("Nets"), in order to raise money for the victims of a particularly deadly air bombardment the preceding week. The Women's Committee Against War and Fascism and the Mexican League of Revolutionary Writers and Artists (LEAR) sponsored the concert.

The effect of the war has been de-politicalizing rather than demoralizing. You have only to compare the posters issued by all and sundry in the early days with the posters that appear today to realize that this is so. "Farmers! the land is yours," was the slogan of the POUM a year ago. "Farmers! the revolution needs your strength," was the slogan of the UGT. The slogan of the CNT, "United We Shall Conquer," was depicted in a poster showing a CNT tank leading a UGT tank on to victory. Now, however, the government itself issues most of the posters. Typical of these is the broadside: "Talent, not money, opens the door to knowledge. Culture has ceased to be the privilege of a minority. The Ministry of Public Instruction has created thousands of scholarships to pay for the education of every son of the people who can demonstrate his talent." Other government posters announce that the number of beds for the tubercular has increased 168 per cent in spite of the war, and that illiterate soldiers are being taught to read and write while in the trenches. The latest PSUC posters are not even illustrated, but are simply such red-lettered quotations from José Diaz, secretary of the Communist Party of Spain, as: "To drive out the foreigner requires the cooperation of every Spaniard who desires the independence of his country." A recent Anarchist poster quoting Elisée Reclus to the effect that "anarchy is the highest expression of order" is very clearly on the defensive.

But slogans and posters, like other forms of political propaganda, are playing less and less important parts in the lives of the Barcelonese. The loud speakers remaining in the streets are not used for political broadcasts at all. They belong to radio stores, or to the Red Cross, or to the Generalitat's Radio Association, and concentrate on music. The Propaganda Secretariat's frequent daily broadcasts are hardly more than news reports, and aside from endless repetitions of the republican "Himno de Riego" and the Catalan "Els Segadors," the Generalitat's radio is no more propagandist in character than the daily papers, which are not excessively so.

For those who would take their social revolutions straight or not at all (the result is frequently the same), some of the changes that I have indicated in this article may be depressing. But they were inevitable. Under fascism the social revolution would not be able to exist at all, and until fascism is killed in Spain the social revolution cannot progress. That seems to be axiomatic. It is true that the land-redistribution question has hardly been touched upon; that foreign and domestic industrial and commercial property rights are still in a tangle; that there is the ridiculous situation of collectivized enterprises competing with one another; that there is inflation and speculation; and that wage readjustments have not kept step with the war-time rise in prices. But nevertheless, the war is being won.

Wall Street Is a Race-Track

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

WITH budget-balancing abandoned, a new appropriation asked for the WPA, and various other measures in force to maintain purchasing power, it is unlikely that the present depression will, at worst, resemble that of 1932. But the fact that there is a bottom to the morass, and that we are not in danger of sinking deeper than our necks, is hardly consolation for failure to reach dry land and begin the ascent of those shining slopes leading to a national income of 80 to 100 billion dollars which, we have been told, is the Administration's objective.

It is obvious that an increase of some 30 per cent in national income means a similar increase in national production, which is conditional on an increase in investment. There is, I am aware, a school of thought which denies this necessity, which argues that there has been too much investment anyway and what is needed is more and more consumption. Two replies may be made. No practical way has been found of forcing the immediate consumption of all incomes; yet if there are "savings," these must be translated into real capital investments—houses, factories, machinery—or the total product will not be used up, and unemployment will follow. Again, if a higher national income is to mean a higher standard of living, production facilities in some lines must be increased or the advance will be dissipated in increased prices. We may have enough automobile factories to supply our wants at an advanced income level. We certainly have not enough houses; and there are indications that a normal demand for many other goods and services could only be met by bringing into use obsolete plant, making a rise in prices inevitable.

This situation should not, of course, blind us to the fact that in this, as in other advanced capitalist countries, there is a secular trend toward over-saving, toward a surplus over and above current consumption too great for translation into profitable investment. In any long-term program of national investment this factor must be taken into account, but it is not a matter of concern in the immediate future.

I should expect business apologists to take issue with this statement and insist that there is no field for profitable investment so long as New Deal policies continue. The reply to this is: either investors have an incredible incapacity for taking long-term views or they have come to agree with the Communists that the economic system is collapsing. But if the latter be true, their eager purchase of public bonds doesn't make sense. Personally I regard the first explanation as the correct one, particularly since the whole system of investment as developed in the corporate era has been to encourage short-term views. Any defense of the Stock Exchange lays stress on the fact that it offers the investor maximum liquidity. This is a great convenience for the investor and, it is claimed, has been an immense aid in promoting a flow of funds into the capital market. Even so, liquidity is far from an unalloyed blessing from the point of view of the general economy. The theoretical ability of the investor to reverse a judgment at short notice has been a primary factor in encouraging the pursuit of capital appreciation rather than income, a pursuit which more than anything else has made Wall Street a race-track rather than an investment market.

According to market theory, the expert opinions of traders, as expressed in purchases and sales, automatically produce an appraisal of a stock which is close to its exact investment value. Such an appraisal, it would seem, ought to have some relation to the income which the stock produces or is expected to produce. After all, a stock is simply a claim to a share in the profits of an enterprise; unless it yields, or promises to yield an income, it is nothing. Actually, of course, traders do not spend laborious days figuring the present value of an indefinite series of indeterminate payments. They are concerned with the price of a stock next week or next month, and the most successful are those who can best anticipate news likely to affect the market (or secure a pre-release) and estimate the psychological reaction to it. "Professional investment," to quote J. M. Keynes's inimitable metaphor, "may be likened to those newspaper competitions in which competitors have to pick out the six prettiest faces from a hundred photographs, the prize being awarded to the competitor whose choice most nearly corresponds to the average preferences of the competitors as a whole. . . . It is not a case of choosing those which, to the best of one's judgment, are really the prettiest, nor even those which average opinion genuinely thinks the prettiest. We have reached the third degree where we devote our intelligences to anticipating what average opinion expects the average opinion to be."

The evil effects of a market in which the speculative tail wags the investment dog is most apparent in its relation to new issues. From the point of view of the national economy, the main function of the Stock Exchange is to provide a conduit through which the stream of savings may flow smoothly on their way to being transformed into capital goods. A steady continuous flow is the prime consideration. But what do we find? In booms the sluices are opened wide and every method used to accelerate the current, with the result that the total supply is swollen at the expense of current consumption, while an undue proportion drains into New York. Frequently it becomes impossible to organize new capital projects rapidly enough to absorb the flow. That is the moment when the boom becomes dangerous and speculators really flourish, the moment for unloading dud stocks, the moment for selling water at fancy prices.

Comes the slump! The sluices are closed tight. The total flow of savings gradually diminishes, but with no outlet the reservoir fills—a reservoir representing the unspent portion of the national product. Inevitably output must be cut down; unemployment rises. Meanwhile where are our brave speculators? Are they scanning the future, playing the long shot, acquiring new assets at a discount? Maybe some are, but in the present slump, at least, these seem to be mostly the little fellows, the buyers of odd lots. It is to be hoped that they are buying for cash and will not be shaken out, for in that case they will probably have the laugh on the big boys, who are sitting on their liquid resources waiting Micawber-like for something to turn up and demning the unpleasant government.

It may, of course, be argued that the Stock Exchange does not originate slumps; it merely registers them. This is a dangerous half-truth. The Stock Exchange is more than a barometer; it is a piece of machinery occupying a strategic position in the national assembly line and, with its alternations between violent acceleration and complete stalling, apt to dislocate the whole process.

The trouble with the New Deal attempts to reform the Stock Exchange is not that they have violated its theories but that they have upset its practices. They have proceeded on the idea of eliminating abuses which had grown up in the market and were impeding its functioning. They have not recognized the extent to which the Exchange had become dependent on its parasites; so that, deprived of them, it found it difficult to function at all. The Securities Exchange Act, the restrictions on margin trading, the increase in the capital-gains tax, the tightening of Stock Exchange rules, the increased cost of trading due to taxes and higher commissions—all these things have served to reduce manipulation and put a damper on speculation. As a result operators have lost their old zest for jolly guessing games; or, as they would put it, confidence has been undermined.

On the assumption, obviously basic to the New Deal, that the capitalist system is to be controlled and reformed but not abolished, there is still a place for the Stock Exchange, and it would be a mistake to let it become atrophied. A national investment program should therefore include an effort to revive the Exchange, not as a casino, but as a real investment market. The reforms themselves should have an important influence in this direction, but a time-lag must be taken into account. It must be remembered that lack of confidence is not due only to the actions of the Administration. There are many solid citizens who have always eschewed Wall Street, believing that the dice were loaded. Still more have memories of the wild racketeering of the boom era. The Exchange has a big job still ahead convincing the nation that its new-found respectability is permanent.

An even more important cause of the loss of capitalist confidence than the Stock Exchange reforms is the government's taxation program. This, it must be frankly admitted, is not in any way a stimulus to investment. It is, in fact, designed in part to check the growth of savings —in the long view an entirely laudable objective. Actually even more drastic taxation may eventually become necessary to achieve this end. Gerald Colm and Fritz Lehmann, in a newly published monograph, "Economic Consequences of Recent American Tax Policy," estimate that in a year of favorable business conditions the 1936 taxation schedule would reduce net savings only by 4 to 7 per cent. They point out, however, that the saving capacity of different classes is very unequally affected. The group with incomes of under $15,000 suffer a curtailment of from 4.7 to 8.3 per cent; those with $15,000 to $200,000, one of 20.5 to 26.5 per cent; those with $200,000 and upward, one of 80.5 per cent.

In the past the general rule was the higher the income the greater the proportion of capital invested in common stocks. Inevitably so, since in an expanding economy a fortune invested in a diversified list of equities tended to grow automatically. As things are now, however, the ability of the very rich to buy equities has been severely restricted. Consequently the supply of capital for the riskier forms of enterprise has been much more reduced than the total supply. Moreover, since the stock market sets the tone for almost all other forms of investment, the collapse in equities has checked the creation of capital assets in innumerable enterprises quite unconnected with Wall Street. These results have been aggravated by the tax-free-bond loophole. There is reason to believe that the very rich are not only employing this for their new savings but are liquidating stocks on a large scale and putting the proceeds into municipal and state issues. Despite the low yields offered—2 to 3 per cent—there is a definite advantage, since it has been estimated that 20 million dollars placed in a 5 per cent industrial security would, after allowing for taxes, give a return of only 1.17 per cent.

In the long run, buying pressure on tax-free securities is likely to force yields still lower, encouraging holders in the lower tax brackets to seek bigger returns in corporate stocks. But the short-run need for greatly increased investment raises the question—assuming that a speedy constitutional amendment to abolish the tax-free privilege is politically impossible—whether important concessions to the wealthier taxpayers are worth while as a temporary expedient. There is no guaranty, however, that such a step would produce more than a temporary boom. The confidence of big business has been undermined not so much by specific New Deal measures as by the whole change in the political climate, exemplified, for instance, by Governor Aiken's speech on Lincoln's Birthday. Until its nostalgia for 1929 is overcome and a realistic appraisal of the situation becomes possible, business will not recover sufficient élan to enable it to take the lead in a drive for prosperity.

Hesitancies of the Administration regarding its next step, its alternate hot and cold breaths, offer business an inducement to stay on the sidelines and see what pressure will produce. If concessions are to be made they should be made quickly; further, they should be clearly stated to represent an absolute maximum.

In a comprehensive federal program a necessary first step would appear to be coordination of effort by the various departments and bureaus concerned directly or indirectly with investment. We have the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board in general control of the credit situation; the RFC making loans to private industry; three or four different bodies concerned with financing housing, urban and rural; the PWA promoting utility projects; the WPA, in conjunction with state and city authorities, adding to the capital equipment of the country in a host of ways. These are only a few of the agencies partly or wholly dealing with investments. There would seem to be need for a National Investment Council which would harmonize these different activities, check competition for appropriations, prevent overlapping, and insure that, when possible, one effort assisted another. For instance, there are indications that the various housing programs may be hindered by a lack of production facilities for some materials. The RFC, which has already announced its willingness to make loans to the smaller business units, might therefore be asked to survey the building-material situation and, if necessary, give special consideration to manufacturers in this line.

While existing government investment projects are in some cases capable of useful extension, it seems certain that some additional and much larger scheme is needed if the depression is to be overcome rapidly. The most obvious deficiency in our capital equipment today is in working-class housing. The FHA, now its powers are extended, may meet the needs of the middle class and a small fraction of the working class. The USHA is tackling the slums but not on a scale commensurate with the problem. Between the spheres of these two agencies is a vast gap corresponding to the demand for decent homes at moderate rents. If this gap is to be filled, the combined efforts of the municipalities and the federal government will be required. There is a great opportunity here to take advantage of the cheapness of money and to turn to account the appetite of tax-avoiders for municipal bonds. Moreover, so many industries contribute toward building that beneficial reactions would be spread over the widest possible area. Another possibility is the plan for a series of transcontinental highways put forward recently in the Senate. It is doubtful, however, whether the need for greater transport facilities is as urgent as the need for houses. It would be for a National Investment Council to pass on their respective merits and on those of similar proposals, and make recommendations to the Executive.

Useful as it could be in the present crisis, such a council could have an even greater value as a permanent part of the governmental machinery. Making a continuous study of trends in the capital market, it could advise on the dovetailing of public and private ventures. It could note when the rate of investment exceeded the volume of savings and suggest such remedies as the postponement of public works. Or if the flow of savings seemed unduly rapid, it could investigate the efficiency of increased taxation. Such a council would not supersede the existing investment machinery; would not mean a government body passing on individual private investment plans; would not necessitate the granting of any additional powers to the Executive. It would mean that the existing power and resources of the federal government could be employed with far greater efficiency than at the present time.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

HITLER has added another crime to his already long list. He has dealt a deadly blow to my friends who believe in "collective security," who have been preparing to put us into war in behalf of the embattled democracies in Europe. Without firing a shot he has compelled England to eat humble pie again and move humbly for an alliance with Italy. Neville Chamberlain, who sees no alternative to war except surrender to the dictators at every point, will, I have no doubt, follow up his impending settlement with Italy with a compromise with Hitler—that is what the die-hards, the Halifax-Astor group, and the inner circle of the City of London desire, to say nothing of the London Times. Their game right along has been to make some settlement in Spain by which they will get a considerable portion of Spanish mines and trade, just as they were willing to have Baldwin compromise with Italy for half of the Ethiopian swag. As Anthony Eden carried nobody with him out of the Conservative ranks, I now look for the signing of the four-power pact proposed by Hitler and a move for the limitation of armaments as suggested by him in 1936; then everything will be peaceful and happy with Hitler dominating Europe, and England safely ensconced in the position of a second-rate, if not a third-rate, power.

Now that raises some interesting ethical questions. As we all know, the government in Washington considers that Germany, Italy, and Japan are "bandit nations." Officials very high indeed use these words in describing them, and a group of men in and out of the government who are determined to have us war-minded within the next three months are constantly referring to the necessity of our smashing Japan now when it has its hands full with China because, as they say, we have got to take on Hitler and Mussolini eventually. But if Neville Chamberlain strikes hands with Hitler, what happens? Will this (a) make Hitler no longer a bandit in the eyes of Washington and our Anglophile statesmen, or (b) make Chamberlain a bandit and the head of a bandit country, or (c) still make it necessary for us to go to war to save the British democracy? In my eagerness to find the answer to these important questions I have carefully read the dispatches that have appeared in our leading newspapers from their special correspondents in Washington. I find a distinct variance quite in accord with the tendencies of their editorial pages. Thus the Herald Tribune affirmed that the Hitler speech and the Eden resignation had greatly strengthened the isolationist sentiment and that the bulk of the people in Congress are determined to tell England and the rest of Europe to go to hell—while we arm at once.

The Times, on the other hand, reported that the events had undoubtedly strengthened the government's policy—by which it means the government's policy of playing its game in Asia with the connivance and cooperation of Great Britain while getting ready to come to the aid of the democracies in due course, whenever the time comes to save the world for democracy once more. Other special correspondents reported Secretary Hull as being dreadfully upset by the news of Eden's resignation, which would seem to indicate that, after all, the recent happenings have not played into the hands of the State Department's inner ring. I am not surprised at that. How in thunder can we fight for the democracies if they insist upon playing the game with the dictators?

All of this brings into clear relief the fundamental weakness of the whole Hull-Davis-Roosevelt policy of getting ready to steal up behind the bandit nations and hit them over the head when they aren't looking. That weakness was and is that they have been in such a dreadful hurry to swat those whom they call the bandits. They weren't ready to wait a few months or years to see whether Hitler would hang himself or not, and how the British would jump; they had to settle it all in a rush. The American people were to be made war-minded in ninety days, with the aid of Japan and some nice rousing fireside talks from the White House. But Japan hasn't been obliging of late—though of course it may come across any day—and here is Chamberlain who has just walked out on the collective-security crowd. So after only a month or six weeks of the Great Conspiracy we have visions rising before us of Brother Neville and Brother Adolf sitting side by side with their arms tightly around one another. How in the world will the State Department be able to sell an Anglo-American alliance to our people in the face of a picture like that?

Well, the truth is it won't be able to. Instead of dissent being suppressed and the country following the example of the ineffable Alf Landon and the noble, patriotic Frank Knox, and declaring that all criticism must now cease at the brink of war, the fire of criticism has grown sharper as the targets have come more plainly into view; and the end is not yet, even though the rearmament bill is going through with a rush. I wish these warlike gentlemen had been with me in Minneapolis recently and attended a dinner of six thousand persons in honor of Governor Benson of Minnesota. When Governor Phil La Follette of Wisconsin in the course of a fiery speech said that the American people weren't ready to exchange social safety for war, every man and woman in that great audience cheered. The people in those two states are 99 per cent for letting the war business alone.

A memoir of his youth, by

HAROLD NICOLSON

Helen's Tower

The central character is Lord Dufferin, famous Victorian diplomatist and viceroy, Mr. Nicolson's uncle by marriage. From the varied material of Lord Dufferin's career, from the author's own memory and states of mind regarding the world in which Lord Dufferin lived, is fashioned this unusual book. Mr. Nicolson's device is that of "indirect autobiography" which he was the first to employ, with such great success, in "Some People."

Illustrated with photographs, $3.50

A collector's item

E. E. CUMMINGS' COLLECTED POEMS

The best work of this extraordinary and vital poet made available in a single large volume. Cummings' poetry has previously been available only in scattered anthologies, magazines, and slim books now prized by collectors. They will prize this also, for its score of new poems and Introduction. $3.00

The new novel by

GÖSTA LARSSON

author of "Our Daily Bread"

FATHERLAND, FAREWELL!

"Both for the interest of the material and for its skillful handling, it well deserves the attention of intelligent readers."

—Herschel Brickell, N. Y. Post, $2.50

●

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK

PUBLIC

Columnists on Parade

II. WESTBROOK PEGLER

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

WESTBROOK PEGLER is the typical newspaper reporter raised to a commentator. There has been no metamorphosis. He is still the newspaper reporter, common garden variety, and that is his principal distinction among the columnists. Pegler is a reporter by training, association, and attitude. His father is a veteran in the game, he grew up in the world of newspapers, and he married a newspaper woman whom he met when they were both covering the same murder. He began as an office boy in the United Press in Chicago. He became a reporter very early and at twenty-two was sent to the London staff. That was during the war. He offended at least one general and an admiral by asking embarrassing questions, and his foreign career was brief. After that he made a reputation as a sports columnist for the Chicago Tribune. He began writing his present column in 1933. Many papers subscribed under the impression that they were getting a sports column, and there were cancelations. Then editors "got educated"; he appears in 110 newspapers, circulation 5,907,389.

Your typical American newspaper reporter has no coordinated point of view. He is likely to be a personal rebel, at heart romantic, something of a reformer, but hard-boiled before the world. He usually has literary ambitions. The reporter's business is to ask questions and get answers even if the questionee is God himself. Do you remember when the reporters asked Dean Inge in New York harbor whether or not he believed in the Virgin Birth? That's the spirit. The tabloid era introduced a new competitive high in questions and a new low in their content. "I know the reporter's side," wrote Pegler defiantly in 1933. "I stop short of burglary, but the sort of newspaper schooling I received did not teach me to throw down an assignment at any time I happened to find the job repugnant to my finer feelings . . . and if I had been the vulgar rascal who was ordered on an office tip a few years ago to ask Colonel Lindbergh if it was true that he was engaged to Miss Anne Morrow I would have been the vulgar rascal to ask him just that." With the power of the press behind, and pushing him, it is easy for the reporter to assume, in a half-cocky, half-dedicated way, that he is asking questions not only for the press but for the American people, who have "the right to know" whether or not Dean Inge believes in the Virgin Birth. Meanwhile the world he lives in—which he comes to believe is the whole world—teaches him to have a low opinion of those who conduct the world's affairs in any and every sphere. He regards "intellectuals" as sissies, though he wants to write novels himself. The personal rebel, in and out of newspapers, nine times out of ten becomes a reactionary in politics because he comes to believe only what he sees and sees nothing in which he can believe—except personal relationships. Sometimes he becomes a cynic—though Pegler is no cynic.

Pegler's column is the column of a man who might have had such an internal history—and we know that he once tried fiction. He is agin everything, especially the government and authority in general. Nothing is what it seems, and both sides in any controversy are wrong. The title of his collection of columns published in 1936 was " 'T Aint Right." It began with a rather gentle piece about pigeons, which is said to be his favorite. His column is the liveliest of the lot. Being a good journalist he always attacks. Being unpredictable he constantly surprises. At his best he has a hard-hitting nervous style, which gives the impression of a boxer stripped and on his toes, welcoming trouble. He is the Cagney of the columnists. His style also gives the impression of ease in writing, though his friends testify that he works painfully at it. At his syndicate they say it's his "Gee whiz" attitude that has made him popular. But the "Gee whiz" attitude is running out. Pegler is becoming less unpredictable—everything is a racket—and the newspaper reporter is deteriorating. In disposing of the suppression of civil liberties of citizens as well as of C. I. O. unions by the blatant dictator of Jersey City he used an easy device, which an accurate reporter would scorn, of belaboring as Communist the C. I. O. and Morris Ernst (whose failure to get a Soviet visa is public knowledge) and ascribing to them the sins of Stalin. "Altogether the row is reminiscent of two dips who ran up to the policeman, one yelling, 'He glommed my stickpin!' and the other, 'He's got my watch!' " Another of Pegler's distinctions is his self-conscious use of sports or police-court jargon with which he brings every issue down to the level of a barroom argument between two "mugs."

He is vindictive about labor unions in general and labor leaders in particular. During the C. I. O. strikes last spring and summer he vented his spleen with characteristic violence. A column on May 12 was headlined: "Union Parasites a Menace. Labor Racketeering Vicious. Toilers Coerced by Leaders."

> As matters stand [he wrote on June 2], a contract with a labor union is worth no more than the word of the leaders who sign it, and . . . the labor leader . . . is immune to rebuke for anything short of personal murder, if that.
>
> One great income tax which is generally overlooked is that collected by labor unions from a class of citizens most of whom are considered to be too humble for the > official attention of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. . . . Only a labor leader would tax those whom the President has described as ill-clothed, ill-housed, and ill-fed [June 9].

>
> Senator Guffey blames the steel trouble on the refusal of three companies to sign contracts with the C. I. O. . . . The justification is that a contract with the C. I. O. isn't worth a damn. . . . In fact, no contract with any union is worth any more than a treaty with Mussolini nor will be until there is mutual responsibility.

Reprints of his column of June 9 were distributed to employees of the Krug Baking Company, whose resistance to an independent union is now the subject of hearings before the New York State Labor Relations Board.

Toward the end of June, Pegler reported an interview with John Lewis, who was annoyed by his columns. He printed Lewis's citation of the record of the United Mine Workers and other unions in the matter of contracts:

> . . . but it has since occurred to me that I was right in saying that a C. I. O. contract isn't worth a damn, or anyway not much of a damn. Because while the law now protects the union and gives the employer a firm pushing around if he utters just one peep against the union to the help, the law still does not penalize the union if it breaks an agreement. . . . [Lewis] is a very tough man, and I predict that there will be more blood shed for and against a free man's constitutional right to stay out of a union and retain his right to earn a living than over all the other issues put together.

That is one way of stating the class struggle; and Pegler leaves no doubt that he will be on the side of the right to work and the oppressed employer.

Pegler's apology for the horrible lynchings in San José in 1933 is famous. It was a protest against self-righteousness rather than a defense of lynching, but its violence was disproportionate to its object. That is characteristic. In his column a day or two before, he had made this interesting, only half-humorous remark.

> Not until the repeal of prohibition did I realize how I loved to hate that law . . . and the present moment finds me with almost a week's accumulation of . . . ill-will and no really worthy proposition or group to use it on. . . .

The San José column was offset later by his columns on the Nazis and Mussolini—and for once his personal inside anger matched the outside social issue over which it flowed, white hot. But there was no organic connection between the two. He is not anti-fascist because he understands fascism in any social sense. He is a personal rebel who hates any kind of authority that affects or might affect him personally. He still takes pot shots at the fascists—and he really hates them—but the fight between Hague and the C. I. O. seems to him "six of one and half a dozen of the other." The "right to work" as defined by the Citizens' National Committee has a warm champion in Pegler, though it represents the essence of fascism—which he sincerely hates as it shows itself in Hitler and Mussolini. It is only fair to cite his column (November 27) on the yellow-dog contract imposed by the Douglas Aircraft Company on its employees, but he did not fail to refer to the coercion of labor unions.

Pegler's attacks on the Bureau of Internal Revenue were based on a personal outrage. His argument is invariably ad personam. It dispenses with any obligation for knowing more than one fact at a time or weighing one against the other. And it makes fast reading. On January 26 he turned out a column—part fact and part fantasy and very amusing—about an orchestra in a night club. It showed up the "full-crew" rules of the musicians' union. It happens that the musicians' union represents A. F. of L. bureaucracy in its last stages, but the average reader would never get a hint from Pegler that it is not typical of all unions, and he has almost 6,000,000 readers.

Another of his pet hates is the Roosevelt family. On January 18 he twitted the Roosevelts for being born rich and defended the self-made men of America whom Roosevelt has called economic royalists. He had a point. He usually has a point and it is usually a pin-point. But in making it he drew a picture of the self-made millionaire that would bring a lump to the throat of the average man. Incidentally he spread out a large sample of the Pegler "philosophy" and his nostalgic Americanism.

> The element of rich men I have in mind are members of the Horatio Alger school who started from scratch as typical, one-gallus, Whitcomb Riley barefoot boys. . . . In every possible way they hustled to make an honest quarter or a dollar. . . . Horatio Alger was the most popular boys' author . . . it was always the story of the boy with the widowed mother or no parents at all who worked hard, suffered much . . . and in the last chapter wore a gold watch and chain. The hero was an insufferable prig [you don't catch Pegler falling for a sissy] . . . but his success was dream stuff and he was the inspiration of many men who are now either rich or quite well-to-do and who got that way playing the game according to the rules which were unanimously recognized [here Mr. Pegler takes a light leap over the exploits of the robber barons big and little] and against heavy odds.

His last paragraph is too eloquent—of many things—to leave unquoted:

> There are those who call Mr. Roosevelt a traitor to his class, but that cry comes from the hereditary rich. . . . The class I have in mind take pride in having made their own way. They are proud to have taken care of their own parents in their old age, and every crack from him about well-fed clubmen and economic royalists evokes from them the soul-satisfying and contemptuous taunt, "mama's boy."

Being a Common Man, Pegler is against big business in the abstract, though the self-made millionaire is one of his heroes. In the big quarrel between Ickes-Jackson and big business, which was the best thing the columnists had had to chew on since the Supreme Court fight, he attacked both sides in his best court-reporter style, in the name of the little man of 1929.

> Mr. Roosevelt's restatement of the New Deal was sweet and showed a wish to soothe the fears of the frightened sucker, and here is hoping he can do it, be> cause there must be an awful lot of small money under loose bricks in this country. But business had better make up its mind that taxes are going to get higher and bigger and quit sniffling about something that simply has got to be, and the Administration had better quit yelling "Keep your hand on your watch!" every time business starts to polish up that Arkansas diamond for a live one's cautious gaze.

>
> How can any man take a chump with police whistles shrilling all the time?

Of late the quarrel about newspaper postal rates has occupied him. In the last few weeks three of his columns have been devoted to the claim of the Post Office Department that in the last ten years alone the newspaper and periodical press has enjoyed a camouflaged subsidy of more than a billion dollars. It gave him the opportunity to ring several doorbells. He could twit Jim Farley about special memorial issues—"the printing and engraving staffs began to think they were working for a funny paper." He could twit the Roosevelts on their journalistic prowess—"journalistic genius flashed in the writing Roosevelts the instant the returns were in in 1932." "Mr. Roosevelt and his Cabinet stooges," he continued, "want to publicize the fact that the press is a private business, conducted for profit." But don't think Pegler has any illusions about the press. He has often heard men in newspaper offices "sound off about the educational function of the papers and their status as a public institution, but always with a smile." He came out against subsidy of any kind.

It was in the course of these columns also that Pegler delivered himself of a piece of economic wisdom.

> One curious thing occurs in this controversy which seems to upset the old Upton Sinclair superstition that a kept or subsidized press is servile to its sugar daddy. Because if the American press does enjoy a subsidy it has not only bitten the hand which feeds it but munched it off clear up to the shoulder.

So a great issue is disposed of. But Pegler was also enabled to twit Upton Sinclair. In 1934 Pegler was sent to California during Sinclair's campaign for governor. Sinclair pinned the brass check on Pegler, and we may be sure the accusation rankled. Pegler's columns bespeak a bitter, thin-skinned, romantic individualist—he lives in a "picture-book Bavarian-Alpine cottage in Connecticut"—who thinks with his feelings, who is anti-"intellectual," and intensely personal. His defense of self-made men is not impersonal either.

His coverage of the Sinclair-Merriam battle was characteristic. He set down Merriam for the political tool he was. He had a Roman holiday with "Mahatma" Sinclair.

> Your correspondent has just reeled away from an interview with Upton Sinclair and some members of his Brainstorm Trust. The world is going round and round. There are wheels spinning in space, an old windmill, bolts and nuts . . . Nuts seems an appropriate note on which to conclude today's instalment.

That set the tone of future instalments. In this case it was an argument between a "mug" and a "nut." He preferred Merriam to Sinclair, echoing the exaggerated cries of the red-baiting reactionaries that Sinclair, the Socialist in Democratic clothing, would "smash the state completely."

Twenty out of thirty-five Pegler columns I have just examined deal with such questions as labor unions, Hague and the C. I. O., the Roosevelts, the newspaper-Post Office quarrel, the anti-lynching bill (he's against it). For the rest there are some amusing reminiscences and some good muckraking columns. One of his best was on the Catholic church and the child-labor amendment. As usual he seemed more interested in attacking the church—he was born a Catholic and the church represents authority—than in defending the amendment. His average man, George Spelvin, is an effective character, though conceived in sentimentality out of confusion. His most waggish performance was his column of January 3. It consisted of the following sentence repeated fifty times (in 109 newspapers*): "I must not mix champagne, whiskey, and gin." Recently he has spent a number of days in Chicago. That city's crooked politics give him unlimited scope for relieving himself of any stored-up ill-will. His columns on Chicago are usually good, though after several days the flow of bile over facts only slightly varied becomes monotonous.

There is no doubt that Pegler speaks to and for the small man, who is also agin the government and the politicians. Listen to some of his fans among readers of the Memphis Press-Scimitar who took part in a features' popularity contest. (Pegler tied with Eleanor Roosevelt for first place.)

> While we have a free press and Pegler, our country is safe.
>
> This is indeed true liberty when free-born men speak and therefore Inarticulate Mr. Average Citizen finds his Champion in the person of Westbrook Pegler. . . .
>
> . . . Pegler writes in our favor. . . . Oh, no, you can't fool Pegler.

One lawyer fan called him the "Voltaire of our century."

In an article in the Saturday Review of Literature Bernard DeVoto echoed his humbler fellow-fans.

> While someone of Mr. Pegler's ability is sitting on [the crackerbox], spitting on the stove, and telling us why he doesn't think so much of the folks in Washington—it is far too early to despair of our institutions.

To Mr. DeVoto Pegler is the direct descendant of the village thinker, the crackerbox commentator, of Major Jack Downing and Mark Twain. Mr. DeVoto flatters Mr. Pegler. The commercialized jargon of a sports writer turned columnist has little in common with the authentic homespun commentary of Major Downing. But admitting the lineage for the sake of the argument, Pegler, as a safeguard of American institutions—I am speaking of civil rights—is a slender reed. The commentator of 1938 who deals with the issues of the modern world in terms of personal feelings and intense individualism is the first to succumb to such reactionary delusions as "the right to work," which has been neatly turned into the wire-fence motto of the company town.

---

*Not 110 because the Philadelphia Inquirer refused to print it.

Pegler's distemper, combined with a lack of any coordinated point of view, much less understanding, of the world he writes in must drive him farther and farther into reactionary attitudes. The charge often made, that he always agrees with the boss, is almost irrelevant. His experience with bosses has been pleasant. Success impresses him, and he believes in a deeply American way that the individual with guts and brains can achieve success. In millions the rich promise of America has generated a sense of power whose frustration they cannot understand. They tend to seek a scapegoat while secretly blaming their own inferiority. Pegler appeals strongly to this group. He has influence in so far as he expresses the small man's confused feelings about what this country's coming to—in glib and violent language his readers would themselves like to command. He speaks most eloquently to that element in the much-romanticized common man that is most susceptible to some reactionary American-dream fascism of which the stock in trade is scapegoats. Pegler's stock in trade is a kind of psychological inflation, the wilful assertion of self, which reaction always finds useful.

Meanwhile an interesting clue to Pegler's internal chemistry is contained in what is perhaps the most fulsome and therefore seemingly least typical column he has ever written. His column on "Snow White" was the outburst of a man who had had a catharsis. All his defenses were down. What came out was a stream almost maudlin in its sentimentality. It was really Pegler's disgust in reverse, and his key remark is as acrid a sentence as I have ever read.

" 'Snow White,' " he said, "is the happiest thing that has happened in this world since the Armistice."

Think it over.

Erratum: I was apparently misinformed as to the figures for David Lawrence's column though my source was presumably authoritative. His column appears in 133 newspapers, circulation 6,000,000.

[Next week: Hugh Johnson]

Verse for a Sower

BY LeGARDE S. DOUGHTY

This acre grew in simple green
Iambics slow as solstial sun,
Lyric-lucid and serene
As syllables of benison.

North-wind's anapestic rout
Brought this acre sorely down;
Scratched its candid wording out,
And left an acrid scrawl in brown.

Trochee-heeled, the ice-hard days
Trample on this acre now,
Leaving to the sower's gaze
Only lines drawn by the plow.

BOOKS

Whose Side Is the Lord On?

HEARKEN UNTO THE VOICE. By Franz Werfel. Translated by Moray Firth. The Viking Press. $3.

WHILE Austria trembles at the future, her gifted sons write of Magellan, Napoleon, and Jeremiah. Confronted by that savagery which her own prophet Freud revealed as sleeping within man and lives to see awaken, Austria seeks from the past a pattern for chaos. But while Zweig evokes the navigator's ghost only, it seems, in futile dream of brave new worlds, and the young Paul Frischauer takes a somewhat morbid delight in dissecting the Emperor's resonant lies, Franz Werfel now finds in the Bible a living belief in the uses of oppression and the power of the oppressed. "Greatness is consistent only with running counter to the world . . . the eternally defeated are the eternally victorious."

More than this, however, "Hearken unto the Voice" apparently indicates its author's return to race and religion, the culmination of a process that was foreshadowed by the return of the Armenian expatriate, Gabriel Bagradian, in "The Forty Days of Musa Dagh." And as a product of this process Werfel describes here the culture and life of ancient Judah under the relatively humane code of Moses—an ethics so advanced indeed that it was properly regarded with alarm both by Judah's powerful neighbors and by her own children. Primarily concerned as he is with God's use of man, Werfel does not neglect the uses to which man sometimes puts Him. There are really fine portraits of Zion's temporal rulers: Josiah, the "royal hurricane"; Jehoiakim, the dreaded tyrant whose strange passion for building vied with that for compounding—wines, perfumes, colors, incense, aromatics; Zedekiah, who at last freed Judah's bondmen because the Lord had decreed it and because he needed warriors. Interested always in spectacle, Werfel gives us glittering descriptions of the events, the customs and ceremonies, the many facets of the ancient cultures. He gives us Pharaoh, watching from his resplendent throne as the gods of Egypt tremble at Megiddo before the God of Israel; Nebuchadnezzar, not just but mighty, restoring through the sack of Jerusalem the "sacred symmetry" of the world; the farmers, soldiers, beggars, and priests of ancient Judah, whose social order, secure as it might seem and bulwarked by elaborate conventions, lay always ready for its Day of Judgment, the loan but not the legacy of an incalculable Creator. And against such a background Werfel traces the history of the impassioned Jeremiah, prophet of disaster, spirit of Hebraic righteousness, heir of Moses and precursor of Christ.

It is in the background scene of "Hearken unto the Voice" —this tremendous and rich mural of ancient life—that the virtue of the book lies. For Werfel, refusing to penetrate what he calls "the boring labyrinths of human psychology," makes no interpretation of that complex interweaving of psychic guilt and, as it were, ethical innocence which forms the emotional matrix of the martyr. To Werfel, Jeremiah, as he was to the Hebrews, is the voice of God, "the old causal God, the God of logic." And to Werfel, as to Jeremiah, ancient Judah sinned against this God, and ancient Judah was punished. Yet in spite of Werfel's convictions and creative force, can we now hearken to such a voice, coming as it does from the childhood of man? This view of Judah's fate seems at best a rationalization of despair and at worst masochistic. I must confess, moreover, that to me the ancient Hebrews hardly seemed to deserve all Jeremiah's fiery animadversions: their sin was as much their physical as their spiritual weakness. And since Werfel's modern protagonist is saved by embracing the ethics of Jeremiah, does Werfel imply that the Jews and all other oppressed minorities today are suffering because they, like their ancestors, have also sinned? Are the Nazis, even as the Babylonians, and Hitler, even as Pharaoh, simply the unwitting weapons of the Divine wrath? Although I realize, as Silone has lately reminded us in another book bearing on this theme, that in times of "conspiratorial and secret struggle the Lord is obliged to hide Himself and assume pseudonyms," I do not somehow feel that He, even for a moment, would assume the one of fascism. MAXWELL GEISMAR

The English

HELEN'S TOWER. By Harold Nicolson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

EVERY new book coming from Harold Nicolson is, for those who have read his last five biographies, an increasing delight. "Helen's Tower" is a development of his historical attitude and an amplification of his biographical technique. One frequently wonders whether it is not more a collective snapshot of its author than a full-length portrait of Lord Dufferin, and this ambiguity is deliberate. For it seems to be the first in a series of studies which will revive, as only Nicolson can, his whole epoch in terms of the men he knew well. Dufferin was his uncle. This "tragic and decorative man" was governor-general of Canada. When he was made Marquess the Queen considered the title of Quebec, whose walls he had preserved, less suitable than Ava, the old Burmese capital, whose kingdom he had annexed to India. He was a great diplomat and an accomplished public servant. His acts still cast their shadow on British foreign policy, and Nicolson had no need to stretch or exaggerate the references in Dufferin's career to contemporary events.

And yet, as Nicolson says, his book is not primarily a record of Dufferin's career but rather a study in transitions and an analysis of a complex personality. It is also in an indirect and more subtle sense an apologia for its author as an individual Englishman and a brilliant defense of the English attitude as a world principle. Nicolson has a special talent for the evocation of a precise past that makes Proust's great work seem all the more what it is, a novel. Nicolson's style is Proustian, but he writes not novels but history. When he hunts his minutes of forty years ago, the breathless, choking lyricism, the haunting, agonized perception by way of the madeleine are absent. Facts in their unrelieved, patient, and almost deprecated nakedness, constructed from trivial relations, are assembled in an anecdotal and carefully informal pattern which to a casual reader might almost suggest that the writer was not quite bright and that every new incident burst with astonishment upon his unsuspecting simple sight. This style is scarcely mock modest or naively pretentious, for every sliver of memory or tactile description accentuates the underlying conviction that the past is forever present, that men's behavior, particularly the behavior of the English (for he indeed admits only the right by observation to speak of his own countrymen), is in its errors and accomplishments at once minuscule and miraculous. Nicolson's childlike familiarity with his Uncle Dufferin, instead of breeding a mythological character, constructs bit by bit an almost heroic but very genuine figure. His sympathy with liberal politics, while he sorrowfully accepts their cynical compromising, does not wholly stigmatize his subject with duplicity but merely is evidence of his own diplomatic experience. The patient cynicism of the English diplomat is not in the bland frame of either De la Rochefoucauld or Machiavelli. The realistic self-interest of the Latins, their steel eyes and shrewd greed, is absent from Anglican idealistic imperialists. Describing a portrait of Lord Dufferin as a young man, Nicolson writes, "His brush had been guided by such confused associations as chastity, the Oxford movement, and a very rich young peer." The sense of imperial crusade, the instinctive feeling that after all the colonies are better British than native-governed and every native will get to be grateful given enough time and colonization, the happy sportsmanship of enough naval bases, the grateful security of imperial pipe-lines are all ingrained in the fascinating chronicle of Lord Dufferin's deeds and days. It is too easy and too irrelevant to cry hypocrisy, to unmask the self-deception, to reveal the self-interest, to point out betrayals, and to list acts of disputable honesty. Nicolson is about as honest as any writer living, and an honest historian in his field is rarer than in the far simpler pastures of an artist's narcissism or a novelist's exhibitionism. Nicolson is a spokesman for England's attitude, and he accepts his stewardship without pretension. As a little boy he was pro-Dreyfus and pro-Boer, but he did not, after Mafeking, recollect that "on that occasion I manifested any overt pro-Boer sympathies. I shouted and halloed with the rest."

The question of the mind of Britain, that awesome and mercurial vexation, is very present with us today, whether reflected in its suppression of "Snow White" for minors, its provision of gas-masks for the masses, its ominous flirtations with Franco, or its dissembling with Hitler and Mussolini. Mere self-interest cannot simply explain it. A knowledge of its grain of modest but absolute self-rightness is helpful, and "Helen's Tower" aids toward this knowledge. "Even to this day (and God grant that it may last) there is something in the spirit of Westminster which discourages heroics. It has nothing to do with cynicism and still less with heartlessness, but it is based upon the sane realization that emotionalism should not pass beyond New Palace Yard." One can accept that on its face value. What it all has something to do with is just this: The English play the waiting game the longest, the best, and win most often. In this angry world they will be the last to relinquish their hereditary and imperial property rights. They have an experienced technique for elastic decisions which may end in eventual war and dismemberment, but not until every humanly conceivable policy or possibility has been consciously employed and exploited. Their modest and resilient stupidity, inexorable acquisitiveness, and stubborn ownership are their God-given armor. All we read in our daily papers increasingly makes clear how fierce a God they get their gifts from. The tragedy of Lord Dufferin's declining days, his involvement in just the sort of hideous and criminal scandal which would most hurt and destroy such a charming man, was not mitigated by his innocence or by his almost accidental connection with the fraud. Dufferin's tragedy is in miniature the present drama of the British Empire, and Nicolson records it with a grace equivalent to its greatness. The urbanity, the simplicity, the endearing record of the many dates, names, places, and his unutterably tender sympathy for it all must command our homage. The last page, for example, is a masterpiece of poetic documentation and touching truth.

Once my sister remarked to Nicolson that she thought the empire started to decline when it lost us as a colony, the only colony it has ever lost. "Not at all," he replied seriously. "We deeded back the Ionian Islands."

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

The Realm of Truth

THE REALM OF TRUTH. Book III of "Realms of Being." By George Santayana. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

THREE decades have passed since Santayana published his celebrated "Life of Reason." Though its magisterial pronouncements were made in accents reminiscent of Plato and Aristotle, that work beguiled contemporary naturalists to view Santayana as one of them. To these philosophers it now seems that Santayana's early naturalism has become progressively attenuated in his recent books. Especially in the "Realms of Being"—a series of books to which the present volume belongs—it appears that the spiritual life has displaced the life of reason, and dispersed its poignant relevance to the human scene.

The "Life of Reason," however, was not a system of philosophy but a philosophy of morals, that is, of the harmony possible in man's practical enterprise. Its naturalistic bias was never central to Santayana's perspective, and even in the "Life of Reason" was qualified by that nostalgia for the spiritual life which so manifestly motivates the "Realms of Being."

Readers of the preceding volumes of this series will recall Santayana's distinction between the realm of matter, which comprises all existence, and the realm of essences, which are the eternal objects of thought and intuition. The realm of truth defines the relation between these other two realms of being, as well as the relation between the moral affairs of the practical reason and the aesthetic devotions of the contemplative spirit.

Truth is a prosaic, practical affair, of interest only to those unfortunate spirits whose material circumstances are unstable and insecure. Though it naturally inclines to the contemplation of pure essence, the spirit must here—to preserve itself—take cognizance of existence. The form of this existence is the truth.

But truth is not the ultimate goal or good of mind. That ultimate good is the spiritual life, which consists in freedom from existence. Free spirits, like the heroes of Santayana's famous novel, live in a material world which sustains them but in which they play no part. They are not workaday forces shaping the world but festive intelligences illuminating it by the free play of wit and fancy. In such spiritual life "truth would take its place side by side with fiction of every sort, to be valued not because true—for merely being true does not make things worth knowing—but only for invigorating and entertaining the mind."

If such entertainment is the value of this philosophy—and for a "free spirit" it can have no other value—it has eminently fulfilled its functions. If, however, the reader is so far from enjoying such "freedom" of spirit as to have a vital and not merely aesthetic interest in truth, he will look to philosophy for something more than an invigorating exercise of his mind. He will look for principles relevant to existence and clarifying the methods by which he comes to know it. And in this demand for an operative efficacy of philosophy there lies a challenge to those abstract realms of being which Santayana has here so neatly articulated into a system. From such a vantage point these realms of being are revealed as the continuous phases of human experience which by a linguistic artifice Santayana has dissociated from the natural and social world in which they originate and function.

This dissociation is at the root of his theory of truth, which he defines as the "complete ideal description of existence." Truth is not the quality of an idea, opinion, or judgment. It is "the standard which these deliverances conform to, in so far as they are true." "That which is true is the proposition, relation, or other essence actually illustrated in the facts." The truth is absolute, and "forms an ideal realm of being impersonal and super-existential."

This doctrine—so momentous in its vision of eternity—is not merely irrelevant to actual procedures in science but seems to lack internal coherence as well.

According to Santayana, true knowledge is a description of existence which conforms to a standard description. Then knowledge in this theory—as in Platonic realism—is a kind of recognition, and the trueness of any description of existence lies in its identity with that "standard comprehensive description" which is the truth. But this recognition, or identity, presupposes the independent knowledge of the two descriptions identified; in other words, the independent knowledge of the description made by the judgment and of the standard description recognized in it. Now, such knowledge of the standard description would have to be attained either through a knowledge of existence, in which case it could not serve as a standard for such knowledge, or through an immediate apprehension of essences, in which case we could have complete knowledge of all truth about existence without any empirical inquiry. Both alternatives are absurd, yet no others seem possible in Santayana's theory.

But perhaps these defects of his system appear only when it is viewed in the human "foreground" for which Santayana has such sovereign disdain. Set at a proper remove in some distant cosmic vista, his philosophy may be free of the embarrassing constraints of an inconstant nature and a halting human society. It is not without truth that Santayana can say of himself: "In the past or in the future, my language and my borrowed knowledge would have been different, but under whatever sky I had been born, since it is the same sky, I should have had the same philosophy."

WILLIAM GRUEN

African Tales

AFRICAN GENESIS. By Leo Frobenius and Douglas C. Fox. Stackpole Sons. $3.

FROBENIUS is certainly one of the best connoisseurs of Africa, but as certainly he is one of the greatest romanticists, one of the most contested scientists in the field of anthropology. His sense for reality seems to have exhausted itself in politics. He was successively a good friend of Wilhelm II and of the left socialist minister president Kurt Eisner of Bavaria; he waited in the antechambers of the Social Democratic secretary of state Heinrich Schulz and has today a framed sentence out of Hitler's "Mein Kampf" in his studio. Anthropological science has its more or less justified doubts about the reliability of his writings. Any Africanist, therefore, will think twice before quoting him as a scientific source.

Frobenius's recent book is a selection of African tales chosen from his former German publications of the years 1921-31 and published under a pretentious and misleading title. The tales deal exclusively with the African high cultures of the Berber region, the Sudan, and southern Rhodesia. Since the African high cultures are extraordinarily complex formations which absorbed numerous influences from the Mohammedan, the European, and the Indian cultures, the title of the book seems especially audacious. The Berber tales, in particular, show a strong European-Christian influence, and some of them may provide tolerable reading for the hard-boiled anthropologist but scarcely for the general public. The inserted illustrations, originating in Frobenius's investigations of African rock paintings, have on the whole no relation to the content of the tales.

Douglas C. Fox, who wrote the introduction, begins with the sentence: "As pure stories, read for the entertainment they may bring, these tales need no introduction." I agree fully with him. Perhaps they may afford some entertainment.

JULIUS E. LIPS

After "Anthony Adverse"—What?

ACTION AT AQUILA. By Hervey Allen. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

MR. ALLEN'S second novel—his first, if you will remember, was a long story about a young man whose name began with A— is doubtless being awaited by hundreds of thousands of eager readers. To set their minds at rest, it should be said at once that the new novel is short, covers only four of these United States instead of most of the civilized world, and takes place over a period of less than a year if you leave out the epilogue, which doesn't amount to much anyway. The time is the fall and winter of 1864; the place, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Maryland, and Virginia; the background, in case you have not yet guessed, is the Civil War. The hero is a colonel in the Union army.

Perhaps because he was dealing with a subject which recent fiction has made tolerably familiar, Mr. Allen was not able to resist a number of old favorites. There is the noble Southern lady who suffers with quiet dignity while the Yankees start to burn her house; there is the courteous Yankee officer who hates to burn the noble Southern lady's house but orders is orders; there is the fiery young Southern girl who sasses the Yankee officer. There is the battlefield scene after the engagement is over. It is night; a heavy snow is falling. You would of course expect to see a woman in a shawl with a lantern looking for her lover among the dead and wounded. Mr. Allen is more generous. He gives you two women in two shawls looking for two lovers. There is, however, only one lantern. At the end there is another scene which Mr. Galsworthy almost wore out. The old colonel, having watched the troops marching off to the war with Spain in 1898, and having mused on the meaning of it all and decided that every generation must have its battle, sits on his porch and thinks of the past. Suddenly a shaft of sunlight strikes through the leaves on to his face. He is dead!

It would be unfair to stop here. Mr. Allen brings his colonel on furlough from his home in Kennett Square down to the Valley of Virginia. As he passes through town after town, the war in some form is always present. In Philadelphia it is hot talk about killing every last rebel; in Harrisburg it is rumor, what you read in the newspapers, and an otherwise quiet life; in Chambersburg it is ashes and blackened chimneys, the aftermath of a rebel raid; in Morgan Springs, West Virginia, it is hog-wild militia lording it over the terrified inhabitants; in Winchester it is the headquarters of the Army of the Shenandoah and the war in fact and in person. It takes

ONE of the world's outstanding scientists reveals his laboratory findings on racial problems.

HEREDITY AND POLITICS

By J. B. S. HALDANE

Taking the reader with him into the laboratory, Haldane brilliantly demonstrates how the principles of genetics work and how the science applies to men, women and nations. In so doing he inters the pseudo-scientific posturings of Hitler's racial theories. A lively and authoritative work. Heredity and Politics also discusses the nature of racial differences, the race problem and positive and negative eugenics. It should be required reading for all who believe sterilization programs would solve our problems. $2.50

W. W. NORTON & CO. 70 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

"The clearest, most scholarly explanation of the last two decades that we have," writes HAROLD J. LASKI in his preface to

THE POST-WAR HISTORY OF THE BRITISH WORKING CLASS

by ALLEN HUTT

Publication of this book in America may, Mr. Laski declares, "save the working class from some of the mistakes that the English have made." The author himself has known at first hand the events about which he writes. He has seen the working of the British Labor Party from within and understands its intricate structure and habits. Above all, he debunks the great "British Myth." A best seller in England, the book is destined to be widely read and discussed in this country. Illus. $2.75.

COWARD-McCANN • 2 W. 45th St., New York

the colonel more than half of the novel to get to the small, unimportant engagement at Aquila which marks General Early's last stand, put down so handily by Sheridan but not before a sharp and bitter fight, to which Mr. Allen does full justice. The colonel's journey down to Virginia and the battle at Aquila are lively, full of credible incident, swift moving, shot with homely humor. This is Mr. Allen at his best, a best reminiscent of McKinlay Kantor's "Long Remember," though the material is less deeply realized. After the battle Mr. Allen and the colonel settle down to a blurry love affair which carries them through the winter and to the end of the war. If you are good at guessing you will know that the heroine is the noble Southern lady whose house the colonel burned down so reluctantly. North and South are thus reunited. But man must have his battle.

If Mr. Allen had not written a novel whose sales reached fabulous proportions, "Action at Aquila" might be taken for what it is, a good, run-of-the-mill Civil War novel, with a vivid battle scene and many admirable touches that can hardly be invention—the clock that never struck anything but two, the boy who was dared to stop a cannon ball with an iron spade and splintered his arm as a result, the strange end of Sergeant Smith who trusted his mulatto wench too far. If Mr. Allen invented these, the more credit to him. As it is, he has made them sound true. Much of the book sounds true. Much of it is hackneyed, a little weary, even a little labored. Perhaps "Action at Aquila" should have been written first, instead of the other way around.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Shorter Notices

INVITATION TO THE BALLET. By Ninette de Valois. Oxford University Press. $5.

It is very seldom that an artist and a craftsman is equipped with executive ability. Miss de Valois is not only a fine dancer and choreographer but the successful director of the Vic-Wells Company. She is also an accomplished writer. This book is a lucid and vivid account of her own experience as a dancer under Diaghilev, and then of her increasingly important role as a prime mover in the creation of a national British ballet. Her excellent taste prevents her from having any chauvinistic illusions about the preeminence of English talent; she is a realist, as any sensible idealist in the theater must be. Her book is full of fascinating details, with a wealth of reference to all the arts. The pictures are interesting and make one eager to see the English dancers. Anyone with curiosity about the developed classic dance or theatrical dancing today will be glad to have this splendid book.

BELLAMY SPEAKS AGAIN. The Peerage Press: Kansas City, Missouri. $1.

This two-hundred-fifty-page volume contains heretofore unpublished articles, addresses, and letters by the American prophet-economist Edward Bellamy, author of the well-known classics "Looking Backward" and "Equality." The first, published in 1887, sold in larger quantities than any other book up to that time except "Uncle Tom's Cabin." It has been translated into nearly every modern language and is considered, paradoxically enough, a textbook in modern Russia. What "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was to the abolitionists, Bellamy's books have been to idealists seeking a new democratic economy and social order. Most of the articles collected in "Bellamy Speaks Again" originally appeared during the nineties in such magazines as the American Fabian Magazine, the North American Review, and the Forum. In the light of recent developments—the enunciation of the philosophy of the New Deal and the presentation of various plans for keeping America out of war—this book, like all Bellamy's writings, takes on a new significance.

A GREAT LORD. By Paul Frischauer. Translated by Phyllis and Trevor Blewitt. Random House. $2.50.

Younger and less well-known to us than such compatriots as Stefan Zweig or Werfel, the Austrian Paul Frischauer gives promise of approaching their creative force. The protagonist of his story is Andreas Rasonski, an obscure Polish noble who, since he can afford the luxury of "neither convictions nor an establishment," dreams of becoming a great lord by the use of his own wits and his wife's charms. When this lifelong desire is fulfilled at last through Napoleon's affair with this wife Dzjunka, Rasonski, jealous, embittered, and trembling, discovers that "its fulfilment afforded him so little satisfaction that he no longer ventured to desire anything further." Mr. Frischauer's irony is not reserved solely for the career of his somewhat dubious hero. And his elegiac wit, summarizing his delicate psychological perceptions, gives the novel flavor as it plays upon the personages and events of the period—on Rasonski's lovely Dzjunka infatuated with royal tyranny, on the Polish nobility seeking a free land for themselves but not for their serfs, on Napoleon himself as he is revealed in Rasonski's aspirations and sickened fantasies, and on Napoleon's era, rich like our own in bloodshed, its crumbling fraternal Utopia enchanted by the fine phrases of its first emperor.

DRAMA

Drawing-Rooms and Battlefields

S. N. BEHRMAN'S new comedy at the Guild Theater certainly exhibits no new facets of the author's talent. The scene is again a sumptuous drawing-room through which his characters move with their accustomed ease, and the subject under discussion is not unrelated to subjects which similar characters have taken in hand on previous occasions. That is no doubt the reason why not all the reviewers seem to have found as much delight in the performance as I myself found, but I do not think I shall be inclined to enter any complaints so long as Mr. Behrman can discourse with the wit and incisiveness he again displays in "Wine of Choice."

His method, like every other method, has of course its limitations. Certain dramatic aspects of the conflict between the philosophy of those who have and the philosophy of those who have not obviously cannot be observed in a drawing-room. If the real significance of that conflict does not emerge except on the battlefield where concrete things are being fought for, then it is plain enough that only plays which move through the factory and the field can communicate that significance. But a fundamental assumption of intellectual comedy is that one kind of understanding of any conflict is possible only on the sidelines, or at some other place where, for the moment at least, the battle is not raging. And Mr. Behrman's drawing-rooms are merely realistic substitutes for a spot of enchanted ground upon which deadly enemies can meet, fragments of neutral territory over which flies the flag of social convention guaranteeing against any breaches of the peace other than those which come within the definition of the "scene" as opposed to the brawl. Here the contented sybarite can exchange thrusts with the reformer, but here also the revolutionist can, not too improbably, come to express his exclusive contempt for all the rules of a game which is not to him worth playing.

Mr. Behrman's clarity and wit being what they are, the result is an exhilarating exploration of minds and temperaments which can be as clear and stimulating as it is only because he has adopted still another convention—that by virtue of which each character is permitted to speak as wittily as the author can make him. For this same reason the battle is, moreover, almost necessarily a draw. That does not mean that Mr. Behrman conceals the direction in which his own sympathies lie. He is, as clearly here as in the other plays, among those who hold that the sensibilities and loyalties of his liberals—"inhibited by scruple and emasculated by charm," as one character puts it—are indispensable to any possible good life, however insufficient they alone may be to guarantee it. But this revelation of his own conviction does not involve any failure to give the revolutionist an opportunity to make the best possible statement of his case, and there is no reason whatever why many spectators should not conclude that he actually has the best of the argument.

Perhaps the fact that the dramatic climax of the play turns upon an incident only collaterally connected with the main theme may be taken as an indication of a certain weakness in the method, since it might be argued that the best possible play on the subject would not reach even its purely theatrical climax in a scene where a group of people await the moment when a guilty pair must confess their guilt by emerging from the room in which only a few of the company know that they are hiding. But this scene is at least one of the best "screen scenes" of recent comedy. And if Mr. Woollcott, who shares with Leslie Banks and Claudia Morgan the chief roles, still "behaves" somewhat more than he acts, his behavior is very appropriate and he has increased considerably in skill since his last appearance on the stage.

"Casey Jones," the new Group Theater production at the Fulton, illustrates rather neatly the dramatic method which is the opposite of that adopted by Mr. Behrman. Writing about a locomotive engineer and the relation of his craft pride to the railroad system he serves, Robert Ardrey boldly moves his scene from railroad yard to way station and even to the locomotive cab itself. The result is, in one or two instances, a stunning bit of stagecraft, but the story, while quite intelligent and intelligible, is pretty consistently what one would expect. As a result one has got at the end some nice realistic pictures but far less real insight into the emotional or intellectual significance of a situation than Mr. Behrman manages to give us without a glimpse of the physical locale of the struggle with which he is concerned. Of course the comparison of the two plays does not prove that all plays ought to take place in drawing-rooms. Mr. Ardrey is only a promising young writer, and Mr. Behrman is a master of his particular craft. But it does prove that to take us to the scene of a struggle does not necessarily mean to make it extraordinarily real or vivid, and that to reconstruct the cab of a speeding locomotive may be to encourage a writer to believe that his play comes to grips with the subject rather more effectively than it does. Charles Bickford is convincing as the engineer.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN EUROPE · MEXICO
THE SOVIET UNION

YOU WILL SEE MORE THAN TOURIST SIGHTS WITH

THE OPEN ROAD

Small travel groups recruited from the professions—authoritative leaders assisted by cultured native guides—social contact with people of each country.

DENMARK, SWEDEN, NORWAY, under leadership of Prof. Hartley W. Cross. Cities and countryside including Norway's fjords and mountains. Study of cooperatives and folk schools. Sailing July 2. Back Aug. 29.

ITALY, TURKEY, SOVIET UNION and GERMANY, under leadership of Prof. Goodwin Watson. A contrasting study of the psychology of social change. Sailing June 29. Back Sept. 2.

"INSIDE EUROPE." Auspices American Student Union. France, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Soviet Union, Finland, Sweden, Denmark, England. For college students only. Sailing July 2. Back Aug. 22.

MEXICO, under leadership of Julien Bryan. More than a month in the cities and native villages. Sailing July 14. Back Aug. 23.

●

For rates and descriptive circulars on these and 20 other trips address:

THE OPEN ROAD

DEPT. C
8 W. 40th ST.
NEW YORK

Cooperating in the Soviet Union with Intourist

By Havelock Ellis . . . Psychology of

SEX

His Latest Book on the Sexual Life
Crystallizes the Findings of a Lifetime

"The best one-volume treatment of Sex in the English language."
—Carl Van Doren

". . . the best of all available books on this subject." —Hygeia—Published by the American Medical Assn.

"There is probably [illegible] better introduction to contemporary knowledge and contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology, and hygiene of sex."—The Nation.

"Some of the finest and, in many respects, the most advanced findings in this field." — Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases.

389 Pages — Price [illegible] (Postage FREE) 5-Day Money-back Guarantee
EMERSON BOOKS, Inc., Dept. 496-A, 251 W. 19th St., New York City

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION will deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

The Readers' Service Division
The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
The ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
production of JEAN GIRAUDOUX'S comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., W. of Bway. Matinees, Thurs. and Sat., 2:40. Evenings, 8:40. 300 Seats at $1.10. Telephone reservations: Circle 6-5990—No one admitted during prologue.

WINE OF CHOICE
a new comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN with
LESLIE BANKS CLAUDIA MORGAN ALEXANDER WOOLCOTT
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., West of Broadway. Mats., Thurs. and Sat. 2:30; Eves., 8:30.

"One of the best musical shows of the year . . . Witty, Fresh."—Atkinson, Times
"PINS AND NEEDLES"
NEW YORK'S HIT MUSICAL REVUE
LABOR STAGE 39th St. & 6th Ave. BR 9-1163
Evenings 8:40
Matinees Wed. & Saturday 2:40
Prices:
Matinee 55c to $2.20
Evenings 55c to $2.75

FEDERAL THEATRE FOR NEW YORK CITY

A Living Newspaper on Housing
"one third OF A nation"
ADELPHI THEATRE
54th St., East of B'way.
Prices 25c to 83c. Evgs. 8:40. Mat. Sat. 2:40.
No one seated during 1st scene

A Drama of the Black Napoleon
HAITI
By WILLIAM DU BOIS
LAFAYETTE THEATRE
131st St. - 7th Ave.
Evgs. Only. 25c to 55c.
No one seated during 1st scene

COMING . . .
A New Comedy About the Young Lincoln
"Prologue TO Glory"
By E. P. CONKLE
MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE
39th St., East of B'way.
25c to $1.10

A Modern Comedy of Negro Life by John Charles Brownell
MISSISSIPPI RAINBOW
49th STREET THEATRE
49th St., West of B'way
40c - 25c - 15c

A DIVISION OF THE WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

WAR IS IMMINENT—STOP IT!
RALLY ON MARCH 6
Speakers
SENATOR ROBERT M. LAFOLLETTE
MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM C. RIVERS
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
NORMAN THOMAS
JOHN T. FLYNN
HOMER MARTIN
BERTRAM WOLFE
ERNEST L. MEYER
JOHN BOSCH
Sunday, March 6—2:30 P. M.
N. Y. HIPPODROME
SIXTH AVE & 43rd STREET
General Admission: Free
Reserved Sections: $1, 50c, 25c.
For tickets phone: CHelsea 2-9174 or write Keep America Out of War Committee, 242 East 14th Street, New York City.
Also at all McBride ticket agencies

RUSSIAN
SEMINAR

Enjoy Special Privileges in RUSSIA
THIS SUMMER
WITH
DR. JEROME DAVIS
Pres., American Federation of Teachers
See, know Russia face to face—15 cities Black Sea to Baltic. Also Poland, Denmark and Sweden. . . . One of Eight Exciting Study Tours in Europe. For complete details
Write to Box J-26
The Bureau's 46th Year!
A non-profit Foundation. Every dollar adds enrichment to the satisfactions of travel. . . . .
Ask for Table of all Tours.
BUREAU OF UNIVERSITY TRAVEL
NEWTON MASSACHUSETTS

RECORDS

THE B. B. C. Symphony has not played long enough under Toscanini to be as sensitized to his direction as the New York or even the Vienna Philharmonic; but its excellent personnel and ten years' discipline make it a responsive instrument in hands that can use it; and so while the performance of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony (Victor: five records, $10) is not all that Toscanini would have achieved with the New York Philharmonic, it is nevertheless a beautiful performance in the ways that his performances are beautiful — orchestral coloring, transparency of texture, contour of sound and phrase, structural coherence. And the recording allows these things to be heard.

No doubt you have read about the weakness in form of Chopin's Piano Concerto Opus 11 (Victor: four records, $8). The weakness exists; but I doubt that most of those who write about it could point it out—their knowledge being acquired from reading other writers who acquired theirs in the same way. And the ordinary listener is more likely to be disturbed by the usual remedy for the weakness—the cut in the long orchestral introduction of the first movement. That introduction once past, he will be aware, I think, not of weakness but of strength—the strength of the superb music Chopin has put into the work. I have remarked on previous occasions that the fault often is not in Chopin but in his performers: it is Arthur Rubinstein who tortures the phrases of the concerto's lovely second movement. In other parts of the work and in other ways his playing is magnificent; and Barbirolli provides an excellent accompaniment.

For a public performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion that was going to be given permanence on records Koussevitzky should have engaged first-rate soloists; actually only Keith Falkner, who sings the music of Jesus in the performance recorded by Victor (Volume 1, ten records, $20), brings to the occasion the voice and style it calls for. To the deficiencies of the other singers Victor adds deficiencies in recording—among them shrillness and harshness in the sound of the orchestra. On the other hand the excellent singing of the chorales by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society sounds well. The work is sung in English; I think a recorded performance should be sung in the original German. And the da capos of the arias are reduced to the mere orchestral introductions—which I have heard done, for obvious reasons, in concert performances, but which I would have liked to see left undone in a recorded performance.

In quiet passages of Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung" the delicacy and subtlety of Melchior's phrasing—astonishing in a Wagnerian heroic tenor's singing of German Lieder—are well reproduced by the Victor record ($1.50); but the full voice in this song and in "Zueignung" and "Cäcilie" is earsplitting. Astonishing in a different way is Jussi Björling's singing of "O Paradiso" from "L'Africana" and "Cielo e mar" from "La Gioconda" ($1.50). Comparing this with the electrical re-recording of Caruso's "O Paradiso," I found Caruso's voice the more beautiful in timbre, Björling's the one with greater power and ease in high notes.

"Carnegie Drag" is an enjoyable jazz improvisation recorded for the Commodore Music Shop by a group of outstanding players that includes the pianist Jess Stacey, who for once is heard at suitable length.

Columbia records have not arrived. B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

America's Blood Guilt

Dear Sirs: It was the Christmas service in our little Chinese church. We were singing, "It came upon the midnight clear, that glorious song of old." A sinister rumbling overhead dominated the music, then died away toward the south. It was a squadron of bombing planes going to bomb the cities and villages in the war area. And I felt a flood of shame to think the planes were all probably using California gasoline. These flights into the heart of China, these ruthless bombings of refugees and helpless civilians, these exterminations of terrified farmers have largely been made possible by the Niagaras of gasoline we have poured across the ocean.

The army is coming into a conquered city—an apparently endless line of Ford trucks, neat closed staff cars, and armored cars of Ford or Dodge make. We have supplied the power for this thrust into the vitals of China. We have given Japan its wings and wheels. No American who has not personally known the sick horror of invasion can possibly imagine what this great mechanized glacier of cars can mean to this tortured population. Words cannot reproduce the agony of fear that shakes a village when the Japanese soldiers surround it, shouting for the "big girls." Words cannot make real the nightmare of bandits descending upon a defenseless countryside. And we are helping to do this. We may send our pennies over for relief. But we can't escape the blood guilt of our share in this holocaust of suffering.

It is ridiculous to call the boycott a war measure. Is a housewife compelled to buy from every agent that comes to her door? Immortal souls are at perfect liberty to give or withhold their resources under the guidance of their own conscience. And may America highly resolve that she will cease to share in the profits of and the responsibility for this international crime—the assassination of China.

F. B.

Peiping, January 15

Mr. O'Connell's Peace Act

Dear Sirs: I wish to call attention to a bill now pending in Congress introduced in the House of Representatives by J. J. O'Connell of Montana and known as the Peace Act. The purpose of this bill is to amend the Neutrality Act, which is in fact anything but neutral.

The O'Connell bill would vest power in the President to declare when an act of aggression has been committed by one nation against another nation, and to name the aggressor nation by proclamation. Thereafter it would be unlawful to transport any arms, ammunition, or implements of war from any place in the United States to the aggressor or to any other state for transhipment to the aggressor. Also it would be unlawful to buy bonds or securities of the aggressor nation, to extend credit to it, or for any American vessel to carry to it arms, ammunition, or implements of war. Heavy penalities are provided for infractions of any of the provisions of the bill.

It is essential that this bill receive a public hearing in the House, where proponents or opponents may introduce testimony concerning it. I therefore urge all readers to communicate with Representative Sam D. McReynolds of the Foreign Affairs Committee urging him to approve a public hearing for the "Peace Act" of Mr. O'Connell.

EDWARD FRIENDLY

New York, February 23

Boycott All Aggressors!

Dear Sirs: In this most critical period in history it is time to stop telling people that boycotts encourage race hatred and that boycotts let helpless children starve. It is time that everyone knew that the money which the Japanese government receives from selling silk to America goes not to feed Japanese children but to fill Japanese cannon. Germany, Italy, and Japan should all be boycotted. A hue and cry should be raised against buying any commodities of these countries.

Many times it has been said that the democratic nations must unite against fascism. But do our governments move toward such unity? Unfortunately, so far, the governments of the democratic countries seem on the retreat. It is up to the people themselves to make themselves heard, and the most effective way they can do this is by boycotting all aggressor nations. In that way they can show the government their real position; both Spain and China will be helped; and fascism will be weakened.

M. V. LEOF

Philadelphia, February 23

Object Lesson in Technique

Dear Sirs: The heavy hand of big business may wear different gloves for different occasions, it seems, but underneath are the selfsame fingerprints.

The New Bedford Standard-Times (evening), the New Bedford Mercury (morning), and radio station WNBH, the only newspapers and the one radio station in a city of 110,000, are owned by E. Anthony and Sons, Inc. Publisher Basil Brewer, who controls this corporation, has been a valiant defender (?) of freedom of speech and press, as a member of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. It will be recalled that the association and its members have often raised this banner of free speech and free press when attacking the New Deal and in their battle against the American Newspaper Guild.

Recently New Bedford's textile manufacturers and the New Bedford Textile Council reached an agreement, under pressure of the current "recession," for a 12½ per cent wage cut. Officials of the Federal Communications Commission later announced that Emil Rieve, acting chairman of the Textile Workers' Organizing Committee (C. I. O.), had complained that the Brewer-owned newspapers and radio station had "refused to print or broadcast a paid statement" of the union concerning the pay reduction. The federal officials said the complaint charging "unwarranted suppression of free speech" would be considered when the station filed for renewal of its license on May 1, 1938.

In one case big business has used freedom of speech and press as a slogan with which to attempt to crush labor. In the other it quietly renounced freedom of speech in an attempt to crush labor.

DREX SPRECHER

Cambridge, Mass., February 25

Republican Sabotage

Dear Sirs: At last the Republican minority in Congress are showing their true colors. At last they have come out in the open in their fight against the Administration instead of allowing a group of Democrats to form the opposition.

On the recent vote for cloture in the debate on the anti-lynching bill the Republicans held the balance of power between the revolting Southern Democrats and the New Dealers. These Republican Senators, though they all claim to favor the bill, voted for a continuance of the filibuster, which has so far made this Congress the most inactive in history.

Why did these men, all of whom favored the anti-lynching bill, refuse to limit debate on it and thereby bring the filibuster to an end? The answer is simple: they wanted to be able to say when the elections came around that the Democrats had become the "do-nothing" party, and to call attention to the bad record of this session.

Let us hope that the American people will remember how those Republican Senators voted on the motion for cloture, and give them their just rewards at the polls.

F. S. CUTLER

Newport, R. I., February 25

Louisa Alcott

Dear Sirs: I am very sorry and indeed aghast that The Nation (in its issue of February 19) should publish a review of the life of Miss Alcott which not only accepts as accurate Miss Anthony's fantastic analysis but piles Pelion on Ossa. It is impossible for one who knew her as well as I did, who enjoyed her amusing tales of Fruitlands and Mr. Lane, played charades and Mrs. Jarley with her, saw her pleasure, yes pleasure, in giving her father comforts and happiness and in caring for little Lulu, to make such phrases as "sterile rewards," "borderland of hysteria," "thwarted life" fit at all the buoyant and free character who was often a guest in my home.

I cannot refrain from writing a few words of protest.

MARION TALBOT

Chicago, February 23

Still Afraid of Forgery?

Dear Sirs: The research supporting Beatrice Schapper's Afraid of Forgery? in The Nation of February 5 was evidently confined to obsolete check-protecting devices, for she will find that no forger, no matter how clever, can "sponge out the colors" from a check protected by an imprint made with a modern ribbon-inking protectograph. Checkwriters employing the old liquid-ink method and fixed "star" characters are not to be compared with machines employing a ribbon which bleeds an indelible ink into the very fiber of the paper.

Moreover, some checkwriter policies provide coverage against forgery of the drawer's signature and the indorsement, and contain a valuable affidavit clause providing that the insured need not furnish proof but merely an affidavit stating that loss has occurred.

There are other errors in Miss Schapper's article. The elementary principle of law "He who alleges must prove" is a refutation of the statement about bank responsibility. Due care only is required of the banks.

IRVING L. GREENE

New York, February 15

Dear Sirs: For the sake of argument, suppose I concede that no forger can change the amount on a check protected by a modern checkwriter. What of it? A forger can still forge an indorsement on the back of the check, where most of the losses occur, or make alterations at a half-dozen or so other points not protected by the indelible provision, which covers only the amount. While the free insurance policies are limited, it is true that some forgery insurance policies broader than others may be purchased. Again what of it? The fact still remains that forgery protective devices are almost entirely unnecessary because the depositor is already adequately protected by the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act.

As for your statement, "Due care only is required of the banks," it may be said that the quality of the care exercised is dependent upon the intensity of the bank's wish to avoid losses to itself through cashing forged checks, for the banks know that they are responsible. Section 23 of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act reads:

> Effect of forged or unauthorized signature—Where a signature is forged or made without the authority of the person whose signature it purports to be, it is wholly inoperative, and no right to retain the instrument, or to give a discharge therefor, or to enforce payment thereof against any party thereto, can be acquired through or under such signature, unless the party against whom it is sought to enforce such right is precluded from setting up the forgery. . . .

BEATRICE SCHAPPER

Pittsburgh, Pa., February 22

Union Teachers Only

Dear Sirs: In your issue of February 19, under the heading Plowing a New Field, you referred to the educational program of our union, the United Automobile Workers of America. We have a slight correction to make. At the present time we are not employing WPA teachers in our educational classes. The very realistic subjects that we are giving instruction in at present can be better handled, we believe, by our own union members who have graduated from our instructors' classes.

Classes for union men who will in turn become instructors are being held not only in Detroit but also in Cleveland, Pontiac, Lansing, Tarrytown, and Los Angeles. These instructors' classes are in addition to classes for the union membership which are being held in practically every automobile center in the country.

MORRIS FIELD,
Education Director

Detroit, Mich., February 24

CONTRIBUTORS

PAUL Y. ANDERSON has become a member of the Washington bureau of the liberal St. Louis Star-Times.

LEIGH WHITE drove an ambulance in Spain for some months. He is now in Barcelona working on a translation of a book on the war.

KEITH HUTCHISON was formerly on the London staff of the Herald Tribune as a specialist in economics.

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN is the author of "Dance" and the director of the Ballet Caravan.

WILLIAM GRUEN is a member of the Department of Philosophy at New York University.

JULIUS E. LIPS, formerly head of the Department of Anthropology in the ethnological museum of Cologne, is now on the staff of Howard University. He is the author of "The Savage Hits Back."

DOROTHY VAN DOREN was formerly associate editor of The Nation.

CORRECTION:—In the article Farm Aid: Fourth Stage by Mordecai Ezekiel in last week's issue, it was stated that minimum crop loans to farmers "under existing conditions would tend to put a floor under farm prices of approximately . . . 10 cents for cotton." This figure should have been 8 cents.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLING ME
PUBLIC

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 12, 1938 NUMBER 11

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 285
EDITORIALS:
RUSSIAN TRAGEDY, ACT III 287
REPLY TO MR. SLICHTER 289
THE COURT WRITES A LABOR CODE 290
A BILL TO PROMOTE DICTATORSHIP By Paul Y. Anderson 291
CHAMBERLAIN'S TREASON by Robert Dell 292
RISKS—THE KEY TO RECOVERY By Sumner H. Slichter 294
COLUMNISTS ON PARADE. III. HUGH-AND-CRY JOHNSON by Margaret Marshall 297
THE WAR IN THE ETHER by Karl Van Gelderland 300
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 302
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
JOSEPH IN THE LAND OF THE DEAD By Philip Blair Rice 303
TWO POEMS by W. B. Yeats 304
HARRIET MONROE'S SEVENTY YEARS By Eda Lou Walton 305
THE EIGHTH GOTHIC TALE by Mark Van Doren 306
MILESTONE ON MEXICO by Anita Brenner 306
THE GALLANT MARQUIS by W. E. Woodward 307
ART: MARIN AND HIS OILS by Jerome Mellquist 308
DRAMA: IN THE GRAND STYLE By Joseph Wood Krutch 309
FILMS: PHOTOGRAPHY BY WOODARD By Mark Van Doren 310

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

BARELY TEN DAYS AFTER EDEN HAD BEEN forced out of the British Cabinet for insisting that Mussolini should submit evidence of his good faith before opening negotiations with Britain, the Duce established the validity of Eden's position by backing out of his compromise offer on Spain. All the powers, including Italy, had agreed that the French frontier would be closed and aid to both sides in the Spanish conflict terminated when a substantial withdrawal of foreign (Italian) "volunteers" had been completed. Italy now demands that the frontier be closed as soon as the international commission which is to determine the number of volunteers reaches Spain. Mussolini knows that France cannot assent to an arrangement that would shut off aid from the Loyalists while Italy continues to support Franco. His demand can only be construed as an effort to line up Britain with the fascist powers in support of the Spanish rebels. In this maneuver Mussolini is doubtless acting on the belief that Chamberlain has burned his bridges and dare not retreat. Meanwhile fascist men and arms continue to pour into Spain in tremendous quantities—and in new qualities. The Germans are now sending their best equipment. In February a number of Desau machines appeared. The Desau is a large, armored fighting plane fitted with seven machine-guns and one cannon. At the same time, many Junker 52's, Heinckel 3's, and fast Messerschmitts continue to fly over Switzerland and France into Franco territory. Mussolini, in February, furnished the rebels with new squadrons of Fiats, Isota Fraschinis, Savoias, and Capronis, which were responsible for the recapture of Teruel. Nevertheless Barcelona is still confident of final victory. Teruel cost Franco far more than it did the Loyalists; the internal political situation has never been so good, what with the UGT and CNT cooperating more intimately every day; the output of domestic arms plants has increased impressively; and the government navy has scored a notable victory by sinking one of the three cruisers with which Franco hoped to enforce his blockade.

*

A LOT OF VERY DIRTY TVA LINEN IS BEING washed in public. If the two-to-one split of the directors was ever merely a family quarrel, it is fast assuming the proportions of a national scandal. Now that Chairman Morgan has openly made charges of conspiracy, deceit, and intrigue against David Lilienthal and H. A. Morgan, nothing short of a full and fair inquiry will allay public suspicion about the inner administration of the TVA. The wide press support that the demand for this inquiry has received comes, we are convinced, from sources hostile to the government power program as a whole. Nevertheless, the inquiry must be held. The most alarming charges are those that concern the claims of Senator Berry to be compensated for his inundated marble lands in Tennessee. Those involving evasion and deceit with respect to accounting methods and public reports are also grave. If they are true, the officials in charge must be held to public responsibility; if they are unsupported, then Chairman Morgan has much to answer for in projecting a private difference of opinion into the public arena, and thereby helping to sabotage a power program from which he dissents. We have never agreed with Mr. Morgan's minority views on what should be the relations of the TVA with the utility companies. But the time has arrived to lay bare the whole course of events within the TVA since its inception. Friends of the power program cannot but believe that its procedures will bear public scrutiny. The inquiry should be conducted by a Congressional committee rather than by another agency like the Federal Trade Commission. But it would be tragic if it were placed in the hands of Senator Copeland and his Commerce Committee. Copeland's handling of maritime matters has been vicious, and in view of his bitter hostility to the government's power program and the New Deal as a whole, he should have no hand in the TVA investigation.

*

THE TVA DISCUSSION HAS RAISED TWO major issues that reach beyond the personalities involved. One concerns the proper role of dissent in an administrative agency. The second concerns the future program of the TVA with respect to the Southern utilities. Every political body needs channels for the expression of dissenting thought. In America that is provided for in Congress by open debate, in the political system by multiple parties, in the Supreme Court and the quasi-judicial administrative agencies by regularized dissenting opinions. Mr. Morgan seems to have been motivated for the past few years by a fear that the nation was not aware of the real issues behind the decisions of the TVA directors, and by a feeling that there was no mechanism by which he could make his views public except the press. We can well understand the attitude of his two colleagues, a majority on the board, who assert that he has been sniping at them and that he has been a poor sport. But we suggest that provisions be made in the future for more frequent reports to Congress in which dissenting voices can express their opinions and gain a public hearing. The second issue seems to be much closer to solution now that the TVA has offered to negotiate with the Southern utilities for the purchase of their properties. The settlement of this issue will do much to free the log jam of utility investment everywhere in the country; it will also give the Southern cities a chance to develop municipal power programs. In the negotiations, however, it should be clear that the municipalities and not the federal government are buying out the utilities; and that the determination of price should be on the basis of physical value and not some intangible and inflated "going value." It is on this question of a power program, and not on mere personalities, that the real cleavage within the TVA is based.

*

LAST WEEK THE COUNTRY PAUSED TO TAKE stock of the five years of Mr. Roosevelt's regime. But, just as significantly, Bernard Baruch's testimony before the Senate Unemployment Committee might have furnished occasion for estimating the effect of five years of Bernard Baruch. We are always suspicious when someone is called an "elder statesman," whether in Japan or America. We smell a build-up to give extra weight to conservative economic views. Mr. Baruch has been the ambassador sent by business into the inner councils of the President. His influence has almost always been used to temper the cutting edge of Administration policies. It is natural that with the deepening of the tension between business and the Administration he should step forward and appeal to the public against the Administration. This he has now done in his testimony, which was full of platitudes about revolution and the pace of social change, and might well have graced Walter Lippmann's columns. What it adds up to, in practical terms, is that the Administration must veer to the right and make "ungrudging" concessions on taxes. Such is the prestige of an elder statesman that Mr. Baruch's speech is confidently counted on in reactionary quarters to swing the Senate balance against the new tax bill, which contains reasonable concessions to business. The tories are never so effective as when they can use supposed liberals to speak for them.

*

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S CLAIM TO THE islands of Canton and Enderbury in the mid-Pacific may mark the beginning of a new era of international rivalry in this region. For centuries the multitudinous small islands which dot the southern Pacific were not considered important enough to warrant colonization. Except for Samoa, the possession of which was disputed at the end of the nineteenth century by the United States, Great Britain, and Germany, and the New Hebrides, claimed by Britain and France, the various islands were acquired by their present owners with little international friction. But the rise of commercial air lines spanning the Pacific, coupled with the growing suspicion of Japan, has lent a new value to the most inconsequential of these dots. At a time when the great powers are openly preparing for a war in the Pacific, increasing competition may be expected for even the smaller islands on the supposition that they may prove strategically useful. In taking the lead in this scramble, on the doubtful ground that Canton and Enderbury islands were first sighted by American whalers, the United States has risked far more than it can hope to gain.

NATIONAL SHARE-CROPPERS' WEEK IS BEING observed this week, and the event serves to remind us that for all its efforts in behalf of the farmer the Administration has made no progress in alleviating the terrible conditions which afflict these marginal thousands in the great valley of the Mississippi. The Workers' Defense League, which is sponsoring Share-Croppers' Week, states that a recent survey shows that evictions last year affected 500,000 families and that 85 per cent of those evicted have been unable to find other employment or crops for this year. Meanwhile persecution of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union continues, and the cost of defending its members in court actions is increasing. The remarkable government film, "The River," now currently on view at various theaters, shows the genesis and development of the conditions that have produced the share-cropper problem. Such "propaganda" may eventually force the nation to solve it. But in the meantime the share-croppers, with a cash income of $200 a year and often much less, continue to pile up a national liability in malnutrition and poverty, while the union must somehow meet the bills incurred in its courageous fight for ordinary civil liberties in the planter states.

*

PRESUMABLY SEEKING TO HEAD OFF, OR buy off, opposition from the Catholic church, the President's Advisory Committee on Education has committed a perilous blunder. It has marred a notable report by recommending allocation of federal funds to parochial and other non-public schools. Nevertheless the report is an impressive summons for Congressional action to save public education. Some months ago the National Education Association estimated that nearly 3,000,000 children of school age are deprived of any educational facilities. It was shown that in twelve states teachers' salaries average less than $750 a year. The tenor of these findings is dismally confirmed by the committee's report, which calls for a six-year program of federal aid. Urging an appropriation of $855,000,000 spread over that period, the group acknowledges that this sum is "undoubtedly small when compared with real need." That the appropriation is inadequate should not be forgotten, but it is at least a hopeful springboard. As for the traditional cry that such appropriations mean "federal domination" and the end of democracy in our schools, the answer lies in vigilance over the execution of the program. Democracy will not be saved by the slow death of free education—or by the resurrection of any identity between church and state.

*

STANLEY M. ISAACS, BOROUGH PRESIDENT OF Manhattan, is a loyal Republican; Simon W. Gerson was a reporter on the Communist Daily Worker. In naming Gerson to his staff, Isaacs paid generous tribute to an individual's ability. His action has been denounced as reckless defiance of law—which it is not—and as sinister capitulation to Moscow—which should tax even the most reactionary imagination. With the Communist Party recognized as legal, it is plain that Gerson's technical eligibility is beyond dispute. What remains important is the pattern of attack which has been fashioned by the American Legion, the Catholic church, and all the professional foes of the New Deal—local and national. It occurs in a city where liberal and labor forces have registered momentous election victories. It is fostered by agencies which have been traditionally indiscriminate in their assaults upon minority opinion. If reaction forces the ousting of Gerson, the crusade will widen to include other progressives in office. In that light Mr. Isaacs's refusal to yield is as vital as it is impressive. When a Republican defends a Communist appointee, at the risk of his own political fortunes, it is not merely news. To the Scripps-Howard World Telegram it is Revolution. To us it is a dramatic assertion of faith in the essence of democratic procedure. It is a dignified rebuke to those who hate Mr. Gerson less than they despise democracy. We hope that Mr. Isaacs will sit tight until his critics grow weary of their own voices.

Russian Tragedy, Act III

THE trial of Bukharin and his fellow-oppositionists has broken about the ears of the world like the detonation of a bomb. One can hear the cracking of liberal hopes; of the dream of anti-fascist unity; of a whole system of revolutionary philosophy. The reaction in this country has been much more severe than in the case of the other public trials or of the purge in general. We are too far away from the center of infection to have become immunized, and the horror deepens as the process of extermination goes on. The probable innocence or guilt of the defendants still absorbs the largest share of interest, but we detect in published and private discussion a shift of attention to the wider implications of the trial—its relation to the European crisis, its effect on revolutionary theory and practice. One of the unfortunate by-products of the case has been the encouragement of isolationist sentiment. It has played directly into the hands of those who are looking for arguments to prove the futility of expecting united resistance to war and fascist ambitions. This too is natural; and it reinforces our conviction that the international effect of the trial may be even more serious and far-reaching than the objective facts warrant.

There is acute danger of a split between Socialists and Communists in France, a split that would doom the united front and lead to ends one scarcely dares to contemplate. Hitler, today, is discussing the fate of Europe with Nevile Henderson; can anyone doubt that a factor in his calculations is the drama under way in the Hall of Nobles in Moscow, and the probable response to it of the Western world? In Czechoslovakia, in Loyalist Spain, in China, wherever democracy is threatened, the significance of the trial will be anxiously weighed. In varying degrees every one of these nations bases its day-by-day foreign policy on its estimate of Russian stability and integrity. The Moscow trial is a world issue as well as the culmination of an inner struggle. Under the pressure of that struggle Stalin has risked losing the confidence of those nations and groups on which the security of the world and of Russia itself must depend.

It is important to know why this trial should mark a turning point. The reasons are not all rooted in logic. The crimes charged against the men now under indictment are not different in kind from those charged in the earlier trials. The list of defendants may include more names favorably known to more people. (When one looks at Bukharin's picture and reads his words, the whole past of the revolution clamors for defense and vindication.) But essentially the story is the same. If it is difficult to believe charges which range from a conspiracy to dismember the Soviet Union to a successful plot to cause Maxim Gorki to catch a cold, we find it equally difficult to believe that the Soviet government invented these nightmare crimes in order, as Trotsky suggests, to restore "shaken world confidence in Stalin's 'justice' "! One's mind moves, as in the previous trials, from the inherent improbability of particular offenses attributed to particular men and the psychological obscurities of the confessions, to the undoubted fact that terror and plotting and espionage have become a commonplace in the Socialist fatherland. And in the end one abandons the attempt to render final judgment when the materials for judging are so obviously out of reach. The tragic spectacle in Moscow leaves only one thing certain—a system of law that allows the guilt of men accused of grave offenses to remain forever in doubt is a travesty of justice.

These same elements of uncertainty and horror were present in the two earlier trials. The reasons for the more ominous aspect of the current one are to be sought elsewhere. The purge has had a cumulative effect. The new trial tragically confirms the evidence of mortal conflict among the most responsible leaders of the revolution and of the government. And it goes far beyond the other trials in the scope of its charges. It indicts the whole past of the revolution itself. It proves that disaffection has spread through all the important branches of the state apparatus. It indicates a plot in the army of sufficient dimensions to warrant plans for a military coup led by the most important generals. Accept the official position, assume the guilt of the accused, and you are forced to a conviction that the government of the Soviet Union has, from the start of the revolution, been riddled with conspiracy. Assume the innocence of the defendants, and the government itself is convicted of an even more monstrous crime. Assume them neither all innocent nor all guilty of all the specific charges—as reason tempts one to assume—and one is still forced to acknowledge a situation in which opposition has been met by repression, repression countered by conspiracy, and conspiracy fought by terror to the final demoralization of the whole government apparatus.

It is for these reasons that the "explanations" of Communists and of Trotskyites alike explain so little. They assume more knowledge than is available and ignore the elements which tend to blur the neat partisan outlines of their pictures. Even a partisan must occasionally ask himself whether the tragedy in Moscow can really be laid to individual perfidy, or whether the issue is not the result of a historic process that, with impersonal logic, is slowly strangling the very forces that set it in motion. The Soviet government was born of inevitable violence and was maintained by means of terror and military force against incredible odds. Would it have survived civil war and foreign invasion and the struggle to achieve a working economic order if it had refused to use force against its enemies? We are certain that it would not. But dictatorship—intrenched behind a powerful army, adept in the use of spying and police terror, conditioned to fear opposition—tended to solidify, not to fade. Repressive measures were easy to justify in the sacred name of the revolution itself. Repression came to be identified with justice; opposition with treason. And presently treason became the only possible expression of opposition, and conspiracy took the place of open political action. This much is evident whatever the truth of specific charges against specific men.

We are not adopting a cut-and-dried doctrine of inevitability. Many shifts of circumstance might have altered the dismal course of recent Russian history. A leader like Lenin might have encouraged the growth of proletarian democracy from the roots of party democracy. Even under Stalin a different course might have been laid had not the rise of Hitler created in the Soviet Union a psychological state of war. This in its turn produced, first, a desperate pressure to speed up industrialization, second, a vast arms program, and, third, a universal atmosphere of suspicion and overcharged patriotism. Since this development coincided with, and helped to aggravate, profound political differences already existing and denied any open channels of expression, the result was certain.

Out of the anxiety and shock of the present trial will come, we believe, a new determination on the part of political thinkers to examine the premises of revolutionary doctrine. The Russian dictatorship has challenged the whole theory of dictatorship and demanded an honest revaluation of its own history and achievement.

What remains? One hears no rumors of internal unrest in the Soviet Union, despite the political cannibalism of its ruling group. The solid material achievements of the revolution still stand. So do the need and desire of the Soviet government for peace, and its opposition to fascist aggression, East and West. But the effect of the trial is not to be measured in such tangible terms. It will be measured in the degree to which faith is reluctantly surrendered by left groups everywhere, in the confusion of contemporary revolutionary thinking. It will depend upon the estimate of Russia's real strength arrived at in the foreign offices of other states. It will depend upon the future policies of the Soviet government itself. Not the next few days in Moscow, but the coming weeks in European diplomacy and the next decade in the development of radical thought and action, will determine the real significance of the Soviet trial.

Reply to Mr. Slichter

A SIGNIFICANT article on the recession by Sumner H. Slichter, one of America's outstanding economists, appears on another page of this issue. Mr. Slichter's analysis is particularly timely in view of the current discussion of the revised tax bill in Congress. But the implications of his article go much deeper than the consideration of any particular bill or policy. He argues, very ably, business's case against the Administration, namely, that certain New Deal measures discourage business enterprises from taking the risks which are essential to economic expansion under capitalism.

After very skilfully presenting the basic dilemma which the New Deal faces in its efforts to cope with the recession, Mr. Slichter sets forth certain specific obstacles that he believes must be removed before business can regain confidence. He places special emphasis on the undistributed-profits tax and the desirability of reducing income taxes in the higher brackets. A realistic analysis of the fundamental forces operating in our profit economy indicates, however, that he has greatly overemphasized the importance of the tax issue and neglected certain compensatory factors of utmost significance.

It is true that the undistributed-profits tax has imposed a genuine measure of hardship on small corporations that were in debt or seeking capital for expansion. This will not be true, however, of the revised tax bill now before Congress, and the former tax did not injure the large corporations which hold the key to expansion or contraction in the capital-goods field. Moreover, the experience of many small companies showed that the profits tax was no bar to expansion. It is a matter of record that the first twenty months in which the tax was in force was a period of fairly rapid industrial expansion. As Mr. Slichter freely admits, repeal of the tax would create no investment opportunities. It is a question how far it would even contribute to the restoration of confidence.

Even more dubious is the contention that a reduction of the taxes on higher incomes would encourage an expansion of "tame wild-cat" investment. Granting that in some instances individuals may hesitate to enter on a speculation knowing that half of the profits will go to the government, we doubt whether a 10 per cent reduction in the income tax on higher brackets would substantially alter the situation. Many of the men to whom Mr. Slichter refers are speculators by temperament and would speculate if they only received 10 per cent of the profits. As for the others, the increased lack of concern with which they view losses that will reduce their income taxes offsets, to a large extent, the diminished urge for profits. The elimination of tax-free securities, though most desirable for other reasons, would not affect the situation materially. It would force local governments to pay a higher rate of interest on their securities, and thus possibly discourage borrowing to a slight extent, but it would not otherwise affect the volume of capital flowing into this type of security.

None of these measures, however, come to grips with the basic problems involved in the present crisis. Although Mr. Slichter does not once use the term "purchasing power," this problem cannot thus easily be dodged in any discussion of the current economic situation. Business men will take risks only if they believe that they can dispose of their product. This assumes that purchasing power is growing at least as rapidly as production. From 1933 until the middle of 1937 this undoubtedly occurred. But in 1937 three important developments checked this tendency: (1) business profits rose much more rapidly than wages or farm income, thus concentrating purchasing power in the hands of the relatively well-to-do who did not need it for consumption purposes; (2) several large corporations, notably in steel and automobiles, increased prices to an extent not justified by either general conditions or wage costs within the industries; (3) the government suddenly ceased its emergency expenditures at a time when the incidence of social-security taxation was just beginning to be felt. On top of this, the "sterilization" of gold and the reduction of excess reserves had a deflationary effect.

Repeal of the profits tax and a reduction of the levy on high incomes would only accentuate this deficiency of purchasing power. For it would once more permit corporations to accumulate large cash reserves and throw the burden of taxation even more completely on the low-income groups which otherwise would spend their money for consumers' goods.

Given adequate buying power, no end of opportunities for productive investment exist in this country. Meeting the need for housing alone would tax our economic system for several years to come. Rural electrification presents another challenge. Why has business failed to grasp this opportunity? It is not entirely or even primarily due to "lack of confidence." There was no lack of confidence a year ago. On the contrary, the business community was convinced that the country was entering a period of inflationary expansion. Yet private enterprise built only about one-third of the number of houses it was accustomed to build in the twenties and an even smaller proportion of the number it is equipped to construct. It may as well be frankly confessed that business leadership is bankrupt, partly because of lack of initiative and courage and partly because it has failed to understand the basic direction of present-day economic development. Confidence may be the key to expansion under laissez faire capitalism. But such a system no longer exists. It was undermined years ago by the methods of big business. The New Deal has only speeded its departure.

Under the circumstances it is only folly to sit around waiting for a return of business initiative to restore prosperity. The events of the past nine years have shown that if expansion is to occur, the government must lead the way. In the article to which we have been referring, it is stated that one cannot plan "chance-taking by many thousands of business men scattered from coast to coast." This is true, but to us it seems irrelevant. One cannot "plan" capitalism; but it is essential to plan governmental activities where private enterprise has failed. Under Administration leadership this country has reached a midway point between laissez faire capitalism and a planned economy. The position is highly vulnerable and probably cannot be maintained, but it is too late for retreat. Only a vigorous offensive will save the economic gains thus far obtained by the New Deal.

The Court Writes a Labor Code

IT IS a chastened Supreme Court that has been handing down decisions in Washington for the past year—a court on which seven out of nine of the members are mildly liberal or better. The only ones left today of the old tory bloc that voted so solidly and consistently for reaction are Justice McReynolds and Justice Butler. The other seven fall into three groups: a center group consisting of Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts, his fidus Achates, with which the newly appointed Justice Reed will in all probability ally himself; a left-of-center group consisting of Justices Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo; and a fourth group consisting of Justice Black all by himself on the left. The center group, it will be apparent, still holds the balance of power, provided it can definitely enrol Justice Reed under its banner. Thus far it has been throwing its weight in the liberal direction. And the principal product of its new enlightenment has been the hammering out of a new constitutional code for labor. The three most recent labor decisions of the court, delivered last week, form an important part of this code.

The "new party line" of the court on labor came a little less than a year ago, at the end of March, with the opinion holding the Railway Labor Act constitutional and, far more sensational, the minimum-wage reversal. In the latter case the court, through Justice Roberts's change of vote, not only transformed a liberal minority of four on the New York minimum-wage law (the Tipaldo case) into a liberal majority of five on the Washington minimum-wage law, but even overruled the classic decision in the Adkins case of 1923. Given this enormously important reversal, it was no wonder that Justice Sutherland's dissenting opinion was unusually bitter. He saw that a breach had been made in the solid phalanx of court decisions which had hemmed in labor activity and social legislation enacted by the states.

The breach was very much widened by the great decisions in the Wagner Labor Act cases last April. They proved that the minimum-wage reversal was more than an accident or a stray impulse of social benevolence on the part of the judges. Actually they were a result of the scissors hold that Mr. Roosevelt had acquired on the court. For with the backing of organized labor assured him the President had practically confronted the court with the alternative of upholding the Wagner Act or facing a popular protest which might give the final impetus to the passage of the court-reorganization plan. The court chose the former. In doing so, in the Jones and Laughlin, Fruehauf Trailer, and Friedman-Marks cases, it changed the whole direction of constitutional law by giving a very liberal scope to Congressional power over interstate commerce. And in these decisions it consolidated the new judicial liberalism.

What remained was the problem of giving actual effectiveness to the work of the Labor Relations Board. For by its very set-up in the Wagner Act the board cannot enforce its orders, but must apply to a Circuit Court of Appeals and ask for an order requiring compliance. The result has been, in the ten months that have intervened, a large number of bitterly fought actions in the circuit courts, on the issue of which the fate of the board has hung. On the whole the circuit courts have gone along with the Wagner decisions in their interpretation of the scope of the commerce clause, and also in their refusal to review the board's findings of fact. But that has not been true on the issues of disestablishing company unions or reinstating men who had been illegally dismissed.

That is why the three most recent Supreme Court decisions on labor, while important in themselves, are even more important for the effect they will inevitably have on the lower federal courts. Justice Stone, speaking for the court in the Pennsylvania Greyhound case, ruled that the Labor Board may require the employer to withdraw recognition of a company union as a collective-bargaining agency. Thus the disestablishment of company unions is made effective, and sabotage on the part of reactionary circuit-court judges can only delay it. Almost as important, from the standpoint of trade unions, is the decision of Justice Roberts holding that an anti-picketing injunction against a union is invalid under the Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Wisconsin injunction law, even when the men working in the picketed establishment are not members of the union. This makes it possible for organizing strikes to be carried on without being smashed by the traditional method of the injunction. The third decision goes far to validate the closed shop. The Supreme Court refused to review a decision of the New York Court of Appeals which had denied a temporary injunction against the Transport Workers' Union. What was involved was the refusal of some of the men to comply with a Labor Board order making the T. W. U. the exclusive bargaining agency. The question may come up again, but the Supreme Court's stand augurs well for a final ruling on the closed shop.

Thus the court has not only upheld the Wagner Act, but has strengthened three of the pillars of labor activity—the right of picketing, the disestablishment of company unions, and the closed shop. It is ironic that this swing should come at a time when the Administration is under heavy fire from the reactionaries on its tax and regulatory policies. The only thing that saves the court from similar attack is that the business groups consider it—and, historically, with reason—one of their own agencies. What will happen to the court's liberalism when a deepening crisis once more raises acute constitutional questions remains to be seen.

A Bill to Promote Dictatorship

BY PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, March 7

A MAJORITY of the House Committee on Military Affairs has just reported a bill which probably is the worst measure ever recommended for passage by a committee of Congress. That this statement covers a lot of territory I am fully aware, but if there ever was a projected piece of legislation which contained more unrelieved horrors and fewer excuses for its existence than the May bill, I should like to hear of it. On reflection, I should hate to hear of it. The title consists of two and one-half lines which contain four distinct falsehoods and not one grain of truth. The title is: "To Prevent Profiteering in Time of War and to Equalize the Burdens of War and Thus Provide for the National Defense and Promote Peace." It would not prevent profiteering or equalize the burdens of war or provide for the national defense or promote peace. A perfectly adequate and truthful title for this legislative monstrosity would be: "A Bill to Provide for the Establishment of a Dictatorship upon a Declaration of War."

One hesitates to say which is the more dangerous and despicable—the provisions of the bill itself or the hypocritical attempt to cloak them under a pretense of righteousness. Congressional hypocrisy is found in many forms and degrees. Here it is singularly cynical because it seeks to achieve its ends by taking advantage of a sentiment which is universal among decent people, namely, abhorrence of war profiteering. Its enormity may be measured by the fact that whereas it is assumed the American people would only go to war if they believed their liberties were gravely menaced, this measure would automatically deprive them of their most cherished liberties the moment the war began. In a sense they would lose the war by act of Congress before a shot was fired. The Hill-Sheppard measure which this bill supplants was less obnoxious in many respects.

The favorable reporting of such a measure at this time may be laid to several factors. Foremost, of course, is the kindling of the war spirit in Congress under the vigorous fanning of admirals hungry for larger and larger appropriations. Another and familiar cause is the general drabness of life in the House of Representatives which drives nonentities to snatch at every opportunity to lift themselves even momentarily from deserved obscurity. This motive doubtless operated with unusual force in the case of Representative May, a Kentucky popinjay who recently moved into the committee chairmanship made vacant by Lister Hill's escape to the Senate. Theretofore he had succeeded in attracting notice chiefly by his efforts in behalf of Southern electric-power companies, practically none of which was calculated to raise him in public esteem. Such considerations may seem piffling, but it is a mistake to underestimate their consequences in the House.

Under this bill the President would be empowered to do a countless variety of things simply by proclamation. He could draft men for war or civilian service. He could grant or refuse licenses to business and industry. He could allocate raw materials and requisition finished products. He could fix prices, rents, commissions, rates, services, and rewards. He could reorganize the government out of all semblance of its normal structure. He could smash labor unions or compel their universal recognition. His power would be bridled in one instance—he could not control the press, except, of course, in cases where he might decide to shut off the supply of white paper and ink. The bill reaches a climax of absurdity when it presumes to advise future war-time Congresses—as if future Congresses would not be as avid as this one to demonstrate the depth of their wisdom and the temper of their "patriotism"!

One sensible argument could be made for this bill. If war comes, some degree of Presidential dictatorship is inevitable. It might be said that the presence of such a measure on the statute books would serve as a frightful warning—a bill to promote peace by inadvertence.

In the quarter-century which has elapsed since the Mulhall scandal the National Association of Manufacturers has learned something. It has learned new and costlier methods of antagonizing public opinion. If it has learned anything else, the fact did not appear during last week's sessions of the La Follette investigation. Once it bribed Congressmen and page boys; now it seeks to bribe whole committees. The old device of a thousand-dollar bill in the palm has been replaced with an elaborate program whereby business men, taxpayers, professional workers, and school children are told by radio, screen, billboard, cartoon, and canned editorial that their existence depends on peace in the mills. To put it more bluntly, they are told the only way they can hope to get along is by keeping the damn labor agitators out. It has worked in some places, but in the long run it will certainly be listed with all such costly and stupid follies.

For some of this propaganda, indeed, the members have paid and are still paying.

Senator La Follette

Thousands of dollars—of their own money—were spent to tell them that the Wagner Act did not apply to manufacturing. Even when such advice was originally free, as was that supplied by the Liberty League's sweet-scented lawyers, the cost of acting on it was heavy. Additional thousands were disbursed to educate them in the technique of forming company unions. Now they have learned from a chastened Supreme Court that the law does apply to manufacturing and that the company-formed company union is an outlaw.

If the fact needed emphasis, the hearings are serving the purpose of emphasizing once more that in the United States little business is almost invariably the dupe of big business. Babbitt is never so cheerful as when supplying the noose for his own neck. Examination of the association structure showed that with more than 4,000 members its policies are dominated by 207 corporations, whose officers in 1936 drew aggregate salaries of $88,750,000. It may be assumed that a substantial majority of the 4,000 are peaceful citizens, but 60 per cent of all the tear gas sold to industrial concerns in recent years was bought by these 207 companies, and 55 of them paid $2,225,000 for espionage in the years 1933 to 1937. The success or failure of a vast majority of the N. A. M. members unquestionably depends upon the purchasing power of workers, yet the evidence showed them religiously coughing up money for propaganda devised for the sole purpose of holding down the purchasing power of those workers.

How were they frightened into doing it? Don't take my word for it; read the testimony of Robert L. Lund, head of the Lambert Pharmacal Company, and Ernest T. Weir, head of the National Steel Corporation. They were told about the plans of the New York Daily Worker for undermining American industry! To what extent this was an extraordinarily silly attempt to justify sinister activity and what part was sheer boobery may be left to individual judgment.

Chamberlain's Treason

BY ROBERT DELL

Geneva, February 22

THE week that began with Hitler's ultimatum to Austria and ended with Anthony Eden's resignation was surely the most important week in the post-war history of Europe. The events of the past five years reached their climax. The successful bluff and blackmail of the fascist powers on the one hand and the incapacity and poltroonery of the Western democratic powers on the other produced a situation in which the British government had to choose between loyal cooperation with France and Russia to save Europe from fascism and adhesion to the fascist bloc. Neville Chamberlain chose the latter alternative. Eden, to his honor, refused to be a party to it. We cannot but regret that he did not make this choice in 1935 when the British government capitulated to Mussolini, but he has wiped out his weaknesses of the last two years by an act of courage which shows that he is made of stouter stuff than some of us had believed. The fact that he has been followed into retirement by Cranborne, the representative of a family that embodies the best tradition of English conservatism, is not negligible. Those of us who have seen Cranborne at Geneva have formed a high opinion of his character, in spite of several deplorable lapses. He has something in common with his uncle, Lord Cecil of Chelwood, whose evolution in the last few years has been so remarkable. The truth is no doubt that Eden and Cranborne have not fully realized until now the real nature of the policy of which they have been the instruments. They are to be congratulated on their escape from the gang of political crooks by whom my unhappy country is at present governed.

If Neville Chamberlain and the "Cliveden group"—the title is taken from Lord Astor's country house—have their way, it will not be long before Hitler is the master of the European continent. Some time or other the story will have to be told of the part played in the pro-German intrigue that led to the recent crisis by the family of American millionaire snobs who migrated to England to get themselves made into aristocrats and whose money has enabled them to lay hands on two of the most important London newspapers. The one hope is that the English people will revolt as they did at the time of the Hoare-Laval plan and prevent Neville Chamberlain from putting the power of the British Empire at the disposal of Hitler. It is as yet too early to form any opinion on that point, but there are already certain encouraging signs.

It is to Hitler, not to Mussolini, that Chamberlain and his fascist gang are capitulating. They are not afraid of Mussolini. They know as well as anybody that he is in a precarious situation, that Italy does not really count as a military power and is not a serious menace to England. The conversations that began yesterday are conversations not with Mussolini alone but with Mussolini as the mouthpiece of the fascist bloc. Neville Chamberlain's aim, as he said plainly in the House of Commons yesterday, is an understanding with Germany and Italy into which he hopes to drag France. He proposes to revive the Four-Power Pact, that is, to substitute for the League of Nations a directorate of England and Germany, with France and Italy as far from brilliant seconds.

There is no longer any question of Vansittart's fatuous policy of trying to detach Italy from Germany. Neville

Chamberlain knows that there is no hope of breaking the Berlin-Rome axis. He proposes to convert it into a London-Berlin-Rome axis. Not for centuries has England been put in so humiliating a position. As the London News-Chronicle said yesterday, Chamberlain "may now look in the mud for what is left of British prestige." Eden was forced out of office on the very day on which Hitler made a personal attack on him in the most truculent speech he has yet delivered. Chamberlain has condoned Hitler's pacific aggression against Austria, if he did not connive at it in advance, as is not impossible. It came to my knowledge not long ago that a certain diplomatic representative in Berlin had reported to his government that the British ambassador to Berlin, Sir Nevile Henderson, had said to a prominent member of the German government in the presence of several other persons that he did not understand why Germany had not already annexed Austria seeing that, so far as he could gather, the majority of the Austrians were Nazis already. Chamberlain has been disloyal to France, for in defiance of the agreement arrived at in the Anglo-French conversations in November he started the negotiations with Italy without consulting the French government. Indeed, he acted in opposition to it, for as soon as the French government heard of the first meeting between Chamberlain and Grandi on February 18, it informed the British government that, in its opinion, any negotiations with Italy at the moment would be "inopportune and premature."

Eden's departure has at least cleared the air. The policy of the majority of the English Conservative Party is now so plainly revealed in all its naked hideousness that nobody in England or in France or elsewhere can have any excuse for being misled. Eden said in his speech yesterday that a firm attitude on the part of the British government was more necessary than ever at this moment. I do not believe that there is a single intelligent observer of international affairs in any European country that does not agree with him. Even if the attempt to set up an Anglo-German hegemony in Europe succeeds, the time will come when Hitler will attack the British Empire. He says in "Mein Kampf" that at first Germany must not try to become a world power, since that would antagonize England and make impossible an alliance between England and Germany. But he also says that ultimately "Germany will be a world power or nothing at all." Clearly Hitler's idea is to make use of England to get the territory that he needs in Central Europe and then to discard it. Foreign observers see this so clearly and are so convinced that Neville Chamberlain's policy of playing into Hitler's hands cannot ultimately serve British interests that they are incined to attribute that policy merely to a craven fear of Germany.

In my opinion they are mistaken. I have been more and more coming to the conclusion that at the basis of the foreign policy of the British reactionaries during the last five years have been hatred of Soviet Russia and fear of the growing force of organized labor in England and still more in France. There is every reason to believe that they were behind Chautemps and Georges Bonnet when the latter deliberately provoked the defeat of the late Chautemps government for the purpose of separating the Socialists from the Communists and driving the latter out of the Popular Front. There is also every reason to believe that the attacks on the franc, for the instability of which there was no technical reason, were engineered in the City of London with the connivance of French financial interests and even of certain members of the late Chautemps Cabinet. The terrible irony of the situation is that Léon Blum and his colleagues in the first Popular Front government allowed themselves to be made the tools of a foreign policy fundamentally opposed to the interests of France and initiated by their worst enemies. The pro-German gang in England represented by Neville Chamberlain are not mere craven imbeciles. They are much more like traitors, putting the interests of their class before those of their country.

On February 12, after five years of rearmament, Hitler began to apply his program of territorial aggrandizement in Europe. The methods by which he forced the unhappy Schuschnigg to yield to his demands constituted as flagrant an act of aggression as an armed invasion. The best account of what happened was given by G. E. R. Gedye in the London *Daily Telegraph and Morning Post, of which he is the Vienna correspondent. Before Schuschnigg left Vienna for Berchtesgaden on February 11 he was given to understand that the Nazi plan for his overthrow, found on January 26 in the safe of Captain Leopold's headquarters in Vienna, would be put into force if he declined Hitler's invitation. According to this plan, which was signed R. H. (Rudolf Hess), the Austrian and German Nazis in collaboration were to promote frontier incidents and at the same time the Austrian Nazis were to start terrorist activities in the interior. As soon as the Austrian police took action the German army was to cross the frontier to prevent "Germans from shedding the blood of Germans." For this purpose German troops were to be massed on the frontier under the pretext of maneuvers and were to be under the command of General von Reichenau, corps commandant at Munich, who was described in the Hess plan as "Commander of the Army of Intervention in Austria."

When Schuschnigg went to Berchtesgaden, German troops were actually concentrated on the frontier opposite Salzburg. General von Reichenau was the first person introduced by Hitler to Schuschnigg at Berchtesgaden, and he and two other generals, if they did not actually take part in the conversations, were in the antechamber to intimidate Schuschnigg. Hitler gave Schuschnigg an ultimatum which expired on February 16. Failing an affirmative reply from the Austrian government by that date, the German troops were to march into Austria. What could Schuschnigg do but give way, knowing as he did that he could expect no help from anybody, not even from Mussolini? He did not, however, give way on every point, for he appears to have refused to agree to Hitler's demand that Austria should support Germany in whatever action Germany might take against Czechoslovakia. Nevertheless, unless something quite unforeseen happens, the formal annexation of Austria to Germany can be only a question of time.

* Mr. Gedye's account also appeared in the New York Times of February 17.

It appears from Eden's speech yesterday that the attitude of the British government in regard to the coup against Austria was also a cause of his differences with Neville Chamberlain. The French government asked the British government a few days ago to join in making representations in Berlin to the effect that England and France would not again tolerate being faced with a fait accompli, and that they would not tolerate the destruction of Austrian independence or any interference with Czechoslovakia. Nothing has yet been published about the British reply to this proposal, but no doubt it was in the negative. Yet the British government signed the Treaty of St. Germain by which Austrian independence was put under the protection of the League of Nations. Hitler's success in this matter has caused great alarm here in Switzerland, where it is recognized that, if such methods are tolerated, no small country in Europe will be safe. Hitler's truculent speech on February 20 shows that he now believes himself able to do anything with impunity. That any British government should propose to come to an understanding with Nazi Germany after this speech is an enormity.

The worst element in the situation is the terrible position of France. Most people in that country are now beginning to recognize what a blunder the policy of sacrificing everything to British friendship has been. They are beginning to see that France has been betrayed by her false friends, the British reactionaries. That brilliant journalist, Emile Buré, described England and France a few days ago as l'aveugle et le paralytique. Alas! France is now paralyzed because the French, too, have been blind. Except during the eight months in 1934 when Louis Barthou was Foreign Minister, every successive French government in the last five years has blindly followed the orders issued from London. It is exasperating to remember that in 1936 the Blum Cabinet, under British influence, refused the offer of a pact of mutual assistance made to France by the Little Entente. The Blum Cabinet when it came into office had an immense opportunity. Had it revived and extended Barthou's policy, it could have secured the peace of Europe without sacrificing the friendship of England. As it is, the British government has succeeded in estranging France from Russia, and in destroying the Little Entente and the Balkan Entente. Poland, Yugoslavia, Rumania, and Greece have one after the other been drawn into the German orbit, because, as a Balkan diplomatist said to me some time ago, they could have no confidence in people who were incapable of defending even their own interests.

Czechoslovakia is isolated in Central Europe. After Hitler's speech there can be no doubt that he intends to use against Czechoslovakia the methods that he has used so successfully against Austria. The probability is that Czechoslovakia will resist, in which case France and Russia will be bound to go to its aid, and if they do the result will be a European war into which the English people will be drawn whether they like it or not. If, on the other hand, France does not fulfil its treaty obligations, Hitler will be the master of Central Europe and Czechoslovakia will no doubt be partitioned among Germany, Hungary, and Poland. Russia is not bound to go to the aid of Czechoslovakia unless France does. It is a heartrending situation.

Risks—the Key to Recovery

BY SUMNER H. SLICHTER

I

SEVERAL months ago we spoke of the business recession. Now quite frankly we say depression. Nevertheless, there is an excellent chance that the next two months will see a revival in the consumers'-goods industries, partly seasonal and partly based on the replenishment of inventories. The crucial question is whether this revival will carry over into a substantial and sustained increase in the demand for capital goods.

This question provokes two points of view—one optimistic, one pessimistic. The optimists regard the depression as a temporary interruption of recovery from the Great Depression, an interruption brought about by the collapse of speculation in commodities last year. They stress two points. The first is that financial conditions in general (railroads excepted) are strong, and that despite the vigorous speculation of last year there has been no credit collapse and there is no speculative wreckage to clear away. The second is that the country has made relatively little progress in eliminating the shortages of durable goods—housing, railroad equipment, public-utility equipment, industrial equipment in general—that accumulated for five years during the Great Depression. Hence the optimists believe that a pick-up in the light industries will soon produce a broad demand for housing and industrial equipment.

The pessimists admit that the potential demand for capital goods is large, though some of them believe that it is overestimated by the optimists. They point out, however, that throughout almost the entire recovery period the country has experienced difficulty in developing a sustained demand for capital goods. True, for a period of about nine months last year the heavy industries were almost as busy as in 1929. But this activity in the main was not based upon long-term planning. Most of it represented replacement of equipment rather than expansion, and it was financed from unexpended depreciation allowances rather than by new security issues. A large part of the accumulated depreciation allowances have been spent. Hence there is no hope for sustained recovery in the capital-goods industries unless we develop a strong new-issues market—something we have not succeeded in doing during the last five years except for the highest-grade issues. The pessimists regard it as an evil omen that when the worldwide commodity boom collapsed last April the United States was the only country in which the demand for capital goods also collapsed. The very fact that the demand for capital goods here lacked vigor will make it difficult, in their view, to reestablish it.

The pessimists also point out that there are special obstacles to expansion in the demand for housing, railroad equipment, and electrical equipment. In the case of housing, expansion is limited by the fact that the effective demand for housing is small. It is true that few houses have been built in recent years and that responsible statisticians estimate the shortage to be between 1,500,000 and 2,000,000 houses. It is ridiculous, however, to argue that a nation which spent $5,000,000,000 last year on automobiles could not buy 500,000 or 750,000 houses a year if it wished them. In 1937 only 280,000 houses were built. The hard fact of the matter seems to be that people prefer to economize by renting old houses and to use their money for automobiles, radios, refrigerators, and vacations. In other words, housing is in fierce competition for the consumer's dollar with these other industries, and it has been losing out in this competition ever since 1926. In 1920 a cheap six-cylinder car cost about 40 per cent as much as a cheap house; in 1937 a cheap car cost about 20 per cent as much as a cheap house, and the car had improved more than the house. Housing will not be a major influence in producing revival until it can compete with other industries by giving the consumer much more for his money.

The pessimists believe that a revival of business will not produce much buying of equipment by the railroads until it is fairly clear that the revival will last for some time. Increases in railroad costs and shrinkage in railroad traffic have so drastically reduced the profits of the roads that they must pursue an exceedingly conservative buying policy.

Most of the pessimists admit that the electric-utility industry offers more hope for an immediate expansion of demand than either housing or railroads. This is a young and growing industry which was making large capital outlays until well into the depression and which today could advantageously spend large amounts on improvements and extensions. The utilities are held back by their unsatisfactory political situation. The government has embarked upon the production of power, and no one knows how its competition will be conducted or how far it will go. No one knows to what extent the plants of the utilities will be duplicated or to what extent the utilities may be compelled to dismember their systems by selling part of their plants to the government. Until these uncertainties are removed, expansion by the electric-utility industry will be on a hand-to-mouth basis.

The pessimists conclude their case by pointing to signs of recession abroad, particularly in Great Britain, and by reminding us that it will be difficult to accomplish a sustained recovery here in the face of recession abroad.

II

Whether one be an optimist or a pessimist, one can agree that the crux of the recovery problem is making sure that expansion in the consumers'-goods industries does lead to substantial and sustained expansion for capital-goods industries. And whether one be an optimist or a pessimist, one can agree that the prospect of such a carry-over is so uncertain that nothing should be left undone which might help to bring it about. What might be done?

One school of thought would revert to the "pump-priming" of 1933-35. They would have the government deliberately incur a huge deficit and spend it on public works or armaments. Pump-priming is stimulating as long as it lasts. The difficulty with it is that it does not produce much long-term planning, because business men hold back in expectation of a recession as soon as the pump-priming ceases. This does not mean, however, that a moderate deficit, say about $1,500,000,000, would be undesirable. A depression is a time when individuals are saving more than they are investing. In order to prevent these savings from being hoarded, and thus making the depression worse, a way is needed for using them to support the demand for goods. A deficit of $1,500,000,000 is large enough to give considerable support to consumer demand and to provide an outlet for savings that might be hoarded, but it is not large enough to arouse inflationary fears. The business man knows that the ultimate result of inflation is collapse. Consequently, when he fears inflation, he tries very hard to avoid long-term commitments—the very kind which need to be encouraged.

Another major suggestion is that a general increase in production be brought about by "planning." The proposals are vague, but the idea has been suggested by the President himself, and it finds some favor in the government. But who is to make the plans, how is their execution to be accomplished, and, above all, how are producers to be assured that there will be a demand at profitable prices for the planned output? All planning schemes rest upon a misunderstanding of the essential nature of our industrial system. Ours is the kind of economy which flourishes only when business men are disposed to take chances, when they are willing to spend money for the purpose of seizing an opportunity to make money. Now, chance-taking by many thousands of business men scattered from coast to coast and from Canada to the Gulf cannot be planned. It can be induced and encouraged, but it cannot be ordered or forced. In fact, the very efforts of the government to plan production and business activity are likely to alarm business men and make them hunt for security rather than take chances.

III

All this helps to define the essential problem of stimulating the capital-goods industries. Clearly it is one of encouraging business enterprises to take risks on a larger scale, to attempt to develop new markets, and to spend money on new methods and new products. No single policy can assure this, but the following steps would help.

Let the government begin to open up new investment opportunities by defining its policy toward the electric utilities in terms which make it plain that operating systems (as distinguished from holding companies) will not be dismembered, and legitimate private investments in them will not be destroyed. The utility industry, more than almost any other, is in an economic position to make substantial capital outlays. The public little knows what the present undefined utility policy of the government is costing the country in terms of unemployment and a lower standard of living. Certainly the cost is many times what the public may expect to get back in the form of lower rates, for electricity is one of the smallest items in the cost of living. Even a cut of one-third in rates would not save most customers a dollar a month.

Let the government use its moral influence to facilitate reductions in the prices of building materials and the wages of building labor. If a house which now costs $4,000 could be offered for $3,500, and on more attractive terms, many people probably would be induced to use their old cars a year or two longer and to cut down on their vacation plans in order to make the first payment on a house. This incidentally would give other people a chance to move up into better quarters at little or no increase in rent. The very fact that there are now so many relatively new automobiles in use gives the housing industry an excellent opportunity to induce people to buy houses provided it prices them attractively.

Although railroad buying must be governed primarily by the prospects for traffic, the ability of the railroads to purchase better and more economical equipment would be increased by a drastic reorganization of the thirty-eight major roads now in receivership or bankruptcy. These financially weak roads can be converted into strong ones if we have the courage to make drastic cuts in their fixed charges. This is a golden opportunity which should not be allowed to pass.

Let the government sponsor repeal of the tax on undistributed profits except as it applies to non-operating corporations created for purposes of tax evasion. Mr. Eccles in his recent testimony before the Senate committee argued that it is deflationary to encourage corporations to reduce their debts and lay away reserves against times of stress, but this is not quite true. Excessive debts can be deflationary, as the present condition of the railways eloquently testifies. Furthermore, the ability of corporations to attract outside capital often depends upon the willingness of the management to plow back part of the earnings. The effects of repeal, however, should not be exaggerated, because eliminating the tax would create no new investment opportunities. It would simply make enterprises more responsive to such opportunities as they arise. Business men are particularly fearful of the undistributed-profits tax because, rightly or wrongly, they regard it as a tax, not upon income, but upon capital accumulation, a tax designed to penalize corporations which undertake to strengthen their financial condition.

Most important of all, let the government sponsor reforms in the income tax designed to encourage capital to take chances in private industry rather than to seek security in municipal and other government bonds. Despite the fact that ours is the kind of economy which flourishes only when capital is disposed to take chances, the United States has developed an income tax which penalizes capital heavily when it enters private industry and rewards it generously when it seeks security in government bonds. This is because income from private investments is taxed at rates which exceed 50 per cent for the higher brackets, while income from government securities is either partially or entirely exempt. Such a system will have to be modified unless we are prepared to substitute state capitalism for private capitalism.

In this connection, it is significant that one of the most universal demands of "the little business men" in Washington recently was for government help in obtaining funds. Scattered around the country are many hundreds of capitalists, small when judged by metropolitan standards, who in times past have been ready to put money into ventures which looked promising to them. Quite often the investments of these capitalists took the form of picking promising young business men, usually men without funds, backing them with capital, and giving them a chance to buy a share in the business out of profits. Capital of this sort has taken long chances, and it has gone into factories, mines, stores, and real-estate developments that no bank or insurance company could possibly consider—ventures which were not exactly "wild-cat" affairs but which some wag has called "tame wild cats." It is the kind of capital which is most useful in starting new enterprises and in making competition vigorous and industry dynamic. Although the local capitalists who have supplied these venturesome funds are not multimillionaires, they are rich enough so that the government is likely to take 40 or 50 per cent of the profits from their successful guesses. And one bad guess, of course, is sufficient to cancel the profits of several good ones. This is why the tax system has dried up the supplies of our most venturesome capital and why the "little business men" cannot get funds at the same time that interest rates in the gilt-edge market have been driven down to record-breaking lows.

Probably the most important single step which the government could take to encourage sustained revival in the capital-goods industries would be (1) to sponsor a constitutional amendment making possible federal taxation of state and municipal bonds, and (2) to commit itself to reduction of income taxes in the higher brackets upon the adoption of the amendment. The result would not be to lighten the tax burden borne by the rich, but to end the discrimination which now encourages capital to hunt for security rather than to take risks.

A proper consideration of the problem of recovery should not confine itself to what the government should do. Business itself has broad responsibilities, particularly in an industrial system such as ours in which private initiative is the mainspring. When business men demand that the government restore confidence, they overlook the fact that confidence is only superficially a matter of relations between the government and business. More fundamentally, it is a matter of relations between business and the community. Business will not have confidence in the future until it feels that it possesses the friendship and the good-will of the community. All of this means that the responsibility for restoring confidence rests as much upon business as upon the government. Once business wins the good-will of the community, the relation of business to government takes care of itself.

Business needs to correct many policies in order to gain the good-will of the community, but enterprises could probably get the most immediate return by improving their relations with organized labor. Indeed, in a democratic society, it is simply not safe for business to be on bad terms with a large and powerful labor movement. Many times during the last year business men have complained that bad relations between employers and organized labor have weakened business confidence and retarded recovery. This probably is true, but business men have it within their power to make these relations good. During the last several years leading enterprises in the steel, electric, oil, and rubber industries have succeeded in working out friendly relations with labor unions. If these enterprises can do this, why cannot others? A strong determination by business managers to build up cooperative relations with organized labor would go far to improve relations between business and the community and to solve the problem of business confidence.

IV

These problems of restoring prosperity which now confront us are far more than simply problems of 1938 and of this particular depression. They are aspects of what may be called the paramount economic problem of the twentieth century. This is the problem of encouraging risk-taking by private capital, of encouraging investment. It is a truism that consumption varies with the level of employment and that employment varies with the volume of new investment. The encouragement of investment, therefore, is a matter which far transcends the interest of investors. Almost everyone's standard of living depends upon keeping new investment large enough to absorb the current savings of the community.

During the nineteenth century, when the vacant continents of North America, South America, Africa, Australia, and large parts of Asia were being developed with the savings of Europe, no one needed to worry much about maintaining the volume of investment. But conditions have changed. With vacant continents no longer awaiting development, with the increase in population slowing up, with many barriers interfering with the international movement of capital, no longer can we take it for granted that investment will maintain itself. The encouragement of investment must become a major objective of public policy. Upon the ability of democracies to appreciate this fact will depend their ability to operate the capitalist system—the only system, I suspect, under which power in the community can be sufficiently divided and dispersed to make democracy possible. And upon the ability of democracies to encourage investment will depend also their ability to keep opportunity abundant and, therefore, social conflict mild, and to avoid the repression and regimentation that are the inevitable results of severe social conflict.

Columnists on Parade

III. HUGH-AND-CRY JOHNSON

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

HUGH S. JOHNSON is an old Lochinvar out of the West. He was born in Fort Scott, Kansas, and he has been answering bugle calls ever since. His family moved to Oklahoma Territory, where he grew up among subject Indians, hard-swearing frontiersmen, and horses, in the wide open spaces of a pioneer country. He tried to enlist with the Rough Riders at sixteen but was saved for West Point. From Fort Clark, Texas, he rushed to the rescue in the San Francisco earthquake, and he served in the Philippines and on the Mexican border. His army name was "Tuffy." He talked out of the corner of his mouth and began roaring at privates at an early age. On the side he wrote sentimental stories for boys about soldiers and adventurers. His heroes were gallant men talking slang. The stories got published, thereby launching the soldier on what his syndicate blurb fondly calls his literary pursuits. Occasionally in his column he still writes stories for elder children glorifying great defeated soldiers like Ludendorff and great statesmen like Newton D. Baker. Between the Philippines and the Mexican expeditions he got a law degree at the University of California. He was with Pershing in the Mexican days. From then on he was forced to do his fighting behind the lines. In the autumn of 1916 he went to Washington during a leave—and General Crowder ordered him to stay. It was the autumn when Wilson was reelected to keep us out of war, but "for us, the war was just around the corner" and Hugh Johnson's happiest years lay just ahead. "General Crowder," he writes in one of the simplest sentences in his book ("The Blue Eagle from Egg to Earth"), "had been interested all his life in the subject of mobilization." Hugh Johnson had the privilege of writing the draft provision into the mobilization plans. The General is very proud of this episode; he repeated the story only a few weeks ago in his column. It has many implications in this period of new wars. I quote, with a few underlinings of my own:

> That was months before we declared war on Germany. President Wilson . . . told the Secretary he wanted a bill prepared by the next day authorizing him to raise a vast army during the recess of Congress if developments in our relations with Germany required it. . . .
>
> Without any discussion whatever I wrote a paragraph providing for conscription. Mr. Baker was supposed to be a pacifist. . . . The Secretary did not hesitate at all. . . . In advance of statutory authority we set up all the machinery for conscription.

In his book he dwells fondly on this point:

> Printing [of registration forms] in advance of the statute was absolutely illegal . . .
>
> . . . by breaking law and regulations we saved at least six weeks.

The next job, writes Johnson, " was to inform and convince the country of just what was necessary"; and it is another of his proud memories that having taken "two days off literally to soak myself in the style and writings of Woodrow Wilson," he wrote the President's draft proclamation: "It is in no sense a conscription of the unwilling; it is rather a selection from a nation which has volunteered in mass. . . ."

Remember? We know the rest. The "selling" campaign (Johnson's phrase) was a great success. And Johnson at least has few regrets. One is that he didn't get to France.

In writing the Recovery Act, at the request of another President, Johnson and his aides "wrote in a provision for vast naval construction which—to our astonishment—was never even questioned. . . . We never even discussed that naval provision. . . . I simply wrote it."

If these episodes do not square with the General's frequent appeals to public opinion, it is because you do not understand his ideal of public opinion. It was exemplified during the war. He recently scoffed at the idea of a dictatorship in the United States, though he had himself taken part in what is generally regarded as a pretty good imitation of one during the war:

> . . . it is the worst material in the world [he is speaking of American soldiers] on which to attempt the goose-stepping, heiling, posturing, sheep-herding, bunk and ballyhoo that must go with any attempt to take away their right to a say in their own government.

He says he knows because he saw a cross-section of them in the draft of 1917!

The war period remains for Johnson the golden day of idealism, unity, leadership, powerful purpose, and Hugh Johnson helping to run things. He was in his element on the War Industries Board assisting one of his heroes, Bernie Baruch. He loves to "straighten things out." He loves great men. His devotion to Wilson, Baker, and Baruch is deep and characteristic. His psychology is that of a top sergeant; and his chief is invariably a great man to whom he gives undying loyalty, confidence, and affection, and whom the world does not truly appreciate. He delights in a similar loyalty from his own subordinates.

When the great days were over, Johnson resigned from the army—a brigadier general at thirty-six—and became associated with Bernie Baruch. Since then he has lived in the never-never land of enlightened capitalism and voluntary cooperation. Its contradictions match his own, but the General has so much energy and is so tough that contradictions naturally "roll off his back like a duck," as Sam Goldwyn would say. Action, devotion, facts, service. He marches in a cloud of dust kicked up by his own fierce forays which obscures distances and fills him with a happy sense of going somewhere.

As a big-time military man who had added big business to his repertory, the general of emergency answered the bugle call of the NRA with gusto. He went about the country in a whirlwind of "straightening things out" and "cracking down" on "chiselers." "Witch doctors" and "dead cats" assailed him, and "those who were seeing things under the bed," such as NRA "dictators."

Labor didn't really appreciate him, although in Johnson's opinion the NRA did more for labor than unions had ever done. Johnson is sentimental about labor. In the land of enlightened capitalism labor lies down with capital, and business is a "joint adventure." He genuinely wants everybody to be happy. The profit system is best, and to the General it presents no conflicts that cannot be resolved by codes and cooperation. Labor and management are partners. "There is never a proper question of what is the most labor can get out of management. . . . There is never either a proper question of what is the least that management can pay labor [Johnson's italics]." He is a King Canute telling capital and labor they must not act like capital and labor. He is hurt when they persist in their folly. He envisions a touching partnership named "Labor, Management & Co." He believes in the vertical organization of the whole of labor in a given industry and he admires John Lewis—"he knows so much more about the bituminous coal industry than many of its managers that I used to feel sorry for them in some joint conferences." But wait. He does not mean to condemn craft unions, and he admires Bill Green and craft-union leaders. He wrote in his book:

> . . . I never saw him [Bill Green] in a spot where the national interest was involved when he did not come forward. . . . He repudiated the general strike on the Pacific Coast with even more emphatic words than mine. He has smashed at communism whenever it raised its head. . . . In finding leadership for the new vertical units, I think it highly necessary to make heavy drafts on the experienced leaders of the craft unions.

What this country needs is a labor policy, and he could pick a team to draft one. He revels in picking teams.

If I have referred often to the General's book it is because it reveals so fully the complicated convictions out of which his columns come. It teems with plans and platforms that he "simply wrote." It teems also with remarks such as "if I had it to do over again" and "I still think my plan was best."

How he would like to have it to do over again! His column is the column of a top sergeant on leave. It is mainly devoted to criticism of the Administration. He carefully distinguishes the first (his) New Deal from what he calls the third New Deal. Its confusions and contradictions are an easy target, and the General has been around enough to have a good supply of ammunition. But the implication is that the third New Deal is more confused than the first. At least the General prefers his own brand. His solution for the country's problems is to accept the "economic behemoths" as > . . . natural growths under natural laws which have brought great benefits—together with whatever burdens and abuses may be proved . . . but give people, through their government, a say in the correction of proved abuses by letting these corporations live but requiring them to operate under supervision of government and with its cooperation in some such tribunal as might be called a "high court" of commerce.

It sounds well, but the NRA, relying on persuasion, was not a howling success, while the War Industries Board, which was, worked through compulsion. The abuses of the behemoths must be curbed, but the Administration's brand of regulation does not suit him. Now that Roosevelt is retreating to Richberg's line, the General must approve. For the present he sees dictation everywhere—"things under the bed." He has made his peace with Richberg, who has come over to enlightened capitalism and voluntary cooperation, but he is still bitter about Madam Perkins. The New Deal is "trying to fenagle the popular support of wages-and-hours legislation into a fascist control of labor." The New Deal's agricultural policy "is a fascist control over croppage." He refers to the "radical fascist fringe of the President's advisers." He speaks of the "third New Deal approach to totalitarian government." He is very tender of big business. As for the talk of monopoly, "There are some price abuses, but to accuse all business, or even all big business, of them is the most dangerous and vicious and least brave and honest kind of political demagoguery." He scoffed at the idea of a "food trust."

"Since 1925 the steel industry has earned less than 4 per cent on its investment." Pity the poor steel industry. During the NRA he was most bitter toward those critics who said that it encouraged monopoly by crowding out the little fellow. In the same breath he said that businesses that couldn't meet the code standards didn't deserve to survive—which is a good principle but seldom hits the big fellow. The du Pont family is a "distinguished [one] with a fine record of public service in both peace and war." "Messrs. Weir, Sloan, and Chester are all men of good-will." He blames the Administration for the recession. "The present depression," he said in a recent speech, "was made by one man and can be lifted by one man, and his name is Franklin D. Roosevelt."

When it comes to plans for war, Johnson is on the side of the President and the generals and admirals. "The President's armament request could be improved upon only by asking much more." There followed a nightmarish picture of fascist invasion of the American continent. He seemed not to be aware of the secret Mobilization Day plans of the General Staff, prepared "in advance of statutory authority," which will convert this government into a dictatorship overnight. We must avoid war profiteering and inflation, but we must be careful not to kill the profit incentive. "Our profits incentive has worked to the greatest result of production in history. The compulsion idea is an unproved experiment." The draft of course is a different matter. Privates will fight out of pure patriotism provided they are drafted and public opinion is behind them, but apparently Johnson's captains of industry cannot be expected to do the same. He's right, of course.

On the question of aliens the General is a belligerent American. On February 15 he raged against aliens like Sonja Henie, who are taking good money out of the country:

> . . . counting the bootlegged ones, we are probably supporting 3,000,000 aliens in jobs or on relief, and when you include these highly perfumed specimens it is costing plenty—we with ten millions unemployed and running WPA theaters and orchestras to support a surplus of mummers and piccolo players in nude eel propaganda. [Syntax and pun Johnson's]. . . . Every time I hear that juvenile lime-juice adenoidal accent [he is speaking of Freddie Bartholomew] playing an American kid and think of Jackie Coogan and Shirley Temple I want to wring that little Briton's little neck—not because he's British or Bartholomew, but because we've got plenty of good kids of our own.

It calls up another incident in Nogales, Arizona, when a Mexican garrison from across the border gave the American officers' corps a dinner. Hugh Johnson, called upon for a speech, said in Spanish: "Here's to the day when the American flag will fly from the North Pole to the Isthmus of Panama—then we can all be brothers in arms." His chauvinism works both ways.

Johnson's style is vigorous and noisy, picturesque and allusive. In his book he describes the scene in which he took leave of his faithful employees. He indulged in an address, reprinted in full, that reduced his "army" and himself to tears and must have reminded the General of Washington's farewell to his troops. It was sprinkled with literary and Biblical references—to the Sermon on the Mount, the Golden Rule, the last words of Madam Butterfly in Italian ("To die with honor when you can no longer live with honor"). I like his paraphrase, in honor of NRA, of the lines of his "favorite poetess":

> But oh my foes and ah my friends
> It was a lovely fight.

His columns likewise abound with allusions. One has the impression that he has read widely—and out loud. His mind is a battlefield in which he rushes in all directions roaring at the enemy. The enemy of the moment is the third New Deal, but I cannot help feeling that the General is only on leave.

When he left the NRA he had no word of blame for his beloved chief, the President, who trusted him to the end. He criticizes Roosevelt, but his real bitterness is reserved for the present advisers of the President, the White House "janissaries" who read books like Lundberg's "America's Sixty Families" instead of listening to B. M. Baruch. On March 4 he wrote a furious column headed "Baruch Snubbed" on the occasion of the report that the President had said he had read only the headlines about Baruch's testimony before the Senate Unemployment Committee. Five Presidents, he said, had requested Baruch's advice on national economic affairs, and he "had a powerful part in advising the broad principles of the first New Deal—the magnificent New Deal of early 1933, under which this nation recorded its greatest economic advance of the depression, an advance now lost." A few days earlier he had said that government requires a team of great men. I am sure that his ex-chief Roosevelt can have him back by calling him back—him and B. M. Baruch.

Needless to say, he is the darling of the editors. At first, I was told, his column did not go so well because editors thought of him as boss of the NRA. When they realized that he was vigorously anti-Administration his stock went up and he has been selling rapidly—which is a commentary on who selects columnists, the "public" or the editors. He appears in 67 newspapers, circulation 4,179,583. His column is designed for the prosperous middle class, for the service corps of industry, for editors. He is an apologist for business. The "chiseling fringe" is only about 10 per cent. His sentimentality, toughness, "picturesqueness," and authentic Americanism probably have an appeal. A general who writes a column is a novelty. Readers like the sharp sauce of a general talking slang. The editors like the anti-Administration meat beneath. I think he is sincere in his opposition to fascism. But I have no doubt that he would be willing to take part in a "voluntary" arrangement—in an "emergency" and with the support of public opinion—with himself as the tough but kindly officer in command.

[Next week: Dale Carnegie.]

The War in the Ether

By KARL VAN GELDERLAND

IT HAS been a major tenet of liberal thought that democracy as an institution need not try to make converts nor send out propagandists to promote its cause since the "truth" as such is bound finally to gain the upper hand over "deception." Having accepted this thesis, the Western democracies ceased to be missionary and aggressive, and post-World War developments found them in a defensive attitude, clinging to the status quo. Only recently the discovery of "thieves at work" shocked France and England and other democracies into a realization that more vigorous measures were necessary against the latest offensive of the fascist world alliance—the war in the ether. This European short-wave war has now spread to all parts of the world where ideologies and material interests clash.

Tokyo has announced that it will start construction of at least two powerful short-wave stations at Peiping and Tientsin to acquaint the world with its program of "pacifying" China. Broadcasts will be in Japanese, Chinese, and English. Italy's radio attacks on France and Britain are undermining the authority of those powers in Africa and Asia. Latin America receives daily broadcasts from Rome. General Franco has established short-wave stations in Seville and Spanish Morocco whose mission it is to expose the "rottenness of democracies"—they have referred to the French government as "a bunch of murderers."

Germany, however, stands first in this as in other fields of modern propaganda. Its short-wave messages are skilfully designed to gain sympathy for the Third Reich by justifying its territorial demands and demonstrating its peaceful intentions; to foster united blocs of German minorities abroad; and to carry on the fight against democracy, Jewry, communism, and the world's labor movement. Germany's twelve powerful short-wave stations have been hammering away on the ether for years. Operating with not less than 40,000 watts, combined with directional antennae, these stations can be heard in every part of the world. For their purposes the world is divided into six zones—North America, South America, Africa, East Asia, South Asia, and Australia—each receiving a program specially prepared for its consumption. One half of the program features German music, folk songs, sketches of present-day life in Germany, speeches by political leaders. The other half repeats most of this in English, Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, French, and other languages. The League for Germanism Abroad, which plays an important role in composing the broadcasts, has announced: "Foreigners of standing, visiting Berlin, appear more and more frequently before our microphones. They give authentic testimony about the Third Reich of a most convincing nature to the people of the speaker's home country." A special department on Weltanschauung seeks to spread those ideas which have been universally recognized as characteristic of the Nazi ideology.

Each one of the six zones is under the direction of a member of the National Socialist Party who has had long experience in that part of the globe. "These men know the conditions in the countries to which their broadcasts are sent; they know the languages well; and they are supposed to answer every letter received from individual listeners." Old German music and folk songs are considered to have a political "cash value" as a means of strengthening the ties of Germans abroad with the mother country.

The program broadcast to the United States on January 5, for instance, contained a number of promotional items sandwiched between folk songs, music from small villages, a violin concert, and chamber music. There were five "news flashes" of fifteen minutes each; a broadcast in memory of a "Pennsylvania Dutch" poet, Henry Harbaugh; a reading by a young poet representing the Hitler Youth; and a review of the news. The news reports with which these programs are packed are not to be confused with the average American presentation. They are chosen primarily to advance the "Berlin line."

German-language publications everywhere reprint items received in the news flashes over the short wave. And since this service is generally free of charge, it is well adapted to bring small newspapers into the same line. (There are 1,700 German-language publications outside of Germany, according to the Deutsche Auslands Institut, Stuttgart, with approximately 150 in this country.) Every month thousands of programs printed in several languages are mailed to all parts of the world explaining the special significance of broadcasts to foreign listeners. That this combination of radio and press propaganda abroad is having the desired effect is shown by a statement in the report of the League for Germanism Abroad: "Eighty per cent of all letters from the United States to the German short-wave stations come from non-German listeners. The average in all zones of letters from non-German listeners amounts to 63 per cent."

Our State Department has recently become concerned about the success of European short-wave propaganda in South America. Unable to deal with the situation directly, it let it be known to the Federal Communications Commission that foreign-language short-wave broadcasts from the United States to South America should be encouraged. A year ago Commissioner George Henry Payne, in a speech before the Harvard School of Business Administration, declared that the establishment of a government short-wave radio station was "necessary for defense over the air from the attacks of foreign or unfriendly agencies." A report of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, dated October, 1937, refers to the unscrupulous methods of the fascist powers in their campaign for "spiritual occupation." "German stations," it asserts, "blanket out frequently the most powerful of the three American stations." It adds that German programs are highly favored in South American countries, while programs broadcast from the United States rank third in popularity. These observations find support in a report by Carl W. Ackerman, dean of the School of Journalism of Columbia University, who also refers to the blanketing out of American broadcasts to South America by Berlin and Rome. ("Blanketing out" is a trick well known in Europe, where radio stations illegally use the wave lengths of their opponents across the border and make a clear reception impossible. Radio Strasbourg, a strong French station, for example, sending out news in the German language, is constantly interfered with by Germany; most German-language broadcasts from Moscow are also "killed.")

An attempt to create a foreign-language short-wave system in the United States was made recently by the National Broadcasting Company, when it inaugurated a six-language short-wave program to Europe and South America. A high percentage of broadcasts, however, are given in English, and the regulations of the Federal Communications Commission, which allow performances only "in the interest of public service," bar anything of a controversial nature. The few other short-wave stations which are equipped to reach foreign countries feature educational, religious, and good-will programs, and since most of them are in English, they are rarely understood in South America. Station WIXAL in Boston, an educational station operating in conjunction with the Pan-American Union, had until recently a two-hour program in Spanish once a week—Germany broadcasts to South America for ten hours daily in Spanish, Portuguese, and German. In Europe's fascist countries the people are not allowed to listen to information on the forces active in democratic countries; witness the suppression by Propaganda Minister Goebbels of President Roosevelt's message to Congress on foreign politics, ordered broadcast in six languages.

On February 26 President Roosevelt made the first official move to counteract foreign radio propaganda in South America by appointing a government committee to investigate the whole problem of international broadcasting. The committee is expected to recommend, among other things, a federal short-wave radio station in Washington. With official encouragement of short-wave broadcasting, the old problem of commercial or non-commercial programs will again become acute. According to the FCC regulations, short-wave broadcasts must be non-commercial. Yet it can hardly be expected that the big radio chains, which have made some effort to appease the government by the installation of short-wave stations broadcasting to South America, will operate them without profit as whole-heartedly as conditions require.

When the FCC gave out rights for new frequencies on the short wave a few weeks ago, the National Broadcasting Company was denied its application for new frequencies, while General Electric, operating from Schenectady, was granted new frequencies and enlargement of facilities. The assumption is that General Electric was supposed to be less entangled internationally and to have a lively economic interest in executing the government's programs of "good-will" to South America. Only a few days ago, from the General Electric station, Sumner Welles joined various Brazilian dignitaries in a broadcast to Brazil which stressed the beginning of a "closer co-operation" between the United States and South America.

César Saerchinger, European director of the Columbia Broadcasting System for seven years, puts the entire problem of short-wave propaganda squarely before the nation when he asserts in his new book, "Hello, America": "Nazi propaganda goes out to the world wrapped in Beethoven, and Italy broadcasts propaganda buried in beautiful Italian opera. I think the democratic countries should make more than a half-hearted effort to counteract this by giving as complete and agreeable a picture of our civilization as we can."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE news from Russia is simply appalling. That after protests from all over the world against these treason trials the largest batch of victims is now on the rack—some on charges of having conspired against Lenin twenty years ago and against the life of Maxim Gorki—is surely proof that madness has taken charge of the Soviets. If it is not the madness of a single man, then it can only be explained as a wave of hysteria sweeping over Moscow like that which led to the witch trials in New England. It actually looks as if Stalin were going to "liquidate" every last one of the men who made the revolution. Whether one man or a group is responsible, this strikes a deadly blow at all the progress made toward a decent life for the masses of Russia. It plays into the hands of the dictators who are openly for the destruction of the Soviets and, as I have written before, deprives Russia of the sympathy of those liberals the world over who, without being in the least committed to communism, have still felt that no more remarkable experiment in human government has been undertaken in modern times.

We knew that the plan to erect a great modern state which should place all the emphasis upon the welfare of the masses and not upon that of the rich and privileged might fail because of economic mistakes or an erroneous philosophy, but we never dreamed it would dig its own grave by exhibiting a blood lust without parallel. Even Hitler killed his largest batch of victims when he yielded one night to craven terror. In Russia they are killing men in cold blood twenty years after the overthrow of the Czar. As Maurice Hindus has well said, having reached the year of maturity the Soviet Union is going back to its revolutionary childhood. The Czar was not more ruthless. And there is no assurance that after these men have made their confessions of guilt in public and been done to death, the dance of death will not go on. Yet only a few weeks ago the special correspondents in Moscow reported that there was to be a cessation of the killing.

I hear some say who have lived long in Russia that the accused are guilty, that the Russians have behind them centuries of misrule during which every official was venal and the very highest sold out to any bidder. With Russia overrun by the agents of Japan, Germany, and Italy, is it any wonder, they ask, that many men should be corrupted? Almost every day there are accounts of spies caught in the United States and England, of men beheaded in Germany, of men and women sentenced to prison in France for treason or espionage. That is one of the inevitable evils of the militarism of which today every nation is the victim. But nauseating as that is, it is something quite different from putting men on trial for crimes which failed to take place, for conspiracies which were abortive—if they existed—twenty years ago. Moreover, the effect is cumulative. We are not getting accustomed to it; the horror grows with every new report of the crumpled bodies of men at the base of another Moscow wall. They may have sinned, but their sin is as nothing beside that of the men in the Kremlin who are destroying the faith of all those who have insisted on the right of the Russians to their own way of life and to be free from outside attacks; the Kremlin is undermining everything good the revolution sought to accomplish.

Even if these men were and are guilty, why must they die? The greatest indictment of the death sentence is its finality; it destroys what no man can replace. Other times may come in a nation's life, other moods, other thoughts. No one knows that better than the Russians. Life exile or imprisonment would not shock the world so much. To say that it would endanger the Soviets to grant life to some of the accused is preposterous; great states do not fall that way. They fall when the masses awake to the fact that justice no longer reigns among them, that murder stalks in the very halls of justice; when rulers find that to hold their places they must kill right and left. This may take long in Russia, where news is suppressed, where millions do not yet care what happens to others if only they are left alone in their fields, their workshops, their homes, but come it will. Meanwhile Russia is being truly betrayed to her enemies; Stalin is giving them aid and comfort and the expectation of early disaster. And how can loyal men in Russia make a success of their part in this mighty human experiment, if they do not know at what hour the executioner may appear?

With various others I gave my name to a telegram to the Russian ambassador in Washington asking that the latest trials be postponed until an international committee could be formed to be present at the trials and tell the world just what was taking place. I had faint hope that our request would be listened to; I know it was rejected as an unbearable foreign interference in Russian domestic affairs. Yet I could not decline to make the appeal. It seems to me that everything must be done to make responsible Russians realize something of the horror which civilized men everywhere feel as they read of what is taking place again. True, the Russian mentality is as unlike our own as is that of the Japanese. Still there must be some among them who know the dangers which confront their state—the danger of complete isolation in Europe, nearer today than at any other time since 1920. These men cannot want to forfeit the last bit of friendly liberal sentiment.

BOOKS and the ARTS

JOSEPH IN THE LAND OF THE DEAD

BY PHILIP BLAIR RICE

ALTHOUGH Mann's Joseph story, of which "Joseph in Egypt"* is the third part, is still incomplete, it has an ominous air of finality. It seems both to sum up and to pass judgment upon the shining virtues of that way of thinking and feeling and living which modern Europe inherited from the earlier Mediterranean cultures and developed so magnificently. Regarded in conjunction with recent events abroad, it cannot fail to give many the feeling that this is the kind of great work which on several past occasions has written off the score of a major epoch in history.

Laden as it is with Herr Mann's assessment of our ethical, religious, and social heritage, constituting as it does a post-Wagnerian synthesis of the art forms, it is at the same time the freshest, clearest, and most straightforward of his stories. The commentary does not become a digression, as it often did in "The Magic Mountain," and the multiple symbolism carries along the story instead of absorbing it. Here, of course, the narrative interest cannot be in what happened but in how it happened. The author's chief task, then, has been to imagine characters from whom the action would issue logically. The key to the action lies in the condition of Potiphar, who is but the titular captain of Potiphar's guard, a parasitic courtier with only ceremonial duties. He is also merely an honorary male and a titular husband to Mut-em-enet, since his consecration to the service of Amen-Hotep III has involved a surgical operation in his youth.

Potiphar's sacrifice, in turn, accounts for the behavior of his wife, who, according to our author, has been maligned by her reputation as a wanton. When we first meet her she is, besides a lady of fashion and the head of Potiphar's purely ornamental harem, a moon-nun, devoted to the cult of the conservative deity Amun. When this exquisite but unawakened creature finally becomes aware of the beautiful Joseph, the result is a demoniac seizure like the passion of Hans for Clavdia and that of Aschenbach for Tadzio. Mann makes her so enthralling an embodiment of all erotic desires, and at the same time evokes so much sympathy for her as a suffering woman, that there may remain some shred of doubt as to the plausibility of Joseph's rejection of her, despite the fortitude of mind and the seven excellent reasons with which the author has endowed him.

To understand Joseph, we must place him within the larger design of the work, for all the old motifs recur with variations. When we meet him at the beginning of this part, his coat of many colors has been replaced by the faded garment of a slave. Joseph's servitude to Potiphar repeats Jacob's to Laban; at the same time the Jacob theme is broken up and inverted by duplicating his agonized yearning for Rachel in Mut's for Joseph. The father-son motif is renewed in the relation of Joseph first to the old Ishmaelite, then to Potiphar, and throughout to God. The course of Joseph's fortunes, as in the previous volume, is again an inverted V, which here assumes significance as the profile of a pyramid. Joseph rises from the pit to become steward of Potiphar's house, then declines into the dungeon. The resurrected god must be slain again. The graph of Potiphar's wife is similar. From a porcelain figurine, she becomes a woman, then degenerates into a hag, a sorceress, a mummy.

But there is an underlying linear progression which makes the inverted V into a triangle, the delta of the Nile, the divine triad of Egyptian theology, foreshadowed by the three days in the pit and consummated by the three years in prison. The base of the triangle, the ground-bass of the story's music, is the flow of measured time, the flow of the Nile, the procession of the living dead. Joseph is really in the pit all the time, a slave in the house of death. His rise is illusory. He is no part of this polyglot Egypt, which is both a symbol and a counterfeit of the human race. He walks through it in the detachment of a dream. Potiphar's wife, likewise, is never wholly alive: her body and her will are awakened, but not her spirit.

Joseph's fathers had always identified Egypt, the land of mud, with Sheol. It was for them "the seat of the worship of the past, of dalliance with death, of insensibility to sin." Although Joseph is of a more sophisticated, more tolerant generation, he finds that their repugnance, tinctured as it may have been with insularity and priggishness, is not altogether unfounded. At the very entrance to the land he is met by the frowning fortress of Thel, which defends luxurious Egypt against the poverty of the East, for to the Egyptian "misery is suspect and lack of elegance an abomination." In the pit Joseph has acquired a conscience. When he sees the coughing little people living under the lash as did their ancestors who built the pyramids, when going up the Nile he observes the nobles sitting upright and immobile on their yachts in order to impress the common people, he knows that he cannot wholly share the purposes of this land.

But Mann's delight in paradoxes, his perception of relativities, his propensity to hold everything in dialectical solution which is yet not resolution, leads him to introduce stirrings of life into the land of mud and death. There is a kind of liberal and progressive movement in Egypt, associated with the cult of the god Atum, who is wresting ascendancy even in the court from his

---

*"Joseph in Egypt." By Thomas Mann. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.
"Thomas Mann's Joseph Story." By Harry Slochower. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.

established rival Amun. The Egyptian nobles are becoming international-minded; there is a rage for importing foreign wares and customs, and even for identifying foreign gods with their own in a religious universalism.

The full social and political reference of this section may not become plain until Mann has finished the tetralogy. The earlier sections depict the primitive communism of the family group. The revolt of the brothers against Jacob in their manhandling of Joseph would seem to be not only, as Mr. Slochower suggests in his useful little guidebook, a savage and proto-fascist revolt of the masses against man but also the uprising of the sons of the primeval horde against the Cyclopean father which, according to Freud, established the social compact and the first state. Mr. Slochower appears right in taking the Levantine cities passed through by Joseph and the Ishmaelites to represent early commercial civilization, and the journey through the desert to the borders of Egypt as symbolic of the Dark Ages.

The question of Mann's temporal references is rendered difficult by the fact that he is simultaneously talking about all time and a particular epoch. But there are good reasons for doubting what seems to be Mr. Slochower's view that the Egypt of this part covers the entire span from feudal Europe to fascism. The features which I have mentioned suggest to me that the present volume brings us only up to the Enlightenment and the verge of the French Revolution rather than to the twentieth century, although here, as in history itself, there are anticipations of later events. Potiphar, the personal archetype of this culture, is neither a captain of industry nor a Nazi official but a nobleman of the tottering ancien régime in his sterile refinement, his bored tolerance, his love of abstract justice, and his capacity to get a pleasurable shiver from reading prophecies of revolution. This interpretation would also accord better with the apparent role of Joseph in the story, as well as with Mann's artistic methods and social philosophy.

For all Joseph's unwillingness to accept anything short of the best, he has not yet reached the end of his pilgrim's progress. His stay in the pit had not altogether rid him of his arrogant pride. If he does not give in completely to Mut's fascination, he yields so far as to take pleasure in her abandonment of herself to him, and under the pretext that he can cure her passion by pedagogical measures, he gives rein to his curiosity. He displays, furthermore, a characteristic liberal fault, the "unwillingness to give up the free choice of the bad course." Joseph has not yet found his life, for he has not wholly lost it. His sympathy with others is mixed with a certain calculation, which enables him to use rather than serve them.

So Joseph must go down into the pit again. Will he emerge in the next part of the novel as "the savior of man and bringer of the new time"? It is clear that, in the person of Joseph, Mann is at last hinting at the ideal character, the god-man, the child of both nature and spirit. But there are also indications that he may not attain his apotheosis. According to the book of Genesis, Joseph's morals to the end remained spotty. He was, in a sense, the savior of the Near East, for he kept those who could pay the price from starving (as has Hitler), and he was generous to his relations (as is Mussolini). But he exacted a heavy return for his work of salvation, using his blessing to develop to a fine point the arts of monopoly and profiteering, and finally becoming, in fact, a kind of Duce to Pharaoh's Victor Emmanuel. Furthermore, he later married a daughter of the land of death. Must we be prepared for a Sophoclean irony?

Mann thus far has held his story rigidly within the framework of the Biblical narrative. It does not, then, seem likely that he is intending to depict in the fourth part of the book, as Mr. Slochower suggests, the ideal socialist commonwealth; we can expect, rather, an image of contemporary European society, with at most portents of the time to come. The moral that appears to be foreshadowed is the humanistic-religious one that man can never become God, but his salvation, in so far as he is capable of salvation, consists in his continuing to try to become like God. If so, we must read "Joseph" as a tragedy, whose purport is the inevitable failure of the ideal to achieve full realization. Great tragedy leaves us with hope; but it also gives us glimpses of the ideal good before the dénouement. Recognizing this as the possible structure of the story, we may get more from it as we read. In particular, we can grasp it as exemplifying Mann's insistence that the social revolution must seek to preserve and fulfil, as it alone can, certain precious values from the tainted past.

TWO POEMS

BY W. B. YEATS

The Old Stone Cross

A statesman is an easy man,
He tells his lies by rote;
A journalist makes up his lies
And takes you by the throat,
So stay at home and drink your beer
And let the neighbors vote,
Said the man in the golden breastplate
Under the old stone Cross.

Because this age and the next age
Engender in the ditch,
No man can know a happy man
From any passing wretch,
If Folly links with Elegance
No man knows which is which.
Said the man in the golden breastplate
Under the old stone Cross.

But actors lacking music
Do most excite my spleen,
They say it is more human
To shuffle, grunt, and groan,
Not knowing what unearthly stuff
Rounds a mighty scene.
Said the old man in the golden breastplate
Under the old stone Cross.

To a Friend

Stretch towards the moonless midnight of the trees
As though that hand could reach to where they stand,
And they but famous old upholsteries
Delightful to the touch; tighten that hand
As though to draw them closer yet.
Rammed full
Of that most sensuous silence of the night
(For since the horizon's bought strange dogs are still)
Climb to your chamber full of books and wait,
No books upon the knee and no one there
But a great dane that cannot bay the moon
But now lies sunk in sleep.
What climbs the stair?
Nothing that common women ponder on
If you are worth my hope! Neither Content
Nor Satisfied Conscience, but that great family
Some ancient famous authors misrepresent,
The Proud Furies each with her torch on high.

BOOKS

Harriet Monroe's Seventy Years

A POET'S LIFE: SEVENTY YEARS IN A CHANGING WORLD. By Harriet Monroe. The Macmillan Company. $5.

AFTER a trip around the world in 1912 Harriet Monroe worked out a plan to subsidize a poetry magazine. She persuaded one hundred men in Chicago to subscribe fifty dollars a year for five years to finance her venture. She studied modern poetry, and when all plans were made, she wrote personally to those poets whom she wished to submit manuscripts. Thus Poetry was launched and American poets were given, at last, a place where their poems might be printed and paid for. The adventure was well timed. America was on the eve of its so-called renaissance. Soon innumerable other little magazines were to appear. In Poetry itself Ezra Pound, Vachel Lindsay, W. B. Yeats, Edwin Arlington Robinson, H. D., and many other poets were represented. And Chicago became a literary center because a woman in her middle years pushed her project through.

Born in 1860, Miss Monroe had grown up in a Victorian atmosphere. In her veins, however, was pioneer blood. She chose to become a journalist, hoping thereby to finance herself until she might become known as a poet and playwright—her two personal ambitions, never fully realized. Her only romantic, and imaginary, love had been for Robert Louis Stevenson. It was a literary affair, and his letters appear in this book. When the young girl finally met the sick man on his way to the South Seas she was shocked at his appearance. In the eighties in New York Miss Monroe had known Eugene Field and Edmund Clarence Stedman, dictator of poets. She had been given encouragement in her poetry and her playwriting. But Chicago was her home and she returned to it. She wrote the "Columbia Ode" for the World's Fair and was paid $1,000 for it. She then had to sue to have it read and sue a newspaper for violation of copyright. From the newspaper she obtained $5,000. She was, in other words, a fighter, and an adventurer too. She had traveled to the inaccessible Hopi lands and to Europe and she had met famous people everywhere. Her girlhood over, Miss Monroe was not unprepared for her task as editor of Poetry. Once in the editorial chair she put aside her Victorian prejudices, if she had any, and began to learn from the violent Ezra Pound and from every poet who wrote to her. She was attacked by the press and she made sane replies. Columnists, editorial writers, and poets all became outraged—it is a little difficult now to see why. William Rose Benét hated Ezra Pound; Conrad Aiken hated imagism; Lindsay's "General William Booth" caused a tempest in a teapot; and Carl Sandburg's "Chicago," a minor revolution. Every prize given by Poetry created an uproar, but Poetry and its editors were usually right. The conventional Dial, then published in the West, fought Miss Monroe on every issue. She fought back. And before the Dial moved east and honored Eliot with its prize, Miss Monroe had printed Eliot's early poetry.

The war years were difficult for Poetry financially, but Miss Monroe saw the magazine through them, as later she was to carry it through the still more critical days of the 1929 depression. She printed the war poets, English and American. A letter from Lindsay at this time is prophetic: "Harriet, war with Germany is only the beginning of our chance to die for the U. S. A. I see war on the world constitution when it is set up, and revolutionaries for it and revolutionaries against it, and no easy time."

In the post-war years other experimentalists than the imagists and free-verse writers for whom Miss Monroe had waged a lively fight appeared, and she gave them all room. Before she died, indeed, some of our present revolutionary poets had crept into her pages. Miss Monroe had capable assistant editors; Morton Zabel, a brilliant young critic, was the last of these. It is he who completes her book.

Poetry's editor died on one of her last adventures. She loved travel, and in the last fifteen years of her life each vacation saw her off to Mexico, to Italy, to Egypt, to China. Finally in 1936 she went to the P. E. N. International Congress at Buenos Aires and there read a lively paper. From this gay meeting she was tempted to go to the Inca ruins. She died of a stroke on the high altitudes of the Andes and she is buried there. The manuscript of her autobiography was mailed back. It breaks off in the midst of an account of the events of 1922. In one short summary chapter Miss Monroe calls herself a heathen, loving beauty and art above all else. She had found her way clear of the Puritan tradition.

If one runs through the back numbers of Poetry, especially the early volumes, one is astounded at the list of famous names first given a hearing in the magazine's pages. Certainly the editor selected all varieties of poets. She may have had one or two prejudices (she kept out Cummings, perhaps because of her dislike of his eccentricities), but all in all hers is a brilliant record. She strikes the one sad note when she remarks that "Ellis Park," by Helen Hoyt, and Kilmer's "Trees" "were the most widely quoted of those poems printed in the first years."

This autobiography is completely impersonal and objective. The author is interested not in her life but in poetry. Famous letters, famous editorials, memories of famous people are, for her, life itself, and she gives these to us. She could efface herself for the sake of art quite unsentimentally and sanely. Poetry is still being published, as she wished; George Dillon, a poet she printed when he was very young, has been appointed editor. It has survived most of the other journals dedicated to the cause of art.

EDA LOU WALTON

The Eighth Gothic Tale

OUT OF AFRICA. By Isak Dinesen. Random House. $2.75.

BARONESS BLIXEN of Denmark, who for some reason signed her "Seven Gothic Tales" with the name Isak Dinesen, signs this new book not only with the same name but with the same style of story-telling, so that the fact of its being autobiography sets it only the slightest distance away from that outpost of fiction which its author so brilliantly holds. No one but Isak Dinesen could have written either book; could have rendered the fantasies of the "Tales" so real, or the realities of Africa so fantastic. For if her autobiography reads like fiction, the moral is not at all that it seems untrue. It is as true as its author's imagination and character; and of these, as of their unparalleled attractiveness, there can be no doubt.

The Baroness does not bother with dates, but it is clear that her residence in Kenya, twelve miles from Nairobi, began some years before the World War and ended some years after it when her coffee plantation failed. The story is chiefly of the plantation and of the natives with whose help she managed it. The landscape figures too, beautifully of course; the wild animals of Kenya are never out of sight; and two or three Englishmen, together with an old Dane named Knudsen, are interesting at the fringe; yet the heart of the book has to do with the relations between one Northern woman and perhaps a hundred Negroes of divers tribes and temperaments. Some of these are her house servants, some are coffee workers, some are vagrants, some are children, some are hunters, some are rulers of neighboring races, and some are simply old men past work or play who spend their time settling the affairs of others. To all of them the Northern woman has given her life, and since she is a woman of genius the intercourse between them is bountiful in its rewards. On her side there is understanding which expresses itself in respect, amusement, sympathy, anger, love, and a sense of continuing obligation by no means inconsistent with a willingness to wield authority. On their side there is understanding which expresses itself in respect for her even when she is incomprehensible, in love for her because she is incomprehensible, and in a sense of continuing obligation by no means inconsistent either with a willingness to resist her authority or with a disposition to worship her as if she were Providence.

She can refer to herself as their Providence because she has no illusions as to what this meant. It meant to them that she was not to be withstood, but it also meant that she was not to be loved and honored with logic. Their mutual understanding was in large part an agreement not to pretend to understand what in the nature of things was mysterious, namely, each other. She knew when to acknowledge their mystery, and they hers. Added to which there was of course their bottomless humor, a thing with which even white geniuses may not cope. It reached exaggerated proportions in the boy Kamante, whom the Baroness had saved from a fatal illness and who ever after lived only to serve her.

> He had a little mocking laughter, of which he made use in all circumstances, but chiefly toward any self-confidence or grandiloquence in other people. All natives have in them a strong strain of malice, a shrill delight in things going wrong, which in itself is hurting and revolting to Europeans. Kamante brought this characteristic to a rare perfection, even to a special self-irony, that made him take pleasure in his own disappointments and disasters, nearly exactly as in those of other people.

She was Providence to Kamante, or a goddess, or a queen, precisely because she took risks, played with fate, gave orders, acted as if she knew what she was doing. No person in his opinion would so behave; so this must be more than a person. She had come into his world from outside, somewhat like a conqueror but somewhat also like a deity strayed from her proper home. Now that there was no help for it he took pleasure in adoring her; which suggests that any people's pantheon may be nothing but the aristocracy of its invaders deified.

Readers of "Seven Gothic Tales" will remember its author's sentiment for the antique and the aristocratic. The same bias is here, and as little now as then can be offered in criticism of it. For Baroness Blixen is really distinguished and profound; there is nothing which she does not know; and there is nothing which she cannot feel. The tragedy of her final pages is that she is leaving her life behind her; it was truly given, and it cannot be taken back. Kamante with the help of a scribe has written her since she returned to Denmark: "We think that you shall never can forget us." This is the highest of compliments, and very touching; but it is more touching that Kamante will never read the book which has been written about him and his people. If he could do so he would recognize himself, one hopes, in the paragraph which describes him as a stunted boy in the Mission hospital where the Baroness had taken him for his final cure:

> I caught sight of Kamante in the grounds, he was standing by himself at a little distance from the groups of other convalescents. By this time he was already so much better that he could run. When he saw me he came up to the fence and ran with me as long as it was following the road. He trotted along, on his side of the fence, like a foal in a paddock when you pass it on horseback, and kept his eyes on my pony, but he did not say a word. At the corner of the hospital grounds he had to stop, and when as I rode on, I looked back, I saw him standing stock still, with his head up in the air, and staring after me, in the exact manner of a foal when you ride away from it. I waved my hand to him a couple of times, the first time he did not react at all, then suddenly his arm went straight up like a pump-spear, but he did not do it more than once.

MARK VAN DOREN

Milestone on Mexico

THE EJIDO. MEXICO'S WAY OUT. By Eyler N. Simpson. University of North Carolina Press. $5.

THERE is no American scholar who is fully competent to criticize, in detail, Dr. Eyler Simpson's monumental work on agrarian Mexico. The "land question" is the fundamental problem of Mexico. Its entire history, its current politics, even its art are related intimately to the economic dislocations of the distribution and exploitation of the land.

Up to now there had been no systematic, scientific effort to describe this problem completely, in terms of all the available facts. It was "a friar's job," as they say in Spanish. Not even Mexican economists, with the added facilities of knowledge of the language and lifelong acquaintance with the human, personal reflections of the problem, had attempted what was tried—and achieved successfully—by Dr. Simpson, in some eight years of patient scrupulous investigation.

"The Ejido," 808 pages long, excluding index and bibliography, has not received the attention it deserves. If Dr. Simpson had written a popular version of it, every person who is at all interested in Mexico or in Hispanic-American affairs would have realized at once that "The Ejido" was required reading and indispensable reference.

To economists the most interesting parts of the book are Dr. Simpson's careful descriptions of land tenure in pre-Spanish and colonial days and of the development of property forms to date. These are illustrated by sets of charts and documented with statistical data. To other readers Dr. Simpson's conclusions would probably seem more important. His decision, on the basis of the material itself, that the land problem in Mexico can be solved only by complete socialization is remarkable coming from a man who began this work with no set social theories.

Some economists and sociologists in Mexico disagree with certain of Dr. Simpson's judgments and interpretations, as I do myself. In a work of such ambitious scope, exploring so much uncharted territory, there are bound to be sections needing further examination and later testing, possibly correction. But the information it contains and the manner in which that information is handled make this a very necessary volume to any student of Mexican affairs. It is the solid stuff that shapes Mexico's history, and is worth hundreds of ephemeral impressions. ANITA BRENNER

The Gallant Marquis

LAFAYETTE JOINS THE AMERICAN ARMY. By Louis Gottschalk. University of Chicago Press. $3.

IN HIS first volume of the Lafayette series, published in 1935 under the title "Lafayette Comes to America," Mr. Gottschalk dealt with the youth of the gallant Marquis. It should be remembered that Lafayette arrived in our fair land, to take part in the Revolution, a few months before his twentieth birthday. In one pocket he carried an English grammar, in another a commission as major general in the Continental army. In his heart and mind there was a surging desire for fame and glory. One of the favorite Lafayette legends is that his American adventure was inspired by an ardent love for liberty and republican institutions. It is a myth; not true at all. Later in life, when he wrote his wholly unreliable memoirs, he did what he could to sustain this legend. Evidently he had become convinced himself that he had been a crusader in the cause of democracy. There is, however, no contemporaneous evidence to support his assertion.

He came here, as Gottschalk points out, for the sake of adventure. He wanted to win renown on the battlefield so that he might eventually return to France in a glowing aura of fame and accomplishment. That would make the Duc d'Ayen, his father-in-law, and other important gentlemen consider him somebody special and not just a dawdler and time-waster. The motive is quite comprehensible. Mingled with it was his inveterate, lifelong hatred of England.

With the arrival of the Marquis in America Mr. Gottschalk concluded his first book. The present volume deals with Lafayette's experiences in the American Revolution from June, 1777, to December, 1778, when he returned to France for a year. In 1779 he served as an officer in the French army, returning to America in 1780. He came back to General Washington and the struggling Revolution in 1780, and remained here until after the surrender of Cornwallis in October, 1781. There are 364 pages in this volume and 184 in the previous one, yet the second book ends when Lafayette was still under twenty-two years of age. This observation is not intended to be derogatory; I make it here simply to show the scope of the author's evident purpose.

BOOK BARGAINS
UP TO 75% OFF REGULAR PRICES
Offered by America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House
ORIGINAL EDITIONS — NOT REPRINTS

1. THE ART OF MARRIAGE. By J. F. Hayden, B.Sc. Extensive, frank, complete, this book includes notable chapters on unequalized sexuality, frigidity of wives, sexual satiety, prematurity, lack of art in procedure, impotence, prudery, etc. Also contains the fullest treatise on Frigidity that can be found today, as well as on Reservatus. Illustrated, Revised, Enlarged. Our special price, $1.98

2. BEHIND THE SCENES WITH THE KAISER. The world-astounding exposé by the Baroness von Larisch of the Imperial Household. "Here at last is the powerful graphic picture of the Kaiser's private secret life—of his birth, his strange disease, his power, his degraded court favorites, his ghastly dissipations, his terrible utterances—and finally his exile!" Published in two volumes by subscription at ($5.00) The 2-volume set, only $1.98

3. A COMPLETE GUIDE TO PUBLIC SPEAKING. By Grenville Kleiser, America's foremost authority. Successful Methods of Public Speaking—Vital English for Speakers and Writers—How to Sell Through Speech—Word Power, How to Develop It. 660 pages. The 4 volumes, only $1.49

4. FORTY THOUSAND QUOTATIONS. Prose and Poetical. Selected from the standard authors of ancient and modern times, classified according to subject and covering almost the entire range of thought and emotion. 1400 Topics. Over 2000 pages. Original red cloth, gold top edition. ($5.00) Our special price, $1.98

5. DIEGO RIVERA'S MOST FAMOUS FRESCOES. Ten prints in full color. Size 9″ x 12″. Diego Rivera is universally recognized as the world's foremost fresco painter. When these prints were first issued they were sold FROM $5.00 TO $10.00 PER PRINT. ($6.25) The 10 prints for 98c

6. MASTERPIECES OF MODERN ART. Magnificent hand-mounted reproductions in full color, size 11½″ x 14″, as follows: 2 of RENOIR; 2 VAN GOGH; 3 CEZANNE; 1 MANET; 3 MONET; 1 PISSARRO; 1 SISLEY; 1 MATISSE; 1 MARQUET; 1 DE VLAMINCK; 1 UTRILLO; 3 DERAIN; 4 PICASSO; 1 GAUGUIN. Any 6 full color prints, for $1.79

7. FAMOUS VAN GOGH PAINTINGS IN FULL COLOR. Zuave—Still Life—Cornfield—Blooming Apple Orchard. Four famous Van Goghs beautifully reproduced in full color. Ideal for framing—they look like original oil paintings. Together with introductory Booklet by G. Benson, containing 17 Van Gogh halftones. Size 14½″ x 18″. ($10.00) Our special price for all, $1.98

8. BEVERIDGE'S LINCOLN. In 4 illustrated volumes. Abraham Lincoln. 1809-1858. By Albert J. Beveridge. Boxed. "The author has traced to its source every fact, incident, or statement, bearing on the life of Lincoln." ($20.00) The 4-volume set, only $3.98

9: ANOMALIES AND CURIOSITIES OF MEDICINE. With 295 unusual illustrations. 968 pages. Second-hand copies of the out-of-print former edition of this work have fetched ($25.00). Our special price, only $3.88

10. MARK TWAIN'S "1601." This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. ($5.00) Our special price, $1.58

11. THE AUTHENTIC LIBRETTI OF TEN FAMOUS GILBERT AND SULLIVAN OPERAS. Ten Complete Operas with the scores of 12 of the most popular musical selections. the Operas being: The Gondoliers; The Pirates of Penzance; Iolanthe; H. M. S. Pinafore; The Mikado; The Yeomen of the Guard; Ruddigore; Princess Ida; Patience; Trial by Jury. Size 7″ x 10½″. Our special price, 98c

12. WRITE IT RIGHT. By Ambrose Bierce. A little blacklist of literary faults, by America's foremost master of style. Useful, witty. Interesting to those who like to write and think precisely. 98c

13. NUDISM. ADVENTURES IN NAKEDNESS. By Julian Strange. Illustrated with 74 unretouched photographs of nudists. $1.59

14. WOMEN OF ALL NATIONS. Illustrated with over 200 photographic plates. Characteristics, habits, manners, customs and influence of women all over the world. The only work of its kind in the history of literature, with a collection of RARE PHOTOGRAPHS gathered from every part of the world. ($15.00) The 2-volume set, only $2.98

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-31
Established 1884
367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $......................for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14
(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 291-N, containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains—just off the press!

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State......................

When his seven or eight volumes are completed I am confident that they will be considered the final word on Lafayette. Mr. Gottschalk is producing a major historical work, a notable contribution to our knowledge of the past. He is not impressed by the tinsel, confetti, and perfume of the Lafayette legend, but at the same time he should not be looked upon as a debunker with an urge to "show up" this and that. He has a passion for truth, and the present volume reveals an astounding capacity for factual research. But Mr. Gottschalk vitalizes his facts. Under his psychological treatment Lafayette ceases to be a historical dummy and becomes a human being—courageous, generous, foolish, impetuous—with a fairly large supply of both good and bad judgment.

His affection and reverence for Washington approached adoration. He called himself Washington's "adopted son." This was, of course, only a figure of speech. Lafayette was an orphan; his father was killed in battle when the Marquis was an infant. Nevertheless, and notwithstanding his love for Washington, he got himself involved—for a little while—in the conspiracy to supplant his adored chief and put General Gates in his place. The explanation is that he did not know what it was all about; he did not understand the complicated politics of the army. Besides, he had a deplorable habit of writing letters on the spur of the moment and sending them in all directions, with compliments and flowery phrases in them. So the Gates party played with his ambitions, but as soon as he learned their intentions he left them.

Jefferson, while he was in France as American minister, wrote that Lafayette had a "canine appetite for popularity." He did, indeed. He wanted to shine, to be in the sun, to sit on a horse on the skyline while bullets came zipping by.

Gottschalk shows that he was a lovable person. No other foreigner has ever made such a profound impression upon the affections of the American people, or upon American history.

W. E. WOODWARD

ART

Marin and His Oils

THIS is the year of Marin's oils. As the painter says in a delightful free-verse poem which accompanies his new pictures at An American Place, they "Seem to be a Coming along—tolerably well—tolerably well—"

Indeed they do. They come to him naturally now.

Five oils are included among the water colors and drawings on show until March 27. Of these, Breaking Wave is undoubtedly the most expert of his increasingly numerous performances in the heavier medium. It is a veritable explosion of color. A great wave, spuming and white, throws itself high against a shore. Purples burst from the sea, supported by deep blues. On the shore are solid browns and blacks. This painting has warmth, power, and spontaneity, qualities which the critics have frequently denied to his earlier oils. Another sea piece, Island, Boat, and Ledges, shows a similar increase in facility, while a third, The Dance by the Sea, marks a new level in Marin's ascent as an artist.

Its five nudes dancing by the sea are in a tempestuous movement. They rise, thrusting upward in the center; they interlock, their bodies moving toward a common axis; yet they never become rigid, because a relaxation is obtained by means of the frieze-like sea and horizontals of shore and sky behind. Hence this picture simultaneously charges, lifts, and recedes. It integrates more and heavier movements than Marin has ever managed in the past. It also demonstrates that he has mastered the dynamics of the human body as well as of nature. We may therefore expect new advances to issue from it. The fourth oil bothered the painter for many months. It shows a gay and wayward tête-à-tête on the Weehawken Ferry, with cubes of the New York sky line punctuating the shore behind. This work, while less affecting than the others, does establish a decided advance for him—namely, the ability to imbed background and figure in each other.

This new faculty has carried over into the water colors—even though they were done earlier. In each of the three gull pictures, for example, he has interlocked the birds and the background in a way that strengthens both. A greater depth has resulted—and a new substantiality. This becomes even clearer by comparing the Boat and Green Sea of the present show with any of his earlier boat pictures. They were swift and brilliant, too. But they skimmed the sea, whereas this boat cleaves it. The water is felt as much as the wind. So, also, with the shores in these new water colors: they seem to go right under the sea. This new solidity proceeds from the oils and Marin's success in building them up. For the oil medium requires kneading, piling on, modeling; it seems, indeed, to be a work of the thumb and fingers. Certainly, it is a thicker and more earthy material. And the water colors have benefited from the activity in it.

But there are two which cannot be seen in this manner. The first, entitled Low Tide, is saline, spent, cold, utterly withdrawn. It is Marin in an Arctic moment. The other, Boat and Sea, is like a bit of ethereal silver which somehow got breathed on paper. Two of the drawings, also, are inimitable. One is a Manhattan fantasy, with a dashing, peak-hatted young woman in the foreground facing a young man with a pipe. A gay horse prances in the streets behind. All the factories are talking through their smoke. This is the impish Marin, populating the city with humor. Another fine drawing is Myself in Wonder, the artist's first self-portrait. These two drawings, it should be noted, further that employment of human subject matter which has coincided with Marin's renewed attack upon the oils, beginning about five years ago. They suggest, accordingly, a new extension of his powers.

Then there are two water colors which the painter terms "stepping-stones." One of these outlines a shore in a very heavy line, almost as if his finger had traced it. Behind, at the horizon, a series of tiny grey dots race across the sky line. From these, no doubt, he will develop new and more silvery space-movements next year. The other water color, entitled Morning Light, has black-barred diagonals against a purplish sea. It is day chasing away night. In explanation, the painter has said that in the early morning hours the darkness and the light fluctuate. Weaving in and out, black shafts retreat as white ones advance. This is what he has seen and sought to realize. He has not quite captured it, but he probably will at the next encounter. Marin is not afraid to chance a failure if it will take him farther than he had gone before. This is one of his most endearing traits as a painter.

Perhaps, too, this is what guarantees his perpetual freshness. He follows the everlasting flux of things. The wind blows, the sea rocks, the boats fly; again, the city veers and turns and shakes; or human beings charge and hurl themselves together. Whatever the experience, Marin meets it without preconceptions. He even has moments of calm, when he appreciates the Wordsworthian solemnities of nature and astounds us with his own sense of awe before it. In short, he has resilience. So it is this year. The only difference is that the singing, wistful, humorous, sometimes passionate composer of the water colors has now been fortified by the mellow, substantial, and irrevocably anchored painter of the oils. Marin is richer than he was before; and so are we.

JEROME MELLQUIST

DRAMA

In the Grand Style

THE Lafayette Theater is located at Seventh Avenue and 131st Street. One could hardly, perhaps, go very much farther but one could easily fare a great deal worse, for there the Harlem division of the Federal Theater is offering a melodrama called "Haiti" which has charms of its own. It is a romantic affair as well as a bloody one, but it is played to the hilt—and somewhat beyond—by an obviously enraptured company whose sincerity disarms all carping criticism.

The plot is concerned with some embellishments upon the story of Jean-Christophe's rebellion at the time of Napoleon, and it is probably best not to speculate too much upon the effect it would produce if acted by an ordinary Broadway company before an ordinary audience of correct but anemic taste. Under such circumstances one would probably feel that the author had laid everything on a bit too thick, that the emotional gestures were somewhat too sweeping and the heroics almost too much in the grand style. One would not find it surprising but almost inevitable that Christophe himself should emerge through a secret panel and that the wife of one of the French colonels should turn out to be the bastard daughter of an ancient ex-slave still hovering about the house. One might even find in the general conduct of the piece a good deal that was reminiscent of the ten-twenty-and thirty as well as of its counterpart, the yellow-back. But in the present production one not only forgives all these things; one actually applauds them. They seem creditable enough and very exhilarating besides.

This happy result is doubtless due, first of all, to the wisdom of the director, who has played everything up instead of down. I do not mean that there is even a suggestion of conscious burlesque. There is no spoofing of the grand manner, and I do not think that any player condescends to his part. Neither, for that matter, do I mean that the audience needs to condescend. What I do mean is that the whole is played for what it is, and that as the result of a perfectly consistent style it becomes effective in a special way of its own. Rex Ingram, as Christophe, is gigantic and impressive in his red and gold, and he is pathetic too—as he could not be if he were not impressive first. Even the white actors seem to catch some of the native grandiloquence of the blacks, and where everything is equally gaudy nothing seems really overdone. One somehow gets to feeling that such simple and grandiose gestures, as well as such simple and grandiose language, really fit these people, and one is accordingly carried along on a pleasant wave of operatic emotion. It is all bigger than life and in some ways better too.

Certainly I found much more to admire in "Haiti" than I did in the elaborate and costly concoction called "Save Me

TRAVEL

THE OPEN ROAD
shows you more than tourist sights
at least cost of time and money.

EUROPE • MEXICO
• SOVIET UNION •

Small travel groups recruited from the professions—authoritative leaders assisted by cultured native guides—social contact with people of each country.

PUBLIC HOUSING IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND. Auspices National Public Housing Conference. Sailing June 29. Back Aug. 2.
BOYS' TOUR, under leadership of Mr. Hubert H. Nexon. Cycling in England plus 10 days in Belgium and Paris. For boys 14 to 18 years old. Sailing July 2. Back Aug. 16.
GIRLS' TOUR, under leadership of Mrs. Edith Maltman. England, Scotland, Wales, mostly on bicycles. For girls 14 to 18 years old. Sailing July 6. Back Aug. 23.
PUBLIC HEALTH IN THE SOVIET UNION, under leadership of Dr. Henry E. Sigerist. 5 weeks of study and observation in principal cities and health resorts. Programed with cooperation of Peoples Commissariat of Health. Sailing June 11. Back Aug. 12.
THE SOVIET UNION AND ITS DRAMATIC ARTS, under leadership of Norris Houghton. A month of metropolitan and folk theatre in the great cities, the Caucasus, Soviet Armenia and the Crimea. Sailing June 8. Back July 31.
MEXICO, under leadership of Julien Bryan. More than a month in the cities and native villages. Sailing July 14. Back Aug. 23.

For rates and descriptive circulars on these and 20 other trips address:

THE OPEN ROAD
DEPT. C
8 W. 40th ST.
NEW YORK
Cooperating in the Soviet Union with Intourist

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
The ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE
production of JEAN GIRADOUX'S comedy
AMPHITRYON 38
Adapted by S. N. BEHRMAN
with a distinguished cast
SHUBERT 44th St., W. of Bway. Matinees, Thurs. and Sat., 2:40. Evenings, 8:40. 300 Seats at $1.10. Telephone reservations: Circle 6-5990—No one admitted during prologue.

WINE OF CHOICE
a new comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN with
LESLIE BANKS CLAUDIA MORGAN ALEXANDER WOOLCOTT
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., West of Broadway. Mats., Thurs. and Sat. 2:30; Eves., 8:30.

CONCERTS

Y.M.H.A., LEXINGTON AVE. & 92nd ST. EVGS. at 9
Five Grand Concerts ★ ★ ★ Complete Cycle
BUDAPEST STRING QUARTET
in BEETHOVEN'S 16 QUARTETS and GRAND FUGUE
Sat., March 26th
Sun., March 27th
Thurs., March 31st
Sat., April 2nd
Sun., April 3rd
$3.50 SOLD OUT! SUBSCRIPTIONS AT $4.50 FOR 5 CONCERTS
AVAILABLE AT { LEAGUE OF MUSIC LOVERS, 121 E. 18 St. GRa 5-9866
{ Y.M.H.A., Lexington Avenue & 92nd Street ATw 9-2400

the Waltz" at the Martin Beck. The latter is so obviously a musical comedy with the music left out that one never gets over waiting for the songs that do not come, and one does not have to be a great admirer of light music to feel that if that is to be dispensed with one might just as well dispense with everything else as well. Nor should the prospective spectator be deluded by the fact that the story is concerned with the adventures and misadventures of a Graustarkian imitator of Hitler and Mussolini. Surprisingly few changes have been found necessary in the standard plot and not too many in the jokes either. Jane Wyatt, back from the movies, is very agreeable to look at but she has little to do.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

Photography by Woodard

STACY and Horace Woodard are the authors, directors, producers, and distributors of "The Adventures of Chico" (Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse), but above all they are its photographers. When Stacy Woodard completed his work on "The River" in 1936, the two of them set off for Mexico with nothing by way of equipment beyond a pair of cameras, an idea in the form of a script, and fabulous reserves of patience. Their idea was simple: to find a man and a boy in Mexico who would live before their cameras as father and son, who would enter into certain relations with certain animals, and who in collaboration with ground and sky would express their country as it had expressed itself to the brothers Woodard. The animal they were most interested in was the roadrunner bird, or paisano, which is very wild and intelligent and can kill rattlesnakes. Since their script called for a friendship between a paisano and a boy, they were obliged, once the boy was found and named Chico, to discover a paisano fledgling and put him in charge of it. They did so; Chico caught lizards and fed it in its nest; and when it was ready to leave the nest it attached itself to him, following him about and sitting in his hand or on his shoulder. The difficulty of photographing all this was great, since the paisano tolerated no other person's presence; screens and telescopic lenses had to be used, and much time needed to pass. But that was only the beginning. Not to speak of the other animals called for in the script, there was the duel between their paisano and a rattlesnake which they hoped to arrange. They arranged it; it happened; the paisano won; and Chico, sleeping by the wall of his father's hut, was "saved."

A year and a half of effort and 100,000 feet of film were spent in making a picture which one sees in an hour and which, if one is not watching closely and thinking about what is there, may seem a thing of mild and transient importance. But "The Adventures of Chico" will not be easy to forget. Barren of superfluous properties, leisurely in its pace, and bothering at no moment to disguise the fact that its activities have been arranged, it asks only that we hear what it has to say about Mexico in the language available to it; and asks with such innocence and sincerity that we can do no less than listen. The brothers Woodard are photographers with a love of their art, but in this case they have the additional merit of being in love with their subject. How they say this with cameras I do not quite understand, yet I am sure that they say it, just as I am sure that their subject is more than Mexico. It is animals and men, or more abstractly still it is life as an enterprise of which we can be most aware when we are witnessing it immediately and affectionately, without theories as to what it means or why it is going forward. The adventures of Chico and his friends take place in a remote and sunny stillness which our presence somehow does not violate, and which is not broken by the small voice of Chico as it accompanies each sequence in childish and imperfect English.

There are other animals, as I have said: two absurdly hungry coatimondi; the doe and her fawns who are saved when the father shoots the puma that is stalking the wild pigs; the armadillo with her four young; and others still. But Chico and the paisano are the heart of the picture. And the picture is somewhere near the heart, I should guess, of photography.

How lightly death is taken in "A Slight Case of Murder" (Warner Brothers) may be indicated by reporting that when the corpses of four gangsters are found in the Saratoga house of Remy Marco (Edward G. Robinson) the audience howls with delight at the things Marco and his mugs have to say about it. Marco is a bootlegger gone "legitimate," but legitimacy is for him only another racket, so that the moral tone of the entire piece is hopelessly low. Since the conception, however, is bold, and the execution both brilliant and consistent, the net result is a very funny film; certain things become laughable which have rarely or never been laughable before, and Mr. Robinson himself, freed from the necessity to sentimentalize his idiom, is able to give his surest and briskest performance to date.

MARK VAN DOREN

EUROPE
31 DAYS — $299 UP*
Sailings Weekly-May through August
Individual freedom and economy all the way, with all routine details cared for, at rates to favor the modest budget
Also—a wide variety of other tours. Write at once for specific facts on where—when—for how long you plan to travel.
*3rd Ocean.

SOLO TOURS
☐ 4-Country Tours
England, France, Belgium, Holland. 32 days or more — from $349.
☐ All-British Tours
England, Ireland, Scotland. 31 days or more —from $299.
☐ Northland Tours
Scandinavia and the Baltic. 34 days or more— from $379.
Send for Booklet N.

EDUTRAVEL Educational Travel Institute, Inc.
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

NOW you may order
BOOKS
from THE NATION
At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C.O.D.
Please address your orders to
The Readers' Service Division
The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

Letters to the Editors

On Determining a Fair Price

Dear Sirs: I read the editorial on the TVA in your issue of January 29 and then I read Mr. Villard's page and then I read the editorial again. To me it's idiotic. The Nation says that to take over the whole interconnected plant in the area is wrong. Only the best units should be taken because to take it all would be to "saddle on the public the various write-ups." This is a completely absurd argument. The prices of the common and preferred stock show what has become of the write-ups. They don't enter into the matter in any way under any of the proposed solutions. A "reproduction-cost" price ignores write-ups automatically.

The Nation says "physical and operating value" are "the only valid basis" for determining take-over price. It may be so. But what is "physical and operating value" and why is that more definite or more just to all concerned than "prudent investment" or "reproduction cost" or "a just price to be fixed by a committee of three," two of them to be government men? There's a hell of a lot of take-it-for-granted in that editorial. It's another case of the other side must be all wrong whatever it says or proposes or does. I have a lot of respect for Mr. Villard, but I haven't got the slightest interest in Commonwealth and Southern.

SAMUEL M. HYNEMAN

Nutley, N. J., March 1

[It would be better if Mr. Hyneman had at least a slight interest in Commonwealth and Southern. If he had, he might not be so willing to trust the stock values as indicators of presence or lack of write-ups. That would have been a forceful argument a decade ago; today it is naive. In 1929 Commonwealth and Southern had unloaded $918,000,000 of stock on the public. Several years later, when the Federal Trade Commission began looking into holding-company set-ups, the holding company reduced the securities to $354,000,000—a cut of over 60 per cent. But look at the commission report and you will find that there is still plenty of water in the stock. Obviously, in order to earn a "fair return" on inflated security holdings and corporate salaries, and thus maintain stock values, the holding companies have to put a crushing burden on the consumer. They got away with it—whatever Mr. Willkie, Mr. Villard, and Mr. Hyneman may say—until the TVA began making power available to the local communities in the South. Then they grew panicky. For out of the TVA "yardstick" experience has grown a movement among municipalities in Tennessee and neighboring states to buy TVA power and distribute it to consumers themselves. Municipalities like Memphis and Chattanooga have been asking their local companies to sell their physical plants at a fair value to be determined by the Federal Power Commission, in order to avoid competition and duplicating plants. We consider this movement healthy. All the state supreme courts in the area and the United States Supreme Court have held it to be legal. It is in line with the best American tradition, which has always regarded the generation of electricity as a local public function and looked upon franchises to private companies as recallable grants of privilege.

If Mr. Hyneman will reread our editorial, he will find that we do not recommend the government taking over "only the best units" of the utility system. When we spoke of "the physical and operating value" of the companies as being the best basis, we meant that urban systems should be bought as functioning units, without paying for "intangibles" and without bailing out the water-logged holding-company securities. If such a plan involves hardship to the companies, then let the communities in the TVA area—not the federal government—buy out the utilities as a whole and parcel out their properties among themselves.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Social Credit Not Fascist

Dear Sirs: In the February 12 issue of The Nation the Social Credit government of Alberta is indiscriminately lumped with the fascism of Quebec and Ontario. The leading exponents of the Douglas ideas are curtly dismissed as fanatic and dictatorial. What, may I ask, has become of the dispassionate inquiry, the intellectual hospitality, the discipline of temperate utterance that have made The Nation justly famous?

Social Credit is a democratic creed, quite independent of both fascism and communism. That Aberhart, who does not understand the technical bases of the policy he is attempting to inaugurate, should dally with censorship, is foolhardy and deplorable.

Social Credit is entirely compatible with the American Bill of Rights, and none of its leading advocates believe that it has anything to hope from dictatorship. The so-called democracies are now under a dictatorship of finance, at whose command millions are denied life's barest necessities. This dictatorship Social Credit is fighting. I respectfully suggest that you launch an inquiry to determine the extent of responsibility of monopoly finance for the present chaotic condition of the Western world.

NICHOLAS LENTZ

New Albin, Iowa, March 1

Browder and Marx

Dear Sirs: It is bad enough when others do it, but it is shocking when so able a scholar as Reinhold Niebuhr starts quoting from the Marxian scriptures to show that somebody has profaned the original gospel. Dr. Niebuhr certainly knows that every Marxian sect everlastingly quotes and counter-quotes from Marx, Engels, and Lenin to prove all other sects faithless; and that such logic never succeeds for the obvious reason that Marxism, above all political doctrines of history, is understandable only in the context of its method and system as a whole. Yet Dr. Niebuhr would have us believe in his review of "The Peoples' Front" that Earl Browder has become a revisionist of Marxism because passages from Lenin can be cited which advocate illegal tactics, atheism, dictatorship, and other policies which the Communist Party now soft-pedals.

If Mr. Browder explicitly contended that the present temperate program of his party were all that communism ever means, then I should agree that he woefully misrepresents Marxism. And no doubt "The People's Front" gives such an impression too often. Dr. Niebuhr is equally misleading, however, when he implies that Lenin stood exclusively for extreme revolutionary tactics. As a matter of fact, a basic principle of Marxian theory is that the specific way we apply the class struggle depends entirely upon the kind of social situation we confront. Sometimes the situation calls for revolutionary, even illegal methods such as Lenin advocated as against Kautsky's; sometimes it calls for parliamentary cooperation such as Lenin advocated against "left communism, an infantile disorder." It is often said that Lenin has been the greatest Marxist since Marx: certainly he is in recognizing that the means to be utilized in achieving the end of a classless society are as multiple as the events of history itself. The most recent biography of Marx, by Nicolaievsky and Maenchen-Helfen, shows again how Marx himself was always ready to compromise on a specific issue, just as Communist parties today compromise with bourgeois democracies whenever such tactics seemed most likely to work. Thus entirely aside from the question of how right Mr. Browder's program may be in effectiveness, it certainly is not wrong in Marxian theory.

THEODORE BRAMELD

Jamaica, N. Y., March 3

Union-made Lisle Hosiery

Dear Sirs: Lisle hose are now being manufactured by some of the best union concerns, notably Best Made, Gotham, McCallum, and Phoenix. By asking for lisle stockings by name, or insisting upon the union label, consumers will promote the interests of the members of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers.

Since it is conceded that machines up to 42 gauge may be used in the manufacture of lisle hose and since some of the best union concerns are now making them, it seems to be up to the social-minded consumer to buy lisle hose intelligently and protect union workers.

AGNES NEWBORG

New York, March 2

A "Radical" Catholic Magazine

Dear Sirs: Several weeks ago I read with pleasure the article you carried by that fine young Catholic woman, Mary M.

Then I found somewhere an advertisement by a little Catholic magazine. "Radical"? it said, "you don't know what radical means until you've read the Christian Front!" So I set out to learn. I sent for a copy. This is what it contains: (1) a diatribe against Marxism; (2) a perfectly decent appeal to the nations of the earth to drop their individualistic nationalism; (3) a recognition that the economic order is unchristian, coupled with the idea of cooperative banking; (4) a defense of Latin as the language of the church; (5) an article in which holding companies are justified; (6) a traveler's impressions of Europe, concluding, "I do not believe either fascism or communism has the most infinitesimal social or cultural contribution to make to the United States."

Honestly, I should like to call the bluff of that little paper. There isn't a radical line in it. Aside from the glorification of Catholicism, there isn't a thing in it that Herbert Hoover would not approve and applaud. In fact, its idea that the lowly of the earth should pool their little funds and manage some of their tiny ventures cooperatively, without disturbing in any way the present ownership of the sources of supply, is Mr. Hoover's stand to a T.

I had hoped to discover a Catholic sheet by some young Catholics, say, who had had a vital collision with the idea that all men are brothers. That idea is to be found within Catholicism. And radicalism can be fetched out of it. I wanted to see the thing done, but the Christian Front doesn't do it.

MARION G. LEWIS

Marshfield, Mass., February 28

Life of G. K. Chesterton

Dear Sirs: I have been asked by Mrs. Chesterton to write the life of the late G. K. Chesterton. I should therefore be very grateful if anyone who has letters from Mr. Chesterton would lend them as material for the biography. They will be copied and returned immediately.

They should be sent to Mrs. G. K. Chesterton, Top Meadow, Beaconsfield, Bucks, England.

MAISE WARD

New York, March 1

Isolationism Makes for War

Dear Sirs: W. R. Hearst, Hamilton Fish, and other tory reactionaries, as well as pacifists and liberals, have become ardent supporters of the policy of isolation. It is difficult to explain this curious combination, but it obvious that lack of political realism is a distinguishing feature of some of its members. Pacifists and liberals perhaps do not realize that their isolationist stand makes it easier for Hearst et al. to sell the idea of a big navy to the American people. Once the isolationist principle is accepted, it is inevitable that Americans should fall for a big-navy program in order to preserve and defend such isolation. This makes eventually for war instead of peace.

Once before pacifists showed a lack of political vision—when they did not foresee the application of our present "unneutral" neutrality law, which they helped to enact, against the legitimate government of Spain.

The Nation's stand for collective security, its brilliant editorials, and Louis Fisher's timely analysis of America's role in world affairs deserve the commendation of everyone who is concerned with the preservation of peace.

HERMAN GOLD

Chester, Pa., March 2

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT DELL is the Manchester Guardian's correspondent in Geneva. His long experience and wide knowledge of European affairs make his comment at this critical period doubly valuable.

SUMNER H. SLICHTER is professor of business economics in the Harvard University Graduate School of Business Administration.

KARL VAN GELDERLAND is the pseudonym of an exiled German journalist.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE regularly reviews poetry for The Nation.

W. B. YEATS is the noted Irish poet. He has set forth the principles from which much of his work in prose and poetry derives its inspiration in his book "A Vision."

EDA LOU WALTON, poet and critic, is associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University.

ANITA BRENNER is the author of "Idols Behind Altars" and "Your Mexican Holiday."

W. E. WOODWARD is at work on a life of Lafayette.

JEROME MELLQUIST was formerly art editor of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 146 NEW YORK ▪ SATURDAY ▪ MARCH 19, 1938 NUMBER 12

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 313
EDITORIALS:
"MEIN KAMPF" UNFOLDS 316
WHIPPING A DEAD HORSE 317
LARCENY IN WALL STREET 318
TVA JITTERS by Paul Y. Anderson 319
EUROPE LEARNS FROM VIENNA By Robert Dell 320
GANGSTER TRIUMPHANT by Freda Kirchwey 321
WAR IN THE PEACE MOVEMENT By James Wechsler 323
COLUMNISTS ON PARADE. IV. DALE CARNEGIE By Margaret Marshall 325
SPRING SONG by Franklin P. Adams 328
HITLER DOOMS THE CHURCH By Philip S. Bernstein 329
SAINTS by George Grosz 331
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 332
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
SELF-DESTRUCTION by Joseph Wood Krutch 333
DE VOTO AND HIS EPOCH by Harry Levin 333
X-RAY REALISM by Eda Lou Walton 334
THE OSIRIS WAY by Philip Blair Rice 335
HERNDON'S LINCOLN by L. E. Robinson 337
MUSIC: TOSCANINI BROADCASTS by B. H. Haggin 338

Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY MAX LERNER
Managing Editor
M. R. BENDINER
Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editor
MAXWELL S. STEWART
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
*
Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

REPORTS FROM REBEL SOURCES INDICATE that the great insurgent drive in Aragon has been far more successful than any previous Franco attack in central Spain. Although we lack information from government sources, it can scarcely be doubted that rebel troops have captured Belchite, together with several other towns, and occupied several hundred square miles of territory. How important the advance will prove in comparison with the government's sinking of the Baleares remains to be seen. Most of the occupied territory is wild and uninhabited. It is useful chiefly as a stepping-off place for a drive to cut the Barcelona-Valencia railway. The sinking of the Baleares, on the other hand, seems definitely to have destroyed any possibility that Franco could effectively blockade the Mediterranean ports. It thus reduces the significance of belligerency rights as an issue before the Non-Intervention Committee and diminishes to a certain extent the strategic importance of Franco's attempted drive to the sea. Spain may also gain from the fact that for the moment the focus of fascist attack appears to have shifted to Central Europe. Much depends, however, on whether events in that area eventually serve to strengthen or weaken the Rome-Berlin axis. If Hitler has made substantial concessions to Mussolini in return for Italian neutrality in Austria, they almost certainly involve Spain. If, on the other hand, Hitler has chosen simply to disregard the Duce, as many observers insist, we may see a substantial reduction in fascist aid to Franco. Thus the events of the next few weeks in Spain may furnish the key to the ultimate fate of Europe.

*

ALTHOUGH THE FAR EAST, LIKE SPAIN, HAS been overshadowed in the past week by events in Central Europe, Chinese resistance to Japan's brand of fascism has shown no signs of weakening in the face of unfavorable world developments. The Japanese attack on Hsuchow seems to be completely stalled on both the northern and southern fronts. Similarly, the main drive down the Peiping-Hankow Railway toward Chengchow appears to have been stopped at the Yellow River. Efforts by the Japanese to cross the Yellow River farther west in preparation for an invasion of Shensi have likewise proved unsuccessful. Only in Shansi has Japan made any substantial gains. Although it may be assumed that Japan will ultimately be able to add northern Kiangsu, Honan, and Shensi to its list of conquered provinces, China, after eight months of war, is far more unified and far more determined to maintain resistance than at any previous time. If this determination continues through the difficult days that lie just ahead, Japan may continue to overrun provinces but will not be able to conquer China.

* * *

WHEN ADOLF HITLER'S BOMBING PLANES roar over Prague, as they have already roared over Vienna, it will be too late to talk of preventing the war which the world has been dreading for a decade. No decent person can want that war, but decent persons have radically different ideas on how it can be avoided. Those who urge a policy of collective security believe that the mass of liberal and left opinion in the United States will respond to a plea for solidarity with democratic forces abroad in an effort to head off the fascist advance before it makes war inevitable. Those who favor isolation insist that American liberalism is overwhelmingly in favor of minding its own business as the one sure way of keeping this country out of war. Believing that the time has come to put both these claims to the test, The Nation is sending to over 130,000 American liberals a questionnaire on war prevention. Elsewhere in this issue is a ballot intended for our own readers. We urge them to use it while their votes are still important to an Administration whose foreign policy in a crucial hour remains to be formulated.

* * *

"SPARE THE RICH" IS THE NEW SLOGAN that Congress has adopted in place of the "Soak the Rich" tendency that was once attributed to the New Deal. Under cover of the general scuttle-and-run psychology that the deepening depression has brought with it, Congress is reverting to the spirit of benevolence toward business that characterized the halcyon tax era of Andrew Mellon. The latest move in this direction was the action of the House last week in passing a revenue bill which it had first stripped of the "third-basket" tax on closely held corporations, and which it almost succeeded in stripping of the provision for publicity of returns. As the publicity provision now stands, salaries of over $75,000 (instead of over $15,000) a year will be made public. The bill that now goes to the Senate is one in which the undistributed-profits tax has been pretty nearly done to death: the small corporations have been completely exempted from it, the larger corporations are taxed only lightly, and the closely held corporations which were the original target of the tax are not dealt with effectively. The Senate, more reactionary even than the House on tax matters, will undoubtedly revise the tax downward even farther. The only possible conclusion one may draw from the tax barrage that the press has been laying down is that the ruling groups in America are bent on taking a course which, in the sacred cause of restoring confidence, would add tax burdens to the wage-earners and still further reduce purchasing power. The doubtful boon of a psychological victory will have to be paid for by a severer breakdown later.

* * *

BROAD VISTAS OF NEW TAX POLICY ARE opened by recent decisions of the Supreme Court on tax cases. In a sensational reversal of two basic precedents the court held in the Wyoming oil-tax case that the federal government may tax income from land leased by a state to a private company. The reversal is dramatic for two reasons. One is the fact that Chief Justice Hughes, who was part of a five-to-four majority in the Coronado Oil case of 1932, has now switched to the government side, with the bland statement that the Coronado case and the case of Gillespie vs. Oklahoma (1922) "are out of harmony with correct principle and . . . are overruled." The second is the triumph of Justice Brandeis, whose sixteen-year-old dissent in the Gillespie case has now become court doctrine. The effect of the decision will be to widen the area of federal taxation and bring within the scope of the tax laws a good deal of income that had unjustifiably been slipping through the crevices. Taken with several court decisions handed down some months ago, which ruled that the federal government could tax the income of quasi-state officials and that the states could tax the income of contractors on federal projects, the cases show a tendency on the part of the court to redefine the entire theory of tax immunity. Another government victory was scored last week in the Charles E. Mitchell tax-penalty case, when the court ruled, after a brilliant argument for the government by Edward S. Greenbaum, that Mitchell's acquittal in 1933 on the criminal charge of tax fraud did not exempt him in civil suit from having to pay a 50 per cent penalty charge to the Treasury. While the decision strengthens the whole administrative machinery of the Treasury in tax enforcement, it is more than an administrative victory. Mitchell's case was in the common belief the outstanding tax fraud of the century. The government's successful challenge of chicanery among the higher bracketeers will do much to dampen their ardor for evasion.

* * *

CHAIRMAN MORGAN DID HIMSELF SMALL credit in the President's inquiry into the struggle of the TVA directors. Mr. Roosevelt's attempt to get at the facts behind the sensational charges fell foul of his stubborn refusal to answer questions. There may be some who still regard Mr. Morgan as hero or martyr; we do not. His refusal to give a bill of particulars for his charges leaves him shorn of whatever prestige he may have had. One can only conclude that he has no particulars that will stand scrutiny, or that he wants to make the President's path as thorny as possible, or that he believes that to reveal the facts now would be to detract from the dramatic character of the Congressional inquiry. If the last two of these three possibilities contain, as we believe, the greatest measure of truth, then Mr. Morgan's ethics (about which he has spoken so much) are transcended by his politics. No one can absolve the President completely of blame in this whole matter. As Paul Y. Anderson points out elsewhere in this issue, Mr. Roosevelt is paying now for his dilatory tactics in not resolving the impasse earlier. Nevertheless, that furnishes no excuse for Mr. Morgan's tactics. We still want an inquiry by a special Senate committee. But we are learning to expect little more than spleen from the TVA chairman.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

*

THE APPOINTMENT OF THURMAN ARNOLD as Robert Jackson's successor in the Department of Justice may be far more fruitful than his critics like to imagine. Naturally his writings are now laid out to confront him, as if he were Walter Winchell turned press agent for the Legion of Decency. At worst these writings disclose that he senses the limitations of the anti-trust campaign, which has always been shrouded in bombast and proclaimed as a cure-all. At best they may provide the base for systematic, intelligent treatment of the monopoly issue. Arnold has maintained, with rich justification, that the anti-trust fight has been surrounded by rampant generalities and moral solemnity. He has debunked the holiness of the war. He believes that there is a battle to be fought—but with devotion to particular problems, to matters of detail, and to variations in the diverse realms of our economic life. He is likely to emulate the best work of the SEC in particularizing his inquiry and in invoking the widest publicity to bulwark real findings. The reactionaries have cuttingly suggested that he would not have his heart in the job. He probably intends to use his brains.

*

FRED BEAL, WHO LED THE GASTONIA STRIKE in 1929, has gone back to prison in North Carolina after a series of events which have taken him through all the vicissitudes of the radical movement for the past nine years. Beal, who was a member of the Communist Party, was convicted with six others of conspiring to murder Police Chief O. F. Aderholt of Gastonia, fatally wounded in a fight growing out of the strike. The American Civil Liberties Union offered to carry an appeal to the North Carolina Supreme Court on the ground that the convictions were based not upon evidence but upon the political views and working-class activities of those involved. While the appeal was pending, the defendants jumped bail. In the years following Beal made two trips to Russia. He came back opposed to the Soviet regime and went into hiding. Last summer he wrote a book in which he denounced the Soviets. He was picked up several weeks ago in Lawrence and extradited to North Carolina. Needless to say, he has been denounced by the Communist press as an enemy of labor. Fred Beal is a casualty of two wars. However strongly one may disagree with his present views, they are not the issue. The issue is the conviction of a labor leader on false charges. Beal has no legal appeal because he jumped bail. His fate rests therefore in the hands of the parole authorities and the Governor of North Carolina. Pressure from liberal and labor groups is in this instance more than ever essential.

*

THE CZECHOSLOVAKIAN TRADE AGREEMENT illustrates better perhaps than any previous pact the advantages and limitations of the Hull trade program. It goes beyond other agreements in providing for a reduction in the duty on an important product manufactured in the United States. But the benefit to Czechoslovakia from the cut of 50 per cent in our tariff on shoes is largely nullified by a provision for an increase in the duty if the importation of shoes reaches 1¼ per cent of average production in this country. As has so frequently been the case in the Hull agreements, the United States seems to have exacted a harsh bargain. Czechoslovakia granted tariff reductions on items forming 76 per cent of its imports from the United States, items which totaled $30,000,000 in value in 1936. In exchange, the United States cut duties on only 63 items with a total value of less than $20,000,000, or 55 per cent of our imports from Czechoslovakia. Although Secretary Hull is being criticized by vested interests for granting unwarranted concessions to foreign countries, the evidence is all the other way. Sensitive lest reactionary interests be offended, Hull has exacted far more than he has conceded, with consequent danger to world economic stability. Figures released last week by the Department of Commerce show that our exports to twenty-six trade-agreement countries in January were nearly 10 per cent higher than in the same month a year ago, while our imports from these same countries declined nearly 30 per cent. Although the recession undoubtedly accounted for most of the decline, these figures should give Mr. Hull cause for concern.

*

"THE BIRTH OF A BABY," AN EXTRAORDINARY film made under the auspices of the American Committee on Maternal Welfare, is at present being kept from the public in New York on the ground that it might corrupt public morals. An appeal is now before the Regents of the University of the State of New York. The film is educational in its objectives, and its objectives are such as to shame any group of censors. It seeks to reduce maternal and infant mortality, to avert fear of child-bearing, to prevent abortion, to warn against the dangers of promiscuity, and to present sex in its proper relation to life. In a country which has one of the highest maternal-mortality rates in the civilized world and more than its share of disease and pruriency as a result of the lack of proper sex education, a film like "The Birth of a Baby" should be broadcast far and wide. It has been indorsed by medical organizations, hospitals, maternity centers, prominent physicians, and even by the United States Public Health Service, which is conducting a campaign to bring syphilis under control. Laymen who have seen the film testify that an admittedly delicate subject is handled with amazing intelligence and taste and that it is, moreover, an excellent and beautiful example of cinema technique. The film is being shown in Minneapolis with the vigorous public approval of the Mayor. That it should be barred in New York City is only additional evidence of the attitude which the film seeks to dispel. Write to the Board of Regents in Albany, and make it strong!

* * *

GOVERNOR LEHMAN'S BLUNT REJECTION of the demands for the removal of Stanley M. Isaacs was politically wise and legally invulnerable. And Mr. Isaacs, the Republican Borough President of Manhattan, who valiantly stood by his Communist appointee, emerges from the incident with increased stature. While a pathetic chorus led by the Scripps-Howard World Telegram still warns that the republic is in danger, Simon W. Gerson remains at a post for which he happens to be well equipped. The net effect of one of the silliest of New York's red scares is that the cause of progressive government has been strengthened and life goes on pretty much as it did before Mr. Gerson seized City Hall.

* * *

WITH THE DEATH OF CLARENCE DARROW the nation loses the most colorful of the older generation of rebels. "I am a pessimist with hope" is the way Darrow once described himself, and he had the gift of making both premises persuasive. His view of human nature was Swiftian: while he professed himself an agnostic, there was an element of almost religious laceration in the low opinion he held of human qualities. But this fatalism about man did not prevent him from fighting for men. He was Governor Altgeld's partner, and his supporter during the Haymarket affair; he was counsel for Gene Debs in the railway-strike case, for Big Bill Haywood and his companions in the Staunenberg case, for the McNamara brothers in the ill-fated dynamite case. When he faced William Jennings Bryan at Dayton, Tennessee, in the evolution trial, he made Darwin and Huxley live in the minds of ordinary men and women; his report on the fate of the small business man under the NRA cleared the air of much of the current cant. The record of his life is woven into the record of the labor and progressive struggles of one of the bleakest periods in American history. But his permanent mark will probably remain in the annals of the law—not in the dusty records but in the body of memory, half-myth and half-truth, to which the common man clings. He will go down as the man who could work miracles for the defense in murder trials. With his intuitive grasp of human emotions and his passionate disbelief in capital punishment, he did more than anyone else to popularize the basic social fact that it is the environment that fashions criminals. His achievement was to bring a measure of humanity into the law.

* * *

THE NATION AND ALL ITS READERS HAVE rejoiced over the return to these pages of Paul Y. Anderson. Old subscribers had never ceased to remind us that he had been too long absent. A few weeks ago Mr. Anderson joined the Washington bureau of the St. Louis Star-Times, and that journal has experienced a similar burst of enthusiasm. We wish to add our congratulations to those of its other readers. The Star-Times has been consistently progressive for years. Its chief editorial writer, Irving Brant, is outstanding among liberal newspaper editors. It has a Guild shop. We can say nothing better about the Star-Times than that we believe Paul Y. Anderson belongs there.

"Mein Kampf" Unfolds

NOTHING that Hitler had done in the past quite equaled the shrewdness, dispatch, and ruthless efficiency he displayed in conquering Austria. On Friday an Austria which was at least 70 per cent anti-Nazi was preparing to demonstrate its opposition to Anschluss at a plebiscite on Sunday. Schuschnigg was defiant; the workers were flocking to his support; there were reports that the Austrian army was being mobilized, and even that Mussolini was giving encouragement if not backing to the government. On Friday night Schuschnigg was forced out by a Nazi ultimatum; early on Saturday morning German troops entered Austria; on Sunday President Miklas resigned, the Austrian army was coordinated with the German military force, the Austrian Nazis were put under German leadership, and Austria ceased to exist as even a nominally independent state.

After this sequence of events, there can be no question either of Hitler's ability to evaluate a political situation correctly or of his willingness to disregard all legal and humane considerations when he decides to strike. Nor can there be any doubt of the absolute nature of his victory. In many ways Austria may prove more difficult to coordinate than Germany. It is predominantly Catholic; it contains a larger proportion of Jews than Germany; and Vienna, at least, has a Social Democratic tradition that was never wholly uprooted by the Schuschnigg dictatorship. Moreover, despite Hitler, a strong Austrian nationalist sentiment exists which will not easily be overcome. Yet nothing unorganized individuals in that tiny country can do is likely to have much effect against the highly organized might of Nazi terror. Austria lost its last opportunity for freedom when Schuschnigg gave the order that the army should not fire a shot in defense of independence.

The conquest of Austria opens the path for Hitler's drive to the East which, according to "Mein Kampf," is to be the next step in Germany's rise to world mastery. That Czechoslovakia will be next is accepted as beyond question. Beyond lies Hungary, already repentant of its years of campaigning for revision of the peace treaties. Rumania under Carol's dictatorship is now strongly under German influence, and would presumably put up little resistance against Nazi economic dominance. Across Rumania lies the black-soil region of the Soviet Ukraine, the ultimate goal of Hitler's expansion to the East.

It remains to be seen, however, whether Hitler has paid a price for Austria that is incommensurate with his gains. The fact that his actions have provoked no open criticism in Rome does not mean that Mussolini is pleased to have German troops at the Brenner Pass. The Duce may have been too weak to resist, but he will certainly try to exact substantial repayment in one form or another. Failure to obtain this might seriously weaken Mussolini's prestige at home, and might yet break the Rome-Berlin axis. At the moment, the axis is unassailable, largely because of Germany's strength, but let it be demonstrated that England and France are firmly reunited, and Italy, its dreams of Central European dominance shattered, might well return to the Stresa front.

Outside the fascist bloc the Nazi coup has already had some effect in strengthening, at least temporarily, the forces opposing aggression. The new French Cabinet is much stronger in its orientation against fascism than the one which preceded it. It has been announced that the French treaty with Czechoslovakia will be strengthened so as to assure French intervention in the event of a German attack on the Czech republic. All signs point to a refurbishing of the somewhat tarnished Soviet-French agreement and a reaffirmation of the Soviet-Czech treaty. Czechoslovakia itself has flatly announced that it will fight rather than suffer Austria's fate.

Perhaps the most serious check to Hitler's aspirations may be found in the sudden disruption of Anglo-German negotiations. A more deadly weapon could scarcely have been put in the hands of those opposed to Chamberlain's pro-Nazi policies than has been furnished by Hitler's coup. Although Britain has refused to commit itself to support Czechoslovakia, it has seen a demonstration of Hitler's aims and methods which it is not likely soon to forget. Should France become involved in a war with the Reich, Britain would have little choice but to come to France's defense.

Frightened by the ease of the Nazi triumph, the democratic countries have been drawn together to resist the growing threat of German domination of Europe. While the anti-German bloc is by no means as strong as in the days of the Stresa front, it is still powerful enough to curb Nazi aggression if it remains intact. But is it a sincere opposition? Will it hold together once the events in Austria begin to fade into history? As always, the answer to these questions must be sought primarily in England. France, Russia, and Czechoslovakia must remain anti-Nazi from necessity. But there is reason to suspect that Chamberlain's opposition is merely "for the record." No Prime Minister of England could openly support Germany in the seizure of Austria. Should Hitler, as on previous occasions, allow passion to cool before launching his next adventure, it may again be possible to urge a "realistic" settlement with Germany. Only then can we know with certainty whether Chamberlain has profited by his error, or whether the British people have awakened sufficiently to overthrow the government if it returns to its pro-Hitler policies. In this connection it is heartening to note that the leaders of the political opposition are almost unanimous in urging a solid front of democratic powers to discourage any further Nazi advance in Central Europe.

Whipping a Dead Horse

IT HAS been amusing to follow the reactions to the President's government-reorganization program ever since it was first proposed over a year ago. The first response was one of magnificent boredom: the Brownlow report was long and most of its sounded technical; the feeling was that Presidents have for many years tried to reform the executive departments, and there was little reason for thinking Mr. Roosevelt would succeed where the others had failed. Then came the court fight, and with it two results—an obsession about Mr. Roosevelt as a potential dictator, and a new technique for smearing his proposals. Part of that technique was for the Republican opposition to stay in the background like a puppet-master and pit Democrat against Democrat. Another part was propaganda through agencies like the Committee to Uphold Constitutional Government: frantic appeals for funds to fight threatened dictatorship, open letters by Amos Pinchot, telegrams by the thousand shepherded to Washington. By use of this technique the opponents of reorganization finally managed to drum up some excitement—at least among themselves. Mr. Pinchot and Frank Gannett have called the reorganization battle the "third crisis" of American history, the deduction being that the Revolution and the Civil War were also important.

What is striking is that these tactics are proving to be just duds. The Administration enemies have tried their hardest; Senator Byrd got the Brookings Institution to make a study of reorganization, and it came through with a half million words attacking the Brownlow plan. But we doubt whether even Senator Byrd's zeal extends to reading half a million words. Senators Bailey, Walsh, Clark, Burke, and Glass—Old Guard Democrats fresh from their victory in the court fight—are trying to rouse the country with cries that the republic is in danger. But the country has failed to rally. Even the columnists, who did yeomen's work saving the country last year, have stopped whipping the dead steed of public indignation. Raymond Clapper picks to pieces the opposition on the crucial question of reorganizing the Comptroller General's office, and concludes that the hysteria has fed merely on ignorance of what the Byrnes bill says. Arthur Krock has failed the tory coalition for once; his comment is one of those on-the-one-hand-on-the-other-hand affairs. And Walter Lippmann has written the most sensible comment we have yet read on the bill, telling the coalition in effect that they cannot hope to make another court crusade out of a job of reorganization that has long needed doing.

For the fact is, despite Senator Wheeler's continued determination to carry on his emotional life in public, that the reorganization plan is nothing to get emotional about. There is very little that is new in it. Congresses have been talking about reorganizing the executive branch of the government for almost half a century—ever since the Dockery committee of 1894; but no Congress has ever done very much about it. President Hoover came close to succeeding in the task at the end of his term, only to miss out finally. President Roosevelt got emergency authority to carry out a reorganization at the beginning of his term. The crucial fact, as Mr. Lippmann well points out, is that while Mr. Roosevelt had theoretically for a time almost dictatorial power to scramble the government bureaus, he made very little use of it. And the reason is that "while in theory the bill may seem to give him enormous power; in practice it gives him a large collection of political headaches."

The job of streamlining the executive to fit the needs of modern administration has to be done. It is idle for Congressmen to cry that they and not the President must be the ones to do it. The fact is that Congress cannot and will not do it, because any individual Congressman is the prisoner of the patronage system, and the sum of their commitments amounts to inaction. It requires a great degree of personal courage even for a President to do it. But the job is his, and if Mr. Roosevelt has the stamina, Congress would do well to let him try it. The Byrnes bill as it now stands allows Congress by a two-thirds' vote to overrule any rearrangement of bureaus and agencies the President may decide on. That is check enough for any exercise of arbitrary executive power. For the rest, the issue should be fought out on technical administrative grounds and not as if the Senate were fighting Bunker Hill all over again under klieg lights.

Larceny in Wall Street

RICHARD WHITNEY was the central figure in one of those rare combinations of circumstance in which it is possible to reduce the activities of a Wall Street operator to so simple a matter as larceny. As floor broker for J. P. Morgan and Company, he made a market for securities in which millions were lost by investors, but he himself was tripped up by a rather elementary operation. He borrowed money from banks on securities which did not belong to him. As a result some of the outstanding contenders for the governorship of New York seem to be falling over themselves in their anxiety to make a reputation by sending Mr. Whitney to jail. District Attorney Dewey, although a late starter, was the first to bring in an indictment. Mr. Whitney has pleaded guilty to grand larceny, the misappropriation of $100,000 from a trust fund left to his wife, his sister-in-law, Harvard University, and St. Paul's School in Concord, N. H. Attorney General Bennett, whose assistants made no secret of their feeling that Dewey had stolen a march on them, next took Mr. Whitney in tow, also on a charge of grand larceny, this time on an allegation that the broker stole $109,384 from the vault of the New York Yacht Club, of which he was treasurer.

The closing of Richard Whitney and Company, if the losses are only $2,000,000, is not a financial disaster, but Wall Street could hardly have been more embarrassed if J. P. Morgan had been caught helping himself from the collection plate at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. Mr. Whitney, five times head of the New York Stock Exchange, had long been one of the Street's chief spokesman for what is known as self-regulation of the investment markets. He seems to have been singularly unsuccessful in regulating his own affairs. According to District Attorney Dewey, investigation showed that Mr. Whitney had twice before taken securities from a trust fund to put up as collateral for loans. On those occasions the loans were repaid and the securities returned. The first time, in 1932, was about two years before Mr. Whitney pleaded that the Fletcher-Rayburn bill establishing the Securities and Exchange Commission would ruin the exchanges and nationalize American business. He said that the Stock Exchange, of which he was president, was ready without interference by government to "assist in every possible way in the prevention of fraudulent practices affecting Stock Exchange transactions, excessive speculation, and manipulation of security prices." The second occasion was in 1937. This was the year in which the investigation of the Wheeler subcommittee into the railroads revealed the failure of the Stock Exchange to disclose reports by an expert in its employ expressing grave doubt as to the financial stability of holding companies. The expert also frowned on listing Alleghany Corporation, a creature of the Morgans and the Van Sweringens, their allies in the railroad field. It will be recalled that Mr. Whitney was on the preferred list for 1,000 shares of Alleghany common at a time when its price was about $35. Alleghany won its listing on the Exchange.

Mr. Whitney's difficulties seem to have arisen from the fact that he and his firm were heavily involved in a small applejack-manufacturing company, Distilled Liquors Corporation. It had 148,750 shares outstanding. The Whitney firm and its partners held 139,400 shares. Question was raised in the investigation as to whether this did not constitute a "corner" in the stock. Unfortunately in this case the stock seems to have cornered Mr. Whitney. An attempt to peg the price, first at $15, later at $9, proved ruinous in a falling market; the announcement by the Stock Exchange that he was under investigation led to a voluntary declaration of insolvency. If the circumstances surrounding Mr. Whitney's fall illustrate the need for the regulation he fought, the absence of the panic fears that have accompanied the closing of brokerage houses under similar circumstances in years of "recession" demonstrates the wisdom of another measure to which Mr. Whitney and his banking colleagues violently objected—insurance of bank deposits.

The Whitney collapse may make the Street more humble in the future, and certainly more careful. The real story has not yet been told. Why did the House of Morgan, with so small an amount at stake, permit Whitney to become so entangled that he turned to larceny as his only way out? Why did the Stock Exchange take the unusual step of precipitating the collapse by publicly announcing that investigation was under way? Was action forced by the SEC? Finally we hope our friends in Moscow do not find too incredible this spectacle of a financial Old Bolshevik forced to confess peculations on a scale so unworthy the traditions of Wall Street.

TVA Jitters

BY PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, March 14

FRIDAY was wash day at the White House, but for all the President's heroic efforts over the tub a mountainous bundle of TVA linen seems surely destined for the senatorial laundry. What is happening to him is what usually happens to easygoing housekeepers. He should have pitched in long ago. Instead, good easy man, he allowed things to accumulate, and what would have been no more than a brisk job of straightening up must now be a thorough house-cleaning—and one out of which envious neighbors will do their worst to make a scandal.

By his dramatic action in summoning the TVA directors to confront one another in his presence and there prove or retract their mutual accusations, Mr. Roosevelt may have hoped to render further investigation superfluous. If so his intent was defeated by the stubborn refusal of Chairman Arthur Morgan to produce any facts in support of his charges against his fellow-directors, Harcourt Morgan and David Lilienthal. It is true the chairman cut such a sorry figure that the President would be on solid ground in demanding his resignation at once, but in the face of his broad and persistent intimation that he can and will present proof when Congress authorizes an inquiry, one seems inevitable.

The question is being asked: Does the President have power to remove a member of the board? The only method of removal expressly provided in the TVA act is by concurrent resolution of the two houses of Congress. Some lawyers contend that a Presidential power of removal is implied in the act. It will hardly matter in this case. Resignation or removal of one director or all three is virtually assured. The outcome probably will be determined by the prospective investigation. Unless Chairman Morgan makes a far better showing than he has thus far, nothing is likely to save him. The tame tory columnists and peanut partisans who labor so heavily at making a martyr of him have no genuine concern for his ultimate fate. He is just a handy mudball to heave at the TVA and will receive the same solicitude as one that has been thrown.

His defiant attitude at the White House furnished the most striking corroboration of his colleagues' charge that he is temperamentally unfit to exercise a divided authority. Obviously he was under the most compelling ethical obligation to produce facts in support of his charges of dishonesty, indecency, conspiracy, and intrigue—charges which, as Lilienthal properly said, are libelous if untrue. And certainly he was morally obligated to render an accounting to the man who appointed him and them. No one who takes the trouble to read the eighty-page transcript of the hearing can fail to be impressed by the President's fairness in the face of insistent provocation. Anyone who, after reading it, is willing to compare the proceeding to a Soviet treason trial would do well to take himself to the nearest psychiatric clinic.

Because of their dramatic content news accounts have emphasized Chairman Morgan's charges, and his refusal to substantiate them. More significant to me, on the basis of the record, was one of the charges leveled against him by Lilienthal and Harcourt Morgan—and the evidence which they adduced to support it. The charge was that he actively and persistently interfered with and seriously hampered the preparation and presentation of the government's case in the vital injunction suit brought—and lost—by eighteen utility companies.

To the TVA the outcome of that proceeding was a matter of life or death. It was the culmination and quintessence of all the legal attacks by the combined forces of the power companies. In it all the tactics of obstruction were summed up and put to the test. Yet the record presented by Lilienthal and Harcourt Morgan appeared to show that the chairman sabotaged the government's case from beginning to end, and even sought to impeach some of the government's witnesses. What impresses me most in this connection is not the angry denunciations from the other two directors, but the coldly bitter objections of the lawyers who handled the case. It is not amiss to note that one of these lawyers—and the one who expressed the deepest indignation—was John Lord O'Brian, who served with some distinction as assistant attorney general in the Administration of Herbert Hoover. He was retained in this case as special counsel.

In the midst of the trial Chairman Morgan charged that a number of TVA engineers had complained to him that they were being required to give evidence of a misleading character. Challenged by Mr. O'Brian and James L. Fly to name the engineers, the chairman refused. Already burdened with the task of conducting the government's case against the best lawyers that utility money could hire, TVA counsel went to the trouble of interviewing every engineer who had been called or was scheduled to be called as a witness. They found nothing to support the chairman's nasty accusation.

Considering the chairman's unblemished personal reputation and his excellent record as engineer and administrator before joining the TVA, it seems logical to conclude that considerable provocation must have been required to push him to such extremities. The conclusion derives a color of corroboration from what is known of Lilienthal's nature and methods. The transcript of the hearing itself leaves little doubt that this astute, ambitious, tough-minded young lawyer overlooked no angles in compiling a record against his older colleague. It may be an unpleasant characteristic, but it does not impair the force of the record. That can only be done by facts—facts such as the President asked for and was denied.

Although Senator Norris still thinks the investigation should be made by the Federal Trade Commission, to avoid partisan sniping and personal buffoonery, he is resigned to a Senate inquiry. Since a select committee is indicated, and since it would be appointed by Vice-President Garner, always a friend of the TVA, there seems to be no great cause for alarm. In view of the tragic aspect of the whole matter, and considering that a certain amount of clowning cannot be avoided, no great harm can be done by making Senator Bridges a member of the committee.

[In last week's dispatch from Mr. Anderson it was stated that whereas once the N. A. M. bribed Congressmen and page boys, now it attempts to bribe "whole committees." The last word should have been "communities" not "committees."—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Europe Learns from Vienna

BY ROBERT DELL

Paris, March 14

HITLER'S annexation of Austria came sooner than anybody had expected, owing to Hitler's desire to prevent a plebiscite that would certainly have resulted in a large majority for Austrian independence. The absorption of Austria puts Czechoslovakia in immediate danger, for the Czechoslovak-Austrian border is not fortified, whereas there are strong fortifications on the German frontier. The Czechoslovak government and the people are meeting the situation with calm firmness. A Prague paper, Pravo Lido, spoke for the whole nation when it said yesterday, "We are not Austria and will never in any circumstances follow the example of Austria." Long ago steps were taken to make possible rapid mobilization whenever necessary, and the Czechoslovak army is excellent. The government has declared, in reply to questions from Paris and London, that Czechoslovakia will yield to no intimidation and will resist invasion by force. It has been assured by both the French and the Russian government that France and Russia will fulfil all their obligations under their respective treaties with Czechoslovakia.

On Saturday Sir Eric Phipps, the British ambassador in Paris, was informed by Delbos that the cause of Czechoslovakia was the cause of France, and the same information was given to Lord Halifax by the French ambassador in London. If, therefore, Hitler deals with Czechoslovakia as he has dealt with Austria, the result will be war. He has assured the Czechoslovak government of his pacific intentions, but it is remembered in Prague that in 1936 he solemnly undertook to respect the independence of Austria.

Neville Chamberlain

Courtesy London Tribune

The last illusion of those who persisted in believing that Mussolini could be detached from Hitler and induced to defend Austria has been destroyed. This illusion persisted at the Quai d'Orsai up to Friday, when the French chargé d'affaires in Rome was instructed to call on Foreign Minister Ciano, who refused to see him. Nothing about Austrian events was published in Italy until Saturday, when the press approved Hitler's action. Gayda said in the Giornale d'Italia that Italy would do nothing to hinder a natural stage in German national history and mentioned that Italy had formally abandoned Austria on March 1, 1937. How anybody can have imagined that the Rome-Berlin axis would exist if Mussolini had not abandoned Austria to Hitler passes my understanding. Yet eminent diplomatists like Sir Robert Vansittart, chief adviser to the Foreign Secretary, appear to have imagined it.

It seems that Hitler did not inform his Italian vassal in advance of his intention to seize Austria, but he has since given Mussolini an assurance that he will always respect the Brenner frontier. German and Italian officers have been fraternizing on that frontier. Mussolini cannot be very happy about the future. He has got nothing from his betrayal of Austria except a worthless promise from Hitler. His only hope now is in the British government. Hitler cannot save him from financial and economic catastrophe.

In France one of the first results of Hitler's coup was Blum's change in his ministerial plans and his attempt to form a government of national union, including Communists and men from the center and right who are loyal republicans, not royalists or pro-fascists. Blum particularly wanted Paul Reynaud as Foreign Minister. The attempt failed because the Communists were ready to subordinate their party and class interests to the interests of the nation, but the center and right were not, excepting Reynaud and a few others. Indignation against the latest example of Hitler's bad faith was intensified by a feeling that it is the inevitable consequence of Anglo-French policy and repeated capitulations. There is great bitterness against Chamberlain and Halifax, only hinted at as a rule in the press, but openly stated by Gabriel Peri in Humanité. Had the British government agreed to the French proposal, immediately after the Berchtesgaden ultimatum, that England and France should tell Hitler they would tolerate no further interference in Austria, he might have been checked without war. The proposal was rejected by Chamberlain, who explained away the Berchtesgaden ultimatum and pretended that there was a voluntary agreement between Hitler and Schuschnigg.

Moreover, in his speech on Eden's resignation Chamberlain encouraged Hitler to go ahead. Saturday the British and French ambassadors in Berlin made what are described as energetic protests, when it was too late. It was officially announced in Germany that Hitler had rejected the protests as inadmissible—another humiliation for England and France.

Now Austria is given up in Paris as a bad job, and interest is concentrated on acting in time to save Czechoslovakia from the same fate. If England and France and Russia all warned Hitler that any attack on Czechoslovakia would mean war with all of them, Czechoslovakia would be saved without war. The British government has been asked what it will do, and its reply is awaited. Much depends on the policy of the new French government. If Paul-Boncour lives up to his recent expressions of opinion, his policy will not be that of Delbos. He has been condemning the non-intervention farce and advocating closer cooperation with Russia, a firm attitude toward fascist dictators, and less subservience to the British Foreign Office. In March, 1936, when Hitler repudiated and violated the Locarno treaty, Boncour as a member of the Sarraut Cabinet strongly advocated mobilization.

Gangster Triumphant

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

IT HAPPENED in broad daylight. The small man looked around quickly as if he expected help from the man just behind him. Then he made a spasmodic move as if to defend himself. But the gunman walked toward him with steady, cold purpose. In a moment the small man was lying on the sidewalk, and it was all over. There were plenty of witnesses. The man behind the victim watched the attack intently, at close range; but he never made a move from beginning to end. Two other rather burly men, looking on from a little distance, seemed disturbed during the attack. They glanced at each other several times; once the bigger of the two frowned and shook his head; the other shrugged his shoulders. Afterward, while the body was still lying huddled at the feet of the gunman, they both rushed up and expostulated with him. He merely smiled. It was broad daylight, and the whole thing was clearly seen by many bystanders.

So Austria was murdered.

Of course it was not as simple as that; no crime is. The causes reach far back into the history of the relations of the gunman and his victim; they ramify in many directions. But once the crime has been committed, it is well to concentrate for a moment on the final fact: Austria is finished, and Germany stands over it, the perfect exemplification of brutal success, the gangster triumphant. Here we see the victory of pure force, untarnished by scruple, pity, hesitation, indecision; contemptuous of the weakness of its victim, scornfully certain of the vacillations of other interested powers. Here is final proof of what no longer needed demonstration—that a ruthless nation driving ahead toward its own goals cannot be stopped by inaction, compromise, and an anxious hope that perhaps the gun isn't really loaded.

Hitler's gun is loaded, and he knows his goals. He has announced them to the world. He is achieving them one by one. First, the wiping out of the Treaty of Versailles; second, the conquest of Austria; third—Czechoslovakia? He has drawn his territorial aims on maps and hung them in each German schoolroom. Every ordinary citizen in every nation knows them—everyone, it seems, except the diplomats, the men in power. To them alone the future is strangely obscure. They confer and bargain and exchange polite expressions of confidence attached to polite inquiries and requests. They hunt boars. They attend picturesque ceremonies. They visit Hitler in his charming Berchtesgaden eyrie. And now that it is all over they are shocked, terribly, terribly shocked. Mr. Chamberlain, who had been discussing colonial demands with the new German Foreign Minister, got the first hint of Hitler's intentions in Austria just before Herr Ribbentrop's departure from London. Lord Halifax, who knew his Nazis so well that he was sent to Berlin to prepare the way for the final, friendly settlement of German claims, and for this high achievement was then made Foreign Minister—Lord Halifax was caught completely by surprise and was reported pacing up and down his office "holding his forehead like a man distracted and exclaiming: 'Horrible! Horrible! I never thought they would do it!' "

Only his predecessor, Anthony Eden, knew what was known by every bus-driver and housewife in London, and his amazing perspicacity first drove him to defeat and isolation within the Cabinet, and then drove him out of it. Now that he has gone and the corpse of Austria lies sprawled across the Central European highway, the men who forced his resignation are emerging from their astonishment and preparing to adopt (too late?) his point of view and policy.

But the crime has older roots. Along the path of Austria's post-war history stand certain datestones marking stages in its sure but uneven progress toward extinction. One was the Treaty of St. Germain, which set up a new Austrian state. The second—February, 1934—was the slaughter by Dollfuss, at the instigation of Mussolini, of the Socialist workers of Vienna. The third—August, 1934—was the abortive Nazi coup and the assassination of Dollfuss. The fourth and last—February, 1938—was the meeting at Berchtesgaden at which the Austrian Chancellor agreed to Hitler's terms.

These dates mark crucial points in the history of the crime. The inexcusable Treaty of St. Germain, dismembering the old Hapsburg empire, carved out Austria, an amiable, impotent dwarf, dependent from the first on other countries and forbidden by the very terms of its birth certificate to unite with its stronger sister state, the new German Republic. Austria survived somehow, on bad debts and scenery and hopes; and the Socialist government of Vienna even created, out of almost nothing, a brilliant demonstration of municipal socialism in action. But always the Austrians looked toward union with Germany as a way out of their economic impasse—a reasonable ambition which aroused spasms of fear in the foreign offices of the Allied states. In 1931 a proposal for a mere customs union between the two German countries created an international financial panic.

The customs union was not established and Anschluss was fatally postponed. But Austria's disequilibrium was not overcome. The countryside—poor, reactionary, and Catholic—resented Socialist Vienna. The federal government represented the Catholic hinterland; Vienna represented only Vienna—and the working-class hopes of the world. Armed forces sprang up on both sides. Difficulties multiplied. When the peasant premier, Dollfuss, ended the parliament in the spring of 1933, he encountered no great opposition. This was partly because Hitler had become chancellor and dictator of Germany, and Austria was being deluged with a flood of threats and propaganda from another source. Nazi groups, organized in Austria, practiced new and more ruthless forms of terrorism. Hitler openly declared his intention to annex Austria, but this was not the kind of Anschluss Austrians had hoped for. Dollfuss looked southward for protection, and Mussolini adopted him.

Mussolini did not—and does not—want Hitler on the Brenner Pass; he wanted Austria to continue as a helpless barrier between the two hungry dictatorships. To survive in this role it was necessary to strengthen the central authority—and suddenly Dollfuss became a real dictator. He disbanded the Socialist Schutzbund and allowed the Heimwehr to assume more power; he announced a new authoritarian constitution which would have abolished the independent trade unions. The Socialists fought back, knowing that their existence was at stake. Dollfuss's struggle with the Nazis grew more active and complex. And finally a simple solution of the situation was proposed by Mussolini. Dollfuss was to clear the decks by wiping out the Socialists.

And that act marked the second fatal step in Austria's collapse. The workers were slaughtered in the streets and in their homes—the fine municipal tenements built by their Socialist government. Their defense was courageous beyond belief but it failed—through inefficiency and democratic scruples and an honest dislike of bloodshed. And when it was over, a thousand workers were dead, and the chance of withstanding Hitler by the creation of an anti-Nazi front had been blasted out of existence.

Then came the Nazi coup. Dollfuss was killed, but his government survived. Why? What held Hitler's hand in 1934? The Socialists were crushed; his own followers were active and arrogant. Two things saved Austrian independence at that time: (1) the Austrian masses failed to rise; in spite of disorders here and there, no genuine response greeted the news—falsely spread by radio—of the government's collapse; (2) Mussolini mobilized the Italian army on the Brenner Pass. So Hitler pretended he had never sanctioned a Nazi coup in Austria, and he let his henchmen go to prison and the gallows.

But four years have passed. Hitler and Mussolini are military allies. Germany has rearmed. The Treaty of Versailles is all but forgotten; the League is not even appealed to by the victims of aggression. The Rhineland has been fortified. Every act of defiance has met with success. But Hitler has only begun. The time has come to fulfil those other announced aims; and the first is the one that stands at the head of the Nazi program—all Germans must be united under a single flag. Then the rest must follow, as fast as possible, for time is also important. Germans, apparently, can live on pride and promises, but factories cannot operate on them even for a day. Germany needs resources—as well as more Germans. So Berchtesgaden and the surrender of Schuschnigg.

Schuschnigg's desperate last-second gesture of defiance was important for only one reason. It revealed with sickening clarity what he and his predecessor had sacrificed when they killed the Socialists and smashed the labor movement. In his extremity last week Schuschnigg appealed to the workers of Austria. And out they came, bravely and deliberately, to help Schuschnigg save Austria; making no conditions except that they be permitted at least the same privileges as the Nazis, asking only for arms and a chance to fight for the government that had driven them underground and killed their comrades. But all their valiant gesture accomplished was to mark them out as the first victims of the new Nazi terror.

Schuschnigg called on the workers just four years too late. This time the Austrian Nazis were ready; they rose at Hitler's command. This time German troops poured across the border, closed the frontiers, occupied the centers; and bombers circled over Vienna. This time the handful of Italian border guards at the Brenner politely greeted the motorized German unit that swept up to the pass. And this time the Western powers were divided and frightened, out-bluffed and out-maneuvered. So Hitler is the dominant figure in Europe today, the gangster triumphant.

War in the Peace Movement

BY JAMES WECHSLER

I

THE leaders of two prominent peace societies were mournfully appraising the outlook for world peace. Mr. X bitterly insisted that the President's failure to invoke the neutrality law in the Far East should be converted into another "Supreme Court issue." Mr. Y, having been weaned on the League of Nations, still drew spiritual strength from Geneva. Neither mentioned the private boycott of Japanese goods. Their talk ran the gamut of human interests from monetary stabilization to lower tariffs—and then to the long view.

"When the next war is over," said Mr. X finally, "we've got to prevent the nations from writing another Versailles."

"A peace without victory; then peaceful change," intoned Mr. Y.

The next day Mr. X quietly asked one of the foundations to finance an exclusive study of peace treaties.

So did Mr. Y.

Concern over the next peace treaty is no longer considered premature among some of America's more mellowed peace leaders; to outsiders it may seem like making plans for an ambitious social life after your funeral. Yet on the surface the American peace movement is enjoying an unprecedented boom. Its leaders used to address audiences which remained absent in large numbers; they wrote letters to the editor when their existence was questioned. Now they snuggle into headlines beside Admiral Leahy. Anti-war literature is being read as well as printed more widely than ever before. Certainly there has never been a period more congenial to the growth of the movement.

But something is wrong. For the established peace societies have tragically failed to exert any pronounced or positive influence upon the course of American foreign policy. They debate passionately among themselves; they hurl occasional epithets in unison; they address feverish and conflicting appeals to public opinion. Meanwhile, American policy returns to the traditional pattern of a big navy which even the admirals don't understand, of preparedness without perspective. While the peace leaders waver between jitters and paralysis, between futile hysteria and fatalistic "long view," the old preparedness lobby dominates. A glimpse of the peace movement in action—and inaction—may throw some light on the causes of its failure and explain the growing interest in peace treaties.

Strictly speaking, the phrase "peace movement" is a euphemism. What passes under that name is a strange, confusing array of more than fifty national organizations which want peace, in one form or another. Many of the organizations don't want anything except peace—at varying prices. Others also want prohibition restored or the equal-rights amendment passed or God more widely publicized. Still others insist that they don't want anything at all; they are just "educational." Most of them have nothing against capitalism. Whatever their individual reasons for existence, they jealously guard their field of action, with dark frowns for those who try to muscle in.

But they have certain characteristics in common. Most of them were founded in the post-war years. They articulated that ardent idealism which demanded the creation of permanent peace machinery. World Court, League of Nations, disarmament—these phrases were their ritual. In practical politics they were appallingly ineffectual. Yet despite persistent rebuffs the peace leaders of that period remained cheerful. A deeply religious animation—which originally inspired most of them—bolstered them against the setbacks of the real world; the character of their constituencies enabled them to scorn immediate results. For the followers of the peace movement ranged from devout, crusading idealists to sober men and women who sent in their dues as faithfully as they remained members of their churches and alumni associations. It was a middle-class movement, recruiting women who were seeking a "cause," educators who were anxious to make some frail contribution to adult society, clergymen who wanted to enthrone Christianity in a harsh world, enlightened men of moderate wealth who wanted to distinguish themselves from Babbitt without causing too much of a row. Peace was the answer. It still is.

In those years the peace organizations rendered some real services to popular understanding. They did not do a great deal more. They endowed the present-day movement with a profoundly middle-class heritage and a marked inferiority complex. They encumbered it with a host of prejudices, divisions, and false hopes, with hostility toward "radical" or "violent" techniques (even when most of the peace leaders were being labeled red by respectable people) and distrust of or indifference toward the labor movement (which remained emphatically indifferent in return).

In 1933 it became apparent that Something Had to Be Done. Still pleading for universal disarmament, the societies were confronted by the fact of aggression. In an effort to reconstruct their battered lines, a group of the leading peace organizations established the National Peace Conference to serve as a clearing-house, to prevent duplication, and, most important, offer a solid front whenever possible in the political arena. As a clearing-house the conference has done admirably. As a solid front it firmly stands for peace in general—and straddles most issues of immediate relevance.

The National Peace Conference includes forty-one affiliated organizations. They range from membership bodies to committees, from peace organizations to the W. C. T. U. When the membership of all these agencies is totaled, the figure passes 40,000,000. But that total should not be taken too seriously. Subtract liberally for duplication. (Thus while 6,000,000 women are represented in the conference by the National Committee on the Cause and Cure of War, which unites eleven women's groups, many of these groups have individual representation also.) Subtract further those persons who know only vaguely that they belong to an organization which belongs to the conference. What you get is an unknown remainder of the "peace-minded." To them must be added the members of such "outlaw" organizations as the American League for Peace and Democracy (formerly Against War and Fascism), which optimistically claims more than 3,000,000 supporters; it is barred from the N. P. C. because it harbors Communists in its ranks.

Even with these reductions, however, the National Peace Conference represents a numerically impressive group. If all its affiliates could agree on propositions more urgent than lower tariffs, they would be more formidable. A cross-section of the conference will reveal why it is a sadly divided camp.

Reading from right to left, we see first the most respectable bodies, strictly committed to inaction. These have the most distinguished trustees, the largest budgets, and the longest view. Of this company the most august is the Carnegie Endowment. The Carnegie Endowment made an exhaustive survey of the cost of the last war; it will undoubtedly make a similar survey of the cost of the next. As its bulletin explains: "That more wars may take place is regarded as inevitable; to prevent them is not the work of the peace endowment." Its work is rather to provide nearly a million dollars a year primarily for research, which future historians may acknowledge more ardently than future war veterans.

Suffering from comparable reticence, but for entirely different reasons, are the large religious organizations which represent the numerical majority of the National Peace Conference. Their real strength can only be estimated by conjecture. A church leader may like to pretend, in peace politics, that he speaks for millions of devout constituents; he knows that on crucial issues of national policy he can speak for himself alone. Thus the millions of Protestant constituents of the Department of International Justice and Good-Will of the Federal Council of Churches undoubtedly cherish international justice and good-will. But how many are for isolation, how many for collective action, and how many are just "peace-minded"? The large women's organizations contain members with similarly discordant views. A notable advance was registered when delegates to the last conference of the National Committee on the Cause and Cure of War reached agreement on a program of collective security.

That forty-one agencies with so diverse a membership have set out to find peace through the National Peace Conference may be a reassuring note. That all their members will vigorously support a program which their leaders write is as likely as an outburst of mass picketing by the rank and file of the Union League Club. The fact is that the overwhelming majority of member organizations in the conference are not geared for pressure action—except the militant circulation of reading lists.

